That we have known Him.—The context must determine who is meant by αὐτόν, God the Father or Christ; the reason must be sought in the section itself, where in vv. 3-6 we have first the repeated forms αὐτόν, αὐτόν and αὐτόν and once ἐκείνος, v. 6. As the latter evidently denotes Christ, so the former applies with equal certainty to God the Father. Hence it was not the immediately preceding verse in which Christ is spoken of, which induced the Apostle to use αὐτόν and to understand thereby the Father, but rather the all-controlling thought, "God is Light," ch. i. 5.—So Bede, Oecumenius, Erasmus, Lücke, Jachmann, Baumgarten-Crusius, de Wette, Brückner, Düsterdieck, Huther, Ebrard. It is referred to Christ by Augustine, Episcopius, Grotius, Luther, Calov, Wolf, Lange, Sander, Neander. Socinus and Calvin are undecided. The word γινώσκειν, occurring twice in juxtaposition, bears each time substantially the same meaning: to know. But to know God is not a matter of the understanding only, a knowledge, a knowing, but matter of the whole man; it is an inward life, both matter of the will and of the mind; an entering into, a perceiving in order to be penetrated thereby, in order to receive it in receptivity. The object of this knowing becomes the substance of him that knows; the nature of the object of our knowing determines His coming near us and entering into relationship with us. God cannot be known without Himself; it is only by converse with Him that He allows Himself to be known (Oecumenius; συνεπρόσθηνεν αὐτόν, Clarus "societatem habemus cum eo"); the knowledge of God presupposes and promotes life-fellowship with Him. This last particular is also intimated by the perfect γνωσάμεν; the real fact of having known Him is described as finished, attended by an after-effect and still further development in continued and ever-growing knowledge; it is parallel to μενωμεν ἔχοντες μετ' αὐτόν, ch. i. 6. Col. 3. "Inward affinity of life, real appurtenance is the unconditional pre-supposition both of knowing and loving; for only those in affinity with each other know and love each other" (Düsterdieck). We, the Christians, renewed in Christ, created to His image, are those who know. Hence it is false to take γινώσκειν like the Hebrew יָדָעַתִּי in the sense of to love (Carpzov, S. G. Lange), or only as a theoretical understanding of Divine truth (Socinus, Episcopius); nor may we intermingle knowledge and love, and regard the latter as essential to the former (Bede, Oecumenius, Lücke), although knowledge is conditioned by love (de Wette).—[It is not mere theoretical knowledge, but vital, experimental knowledge flowing from God, being received into the heart, and His influencing our thoughts, our will and our actions.—M.]

If we keep His Commandments.—The verb τηρεῖν, probably connected with τέρας, [more probably with τήρος, a watch, M.], a sign, denotes properly to pay attention, to observe, ἀνεμῶν (Eccl. xi. 4), τῇ φυλακῇ (Acts xii. 6), the beloved disciples (Jno. xvii. 11 sqq.), τὴν ἐνότητά τοῦ πνεύματος (Eph. iv. 8), ἐαυτόν (1 Jno. v. 18). Hence to preserve [keep in safety] (observe, servare) from loss, danger, injury. Fear, selfishness, hatred or love may be the motives of such preserving; the object of τηρεῖν enables us to infer the motive. His commandments—the commandments of God the Father; for the reference to Christ here is valid not so much because He gave commandments as because He kept them (cf. v. 6). To keep the commandments is not the same as ἐν φωνῇ περπατεῖν (ch. i. 7), but an indispensable part of it, and moreover a distinct, cognizable part of the greater, wide and profound whole, and as a sign or token peculiarly fitted to mark a conclusion. The commandments of God are clear, simple, well-defined; the expression of His will, given as much for His glory as for our salvation, evidences of His holy love, of His sanctifying compassion, and of His salutary righteousness; they answer to His Being, and in like manner to the nature of His Law, and particularly to the nature of His creatures. If they originate in the love of God, the motive of obedience to them must also be the love of God, who gave them, and the love of themselves as the gifts of His love. But the words themselves do not warrant the opinion of Augustine and Bede, that John insists here upon love. He only demands the unexceptional keeping of the commandments of God, and by the use of the Article and the Plural (τὰς ἐντολάς), excludes any and every arbitrary selection. He lays down a sure and infallible token; and the erroneous view just stated proves it to be such. But he does not lay down this keeping as a fact by the use of ὅτι, but as a supposition by ἐάν; with this agrees also the choice of the word τηρεῖν instead of ποιεῖν (which is likewise conditioned by the words of our Lord in Matth. xxviii. 20: τηρεῖν πάντα ὅσα ἐνετειλάμεν ὑμῖν). We cannot do, but only keep the commandments of God. And even this is very limited, unsatisfactory, liable to frequent and manifold interruptions. Least of all can it be John's meaning (according to ch. i. 8-10) to suppose Christians capable of fully keeping and practising the commandments of God. But notwith-

- 5 truth is not in him. But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God
 6 perfected*: hereby know we that we are in him. He that saith he abideth in him
 7 ought himself also so<sup>7</sup> to walk, even as he walked. Brethren,<sup>8</sup> I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning.
 The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning.<sup>9</sup> 8 Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you;<sup>10</sup> because the darkness is past,<sup>11</sup> and the true light now shineth. He that saith 10 he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in<sup>12</sup> darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in 11 him.<sup>13</sup> But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that<sup>14</sup> darkness hath blinded his eyes.

Verse 3. [<sup>1</sup> German: "And hereby we know;" the emphatic do know in E. V. suggests an idea foreign from the text.—M.]

[<sup>2</sup> German: "That we have known him." Lillie: "Have attained to this knowledge." Where knowledge is spoken of merely as present, γνωσας, or οἶδα is used, not εἶπεν. See John's epistles passim.—E. V. vv. 13, 14; ch. iii. 6; iv. 16; 2 John i., and generally elsewhere.—M.]

[<sup>3</sup> Cod. Sin. has φύλαξεν for τηρώμεν; which is, however, given as well. The future by no means suits the Apostle's thought.

Verse 4. [<sup>4</sup> A. B. Cod. Sin. al. insert ὅτι before εἶπεν. John usually employs the oratio indirecta with the infm., as in vv. 6, 9; ch. i. 6, or temp. fm. with ὅτι, as in ch. i. 8, 10. The oratio directa with ὅτι occurs only in one other place, ch. iv. 20. It is difficult to understand why ὅτι should have been introduced here from there. [Rather: ὅτι was possibly omitted by later transcribers, on account of the difficulty it presented.—M.]

Verse 5. [<sup>6</sup> German: "In such an one the love of God is truly perfected." Lillie: "Truly in this man hath the love of God been perfected."—M.]

Verse 6. [<sup>7</sup> C. Cod. Sin. insert οὐτως before περιπατεῖν. There is no reason why it should be inserted, although it might have seemed superfluous to some. [It is wanting in A. B. Vulg.—M.] It renders the thought very emphatic.

Verse 7. [<sup>8</sup> German: "Beloved" M.] ἀδελφοί, Oecum, Mill, Wetstein, is weakly supported; γαλήνη is manifestly the correct reading [A. B. C. Cod. Sin. Syr. Vulg. Griesb. Bengel, al. sustain it.—M.]

Verse 8. [<sup>10</sup> μὴ, B. C. Cod. Sin., although the more difficult reading, is better authenticated than μὴν (A.)

[<sup>11</sup> σκότι instead of σκότις lacks the weight of authority, and is clear as to its tendency or origin from the contrast between the economy of the Old and New Testaments.

[German: "Passeth away," παράγεται. The Present should by all means be retained. German: already, ἤδη, better than now.—M.]

Verse 9. [<sup>12</sup> German: "The darkness," ἡ σκότις, both here and below in v. 11. The omission of the Article in E. V. obscures the sense.—M.]

Verse 10. [<sup>13</sup> German: "An offence" or "stumbling-block is not in him."—M.]

Verse 11. [<sup>14</sup> German: "The darkness;" "because that darkness" (E. V.) is perplexing and ambiguous, better retain the more correct rendering, "because the darkness," ὅτι ἡ σκότις. German: "where he goeth to."—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Connection. The call to the contest with sin on the ground of the Saviour's antecedent propitiation and lasting intercession is connected with this section of the mark of the true knowledge of and fellowship with God, as that of vital Christianity: see whether thou really art the object of the intercession of the Sinless One with Him who is Light! The malis securitas and the utilis timor move the Apostle to set this section with the given marks of a true Christian into close connection with the immediately preceding section of the atonement for the sins of the whole world, and namely, as a link in the chain of thoughts depending on v. 5: "That God is Light." His object is to excite a salutary, moral seriousness of purpose in his readers; their obedience to the commandments of God, and especially their practice of brotherly love are given to them as tokens by which they may determine whether they are really in God's kingdom of grace. He warns, therefore, "against the false security of a show-Christianity," and guards his churches "against false confidence and carnal security" (Neander); similar are the views of the greater number of commentators, from Episcopius and Calov down to Düsterdieck, who, however, confines himself to pointing out the dependence of this section also on the leading thought in ch. i. 5, 6, while the former take too narrow views of the connection with ch. ii. 1, 2. The copula and denotes the close connection and appurtenance of the sequel to the preceding section. Hence it is not correct to make here the beginning of a new section, (Sander: "Having thus far spoken of the proofs of salvation, he now proceeds to exhort his readers to its preservation"), or to connect with ch. i. 5, 6 (Huther).

Obedience to the commandments of God is the general characteristic of true Christianity. (v. v. 3-8).

VER. 8. And hereby we know.—John uses ἐν τοῖς in order to refer to the sequel, as here, ch. iii. 16, 19, 24; iv. 9, 10, 13, 17; v. 2, or to the preceding, as in v. 5: iii. 10; the reference is generally plain from the context. In the former case the Apostle is wont to indicate the mark whereby we know, by the addition of the preposition ἐκ (iv. 13), or by δὲ (ch. iii. 16, 19; iv. 9, 10), or ἵνα (ch. iv. 17), or ἐάν (vv. 3, 5), or ὅταν (ch. v. 2), according as he wants to supply either "a really existing, historically given and objectively sure token" (Düsterdieck), on one only ideally existing and described as possible or conditional. The Apostle, who lays a strong emphasis on knowing, understands to express in writing the different shades of thought with the same nicety and correctness. ["John uses the formula ἐν τοῖς γινώσκουμεν first as referring the demonstrative pronoun back to what has gone before, as e. g. in our v. 5, and in ch. iii. 10. If, however, the demonstrative pronoun in this or a like formula, looks onward, and the token itself, with the cir-circumstance of which it is a token, follows, he expresses this token variously and significantly, according to the various shades of meaning to be conveyed. Sometimes the token implied in the demonstrative, follows in a separate sentence, as in ch. iv. 2; sometimes the construction is slightly changed, and the sentence begun with ἐν τούτῳ is not regularly brought to a close, but continued in a new and correlative form; e. g. ch. iii. 24, where ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκουμεν is taken up by ἐκ τοῦ πν. And this way of expression is closely parallel to that where ὅτι completes the construction begun with ἐν τούτῳ. So ch. iii. 16, 19; iv. 9, 10, 18. In these cases the full objective reality of the token, as a fact, is set forth. It is an undoubted fact that He has given us of His Spirit, that He has sent His Son: and from these facts our inference is secure to the other facts in question, that He abideth in us, etc. But in other passages we find instead of this ὅτι an ὅτι, ch. iv. 17, or an ἐάν, as here, John xiii. 85, or ὅταν, ch. v. 2. This ἐάν, ὅταν, mark the token implied in ἐν τούτῳ as one not actually existent, an historical or objectively certain fact; but as a possible contingency, something hypothetically and conditionally assumed: in other words as ideal." Düsterdieck, pp. 172, sq.—[M.J.] He is concerned with the fact,

That we have known Him.—The context must determine who is meant by αὐτόν, God the Father or Christ; the reason must be sought in the section itself, where in vv. 3-6 we have first the repeated forms αὐτοῦ, αὐτόν and αὐτόν and once ἐκείνος, v. 6. As the latter evidently denotes Christ, so the former applies with equal certainty to God the Father. Hence it was not the immediately preceding verse in which Christ is spoken of, which induced the Apostle to use αὐτόν and to understand thereby the Father, but rather the all-controlling thought, "God is Light," ch. i. 5.—So Bede, Oecumenius, Erasmus, Lücke, Jachmann, Baumgarten-Crusius, de Wette, Brückner, Düsterdieck, Huther, Ebrard. It is referred to Christ by Augustine, Episcopius, Grotius, Luther, Calov, Wolf, Lange, Sander, Neander. Socinus and Calvin are undecided. The word γινώσκειν, occurring twice in juxtaposition, bears each time substantially the same meaning: to know. But to know God is not a matter of the understanding only, a knowledge, a knowing, but matter of the whole man; it is an inward life, both matter of the will and of the mind; an entering into, a perceiving in order to be penetrated thereby, in order to receive it in receptivity. The object of this knowing becomes the substance of him that knows; the nature of the object of our knowing determines His coming near us and entering into relationship with us. God cannot be known without Himself; it is only by converse with Him that He allows Himself to be known (Oecumenius; συνεπρόσθετον αὐτόν, Clarius "societatem habemus cum eo"); the knowledge of God presupposes and promotes life-fellowship with Him. This last particular is also intimated by the perfect ἐγνώκαμεν; the real fact of having known Him is described as finished, attended by an after-effect and still further development in continued and ever-growing knowledge; it is parallel to κοινωνίαν ἔχειν μετ' αὐτοῦ, ch. i. 6. Col. 3. "Inward affinity of life, real appurtenance is the unconditional pre-supposition both of knowing and loving; for only those in affinity with each other know and love each other" (Düsterdieck). We, the Christians, renewed in Christ, created to His image, are those who know. Hence it is false to take γινώσκειν like the Hebrew יָדַעַ in the sense of to love (Carpzov, S. G. Lange), or only as a theoretical understanding of Divine truth (Socius, Episcopius); nor may we intermingle knowledge and love, and regard the latter as essential to the former (Bede, Oecumenius, Lücke), although knowledge is conditioned by love (de Wette).—[It is not mere theoretical knowledge, but vital, experimental knowledge flowing from God, being received into the heart, and His influencing our thoughts, our will and our actions.—M.J.]

If we keep His Commandments.—The verb τηρεῖν, probably connected with τέρας, [more probably with τήρος, a watch, M.J.], a sign, denotes properly to pay attention, to observe, ἀνεμῶν (Eccl. xi. 4), τῇ φυλακῇ (Acts xii. 6), the beloved disciples (Jno. xvii. 11 sqq.), τῇ ἐνότητι τοῦ πνεύματος (Eph. iv. 8), ἐαυτὸν (1 Jno. v. 18). Hence to preserve [keep in safety] (observe, servare) from loss, danger, injury. Fear, selfishness, hatred or love may be the motives of such preserving; the object of τηρεῖν enables us to infer the motive. His commandments—the commandments of God the Father; for the reference to Christ here is valid not so much because He gave commandments as because He kept them (cf. v. 6). To keep the commandments is not the same as ἐν φωνῇ περιπατεῖν (ch. i. 7), but an indispensable part of it, and moreover a distinct, cognizable part of the greater, wide and profound whole, and as a sign or token peculiarly fitted to mark a conclusion. The commandments of God are clear, simple, well-defined; the expression of His will, given as much for His glory as for our salvation, evidences of His holy love, of His sanctifying compassion, and of His salutary righteousness; they answer to His Being, and in like manner to the nature of His Law, and particularly to the nature of His creatures. If they originate in the love of God, the motive of obedience to them must also be the love of God, who gave them, and the love of themselves as the gifts of His love. But the words themselves do not warrant the opinion of Augustine and Bede, that John insists here upon love. He only demands the unexceptional keeping of the commandments of God, and by the use of the Article and the Plural (τὰς ἐντολάς), excludes any and every arbitrary selection. He lays down a sure and infallible token; and the erroneous view just stated proves it to be such. But he does not lay down this keeping as a fact by the use of ὅτι, but as a supposition by ἐάν; with this agrees also the choice of the word τηρεῖν instead of ποιεῖν (which is likewise conditioned by the words of our Lord in Matth. xxviii. 20: τηρεῖν πάντα ὅσα ἐνετείλαμην ὑμῖν). We cannot do, but only keep the commandments of God. And even this is very limited, unsatisfactory, liable to frequent and manifold interruptions. Least of all can it be John's meaning (according to ch. i. 8-10) to suppose Christians capable of fully keeping and practicing the commandments of God. But notwithstanding all the shortcomings of obedience to the commandments of God, and despite all the imperfections and sins of Christians and their life, there still remains a sharp contrast between those who remember the commandments of God to do them (Ps. ciii. 18), and those who do not mind them at all, or only know them. However great may be the difference of believers among themselves, their knowledge of God and their obedience to the commandments of God will be reciprocally related, and the latter will always remain a sure token of the former, which cannot be a fact in the life of Christians without the latter. On that account the Apostle, as is his wont, (as in ch. i. 8, 9), gives prominence to the opposite with a progression in the thought and by way of explanation. [Huther thinks it note-worthy that John never designates the Christian commandments by νόμος, a term used by him only with reference to the Mosaic code of laws, but mostly by ἐντολαί (only occasionally λόγος θεοῦ, or χριστοῦ); nor by the verb ποιεῖν (except in Rev. xxii. 14), but τηρεῖν. Paul uses the term τηρεῖν ἐντολῶν only at 1 Tim. vi. 11; it occurs besides in the N. T. at Matth. xix. 17 (cf. ch. xxviii. 20). M.]

V. 4. He that saith I have known Him, and keepeth not His commandments, is a liar.—The progression in the development and unfolding of the thought lies in the Singular, which sets it forth not as indefinitely general, but as general and true in its application to each individual. It lies moreover in the negative form, so that we may and must not only infer the knowledge of God from the keeping of God's commandments, and from other facts as well, but that the keeping of the Divine commandments, obedience, cannot and must not be wanting where there is a knowledge of God, which deserves that name. The words "he is a liar," moreover, are intensive and stronger than "he lies" (ch. i. 6), or "he deceives himself" (ch. i. 8). Not a single act, but his whole nature and being, is thus designated; the lie reigns in him. There may first of all be wanting self-examination in the light of divine truth, or it may be self-deception and unconscious hypocrisy, but the conscious lie will follow; one desires to appear more than one is. The further particular,

And the truth is not in him, gives emphatic prominence to the status, the emptiness of such a person, cf. ad. ch. i. 8, in Exegetical and Critical.

V. 5, similar to ch. i. 8—10, in antithesis with v. 4, refers back to v. 3, by δέ, but progressing both in the subject-clause and in the predicate-clause.

But whoso keepeth His word; literally: "but whoso keepeth of Him the word."—Τηρῶν, keepeth, stands emphatically first, so αὐτοῦ precedes τὸν λόγον, and λόγον instead of the manifold ἐντολαί, in order to mark the unity. "Præcepta multa, verbum unum," observes Bengel, and a Lapide correctly says: "Dicit verbum ejus in singulari, quia præcipue respicit legem caritatis: enim ceteras omnes in se comprehendit." Hence ὁ λόγος is not the synonym of αἱ ἐντολαί (Huther), nor the comforting message of the gospel, nor the requirement of faith, but the revelation of the will of God as a unit, or the revelation of His commandments in their relation as a unit to His purpose of grace (Ebrard). As this sentence corresponds with "if we keep His commandments" (v. 3), and is more definite by the pron. rel. than is the other sentence by εἰ, so the ἐνῶκαμεν αὐτὸν is parallel with ἐν τούτῳ ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ τετελείωται. It matters not how much we distinguish knowledge and love, and warn against their being confounded, they are nevertheless intrinsically connected and correlatives: "Amor præsupponit cognitionem" [says Grotius, which Huther admits, and adds M.]: "Cognitio præsupponit amorem." Both are true. From this it is evident both that we must apply αὐτὸν, v. 3, to God the Father, and that ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ must denote our love of God (as ch. ii. 15; iii. 17; iv. 12; v. 3.) The knowledge of God and the love to God must correspond with each other. This is the view of the majority of commentators, viz.: Bede, Oecumenius, Luther, Beza, Lorinus, Socinus, Grotius, S. G. Lange, Lücke, Jachmann, Baumgarten-Crusius, de Wette, Brückner, Neander, Huther, Düsterdieck, and others. Others (Flacius, S. Schmid, Calov, J. Lange, Bengel, Sander), understand the love of God to us (as in ch. iv. 9, 10), first in opposition to the Romish exposition of the meritorious perfectio caritatis nostræ aut operum nostrorum, and secondly on account of τετελείωται, which, they say, cannot be predicated of our love. But neither is it "the love commanded by God" (Episcopus) in which we have to exercise ourselves, nor the relation of reciprocal love between God and man, the communio, societas and conjunctio, mutua amicitia et conjunctio (Ebrard following several commentators, chiefly [German] Reformed), nor "the love of God in us, comprising both God's love to us, through which, and our love to God, in which we live." (Besser.) The explanation of τετελείωται, is perfect, perfect, is difficult. We have no right to dilute the word with Beza, as if John were speaking not of a perfect caritas, but of an adimpleta caritas, without all show and hypocrisy, so that the reference were only to sincere love and τελειοῦν were only mettre en exécution [to put into execution.—M.]. Nor can it be right to hold with Socinus and his successors, the rationalists, that the reference is to a relative perfection adapted to the powers of man, because ἀληθὺς prohibits such an interpretation. It signifies, as in ch. iv. 12, 17, 18, perfected, has become perfect. "John supposes the case that somebody really keeps the word of God, and from this ideal stand-point says with the fullest right that such a keeping of the Divine commandments evidences a perfected love to God in practice (cf. Lücke). The more the ideal keeping of the sentence becomes apparent to us, so much the more do we perceive in it a paracletical power, an incentive to the realization of that ideal, a holding up of Christian duty, ὁπερ εἶπεν, v. 6." (Düsterdieck). Calvin says: "Si quis officiat, neminem unquam fuisse reperit, qui deum ita perfecte diligeret, respondeo, sufficere, modo quisque pro gratia sibi datæ mensura ad hanc perfectionem adspiciat. Interim constat definitio, quod perfectus dei amor sit legitima sermonis ejus observatio. In ea nos progredi sicut in notitia proficere decet." But Huther is perfectly right in his strictures of Calvin's view which approaches that of Socinus, who says: "Est autem perfectio ista caritatis in Deum et obedientia præceptorum ejus ita intelligenda, ut nos omnino requiratur, ne ei quicquam deesse possit, sed tantum ut ejusmodi sit, qua Deus pro sua ingenti erga nos bonitate contentus esse voluit."—M.]. "Where the word of God is perfectly fulfilled, there the love to God is perfect; perfect love shows itself in perfect obedience. It is certainly true that the Christian at no moment of his life has reached this perfection, but is always only growing in that direction. John, however, does not refer to that here." The Apostle now quickly subjoins the concluding thought: Hereby (not "by the perfection of love" (Socinus), but "by obedience to the commandments of God," Huther, Ebrard; for this thought concerning obedience as the token of the knowledge of God and of life-fellowship with Him governs this whole thought-complex) we know that we are in Him. Ἐν αὐτῷ ἐσμέν is the final and summary expression of ἐγγράμμεν αὐτόν, v. 8, and of κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' αὐτοῦ, ch. i. 6, of the inward life-fellowship of Christians with God. It is more than man's dependence on God in virtue of his inward relation to Him (as in Acts xvii. 28). As having known Him is not without being in Him, obedience of His commandments must stand as the mark of the knowledge of God, while the love of God [i. e., our love to God, M.] must supervene. What is said here amounts therefore to more than the explanation given by Grotius: "Christi ingenii discipuli sumus."

V. 6 is the final and full conclusion of this section.

He that saith he abideth in Him, ought himself also so to walk.—First: "Synonyma, cum gradatione: ILLUM NOSSE, IN ILLO ESSE IN ILLO MANERE, cognitio, communio, constantia," (Bengel); then ἐντολὰς τηρεῖν, τὸν λόγον, περιπατεῖν καθὼς ἐκεῖνος. 'Ἐν αὐτῷ, particularly by the side of ἐκεῖνος (Jesus), and different from it, evidently denotes God the Father, and not Christ, as maintained by Augustine, Wolf, Neander, &c., although the recollection of μένειν, the favourite expression of Jesus, which occurs ten times in John xv. 4-11, may have influenced the language of the Apostle in this passage; at all events, the abiding spoken of in the Gospel is also connected with a reference to the commandments. "Being and abiding in God denote one and the same fellowship with God. The latter term merely superadds the description of its permanence and continuance, which is not contained in the former." (Frommann.)

Ought (ὀφείλει) does not designate a mark or sign, but only the obligation.

So to walk even as He walked.—(i. e. Christ). This walking is not a mark or sign, which exists or might exist, or given as a touchstone to determine the Christianity of individuals, but simply designates the duty and obligation of Christians, as the disciples of Christ. Nor is it consequently a moment of abiding or being in God, a part thereof, but a goal to be reached, and a problem to be solved by every Christian, with the obligation of which none may dispense. So (οὕτως) to walk as Christ walked—is a requirement, compliance with which involves constant learning and ceaseless labour. The reference to Christ by καθὼς ἐκεῖνος occurs several times in this Epistle, ch. iii. 8, 7; iv. 17.

As He walked points neither to particular traits in the life of Christ, e. g. prayer for His enemies (Augustine), contempt of the world and its pleasures, and patience in sufferings (Bede), nor, as in 1 Pet. ii. 21, sqq., to His self-humiliation and suffering, nor only to His perfect obedience of the commandments of God, nor to His doing only; but it is the concrete representation of walking in the Light (ch. i. 7), of the Divine life in Christ, whose essence and kernel is love. So that Paul may even exhort us to imitate, copy, follow God (Eph. v. 1,) and to walk in love (v. 2). But this must not be confined to the inward disposition, but must have an adequate expression in all our doings, in our whole conduct, at every step of our life; hence περιπατεῖν. John and his mysticism are certainly not afflicted with sentimentalism. The emphatic οὕτως can hardly be dispensed with here [See Appar. Crit. v. 6, note 7.—M.].

Brotherly love in particular is now specified as a mark of true Christianity (vv. 7-11).

V. 7. Beloved, so in ch. iii. 2, 21; iv. 1, 7, 11; in the last two passages it is particularly connected with the commandment of brotherly love. Beloved of God the Father in Christ, whom they ought to follow in that they walk in love to the brethren, as He did. [Huther: "Such an address does not necessarily indicate a new paragraph, but it bursts forth also in cases when the matter in question is to be brought home to the hearts of readers or hearers; which is the case here."—M.].

I write not a new commandment to you.—The whole context, both what immediately precedes and what follows, requires us to regard this ἐντολὴ as a commandment, even as the commandment of brotherly love. The consideration of v. 6 teaches first that ὀφείλει constrains us to hold fast to the meaning of ἐντολὴ, commandment, and secondly exhorts us to walking after Christ; while v. 9 treats of love to the brethren. The latter is the definite and explicit declaration of what is implied in the former. It is improper to say that the reference here is to the different commandments; the commandment, to walk after Christ, and the commandment, to love the brethren; the two commandments are not alongside one another, but inside one another, and so that the latter is included in the former, not vice versa, that consequently the former is more general and less definite than the latter, whereas the latter is particular and clearly defined [i. e. Walking after Christ is the general, loving the brethren the particular.—M.]. A separation is impossible here; nor must vv. 7-11 be subdivided as if vv. 7, 8 treated of something different from vv. 9-11. That which is stated in such explicit and definite terms in the second half, with reference to the first half of the whole section, must be already contained and intimated in the first half. The argument proceeds from the formal, as given in the walk of Christ, to the material which is contained therein. The connection is supported by the Apostle's mode of treatment. For in ch. iii. 11, 23; iv. 7, 21, he uniformly passes from general precepts to the commandment of love. Jno. xv. 13, 17, and particularly ch. xiii. 34, present an analogy, and supply the basis for this part of the Epistle. 2 Jno. 4-6 is the perfect parallel passage which specifies walking in truth, walking after His commandments, walking in the new commandments, which we had from the beginning, and which they had heard. The corresponding points here are walking in the light, walking as He walked, after the commandments of God, in love of the brethren. But the reference cannot by any means be to walking after Christ per se in v. 6, because just there the ἐντολή is described as ὁ λόγος ὃν ἡκούσατε. The commandment given is therefore, not Christ's walk which is seen, but His Word, which is heard; the commandment was not only given in acts, but spoken in the word. Of course we must not understand ὁ λόγος as designating the Gospel which is preached, and make it the ἐντολή. Lastly, the general grammatical usage forces us to take ἐντολή [in its usual sense—M.] as commandment, and not in the sense of doctrine or truth, as Flacius, Calov, J. Lange, Rickli, Ebrard understand it. We ought therefore to agree with Augustine, Bede, Occumenius, Theophylact, Luther, Calvin, Baumgarten-Crusius, de Wette, Neander, Sander, Huther and Düsterdieck, who understand the commandment of brotherly love, and not with expositors like Beza, Socinus, Episcopius, Lücke, Frommann and others, who hold that the commandment applies only to walking after Christ. [It is doubtful whether Braune's view of the relation between walking after Christ and loving the brethren is correct. It strikes me that the case is stated with greater lucidity and correctness by Huther, who says with reference to the two views of the commentators: "These two views seem to be opposed to each other, but they are opposed only when it is assumed that John's design was to specify a particular commandment in contradistinction from other commandments. But that assumption is erroneous: the commandment to keep the commandments (or the word) of God after the pattern of Christ, or to walk in the Light, is none other than that of loving one's brother. From ch. i. 6, onwards John does not refer to different commandments, but to a general commandment of the Christian life, which flows from the truth that God is Light. The reference is to this commandment when John, in order to bring the matter right home to the hearts of his readers, says: οὐκ ἐντολὴν καινὴν γράφω ὑμῖν, so that ἐντολή does not refer to a commandment he is about to specify, but to the commandment he had already specified before (however, not in v. 6 only), and which he is about to define more clearly in the sequel as its concrete substance." This view Huther pronounces in agreement with that of Düsterdieck: "The solution of the riddle is . . . that the holy commandment to walk as Christ did walk, is fully and essentially contained in the commandment of brotherly love." "We encounter here the view that as the whole exemplary life of Christ is contained in His love of us, so our whole walk in the Light is substantially nothing else than following after Christ in this full brotherly love."—M.]

The words "not a new commandment" are explained by what follows:

But an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning; this old commandment is the word which ye heard.—The commandment, therefore, is not new, but old, because the readers do not only now learn to know it by his writing, (γράφω), but because they have it already, and had it from the beginning. It is also said how they did receive it; they had heard it, that is, it had been announced to them. This renders it necessary to refer ἀπ' ἀρχῆς to the beginning of Christianity, and the Christian standing of the readers; for the beginning, as far it concerns their life, cannot be anterior to their time, but must coincide with their life and the time when it was announced to them. So, also, v. 24; ch. iii. 11; 2 Jno. 5, 6. Ye can never mean maiores vestri (Grotius), but designates the readers themselves, the Church, to whom the Epistle is addressed. Nor is there room for a distinction between Jewish Christians who had it already formerly, and Gentile Christians who had only heard it by the preaching of the Gospel, as Wolf draws it, and for saying that the beginning in the case of the former denotes what is written in the Old Testament by Moses (Flacius, Clarius), and that in the case of the latter the beginning dates even from the creation, written in their heart and conscience (the Greeks, fully corresponding with what Luthardt, on free-will, p. 12, sq., 22, observes as a characteristic of the Greek Church which is fond of connecting Christianity with the sphere of the universally human as contradistinguished from the Latin Church, which prefers to give prominence to the specific newness of the Christian, Baumgarten-Crusius, Credner). But we must not say that ἀπ' ἀρχῆς bears precisely the same meaning as in ch. i. 1; ii. 18, 14; iii. 8, since the meaning is determined by the context, which points here to the beginning of the Christian life. This is the view of most commentators, viz.: Calvin, Beza, Socinus, Episcopius, Lange, Rickli, Lücke, de Wette, Sander, Neander, Besser, Düsterdieck, Huther and al.—The Article in the addition (ἡ ἐντολή ἡ παλαιά) marks once more the age of the commandment which had already been indicated by the antithesis (οὐκ-καινὴν, ἀλλὰ παλαιάν). It is called straightforth ὁ λόγος, ὃν ἡκούσατε, because, as all ἐντολαὶ run together in the one ἐντολή, as this one ἐντολή runs through and fills the whole λόγος, the evangelical ἀγγελία: "We should love one another as Christ has loved us;" wherefore ὁ λόγος is not the chief substance of the word, but the word itself. As εἰπετε meant that they had, knew and used the commandment, so ἡκούσατε adds how they came to possess it: by the preaching of the Apostles. The addition is, therefore, not a correction of γράφω, as if John wanted to say: it is not I that give it to you now while I am writing, but you have heard it long ago of Christ (Baumgarten-Crusius), [for ἡκούσατε has no immediate relation to γράφω, but to εἰπετε.—M.]

VER. 8. Again I write unto you.—Πάλιν indicates a close connection with the preceding verse, rendered unmistakable by the repetition of the same word in the same form: γράφω, v. 7. —πάλιν belongs to the verb (Lücke, de Wette), although ἐντολὴν καινὴν stands before γράφω, and signifies again, once more, a second time, and Erasmus, with whom most commentators agree here, is not wrong in saying (against Huther): "et contrarietatem declarat et iterationem," because πάλιν is used by Homer and Hesiod in the sense of back, backward, and against, πάλιν ἐπεὶ το γαῖαν [i. e., say against—M.], but in Herodotus and Attic, and later writers generally, it bears almost the exclusive signification of again, once more, anew; but Erasmus errs when he adds: "hic non repetitio sed contrarietatis est declaratio;" it is here corrective and epanorthotic (Beza, Episcopus, Calov, Wolf, Lücke, al.).—Γράφω, both here and in v. 7, denotes the present act of the Apostle, and has its ordinary, literal sense, not—I prescribe (Baumgarten-Crusius), nor does the Accusative following γράφω admit the construction =I write of, concerning the commandment.

[As] a new commandment, which thing is true in Him and in you.—[Knapp's paraphrase πάλιν (ὡς) ἐντολὴν καινὴν γράφω ὑμῖν (τοῦτο) δ' ἐστὶν ἀληθές is the basis of as bracketed in the text.—M.].—This is a further proof of the close connection of this verse with v. 7; John adheres to what he had just said, writes still on the same point, and it is, therefore, simply impossible to make v. 8 begin a new paragraph, as does Ebrard. The clause δ' ἐστὶν ἀληθές relates to the preceding matter, as is evident from the relative pronoun, and cannot be connected with the following clause introduced by οὗτις, as Ebrard thinks. The Neuter forbids our regarding it as a relative clause belonging to καινὴ ἐντολὴ, as maintained by Düsterdieck, who assumes a constructio ad sensum, and says that "the real substance of ἐντολὴ is declared to be true, both in Christ and in the readers," but this would require ἡ—ἀληθής (Lücke), and "the thing required by ἐντολὴ is nothing else but the ἐντολὴ itself" (Ebrard). We must take it rather as co-ordinated with ἐντολὴν καινὴν, and construe it like ἐντολὴν καινὴν, as the object of γράφω. The above-mentioned paraphrase of Knapp is the most simple construction, although we must not attach to the inserted ὡς the meaning of "tantum si nova esset," as Knapp does, for then it could not be called a new commandment; yet both the Apostle and our Lord Himself describe it by the epithet new (Jno. xiii. 34); ὡς, moreover, denotes the reality (Rom. xv. 16, and elsewhere), and is well adapted to being supplied, in order to point out the right explanation.—But we have to begin with the explanation of δ' ἐστὶν, which stands emphatically first; the reference is consequently to that, which is—in Him and in you. Αἰνός by the side of ὑμῖν denotes a person, so that ἐν αὐτῷ is not =per se ac simpliciter (Socinus), and the context requires its being explained of Christ and not of God (Jachmann, who is then compelled to understand ἀληθές in connection with ἐν αὐτῷ, in a different sense from the same word in connection with ἐν ὑμῖν; in God it has its reason, in you it has its evidence). There is no reason why the preposition should be rendered respectu, in respect of, or by (which something may be known, identified as true, de Wette); it simply means: in or with Christ and you. At the same time ἀληθές bears of course the sense of real, as in Acts xii. 9 [i. e., it denotes actual reality (Huther, Meyer)—M.]. The sentence, moreover, must not be torn to pieces after the manner of Erasmus, Episcopus and Grotius: "quod verum est in illo, id etiam in vobis verum est, esse debet." But brotherly love evidenced in the walk is true in Christ the Head and in the readers of the Epistle, as the members of His Body. No matter how great the difference of that reality may be, it is still there [is actually, really extant.—M.]. This stands as a new commandment, and, therefore, John writes it thus. He considers the ἐντολὴ as the main point, places it first, and then predicates of it that it is new, after having previously called it old.—He called it old from the stand-point of the present with regard to the former entrance into Christianity, which took place long ago; he describes as new that which is true in Christ and His people, and sees first in Him what is now also in His people, what Christ required of His followers as a new commandment (Jno. xiii. 34), and from this stand-point, from their entrance into Christianity and their fellowship with Christ, he, like the Lord Himself, calls this a commandment which is new. The Apostle consequently does not refer here to the permanent duration of the commandment of brotherly love, which requires to be constantly inculcated anew (Calvin: "perpetuo vigere," Socinus, Knapp, al.), nor to man's new birth (Augustine, Bede, al.). It is new by the very words added by Christ Himself in Jno. xiii. 34: "καθὼς ἠγάπησα ὑμᾶς," as He has proved it in fact, and as he does effect and operate it in His people. [Huther: "The sense is: that which is already true, i. e., a reality, in Christ and in you, to wit: the τηρεῖν τὰς ἐντολὰς τοῦ θεοῦ (cf. Jno. xv. 10, where Christ says of Himself: ἐγὼ τὰς ἐντολὰς τοῦ πατρὸς μου τηρήκα), I write to you as a new commandment," and then he adds in a foot-note, "It is manifestly not more surprising that John sets up before his readers anew as a commandment that which has already become a reality in them, than that he announces to them truths, of which he says himself that they know them already."—M.].

Because the darkness passeth away and the true light shineth already.—This sentence answers the question: Why does the Apostle write as a commandment which is new that which is true in Him and the readers of the Epistle? Hence οὗτις is simply causal, because; and this whole sentence corresponds exactly with the preceding (Düsterdieck, Huther). "Οὗτις, consequently, is not merely dependent on ἀληθές or ἐντολὴ (Socinus, Bengel, Ebrard), so that it has declarative force—that; the point is not to prove that the light shineth and that the darkness passeth away, nor could that be the substance of a commandment. Nor can we divide (with Lücke and Brückner) the sentence that the commandment of walking in the light manifests itself as new in Christ (in whom the true light has appeared), and in the readers (in whom this light diffuses itself and shines already, scattering the darkness), and refer the former to ἐν αὐτῷ, which is not said at all, or to τὸ φῶς φαίνει, and the latter to ἐν ὑμῖν or ἡ σκοτία παράγεται. We have no occasion or warrant for doing so. The antitheses ἡ σκοτία and τὸ φῶς ἀληθινόν must be taken in an ethical sense, and denote the sinful and the holy, as the elements in which one lives and walks; and this construction is rendered necessary by the subsequent verses and the whole context. Both are opposed to each other, but they exist alongside each other, increasing or decreasing (παράγεται—ἡσθ φαίνει). The former consequently does not denote the economy of the Old Testament or paganism, which indeed were never without light, nor the latter only the person of Christ, as in John i. 9 (Oecumenius, Bengel), nor "Christus una cum doctrina ejus et effectus fidei et caritatis" (Lange); for the expression has a wider reach. The σκωρία denotes the whole power and sphere of the ethical life, separate from communion with God (the Light in Whom there is no darkness), still fighting against the Light, but evermore condemned (Jno. iii. 19), constantly overcome and consuming itself; but the Light, which is God (ch. i. 5), embraces whatever belongs to His Kingdom, and keeps believers in communion with Himself (Düsterdieck). The Light is called τὸ ἀληθινόν, which is not only real (ἀληθές), but the true light answering to the real truth, embracing and effecting the real truth. (Ibid.) [Eternal, essential Light, of which earthly light is only a transitory image.—Huther, Neander.—M.J.] So Luke xvi. 11; 1 Thess. i. 9. It is just the life of the Lord, wherein is that which shines, bursts and shines forth with ever increasing strength; this real Being is the Light, the true Light (John i. 4). In παράγεται we have first of all to preserve the Present form. The Vulgate renders falsely "tenebræ transierunt," so do Luther, "is past," Calvin [and E. V. "is past"—M.J.]. It is unnecessary to construe it passively with Besser, Sander, Bengel, (traducitur, commutatur, ita ut tandem absorbeatur); it is Middle, like παράγει, 1 Cor. vii. 31 (so Oecumenius, Wolf, Lücke, de Wette, Düsterdieck, Huther): it is passing away, vanishing, disappearing. With this corresponds ἡν φαίει, said of the Light, it shineth, shineth already, not now (Luther, E. V.); the darkness makes room for the light, the light begins already to break through. [Huther, who adds, "so that neither the darkness is entirely past, nor the light entirely established."—M.J.]. The transition from the reign of darkness to that of the Light is thus indicated and referred to the future, when the conflict thus begun will end in the full victory of the Light. Hence in the words ὁ ἔστιν ἐν ὑμῖν John expresses not so much an encomium on his church, as a declaration of his joy in the continued working and the commencing and progressing victory of the Lord and His Kingdom. From this point of view the reading ὑμῖν only can be received as authentic, as bringing out the true sense of the passage in an undiluted form, which would certainly be awakened by the reading ἡμῖν, and lessen the Apostle's pure rejoicing over his church, as the work of Jesus Christ. [Rickli: "John says this in relation to the time in which they live, and during which the great work of the Lord took a wondrously rapid course of development. The true Light, the Lord in His perfect revelation of Divine truth, shines already;—already the great morning dawns for mankind. When the Lord returns, then will be the full day of God. This revelation . . . believers go to meet.—M.J.]

VER. 9. He that saith he is in the light and hateth his brother.

For the form cf. v. 4, for the thought see ch. i. 6, 7. Φῶς here denotes neither Christ (Spener), nor the Church (Ebrard): "The Church of those in whom the fact ὅτι τὸ φῶς ἥδη φαίνει has become an ἀληθές"; for since τὸ φῶς, v. 8, denotes the holy, the sphere of the Divine life, no other sense can be admitted here. The Apostle regards as his brother particularly the believer in Christ, as γεννημένος ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ (ch. v. 1); the love of the brethren, as the children of a loved Father, rests on the love of God, who has regenerated them (ch. v. 1; iii. 10). Likewise in the Gospel (Jno. iii. 16; xv. 12, sq.; xiii. 34; xx. 17; xxi. 18); St. Peter also gives φιλαδελφία in the same sense (1 Pet. i. 22, sq.), and actually distinguishes it from ἀγάπῃ which he takes in the sense of φιλανθρωπιά (2 Pet. i. 7), (Luther, common love). "Ipsa appellatio amoris causam continet" (Bengel). Whether ἀδελφός denotes elsewhere an actual brother or a cousin, Jno. vii. 8, 5 [see my article "Are James the son of Alphaeus and James the brother of the Lord identical," in Princeton Review, January, 1865—M.J.], or members of the same nationality, Acts xiii. 1, or—ὁ πλῆσιον, ὁ ἑτερος, (Matth. xviii. 35; vii. 8; Luke vi. 41; Jas. iv. 11), the context must always determine the sense, and the context here refers decidedly to Christian fellowship. Hence Grotius is wrong: "sive Judæum, sive alienigenam; fratres omnes in Adamo sumus," as well as Calov and Lange [who give a similar exposition.—M.J.]. It is improper to take μισεῖν as "post habere, minus diligere, non colere" (Bretschneider); it means to hate; but it is not specified here to which degree of hatred he has come to whom reference is made; it is left undecided whether his hatred be germinating and initial, or mature and fully developed. Not even the faintest degree or colouring of hatred can be compatible with this ἐν τῷ ᾧ ἔστιν εἶναι. That saying and this hating are so little in agreement, and this hating imports so much more than that saying, that John continues, saying,

Is in the darkness until now—in sin, in the atmosphere of the sinful, until now, yet, at this hour, this very moment. But along with all this severity and profound earnestness which insists upon one thing or the other, runs the intimation of a hope of return. [Huther: "Like φῶς and σκωρία, μισεῖν τὸν ἀδελφόν and ἀγαπᾶν τὸν ἀδελφόν mutually exclude each other. They are two diametrically opposed biases of life; a man's doings belong either to the one or to the other; that which does not belong to the sphere of the one, appertains to that of the other. Each denial of love is hatred, each conquest of hatred is love." Düsterdieck:—"Nothing can be more shallow and weak as compared with the ethics of the whole Scripture. All the truth, depth, and power of Christian ethics rest on the 'aut . . . aut,' so distinctly insisted on by St. John. On the one side is God, on the other the world: here is life, there is death; here love, there hate, i. e. murder; there is no medium. In the space between, is nothing. Life may as yet be merely elementary and fragmentary. Love may as yet be weak and poor, but still, life in God and its necessary demonstration in love, is present really and truly, and the word of our Lord is true: "He that is not against me is with me," Luke ix. 50; and on the other side, the life according to the flesh, the attachment to the world, and the necessary action of this selfishness by means of hatred, may be much hidden, may be craftily covered, and with splendid outer surface; but in the secret ceptn of the man, there where spring the real fountains of his moral life, is not God but the world; the man is yet in death, and can consequently love nothing but himself, and must hate his brother; and then the other word of the Lord is true, "He that is not for me is against me," Luke ix. 23. For a man can only be either for or against Christ, and consequently can only have either love or hate towards his brother."—M.]

VER. 10. He that loveth his brother, abideth in the light, and a stumbling-block is not in him.—Not only an antithesis to v. 9, but also a progression in the argument: μένει, for every thing depends on the abiding which must be the result of being cf. v. 6. The sentiment is prepared in ἐως ἁρτι v. 9 by the fine allusion that hatred of the brother and being in the darkness, must be overcome, and that being in the light and in love must be maintained. Hence we cannot say with Ebrard: "The exercise of brotherly love is of itself a means of strengthening and confirming the new life; from brotherly fellowship there flow for the new man refreshing and quickening streams of his faith." But the love of the brother acts and moves within the sphere of light, not without growth which strengthens itself there; the impelling power is that which evinces itself in brotherly love, faith in the Father, faith in the Only Begotten of the Father, who gives us the power to become the children of God. He that loves his brother ever grows more firmly rooted in holiness, the kingdom of light; growth takes place in brotherly love, but brotherly love does not produce it; He only produces it who produces fellowship with Himself and the love of the brother. John knows only αὐτὸς—αὐτὸς, hating or loving: "ubi non amor est, odium est, cor non est vacuum" (Bengel). The sentence, σκανδάλων ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν fully corresponds with v. 4; ἐν τούτῳ ἡ ἀλήθεια οὐκ ἔστιν. The comparison of these two verses facilitates the understanding of our passage. τὸ σκάνδαλον, or ὁ σκάνδαλος (Heyschius) is [the rendering of the pingit. Ps. cxix. 165), or de Wette (with him [for him] there is no offence), or Neander (there is no offence with him, he himself does not stumble) or to explain αὐτῷ with Lücke and Sander of the external sphere of life, because in the case of Christians σκανδάλα lie in the world, not in himself. What Vatablus says is only half true; nemini offendiculo est; the same applies to Johansen: "he gives no offence; Ebrard: "there is nothing in them whereby they give offence to the brethren; and Huther, "there is nothing in him which becomes an offence to himself;" the reference to others has also been given by Calov, Jachmann, that to himself by Bede, Luther and Calvin.

LXX, M.] for מִשְׁכָּל or מִקְשָׁ properly ἐμπόδιμος, σκανδάλιστρον (τὸ ἐν ταῖς μνάγρας), προσκόμμα; hence βάλλειν, τιθέναι σκάνδαλον. So λῆθον προσκόμματος, πίτρα σκανδάλων Rom. ix. 33; 1 Pet. ii. 7; cf. Is. viii. 14; xxviii. 16; Rom. xiv. 13. It is always a stumbling against, an offence given, but it is left undefined whether it is given with or without guilt. Christ Himself, the Crucified One, is 1 Cor. i. 28: Ἰουδαίους σκάνδαλον. The guilt of the σκανδάλων may reside in him to whom it is given, who takes it, who is offended at it and falls. Here it is said: ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν. In him, who loves his brother and abides in the Light, in the holy, is not σκανδάλων, is not that which offends, gives offence, causes himself or others to stumble and fall, such as envy, suspicion, want of sympathy, harshness of judgment, pride—all σκανδάλα to himself and also to others. "Qui fratrem odit, ipse sibi offendiculum est et incurrit in se ipsum et in omnia intus et foris; qui amat expeditum iter habet. Bengel. This seems also to be the exposition of Düsterdieck, who says: "Occasion of stumbling and falling, the lust of the flesh is still extant in believers, but they are always sure of the virtue of the blood of Christ which hallows and increasingly removes every σκανδάλων (ch. i. 7, sqq.). It is inadmissible to explain ἐν αὐτῷ—αὐτῷ, as Grotius does (est metonymia et ἐν abundant; sensus: ille non im-

VER. 11 concludes this section in antithesis to v. 10, taking from that antithesis that which helps the further development of the thought.

But he that hateth his brother is in the darkness and walketh in the darkness.—Here we find περιπατεῖν ἐν τῇ σκορίᾳ, superadded to εἶναι ἐν τῇ σκορίᾳ v. 10. The latter denotes the status or habitus (Sander), or affectus (Grotius) the disposition, state, the former the actus, operation; so also de Wette and others. "Both the being (the assumption) and the doing (the consequence) of the unloving belong to the darkness; cf. Gal. v. 25" (Huther). "He that hateth his brother, both as to his person and as to his walk, belongs to the darkness, the sphere of the sinful" (Ebrard). Closely connected with this is:

And he knoweth not where he goeth to—answering to the σκανδάλων ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν, v. 10. The particle ποῦ, where, not whither, denotes rest; ὑπάγειν however is not to go, but to go away to, to go to; the word describes a calm walking, not a mere moving to and fro, but a progressive moving towards an end or goal. So Jno. iii. 8; viii. 14; xii. 35; also Jno. vii. 35; ποῦ—πορεύεσθαι; ch. xx. 2, 13; ποῦ ἔθγκαν. The unloving man sees and knows not which way he is going; he walks with darkened eyes on a dark way. Luther ("they fancy that they are going to rest and glory, and yet go to hell"); and Cyprian ("it nescius in gehennam, ignarus et caecus precipitatur in paenam") look at the extreme goal, but we should not lose sight of the immediate consequences of a selfish and unloving being and walking. The matter is so very important, that the Apostle substantiates his statement, saying:

Because the darkness hath blinded his eyes.—τυφλοῖν, to blind, to make blind must not be changed into "surrounding with darkness," or diluted by a tantum (Lücke and others). The unloving man himself is dark, and the darkness is in him, in his eyes, not only round about him. Jno. xii. 40; cf. Is. vi. 9, sq.; Matth. xiii. 14, sq.; and N. pp. Acts xxviii. 26, sq.; also 2 Cor. iv. 4.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Here we see quite plainly the different sides of the Christian life; γινώσκειν θεόν, τὰς ἐντολάς αὐτοῦ τηρεῖν, τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ τηρεῖν, ἀλήθεια, ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ, ἐν αὐτῷ εἶναι, μένειν, appear as correlates. The dogmatical and the ethical are in one another. The ethos is contained in the dogma, waiting to be delivered in the life; the ethos rests on the dogma as on a root; both are inwardly related to each other, refer to each other, belong together, may be distinguished, but not separated; the one without the other falls to ruin or runs to waste. Christian knowledge loses experience, clearness, sharpness of outline, assurance, and breadth, without a life of Christian morality; Christian morality loses unity, depth, endurance, joyfulness, grace and beauty, if not founded on Christian knowledge. If it is affirmed concerning him who, while disobeying the commandments of God, still makes his boast of the knowledge of God, that the truth is not in him, and concerning him who loving his brother, abides in the light that offence is not in him (vv. iv. 10), it is evident that the ἀλθρεία and the σκανόβαλον cannot be made to agree, and that the former is also an immoral thing.

2. Since John makes τὰς ἐντολάς and τὸν λόγον ἡρπεῖν perfectly parallel, and regards the Law with its particular commandments, and the revelation of God in His word as a unit, and contemplates the love of God as growing and maturing toward perfection by the obedient observance of the same, the presumption is that the same loving Will of God has revealed itself both in the Law and in the Gospel, and that man's love of God lives on, ought and has to live on the wholesome food of both. But this decidedly excludes any and every meritoriousness of obedience and of good works; just as in the Gospel faith in the love of God does not constitute a merit, so in the Law obedience to the loving Will of God is not a merit. Obedience is simply a sign and mark of the Christian life begun on the foundation and in the efficiency of the reconciliation accomplished by Christ. Our only merit before God is Christ, and beside Him no man can have any merit before God.

3. John does not in any way countenance the doctrine of the Council of Trent (Sess. VI., chap. 16) that "the justified are able fully to satisfy (plene satisfacere) the divine law by means of works wrought in God" [Nihil ipsis justificationis amplius deesse credendum est, quo minus plene illis quidem operibus quæ in Deo sunt facta, divinæ legi pro hujus viis statu satisfecisse.—M.], because he does not speak of that which has an historical existence, but of that which is to become a reality; he refers not to actual reality, but to ideal reality. On this account the words of John rather sustain Luther's paradox: "The righteous sins in every good work mortaliter, at least venialiter"—or Schleiermacher's translation of it: "even in our good works there is something in consequence of which we stand in need of forgiveness for them." Though [Roman] Catholicism debase the Law and blunt its requirements in order to exalt man, we are bound to exalt the Law, though man be debased and humbled, since the case as put by John is and remains only ideal truth, Christ alone being the exception, whom alone all are bound to follow.

4. The unity and difference of the characteristics of the Old and New Testaments appears in one point, namely, the commandment of brotherly love. This commandment is valid in either sphere; it derives in both spheres its origin from God; it has the same meaning in both, and is one in both, the old [commandment] which remains. But in virtue of Christ's example in His love of the brethren, it is more lucid, attractive, powerful, comprehensive and pure in the New than in the Old. It is new only in that which the Person of Christ has added thereto in His personal love; He is the new, which has been superseded to the old commandment.

5. The Perfect τετελειωται, v. 5, evidently denotes no historical truth, since the historical is marked by ἡ σκοτία παράγεται, τὸ φῶς δὲ φαινει. But these Presents indicate the assurance of victory and the joyfulness of hope with which that Perfect is anticipated. It signifies: "the whole power and sphere of the ethical life, separate from communion with God, (the Light in whom there is no darkness), still fighting against the Light, but evermore condemned, constantly overcome and consuming itself" (Düsterdieck), both in respect of the great totality of the world, and in respect of individual persons.

6. The progress in evil to perdition, and in good to the salvation of eternal life, is inward. The hidden life of the children of God has been commenced by the Forerunner; walking after Him, it grows in them, daily increasing in completeness, so that salvation, pursuant to divine appointment, is the consequence of a holy life on earth. But disobedience and unlovingness exert a reaction on the unloving, which forms their inward being and operates their perdition, which, in its turn, is also the result of their conduct here on earth.

7. As Christ is the principle of ethical life (v. 6), and love the principle in Him, as in the λόγος and the Law, so the love of Him, of God and of the brethren, must be the principle of obedience and of ethical life. Ultimately every thing occurs in brotherly love, which is the mark, while the love of God is the principle, the love of the loving God the fountain of all inward, Christian and godly life.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Examine thyself.

1. What is to be investigated? Whether you know God; and the knowledge of God is not without fellowship with God. The question is not knowledge concerning and about God, not having heard and learned certain truths relating to Him, but the being and abiding in Him (vv. 3, 6, 6). You are intimate only with those between whom and yourself there is habitual intercourse. Otherwise you have only a more distant and superficial acquaintance, but never an intimate knowledge.

2. Why it should be investigated? Without God you are in darkness, without Him you walk in darkness, you become more and more darkness yourself, you run to ruin, and perish at last in the darkness of condemnation; you reach the point that you hate, and are hated, hateful and abominable (vv. 9, 11). But with and in God you are in the light, you walk in the light, and light and truth and love are in you, you become more and more light, love in truth grows more perfect, and all offence will be put away from you (vv. 4, 6, 11).

3. How it should be investigated? Look after your obedience to the commandments of God (vv. 3, 4), more especially after the old and yet new commandment of the love of the brethren (vv. 7-11), and see whether you walk after the Lord Jesus (v. 6). He that keeps the commandments of God in thought, in word and in deed, keeps himself; he that observes the commandments of God, preserves himself.

AUGUSTINE:—Christ says not, learn of me to create the world, to work miracles, to raise the dead, but that I am meek and lowly in heart.

LUTHER:—The commandment of love is a short commandment and a long commandment, one commandment and many commandments, it is no commandment and all the commandments. Short and one it is of itself, and soon mastered as to its meaning; but long and manifold in point of practice, for it is the sum and chief of all commandments. And it is no commandment at all in respect of the works, for it has no special work of its own by name; but it is all the commandments, because the works of all the commandments are and should be its works. The commandment of love therefore abrogates all the commandments and yet establishes all the commandments; and all this in order that we may know and learn thus much: no commandment and no work is to be kept and binding, but in as far as it is the demand of love.

SPENCER:—There is a vast difference between living and dead knowledge; the one flows from the revelation of Jesus Christ (Jno. xiv. 21), from the Holy Ghost, and is therefore the operation of God; the other flows from reason, and consists in man's imagination; the latter knows only what people are wont to say of God, the former ascertains the mind of God; the one is a knowledge like that which I have of a man, concerning whom I have heard something, the other like that of one with whom I have had converse; the one is a feeble light, letting in only a beam into the understanding, the other is a heavenly light which fills and irradiates the whole soul, and in which we should walk.—It is a great consolation that God gives us a sure test, whereby we may be assured of our faith and consequently of our participation in the reconciliation of Christ, a test moreover which we may use also in a state of temptation, when the sense of faith is wanting.—Saying that we know God, amounts to nothing. Simon the sorcerer gave out that himself was some great one, but was not (Acts viii. 9); some say that they are Jews, and are not (Rev. iii. 9); but confession demands first of all a believing heart.—The imitation of Christ is not something that is left to our option, or only incumbent upon certain people desirous of attaining unto a peculiar perfection, but it is the universal obligation of all those who are in Christ Jesus, and is therefore binding on the high and on the low, on the clergy and on the laity, on men and women, in every manner and walk of life.—Teachers should treat their hearers as brethren, and use the paternal power within such limits, as never to forget their brotherly equality (Philem. x. 16). No condition of life gives to a man the liberty to hate his brother; but in whatsoever condition a man may be, he is never and in no wise permitted to hate his neighbour; and although he have occasionally to hurt him, as e. g., the authority of the land, which has to punish the wicked, yet must such condign punishment flow from love, as in the case of others so in his case, and be administered with a compassion that would, if it were able, rather withhold the severer remedy, just as a physician, moved by love, yet because of urgent necessity, will amputate the arm or leg of a patient.—There is no lack of offences in the world; let every one take care not to give offence, nor condemn others, but judge every thing in love. He that hateth his brother knows not the injury he inflicts upon himself, and into what misery he precipitates himself; for whereas he thinks that he loves himself and for his own interest, honour or pleasure, hates his neighbour, even as selfishness is the cause of all hatred, he hates himself most of all, when he fancies that he is loving himself (John xiii. 9).

LANGHE:—The true followers of Christ have not a transient faith, but they are firm and steadfast like a branch in the vine, a bough in the tree, a house on its foundation. The duties of common love towards every man are these: 1. Intercession for the promotion of his conversion; 2. friendly admonition and correction at convenient seasons; 3. the careful avoidance of whatever may deter him from the practice of good; 4. the diligent warding-off of his loss under all circumstances; 5. kindly demeanour in words, manner and works. The duties of particular love towards believers are partly the same, partly those which are necessary to the maintenance of intimate brotherly converse and spiritual affinity.

STARKE:—A piece of coin stands the test; lead betrays itself that it is not silver, and brass that it is not gold. Perhaps by sound? No, by the streak; and this is to keep the commandments of Christ. Have a care, my soul. The loss of the fraud is thine own.—Faith worketh by love (Gal. v. 6); therefore the faith, whence no good works do proceed, is only dead faith (Jas. ii. 17, 26).—The perfection of believers' love of God consists in that it is honest, sincere, pure, undivided, upright, faithful and without hypocrisy, lacking neither a truly divine impulse nor holy ardour, neither true reverence of God, nor ardent zeal for and towards God, although as yet unable to take and hallow all the thoughts of the mind, or to present all its powers as an offering of love to God.—As we know that a branch which bears good fruit is truly in the vine (for were it otherwise how could it bear fruit?) so we may surely say of a man that does truly good works, that he is truly planted in Christ.—Come hither, ye that refuse to believe that it is necessary to be pious. Christ is your Forerunner! Do as He did! Look upon His example. Arbitrary choice and presumptuous conceit pave the road to hell.—It is a great comfort that our Christian doctrine is sure and established, not liable to change and to be presented now in one way, now in another, but remains always the same, because God, who has wisdom and truth, is its Author, and needs not at any time to change that which He has given us once for all. Examine thyself, O man! who art thou? The child of God, or of the devil? Consider only whether thou lovest or hatest thy neighbour? If thou lovest him in deed and in truth, thou art in the light and in God's; but if thou hatest Him and showest thy hatred either outwardly in works, or concealest it inwardly in thy heart, and withdrawest thyself from Him, then thou hast a sign that thou art in darkness and the devil's. Tremble at thyself, and amend thy ways!

HEUBNER:—To know Christ is to know, experience and delight in Him as our Friend and Saviour, and to enjoy His grace and fellowship. The mark of it is the keeping of His commandments, vital, active Christianity. Works are not the ground of justification, but a mark to ourselves, whether justifying faith is in us, and whether we are justified; because Christ when He gives Himself to us, never gives Himself half but entire; to whom He becomes justification, to them He also becomes sanctification. We may therefore conclude backwards, to whom He has not yet become sanctification, to them also He has not yet become justification.—The assertion of justifying faith and want of holiness, fidelity and conscientiousness, constitutes a contradiction and makes the assertor a liar.—In those who keep the words of Christ, we may plainly see that they have really tasted the forgiving love of God, that it has carried captive their hearts and filled them with love to God.—Hatred, selfishness, is a state of darkness because the lightsome knowledge of God, of the love of Christ is still wanting, because it has not yet penetrated and illuminated the heart, because therefore the soul also is still in a dark, rent state, at discord with itself, without seeing the gracious countenance of God which renders us light, and, as it were, resplendent of countenance.—He knows not 1, how far this evil, unloving mind may carry him, and 2, what will be his end, what his reward,—exclusion from the kingdom of light.

NEANDER:—Believing aright in John's sense, is a matter of life.—His commandments are only separate traits in which His life-forming word develops itself.—As genuine love can evidence itself only in the observance of Christ's word, so there are different degrees of the manner how this love has more or less interpenetrated the life of men.—He Himself is in His commandments, and they also are only separate parts of His self-revelation.—The life of every believer should be only a peculiar representation of the image of Christ, the original of the new and glorified humanity.—Either love or hatred of the brethren; love which is ready for any sacrifice, or selfishness that may also pass into hatred; even as Christ indicates only the two fundamental biases: to serve God or the world.

BESSEY:—Would I know whether I know God, I must not examine my knowledge but my walk; and would I know whether thou knowest God, I do not ask that which thy mouth may have to say of Him, but that which thy life does testify of Him.—Just in the sense of John we read in the Epistle to Diognetus: There is neither life without knowledge, nor right knowledge without the true life.—It is characteristic of love that it would do nothing to grieve but every thing to please the Beloved, surrendering its will and weal, its honour and life to the Beloved; His pleasure is its pleasure; what displeases Him, it hates.—The motto of St. Francis was: "Tantum quisque scit, quantum operatur."—Cursed be all science that cannot stand the test of the commandments of Jesus Christ!—This indisputable ought (v. 6), is at the same time a blessed may to John and to all who have John's mind [That is, the duty is to them a blessed privilege, which they receive with grateful hearts.—M.].—When the pagans looked with amazement on the love of the early Christians, and exclaimed: "See how these Christians love one another, and are ready to die for one another," when the mark of Christians was described in the words: "They love each other even before they know each other," then there shone the resplendent light before which darkness recedes. Would that this day, when it comprises already a much longer period of light, there could be found no Christian Church, in whose new walk that is not truth and reality which John writes to the Christians as an old commandment.

[SUCKER:—If we keep His commandments, v. 3. Whosoever doth so, though imperfectly, yet sincerely and humbly, hath nothing to fear. Whosoever doth not, hath nothing to hope. Strong feelings of joyful assurance may be given to the pious from above as a present reward; and strong feelings of vain presumption may lead on the wicked, secure and triumphant, to their final destruction. Very reasonable terrors from consciousness of their guilt, may torment the bad beforehand; and very unreasonable ones, from constitution or the suggestions of Satan, may assault the good. Therefore we are to judge of our condition by none of these things; but by the Scripture rule, fairly interpreted: "Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doeth righteousness is righteous; he that committeth sin is of the devil" 1 Jno. iii. 7, 8.—M.].

[BARROW:—(v. 6). If a man perform any good work not out of the love to God, but from any other principle or any other design (to please himself or others, to get honour or gain thereby) how can it be acceptable to God, to whom it hath not any due regard? And what action hath it for its principle, or its ingredient, becomes sanctified thereby, in great measure pleasing and acceptable to God; such is the work and value thereof. It is also the great commandment for efficacy and influence, being naturally productive of obedience to all other commandments; especially of the most genuine and sincere obedience; no other principle being in force and activity comparable thereto; fear may drive to a compliance with some, and hope may draw to an observance of others; but it is love, that with a kind of willing constraint and kindly violence carries on cheerfully, vigorously and swiftly, to the performance of all God's commandments.

(v. 6): "To abide in Christ, to be in Christ, to put on Christ and reciprocally Christ's being in us, living, dwelling, being formed in us, and the like expressions, occurring in Holy Scripture, do not denote any physical inherence, or essential conjunction between Christ and us, such as those who affect unintelligible mysteries, rather than plain sense, would conceit; but only that mutual relation accruing from our profession of being Christ's disciples, our being inserted into His body, the Church, being governed by His laws, partaking of His grace, with all the privileges of the Gospel, relying upon His promises, and hoping for eternal salvation from Him. By virtue of which relation we may be said, in a mystical or moral manner, to be united to Him, deriving strength and sustenance from Him, as the members from the head, the branches from the tree, the other parts of the building from the foundation, by which similitudes this mysterious union is usually expressed in Scripture; in effect, briefly, to be in Christ, or to abide in Christ implieth no more, but our being truly in faith and practice Christians; so that the meaning of St. John's words seemeth plainly and simply to be this. Whosoever pretends to be a Christian, that is, to believe the doctrine and embrace the discipline of Christ, ought to walk, that is, is obliged to order the whole course of his life and actions, as Christ walked, that is, as Christ lived and conversed in the world; or, it is the duty of every one professing Christianity to conform his life to the pattern of Christ's life, to follow His example, to imitate His practice.—M.]

[HORNE:—(v. 6). No one can fail to see that the life of Christ was designed as a pattern for His followers, who considers how admirably it is calculated for that purpose. We meet not here with legendary tales of romantic austerities, ecstasies and abstractions, tending only to amaze and embarrass the consciences of men with unprofitable and unnecessary scruples, but we behold a life, which though holy and without spot or blemish from beginning to end, was conducted after the manner of men, and so as to be imitable by them; being passed into the midst of civil society, and in the exercise of all those lovely graces, by which that is preserved and improved, sweetened and sanctified. And we should find it the best compendium of morality, the most perfect and unerring rule whereby to direct ourselves in all cases, if we would only ask our own hearts, before we enter upon an action, how the blessed Jesus would behave in our circumstances. A conscience, but moderately informed from the Gospel, would seldom perhaps give a wrong determination.—M.]

[BURKITT:—(v. 7). The commandment of love might be called an old commandment, as being a branch of the law of nature, and a known precept of the Jewish religion: although in other respects it might be called a new commandment, because urged from a new motive, and enforced by a new example.—M.]

[CLARKE:—There is a saying in Synopsis, Sohar, p. 94, n. 51, that may cast some light on this passage: "That way in which the just have walked, although it be old, yet may be said to be new in the love of the righteous."

(v. 11). Love prevents him from giving any offence to his neighbour, and love prevents him from receiving any from his neighbor, because it leads him to put the best construction on every thing. Besides, as he walks in the light, he sees the stumbling-blocks that are in the way, and avoids them; every part of his path being illuminated. Many fall into sin because they do not see the snares that are in their way; and they do not see the snares because they either have not received, or do not abide in the light.—M.]

truth, for any man to profess himself a true disciple of Christ, while he harbours revengeful thoughts and uncharitable principles towards other men. On the contrary, a kind behaviour and tender disposition towards all our brethren is one of the best instances of Christian perfection, and secures us from all the scandal and mischievous effects of a censorious and persecuting temper.—M.]

[NEANDER:—(v. 8). Thus, too, John contemplates Christ as Himself the true light, holding the same relation to the spiritual as the sun to the natural life. What he here says then is this: With those who have been so long attached to Christianity, the darkness proceeding from their former heathen state is passing away, and the true light is now breaking. Now, he says,—meaning their present in contrast with their former state of heathenism, or while still affected by its remaining influence. The light derived from Christ, the true Light, was already banishing the former darkness—they were becoming constantly more and more enlightened. So Paul says to his readers, Rom. xiii. 11 sqq., that now their salvation is nearer than when they believed, that the end of the night approaches, the day of the Lord draws near. It is, therefore, true, both with reference to Christ, the true Light which has dawned upon their souls, and with reference to believers who have received this light and been illuminated thereby, that this fundamental law of Christianity now verifies its character as the new command. To those who live in the light of Christ, who have become at home in the new world of Christianity, the old commandment now, in contrast with the former state of darkness, presents itself in new glory as the new command. In new power must it be revealed to their hearts, that BROTHERLY LOVE constitutes the essence of the Christian life, is the essential mark of fellowship with Christ.—M.]

[WORDSWORTH:—Christian Praxis is the test of Christian Gnosis.—True Christians are the genuine Gnostics.—The Gnostics pretended to have light, to have special illumination; but their light is a false light, it is the light of wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness" (on v. 8).—M.]

6. Consolatory warning against the love of the world.

CHAPTER 2, 12-17.

12 I write unto you, little children, because your sins are<sup>1</sup> forgiven you for his name's
13 sake. I write unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the begin-

- ning. I write unto you, young men, because ye have overcome the wicked one.<sup>2</sup> I write<sup>3</sup> unto you, little children, because ye have known the Father. I have written unto you, fathers, because ye have known him<sup>4</sup> that is from the beginning. I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one. Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world.<sup>5</sup> If any man love the world, the love of the Father<sup>6</sup> is not in him. For<sup>7</sup> all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof;<sup>8</sup> but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever.

Verse 12. [ἀφένεται, Perf. Pass. formed after the Perfect Active ἀπέωκα, here and Matth. ix. 2. 5; Mark ii. 5; Luke v. 20. 23; vii. 47; Syriac—remissa sunt, "HAVE BEEN FORGIVEN YOU" more correct than E. V. "are forgiven you."—M.]

Verse 13. ἔγραψα, A. B. C. Cod. Sin. The reading γράφω is without critical authority, and opposed to the structure of this series of sentences.

Verse 14. τὸ δὲ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς; in B, which might allude to ch. i. 1, is evidently a slip of the pen, since the same Codex reads τὸν in v. 13.

Verse 15. [μὴ δὲ τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ—nor the things in the world, more correct than "the things that are in the world" E. V.—M.]

τοῦ πατρὸς, B. [G. K.] Cod. Sin.; the best verse. Fathers [Oec. Theophyl.—M.]. The reading Θεοῦ A. C. must yield the place to the former authorities, and to the context v. 16.

Verse 16. [ὅτι—because, so German.—M.]

Verse 17. [αὐτοῦ after διευμία, although wanting in A. and cancelled by Griesbach, is the true reading. The difficulty readily accounts for the omission.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The structure of vv. 12-14.—The six members are evidently divided into two triads: the thrice repeated Present γράφω, and the thrice-repeated Aorist ἔγραψα, as well as the address τεκνία, πατέρες, νεανίσκοι joined to the Present, and πατέρες, πατέρες, νεανίσκοι joined to the Aorist, clearly intimate as much. The sentences subjoined by ὅτι exhibit the same correspondency, and confirm this arrangement. This has to be proved by the exegesis.

The addresses, vv. 12-14. Τεκνία must be taken here in the same sense as in the other passages of the Epistle where it occurs, ch. ii. 1, 28; iii. 18; iv. 4; v. 21. It applies to all readers, the whole Church, and should not be made to designate a particular age (as has been done by Erasmus, Socinus, J. Lange), or a peculiarly near relation to the author. The diminutive form is chosen for the sake of intimacy and cordiality, and is indicative of the paternal relation and advanced age of the Apostle. The addition μου, ch. ii. 1, may have a still more intimate sound, but there is no want of intimacy here or in ch. iii. 18; iv. 4; v. 21, although μου is wanting. It is altogether parallel to ἀγαπητοί, ch. ii. 7; iii. 2, 21; iv. 1, 7, 11, or to παῖδια, ch. ii. 18; iii. 7, (var lect.). Although παῖδια is thus rarely used, nevertheless it is used, and, if we take it here—τεκνία, it is used thrice. Hence there is no reason whatsoever why παῖδια, v. 18, should not be applied to the whole Church, but, like πατέρες and νεανίσκοι, be understood to designate a particular age (with Calvin, Luther, Calov, Sander, Neander, Besser, Ebrard, al.), and to disturb the harmony of the structure of this group of sentences. Particularly as the comprehensive παῖδια, little children, offered a more natural sequence to πατέρες and νεανίσκοι than τεκνία, little sons. The order in which τεκνία and παῖδια occur, forbids their being referred to a particular age, for either νεανίσκοι, πατέρες would have to follow, or πατέρες, νεανίσκοι to go before. Hence τεκνία and παῖδια must be construed as denoting the general address, and πατέρες and νεανίσκοι the specialization of church-members, πατέρες describing those of maturer years (πρεσβύτεροι, γέροντες, heads of families, the more experienced), and νεανίσκοι those younger in years. This is the view of most commentators. Augustine's view, according to which the Apostle refers throughout to the same persons, only designating them by different names from different points of view, is consequently untenable: he says: "filii, quia baptismo neonati sunt, patres, quia Christum, patrem et antiquum dierum agnoscunt, adolescentes, qui, fortes sunt et validi;" nor must we refer, with a Lapidé, the different addresses to a "triplicem Christianorum in virtute gradum; pueri enim representant incipientes et neophytos; juvenes proficientes, senes perfectos." Similar explanations are given by Clement, Oecumen., Grotius (with reference to 1 Cor. xiii. 11, 12; Heb. v. 18; Eph. iv. 13, 14) and others.

The tenes of the otherwise clear verb, γράφω and ἔγραψα, vv. 12-14, present great difficulties. It is clear that ὅτι does not denote the substantes of his present or former writing. John writes not that their sins are forgiven, and that they have known the Father, that they have known Him that is from the beginning, that they have overcome the wicked one, that they are strong, that the word of God abideth in them, all this he does not write, and has not written to his church, but other things. Hence ὅτι can only be taken as a causative particle; it denotes the reason and cause of his writing, and must be rendered "because." It is self-evident that ὅτι, if translated "because" once, must be translated thus throughout, in all the six consecutive places where it occurs, and not be rendered with Luther the first, fifth and sixth time "that," and the second, third and fourth time "for" (=because).—Socinus, Sohott, Sander, Neander translate "that," Calvin, Bera, Lücke, de Wette, Huther, Düsterdieck, al. "because," while Erdmann gives to ὅτι a declarative meaning in the first three sentences, without determining whether it should be construed objectively and causatively in the last three sentences. I write—simply defines the act of writing: I write just now what I write, because—The object is the Epistola, even this Epistle. Now, if John, after this thrice-repeated γράφω signifying this Epistle, says again three times ἐγράφα, the reference cannot be to the Epistle, neither to the preceding exhortations (Grotius), nor to the first chapter (Calov), neither in respect of the thrice-repeated ἐγράφα to ch. i. 6-7; i. 8-ii. 2, 8-11 and γράφω to ch. ii. 15-17; 18-27; ii. 28—iii. 22 (Riekl and Lücke), nor so that the reference is general, the Aorist denoting that part of the Epistle which is already written, the Present the part as yet unwritten, but in process of development [the very act of writing, i. e., the Epistle itself.—M.] (so de Wette, Brückner, Huther) nor can the reference be to vv. 12, 18, as if the apostle had said "I write, and I have written, it is a settled thing" (J. Lange, Neander, Sander, Ewald, Heubner, Bengel ["inuit communitionem firmissimam"]), nor are Beza and Düsterdieck any more satisfactory, who suppose the Present to indicate the present stand-point of the Apostle, his present act of writing, and the Aorist to describe the stand-point of the readers after they had received the Epistle, when, of course, it was written;—all these explanations are so many attempts whose very forced and artificial character shows them to be mere make-shifts, which, even in their more simple forms, do not remove the appearance of trifling, and explain as little the position of the Present relating to what follows before the Aorist relating to what goes before, as that the author by this change of tense tears asunder that which he has written from that which he is about to write, both of which belong together as one. If we are thus constrained to think of another writing, we must not think of a previous Epistle (Michaelis), but of the Gospel (Socinus, Lange, Schott, Baumgarten-Crusius, Ebrard, Hoffmann), to which this Epistle is not only nearly related in the exordium, but also in its very kernel and essence. Cf. Introduction, § 8, 8. The consciousness of the importance of the Gospel he had written, fully justifies in the Epistle the threefold repetition of ἐγράφα in consideration of the reasons relating to different groups of persons in the Church, and warranting such repetition; nor can it be thought singular that he had no other reasons (brei) for having written the Gospel than those for writing the Epistle. Nor may an objection be raised to the Apostle's not specifying the object either of ἐγράφα or γράφω, and his not describing the writing to which he refers, because both the Gospel and the Epistle were in the hands of the readers, and enabled them both to find the necessary explanation, and to prevent possible misunderstanding. [The peculiarly involved statement of Braune renders it desirable to supply the English reader with a more lucid account of the views he advocates. Γράφω, denotes the present act of writing, not only the particular sentence in which that word occurs, but the present Epistle; ἐγράφα, a writing already written, finished and complete in the hands of the readers of the Epistle, to which they might refer; and that writing was the Gospel, which would clear up every doubt, remove every difficulty, and furnish a commentary on the statements and exhortations contained in the Epistle. It must be confessed that this is, on the whole, the most simple and satisfactory solution of a very knotty question, although that advocated by de Wette, Brückner and Huther is not so trifling as Braune, echoing the words of Ebrard, asserts. Said authors explain ἐγράφα of that part of the Epistle which the Apostle had already written, and γράφω of the immediate act of writing, that is, to the Epistle in general; in their view it is proper that John should begin with γράφω while his reference to the part already written by ἐγράφα may be explained by the fact that that part (especially ch. i. 5—ii. 11) contains the fundamental principles of the subsequent exhortations and developments. Personally we prefer the view of Braune, but many readers will, doubtless, incline to that set forth by Huther and others.—Ebrard gives the following synopsis of the two triads:

TRIAD THE FIRST.	TRIAD THE SECOND.
γράφω.	ἐγράφα.
1. τεκνία —all readers.	1. Children (in point of age).
2. Fathers.	2. Fathers.
3. Young men.	3. Young men.

and Wordsworth (who, however, does not discuss the details of his arrangement, and carries the series down to v. 28) makes a series of seven, closed by an eighth, the octave of the first, with a symbolical reference to the number seven and eight. His arrangement is this:

This arrangement is more curious than valuable or logical, and merely added to complete the catalogue of representative views begun above. M.]

The reasons of the Apostle's writing vv. 12-14. First series, vv. 12, 18b.

VER. 12. I write unto you, little children, because your sins have been forgiven you.—The Perfect ἀφένται (See Winer, Grammar, § 14, 3, p. 93, on the form of this word) points to the forgiveness of sins, mentioned ch. i. 8, sqq.; ii. 1, 2, as a completed fact, which, as a ground whereon they stand, as a sphere wherein they move, as a benefit they have received, has and is to have on them and the rest of their life a lasting effect and an efficient power. [The forgiveness of sins is the ground of the Christian life.—M.] Vulg., Augustine and Calvin render falsely "remittuntur," so Luther, "are forgiven you," [and E. V.—M.] For His name's sake. The reference is not to Him who forgives sins, God the Father, but to Him, for whose sake the Father forgives; that is Christ; for δὲ with the Accusative is not per, through (instrumental), but propter, on account of, for the sake of, indicating the ground of the forgiveness of sins, and here, where the cordiality of the address (little children), and the direct application to the persons addressed (I write unto you, your sins have been forgiven you), are to be brought out, it denotes the objective ground, rendered subjective: since His name is with you, in you and among you; His name is He Himself and what He is, but revealed and known, believed and confessed; hence—since ye have believed on Him, confess and invoke Him, individually and collectively, and since He has manifested Himself and may yet further manifest Himself as ἰλασμός, παράκλητος; consequently for Christ's sake in you. Thus we might combine with Neander the explanation of Dürstedeck, who insists with the majority of commentators on the objective ground of the forgiveness of sins, and that of Luther, who understands the subjective ground. [Neander says: "He comforts them with the assurance of sins forgiven through the mediation of Christ. For the name of Christ are their sins forgiven; that is, for the sake of what Christ is as the Son of God and the Son of Man, the divine-human Redeemer—it being as such that they invoke Him as their Mediator."—M. J.]

VER. 18a. I write unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning.—Ὁ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, according to ch. i. 1 and the context, can only signify Christ, with reference to His eternal, Divine Nature; for the ἀρχή reaches beyond the beginning of time and of the world, into God's eternal life, and must not be weakened into "initium novi fœderis et evangelii patefacti" (Socinus). Grotius and a Lapidé, without all contextual sanction, explain "novistis Deum, qui Senex dierum," Dan. vii. 9; xiii. 22. Ἐγνώκατε consequently denotes only the more profound understanding of the nature and eternal glory of Christ, spiritual knowledge, and not personal acquaintance, not even on the part of some (Bengel: "vivebant patres eo tempore, quo Christus in terris fuerat conspicendus, et eorum nonnulli eum et facie et fide, omnes fide cognorant") so the Ἐγνώκατε τὸν πατέρα, v. 18c must on no account be explained of personal acquaintance. Nor does this exhortation warrant the idea that the Fathers, the aged, love to hear and talk of old things, and that to them, in particular, knowledge ought to belong. (The Greek Fathers, Augustine, Erasmus, Luther, Calvin, Neander). But more profound knowledge in general, and knowledge of Jesus Christ, His Person and work in particular, is peculiarly suited to the calmness and experience of old age.

VER. 18b. I write unto you, young men, because ye have overcome the wicked one.—While young men are exposed to the power of temptation in respect of the world, both within and without, they have also fresh vigor and courage to fight against and overcome the wicked one, τὸν πονηρὸν, the devil, who is thus designated in the N. T. in general (Matth. xiii. 19, cf. xxviii. 38, sq.; Eph. vi. 16); and in this Epistle in particular (ch. iii. 12; v. 18 sq.) Carpzov: "Viris fortibus et robustis tribuitur supra fortissimum et robustissimum victoria." But we must not narrow the idea with Bengel, who says: "Insigne quoddam specimen virtutis a juvenibus, quibus scribitur, exhibitum, cujusmodi erat constantia confessionis in persecutione Domitiani, itemque reditus juvenis illius, quem apostolus summa mansuetudine a lactrocinio ad poenitentiam reduxit, suavissime descriptus a Clemente Al. lib. quis dives salv. c. 42, ab Eusebio H. E., lib. 3, cap. 20 et a Chrysostomo, Paræn. 1 ad Theodorum lapsum, cap. 11." We may think of it, but take it in the widest reach. That which John says to all, the τεκνίους, that their sins have been forgiven, applies indeed to all, and it does not apply exclusively to the fathers, that they have known the Lord, or exclusively to the young men, that they have overcome the wicked one; for it may be that there are fathers who have just gained the victory, and young men who have acquired profound knowledge; but besides the general truth of the forgiveness of sins, those particular affirmations are admirably distributed among the different classes, and only possible and real on the condition of that general declaration. "Christian life-truth is essentially one; in whichever direction its riches may be developed, or to whichever relations it may be applied, all these different exhortations and instructions are always of one casting, resting on one foundation, and animated by one spirit" (Dürstedeck). But John has a particular word, a word of peculiar application for the whole Church, as well as for the separate groups and individuals.

Second series, v. 18c—v. 14.

VER. 18c.—I have written unto you, little sons, because ye have known the Father. To know the Father, that is, to know God as our Father, to cast deeper looks into the peace-thoughts of His heart concerning us, into the holy Love which is His Being, is possible only in the more intimate converse with Him which He opens in the forgiveness of our sins and our reconciliation. The child, with its child-like ways and mind, with its humility, attachment, diligence, teachableness and receptivity, is nearer to God than an adult. Here also apply the words, "Become as little children" Matth. xviii. 3. It is easy to see that we have here the parallel of the clause, "Because your sins have been forgiven you;" adoption and forgiveness of sins interpenetrate each other, and more than mere correlates. He now writes to the fathers precisely the same thing as before:

VER. 14. I have written unto you, fathers, because ye have known Him that is from the beginning.—His object is not to write something else; for he has rightly divided the word.

I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one.—"Alii juvenes corpore, vos fide." (Bengel). Matth. xii. 29; Luke xi. 21, sq.; Heb. xi. 34. It is the strength of the Spirit for the combat and victory, the strength of their own spirit, and derived from the Spirit of God, given from above, through and with the adoption and the forgiveness of sins. The ἀγγελία (ch. i. 5), with the ἀλήθεια ch. i. 6, 8; ii. 4), in the word of God, (ch. i. 10; ii. 2, 5, 7), creates and moves this vital strength and vital courage for the combat. Hence ισχυροί ἐστε is immediately followed by καὶ ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν ὑμῖν μένει. 'Ο λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ, therefore, does not denote Christ, although He is the centre and star of that word. The word of God, with its eternal power, must not only be brought to them, but it must have entered into them and remain in them; then it happens: καὶ νενικήκατε τὸν πονηρὸν. The strength is grounded on the word of God, which abides in them (μένει), and in virtue of this strength they have overcome the devil [the thought belongs to Huther—M.]; the decisive battle, of course, has been fought by Jesus Christ, but His people ought to follow up His victory by continuous warfare, and gain further triumphs in their heart and sphere of life, cf. Jno. xvi. 33. A retrospective view of the preceding verses, assigning the reasons for the Apostle's writing and having written, characterizes the readers as possessing not a small degree of Christian knowledge and ability, and the writings in question as taking for granted such a degree of Christian culture. While we may therefore think of the Epistle and the Gospel, we cannot say with Ebrard that the Gospel is wholesome and pleasant food for the little ones (παιδιά), but that the Epistle can be understood by adults only. Now has been laid down an important and sure foundation for the subsequent warnings and exhortations (Luther, S. Schmid, Episcopius, Bengel, Lücke, de Wette, Düsterdieck, al.): You have received and acquired so much, and succeeded so well, that you ought to progress, and not to retrograde! You stand in life-fellowship with God—do not dissolve it!

The warning. VER. 15a. Love not the world, neither the things in the world. The correct exposition of the whole depends on the meaning of ὁ κόσμος, which signifies according to Suidas: εὐπρέπειαν, τὸ πᾶν, τάξιν, τὸ πλῆθος, or according to Hesychius: κόλλος, and then the beautiful fabric of the material universe. "Quem κόσμον Græci nomine ornamenti appellaverunt, eum nos a perfecta absolutaque elegantia mundum" (Plinius. H. N. 2, 3). The LXX do not apply the word κόσμος, strictly taken, to the universe. In the New Testament we find it used in all these senses, 1 Pet. i. 8=εὐπρέπεια, τάξις; Acts xvii. 24; Jno. xxi. 25; xvii. 5; Matth. xxiv. 21; Rev. xii. 8; xvii. 8=τὸ πᾶν, and especially by John in the Gospel ch. i. 9; xi. 9; xii. 19; xviii. 36; 1 Jno. ii. 2; iv. 1. 8. 9. 14.=the creation of the earth, especially of the world of man (Düsterdieck)=τὸ πλῆθος. Now the difference between ὁ κόσμος=τὰ κάτω and τὰ ὄψω (Jno. viii. 23), which is at the same time the opposite of both, makes κόσμος to denote the whole kingdom of sin and death, inimical to God, under Satan its prince, and more particularly the world of man as fallen away and estranged from God (Jno. xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11; 1 Jno. iv. 4; v. 19; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Eph. vi. 11, sq.). But all this without the faintest trace of dualism. For the κόσμος, as originally created by God, was very good (cf. Gen. i. 31, with Jno. i. 3, 10), but became evil and is the object of redeeming love (Jno. iii. 16; 1 Jno. ii. 2; iv. 14), so that the children of the world become the children of God in their faith in Christ and His Word (Jno. i. 12; xii. 45-50); there is no man who is not first born flesh of the flesh, and yet born spirit of the spirit may not and should not become the child of God (Jno. iii. 6; 1 Jno. iii. 9, 14).—Now the sum-total of this earthly kingdom of evil is alternately applied in a real sense to the earthly sphere in general, and in a personal sense to the world of man, sinful, and abiding in sin; and these two conceptions frequently and easily play the one into the other. The present passage must be interpreted by the usus loquendi current in the N. T., and we must "lay down the rule that κόσμος bears the same meaning in all the three verses, so intimately connected together" (Düsterdieck). We cannot say with a Lapidé "omnibus hiæce modis" (i. e. three different meanings: "1. homines mundani, in his propriis est concupiscentia; 2. orbis sublunaris, in hoc mundo propriis et formaliter non est concupiscentia; sed in eo est concupiscentia materialis, i. e. objectum concupiscibile: 3. ipsa mundana vita vel concupiscentia in genere): omnibus hiæce modis mundus hic accipi potest et Johannes nunc ad unum, nunc ad alterum respicit; ludit enim in voce mundus." Points of support necessary to the right explanation of our passage are these: κόσμος is the opposite of God, it is a whole consisting of various parts and members, it is easily the object of love: it has a life, but lacks permanence and endurance. Hence it is evidently the earthly sphere of life, especially as filled with the world of man and opposing God, whose real side often alternates or concurs with its personal side; as applied to things, we have to think not so much of trees, flowers, mountains and stars as of whatever forms part of and constitutes the world of man, such as rank or dignity, possessions and gifts of the mind and of the body and such like. Consequently the κόσμος must not be taken as the sum-total of transient creatures as far as they are natural things as Lücke (sum-total of all sensuous manifestations, exciting sensuous pleasure), with whom we must rank, de Wette, Brückner, or J. Lange (systema totius mundi), Neander (the world and worldly things), and others construe the word. But equally objectionable is the interpretation which makes κόσμος=the evil inhering in the world, as given by Greek authors (ἡ κοσμοῦ φιληδονία καὶ διάχυσις), Luther (=the world, i. e. ungodliness itself, human passions according to which man does not rightly use the creature), Calvin (omne genus corruptionis et malorum omnium abyssum), Morus (malum morale) Semler (vulgata consuetudo hominum, res corporeas unice appetentium), Erdmann (lotus complexus et ambitus mali), Ebrard (τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ=kinds of sinful living, thinking and demeanor [e. g. covetousness, ambition, sensuality.—M.]). Lastly, we must not limit the application of κόσμος to "the heathen world" (Lange), "the mass of ordinary men" (Oecumenius: ὁ σαρφετὸς not συνφύρες, as Braune corrects M.] ὁχλος, ὃς οὐ τὴν τοῦ πατρὸς ἔχει ἀγάπην ἐν ἑαυτῷ; Calov.: homines dediti rebus hujus mundi), "the major part of men" (Grotius: humanum genus, secundum partem majorem, quæ in malis actionibus versatur), "to that part of the world which constituted the anti-Christians" (Storr, Socinus). Cf. Düsterdieck and Huther ad loc. [the latter giving all the passages cited by Braune.—M.].—Now while John, according to the Lord, urges love, notwithstanding Jno. iii. 16: οὕτως ἠγάπησεν ὁ θεὸς τὸν κόσμον he says here—μη ἀγαπᾶτε τὸν κόσμον. There is a difference, if the Lord our Saviour and Redeemer, who is above the world, loves, or if we love that are of the world, needing salvation, although salvable. To love is to surrender oneself; God surrenders Himself in order to save, overcome and glorify; the creature can only surrender itself to the world to be ruined, swept along and carried off. The creature is forbidden to enter into intimate and vital communion, or entire life-fellowship with that sphere of humanity which has fallen away from God. The Saviour does it in order to save from it those who suffer themselves to be seized by Him.—Μηδέ—but not even, or no, not even. The Apostle consequently draws a sharp distinction between τὸν κόσμον and τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, the whole or the general, and the particular or the specific. You are not even to love a particular, a specific part of the κόσμος; one may be fascinated by this thing, another by that, it all amounts to the same; the love of the world is there where we find the love of the particular or of one particular in the world, be it the gold of the earth, which is highly valued among men, or human wisdom, or honour with men, or power and dominion, or only influence of a less degree and in a limited sphere.—This warning is obviously addressed to all, the πατέρες and νεανίσκοι. "Omnibus hæc generaliter ecclesiis filiis scribit" (Bede). It is not said to the children only (Oecumenius); for παῖδια and τέκνια denote the whole church (see above); nor to the young men only (Bengel, Sander, Besser), although it follows the last address. The next verse, which is purely general, as well as the import of this warning, require us to understand it as being universal in its application.

The reasons. vv. 15b-17.

First reason. vv. 15b, 16. If any one love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.—"Unum cor duos tam tibi adversarios amores non capit." (Bede) "Contraria non sunt simul" (Bengel). Since ὁ κόσμος is the object of love, since the Apostle is concerned with the love of the world and the heart of man which loves, ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ πατρὸς is of course our love of the Father; for the love of the Father is not incompatible with the love of the world (Jno. iii. 16). Hence ἀγάπη τοῦ πατρὸς denotes neither "amor Patris erga suos et filialis erga Patrem" (Bengel), nor "the love of God toward us" (Luther II., Calov.), nor the "caritas quam Pater præscribit" (Socinus). We have here the same antithesis which is noted in Matth. vi. 24: θεὸς καὶ μαμωνᾶ δουλεύειν, Rom. viii. 5 (σὰρξ and πνεῦμα), v. 7 φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς ἐχθρὰ εἰς θεόν; 2 Cor. vi. 15 (Χριστὸς and Βελιάρ); Jas. iv. 4 (ἡ φιλία τοῦ κόσμου ἐχθρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ and in this Epistle ch. i. 5 (φῶς and σκοτία). This is the reason of the warning against the love of the world; the love of the world is incompatible with the love of God, as our Father; the love of the world cannot consist with the sonship of God. [Christians are the children of God, God is their Father; their vocation is to love their Father, not to love the world.—M.] This is explicitly brought out in

Vers. 16. Because all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. The connection of this verse with the one preceding by ὅτι—because, compels us to emphasize πᾶν; for, because there is nothing in the world, the κόσμος, which is of the Father, the love of the world is utterly incompatible with the love of the Father.—Ἰὼν τὸ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ is evidently not identical with τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ (v. 15); the Singular denotes the transition from the particular to the unit: what is in the world is conceived as a whole, a totality comprehending the particular; hence the reference is not to objects only, as all those maintain who make it identical with τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ (although Ebrard's exposition correctly adverts to particular forms of demeanour, and Düsterdieck speaks of a "transformation of the conception of the objects of the love of the world into the conception of subjective love itself and its essential modes of representation"); still less to persons ("omnes mundi dilectores non habent nisi concupiscentiam" Bede); but as Huther excellently puts it: "All that which constitutes the substance, i. e. the essence of the κόσμος, its inward life, which animates it." The apposition indicates the nature of πᾶν τὸ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, and shows how we are to take, and what is the true import of these words. The apposition has obviously respect to life-manifestations in the world of man; the whole, the sum and substance, the totality of those life-manifestations in the God-forsaken world of man, is not of God, but without, and opposed to God. In dealing with the difficulty connected with the exposition of the apposition: ἡ ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκὸς καὶ ἡ ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν καὶ ἡ ἀλαζονεία τοῦ βίου, we have to remember that all the three clauses must be taken as coördinated, and that the Genitive must be construed alike in all three cases. The three ideas are placed in juxtaposition by καί. Hence Düsterdieck errs in making ἡ ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκὸς the principal idea governing ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν and ἀλαζονεία τοῦ βίου. This is confirmed by the explanation of the separate ideas. In ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν we have evidently the Genitive of the subject; it cannot mean: lust after the eyes. We have therefore three times the Genitive of the subject. In ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκὸς the Genitive of the subject is analogous to the idea: ἡ σὰρξ ἐπιθυμεῖ (Gal. v. 17), and to the grammatical usage of the N. T., where, with the exception of 2 Pet. ii. 10, the Genitive connected with ἐπιθυμία always denotes the subject; but σὰρξ denotes here what it signifies elsewhere, e. g. in Eph. ii. 8 (ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκὸς) 1 Pet. ii. 11 (αἱ σαρκεῖς ἐπιθυμίαι), the desire, the lust of the flesh, as suggested by the antithesis of πνεύματι ἀγεσθαι, ἐν πνεύματι περιπατεῖν. Limitations like those of Augustine ("desiderium earum rerum quæ pertinent ad carnem, sicut cibis et concubitus et cætera hujusmodi"), Grotius, Baumgarten-Crusius, Sander and Besser, who agree with him, or those of Brückner, who suggests "carnal lust in the strict sense," Bengel ("ea quibus pascuntur sensus qui appellantur fructivi: gustus et tactus," Gerlach ("every kind of the lust of enjoyment") and Ebrard ("sexual enjoyments")—are not in agreement with the context and more or less arbitrary. Only the limitation required by the coördinated ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν is justifiable; but even this is an ἐπιθυμία, and as such equal to the former, yet not τῆς σαρκὸς, but τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν. This ἐπιθυμία must not be subordinated to the former (as is done by Lücke, de Wette and Düsterdieck), but it is coördinated with it. Nor must the Genitive be taken at once subjectively and objectively: "the lust of the eyes, and at the same time that, wherein as the sensuous-worldly, the eyes delight themselves" (Brückner). The lust of the eyes has respect to seeing, consequently the lust to see, and to see that which is the object of such lust. Hence Spener explains correctly: "all sinful lust which seeks for enjoyment in the very seeing," and so does Huther: "the desire of seeing that which is unseemly, and the sinful gratification afforded by seeing it." Hence it must not be restricted to "omnis curiositas in spectaculis, in theatris" (Augustine, Neander); nor is it sufficient to say with Calvin: "tam libidinosos aspectus comprehendit, quam vanitatem, quæ in pompis et inani splendore vagatur." Nor may it be referred with Bengel to "ea, quibus tenetur sensus investigativi, oculus sive visus, auditus et olfactus." Nor must extraneous ideas be added thereto, so as to make it denote a desire of possession excited by sight (Rickli), or straightforth πλεονεξία (Luther, Socinus, Grotius, Lorinus, Wolf, Baumgarten-Crusius, Gerlach, al.), or even "the whole sphere of the desires of selfishness, envy, covetousness, hatred and revenge" (Ebrard). Thus the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes are arbitrarily distinguished from each other or rather confounded, since the former is taken as sensuality and the latter as covetousness, or vice versa. The eyes, instruments of the senses, are preëminently the ministering members of the life of the soul and the spirit: here is flesh, become transparent, whereby surrounding objects and manifestations produce impressions on the life of the soul, and the soul requires insight of them. As the Scripture draws a distinction between grass and the flower of grass, and understands thereby the flesh and the glory of the flesh (1 Pet. i. 24: σὰρξ ὡς χόρτος and πᾶσα δόξα αὐτῆς ὡς ἄνθος χόρτου), and thus points beyond the nearest sphere of carnal life to the life-sphere of the soul, so we may distinguish the ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός from the ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὁρθολογίων in such manner that the former denotes absolute, purely sensuous lust, and the latter lust which through the instrumentality of the soul, points to the spiritual sphere of life. It is noteworthy that as Peter subjoins the words (v. 25) "τὸ δὲ ῥῆμα τοῦ θεοῦ μένει εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα," so John has almost the identical addition: "ὁ δὲ ποιὼν τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ μένει εἰς αἰῶνα." Hence the former includes all the desires of possession and enjoyment, of covetousness and sensuality, of vulgar or refined form, while the latter embraces the desire which longs for, seeks and finds gratification in social intercourse and the manifestations of social joys, in works of art down to the rude outbreaks of festal joy.—To this is now added as a third καὶ ἡ ἀλαζονεία τοῦ βίου. While ἐπιθυμία refers twice to acquisition, ἀλαζονεία has respect to spending. The noun occurs, besides this place, in the N. T. only at Jas. iv. 16: ἐν ταῖς ἀλαζονείαις ὑμῶν, the adjective in Rom. i. 30, after, and in 2 Tim. iii. 2, before ὑπερῆφανος. In classical Greek it signifies arrogance and vaunting, with the secondary idea of untruthfulness and boasting about one's rank or wealth. In

James it evidently denotes the outbreaks of that arrogance which overlooks the vanity and nothingness of earthly happiness, and boastingly confides in it. The ἀλαζών is the vain braggart, at whom and with whom one may perhaps smile; the ὑπερῆφανος is the haughty man, who is irritable and injurious; the one recognizable in the national character of the French, the other in that of the English. The Genitive τοῦ βίου, of the life, with reference to sustenance and necessities, as is evident from ch. iii. 17; Mark xii. 44; Luke viii. 14, 43; xv. 12, 30; xxi. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 4, designating occasionally personal property (living), indicates the side on which this braggart arrogance does and is wont to appear, as well where there is little or great abundance as where it is merely coveted and want is concealed; braggart arrogance is wont to appear in connection with bodily sustenance and necessities. Augustine: "Jactare se vult in honoribus, magnus sibi videtur, sive de divitiis, sive de aliqua potentia." Bengel: "Ut velit quam plurimum esse in victu, cultu, apparatu, suppellectili, ædificiis, prædiis, famulitio, clientibus, jumentis, muneribus, etc., Rev. xviii. 12. Chrysostomus appellat τὸν τῶν βιωτικῶν ἐν τῇ παντασίᾳ τοῦ βίου." Examples occur in Gen. xi. 2-4; 1 Chron. xxii. 1, sqq.; Eccles. ii. 1, sqq.; Ezek. xxviii. 12-19; Dan. iv. 27; Rev. xvii. 4-6; xviii. 4-7. So Lücke, Sander, Besser and Huther; Neander, Gerlach and Düsterdieck may be included in this category. Hence it is not correct to restrict the meaning to ambition, superbia, ambitio (Cyrillus, Socinus, al.).—We should hold with Bengel that: "Non coincidunt cum his tribus tria vitia cardinalia, voluptas, avaritia, superbia: sed tamen in his continentur." The hypothesis that this trinity contains a complete indication of all the forms in which evil is apt to manifest itself, has become traditional, and goes so far that Bede following Augustine said: "Per hæc tria tantum cupiditas humana tentatur; per hæc tria Adam tentatus est et victus; per hæc tentatus est Christus et vicit." A Lapidé actually discovered in them the correlatives of the three Persons of the Holy Trinity answering to the three primariis virtutes, continentia, caritas, humilitas [which according to Huther are closely connected with the three monastic vows of chastity, poverty and obedience.—M.]. The majority of practical expositors have followed this track with various modifications, even Pascal (Pensées, 28, 56) says: "libido sentiendi, sciendi, dominandi." Lücke very rightly opposed this interpretation and maintained that the point in question did not relate to cardinal vices, but to the chief forms (Brückner; "leading biasses") of worldly-mindedness. These, as Bengel observes, sustain an intimate relation to one another: "Etiam ii, qui arrogantiam vitæ non amant, tamen concupiscentiam oculorum sectari possunt, et qui hanc superarunt, tamen concupiscentiam carnis percipere retinent: hæc enim profundissima et communissima, apud minores, medioximos et potentes: apud eos etiam, qui abnegationem sui colere videntur; et rursum, nisi vincatur, ab ea facile progreditur homo ad concupiscentiam oculorum, ubi materiam habet; et ab hac ad superbiæ vitæ, ubi facultatem habet; tertioque includitur secundum, secundo primum." Thus ambition is ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός only in so far as it wants to cast others in the shade, it is ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὁρθολο- uōn as far as it aims at recognition and marks of recognition, and it is ἀλαζονεία τοῦ βίου as far as it is indulged in the consciousness of position and wealth, and in every form there are degrees of intensiveness and coarseness. The same holds good of avarice, voluptuousness and the love of pleasure. We have here by no means a complete catalogue of the biases and forms of manifestation of evil. Unlovingness specified above (vv. 2-11) and mendacity mentioned below (vv. 18-20) although connected with this [trichotomy M.], are not contained in or denoted by it. Hence Luther, followed by Sander, rightly observes: "These three particulars are not of the Father: 1. Hatred of the brethren. 2. The three idols of the world. 3. False and corrupt doctrine.—The terms ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς, ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου εἶναι denote origin and indicate similarity, congruity and connection. This is the profound truth that nothing is esteemed with God except His own Image; whatever is to have respect to Him, to belong to Him, to be, and able to be united with Him, must come from Him; ch. ii. 29; iii. 7 sqq.; iv. 2 sqq.; 7 sqq.; v. 1 sqq.; Jno. viii. 44. So Dürst dieck, Huther, and Ebrard in opposition to de Wette [Paulus and Baumgarten-Crusius—M.], who deny the reference to origin and restrict the application of the terms to congruity and similarity. The antithesis, intensified by the repetition of ἐστὶ "is not of the Father, but is of the world" marks with peculiar pointedness the world as the source of ungodliness. The world will not tolerate any thing that does not derive its being from it or belongs to it. We see therefore how God and the world are just here opposed to each other, irreconciled and irreconcilable; both are inflexible and neither can yield the place to the other. [Dürst dieck: "Through our whole Epistle runs the view which is also manifest in the Gospel of St. John, that only the mind which springs from God is directed to God. He who is born of God, loves God, knows God, does God's will. God Himself, who first loved us, viz. in Christ His incarnate Son, begot in us that love which of moral necessity returns again to the Father, and of like necessity embraces our brethren also. This love is hated by the world, because it springs not from the world. It depends not on the world, any more than that perverted love which springs from the world and is directed towards the world, the lust of the flesh, etc., can be directed to the Father or to God's children. So that John grasps in reality down to the very foundations of the moral life, when he reminds his readers of the essentially distinct origin of the love of the world, and the love of God. The inmost kernel of the matter is hereby laid bare, and with it a glimpse is given of the whole process of the love of the world and the love of God, even to the end; and this end is now set forth expressly with extraordinary power."—M.]. But

The second reason: v. 17.

And the world passeth away and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever.—The world can only be taken here in the same sense as in the preceding verses, viz.: the world of man fallen away from and opposing God, which is a power, and as a power awes many, but does and has great things. But what is true of the σκόρρα, v. 8, applies also to it: παράγεται, it passeth away, it is passing away and disappearing; the sense must not be limited to the transitory world, to be destroyed in the judgment (Bede: "mundus transibit, quum in die iudicii per ignem in meliorem mutabitur figuram, ut sit celum novum et terra nova"), nor must the term be so construed as to express the consciousness of the approaching advent of Christ and the judgment of the κόσμος connected with it (Luther, with reference to vv. 8. 18: ἐσχάτη ὥρα). It is, in effect, the uninterruptedly peculiar nature and destiny of the world (Oecumenius: "τὰ κοσμικά ἐκδημήματα οὐκ ἔχει τὸ μόνον τε καὶ ἰσχύος, τὰ δὲ κατὰ τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ διακρῆ καὶ διασωθῆναι" (Dürst dieck: "because of its alienation from God, doomed to passing away, to death"). The antithesis μένει requires and confirms this view. Although Dürst dieck distinguishes his view, according to which he finds here more permanently valid axiomatic truths concerning the course of the love of God or the love of the world, from that of Oecumenius, who gives prominence to the properties of the love of the world and of the obedience to the commandments of God, the two views ought really to be combined thus: it fares with the world according to its nature, and the nature of the world agrees with its passing away. And as it passes away, so also passes away its lust, the lust which inheres in it, emanates from it, and governs it. Hence αὐτοῦ is the Genitive of the subject, as maintained by most commentators; it cannot mean lust after it or in it, as if αὐτοῦ were the Genitive of the object (Lücke, Neander, Sander, Besser, al.). Of course, the lust of the world refers also to the world and the things and manifestations in it, and not to God and the riches of His Kingdom. If the whole, the world, belonging to death, passes away, then also its parts, the life that is in it, its separate manifestations and exhibitions of life in individuals, must pass away. This makes one thoroughly loathe the love of the world—the ἀγάπην τὸν κόσμον. Who wants to seize and hold as the object of his love that which is perishable, doomed to death and perpetual defeat? The clause ὁ δὲ ποιεῖ τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ supplies not only an antithesis, but affirms that the ἐκδημία τοῦ κόσμου does not the will of God, that the ἀγάπη τοῦ πατρὸς shows and verifies itself in the ποιεῖν τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ, even as unfolded in vv. 8, sqq., that the child does not trifle with the will of the Father, for the Father is God. To such applies the μένει εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, the antithesis of παράγεται, he abides therefore unto, into eternity, sharing and assured of the imperishable and beatific life; redeemed from θάνατος, from the σκόρρα, he gains φῶς, ζωὴ αἰώνιος. [Huther: "The destiny of the κόσμος is θάνατος, that of the children of God ζωὴ αἰώνιος."—M.]. This antithesis points to the fact that the παράγεται of the world will sooner or later have run its course, and that the world will have ceased to exist. Most singular and arbitrary is the opinion of Ebrard, who says that "αἰὼν is the moon which will gloriously begin with the visible establishment of Christ's Kingdom on earth," and that consequently ὁ ποιεῖν—εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα signifies that "he that does the will of God will abide until then, until the Kingdom of Christ is established, and be suffered to witness the victory of Christ's Kingdom." The addition, "quomodo et deus manet in æternum," found in several Latin translations, but not in Jerome's, is rather remarkable.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The gift of the forgiveness of sins (v. 12), which is, at the same time, the gift of adoption, [of being made the child of God—M.], v. 13c, establishes a relationship which must verify itself in corresponding conduct, in the way of sanctification. God has taken the initiative, but man must seize it and hold fast, keep and verify it in striving after more profound knowledge, and in struggling for the peace of victory. On the gift of the forgiveness of our sins, and on that of our adoption with the Father, rest the more intimate knowledge of Christ, the victorious fight against Satan, and the enjoyment of the fruits of victory. In the fellowship with the Father and the Son are given us life, light, forgiveness, truth, wisdom, and understanding, and victory over the world and the devil. The victory of Christ (John xvi. 38) is the presupposition of all true victories, and His victory must continue in ours. John grounds the duties of Church members on the high privileges and immunities of the Christian state, and makes gratitude the principle of morality.

2. The peace-work of profound meditation and mature knowledge in men can only take place and prove successful if preceded by the struggles and triumphs of young men [i. e., the man must have passed through the discipline of the young man.—M.]. Great purity and integrity are indispensable to the clear perception and more thorough knowledge of the glory of Christ, of His Person, His Word, and His work. True knowledge presupposes life in fellowship with the Person known; it is a living reality and not a mere dogmatical formula (concerning the Person of Christ). Nothing but fighting against Satan will facilitate our knowledge of the eternal glory of Christ.

3. The κόσμος is diametrically opposed to God, and the heart of man cannot combine the love of the world and the love of the Father; the latter cannot thrive because of the former, or the former must be overcome, and disappearing, yield the place to the latter in the course of its growth and development. Where the life of [emanating from—M.] God is extant there may still be the world, but its power must be broken, it must wane more and more, and its still surviving remainder must recede before increasing and waxing knowledge and joy. Worldly life and godly life are not only two different biasses, but two opposite inclinations, incompatible and destroying each other.

4. It is not in point of space that we must flee from the world, but it is with reference to ethical principles that we must shun it, without loving it, turned away from it, to prevent our dying and perishing in and with it; some one thing may so effectually lay hold of one or another as to sweep him along with the fearful destruction of the whole κόσμος.

5. The definite superiority of the divine to the worldly may be gathered from the transitoriness of the world. Here is "afforded a vista through the whole process of the world's history, as well as of the love of God, right on to the end" (Düsterdieck), and at the same time an insight into the biography of individuals.

6. He that has separated himself from God, has estranged himself from Him, falls into the power of death; the world contains death in the love of itself. None but those who love the Father have the life; yet none love the Father but those who have and with true fidelity keep His word. But there exists no eternal kingdom of evil, the principally dualistic predisposition to evil, but only a condition which has become so, from which any and every man may and shall be redeemed, who does not offer any resistance.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The gift of the forgiveness of sins sets us the task of fighting against the destroyer, and acquiring the knowledge of the Saviour. The gift of the forgiveness of sins is sonship with God and the knowledge of the Father. Holy Scripture directs us first to the knowledge of sin, then to fight against and overcome the wicked one, and lastly to acquire the knowledge of the God-man. Holy Scripture addresses first children—that is to say, the children of God; the word of God is the word of the Father to His children; the word of God calls all, whom it addresses, children, because He is the Father of all. Young men and fathers cannot go beyond this child-ship [I retain this Germanism in this place in order to render the thought more perspicuous; neither the word sonship nor adoption conveys the precise shade of thought.—M.]. No age of life can or may desire to surpass the stage of childhood before God. The life-truth of the Gospel is only one, emanating from one Spirit, resting on one foundation, consisting in one Spirit, but like the sun, shedding its illuminating and vitalizing beams in all directions: away with all false individualizing and all dry moralizing! He that loves not the world in God as the object of redemption to its salvation, loves it only without God to his own perdition. The world, which thou lovest, reacts more on thee than thou art able to influence it; thou wilt sooner become worldly through it, than it will become Christian through thee. Shun not the world, but love it not; be not afraid of it, but be afraid of thy love of it.

BODMER:—John the Apostle survived twelve Roman emperors: Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasianus, Titus, Domitianus and Nerva; great expectations and hopes were entertained of each one of these lords of the world, but all failed in the case of the best of them: instead of healing, they inflicted wounds, and many came to a miserable end.

GERSON:—Amor habet vim uniendi, si terram amas, terrenus es; si deum, divinus.

SPENNER:—Every age should diligently cultivate the virtue becoming it before others, which is especially done by each particular age applying its natural gifts to the growth of life (understanding in the case of the old, strength in the case of young men, simplicity in the case of children).—Those who have overcome Satan as young men, may afterwards truly and fully know Christ as fathers, while those who have served him do not easily attain such knowledge, which is a kind of reward of grace.—The word of God does not only come to us, but abides also in us, and consequently is not a dead or passing sound.—That which does not abide forever is not worthy of our love; for God has created, appointed and called us unto eternal things.

STARKE:—Preachers should particularly urge obedience to the commandments of God, and renunciation of the love of the world on the plea of the grace of God in the forgiveness of sins, as a more powerful incentive than considerations founded on the Law.—Although you have conquered the devil once, he will return and assault you with sevenfold strength to rob you of your crown. Therefore, ye warriors of Jesus, grow not secure, but think that your task is not done with one well-fought battle.—O the deluded souls that fancy that it is the privilege of their rank to use the world at their pleasure, to lead a worldly and carnal life, and to be good Christians for all! They will terribly deceive themselves, for the mere name is not sufficient.—Christians, would you love the Father, you must content yourselves with the necessities of the body, bridle your eyes, and lead a life of simplicity.—The world and its lusts pass swiftly away, like an arrow out through the air, like smoke blows away, like a river flows along, like a bird flies past, like a sound dies away. What folly to set one's hope and pleasure on such changeable and transitory things!—It is well, but not enough to know the will of God, we must do it in the strength of God, with all diligence, at all times, in all things, if we would abide forever.—It is a great mercy of God that He accepts our poor, imperfect doing, provided it be done with a childlike heart, as the doing of His will.—None can do the will of God without denying his own will, for the will of God and corruptible self-will are utterly opposed to each other.

HUBNER:—Fathers are spiritual adults, matured Christians; they have known Christ, the Son of God, from personal experience, made proof of His power, or He has been fully formed in them (Eph. iv. 13; 1 Thess. ii. 7, 11; Heb. v. 14). The image of Christ has a feeble and tender beginning in childhood; it continues growing in youth, but does not attain perfect clearness with open face until manhood. No warrior can go beyond this: Christ and His knowledge excel all perfection. We have here the case of souls that long since have acquired forgiveness and cleansing from their sins, overcome the wicked one, stood severe trials and hard conflicts, in victory have been planted in the likeness of Christ's death, and made experience of the power of His resurrection. As fathers they possess spiritual generative powers. They are the mellow old wine. They are called παιδευοι, they are the nearest friends of the Lord, His intimates, that have a better understanding of His counsel: but, although thus highly raised by God, they never divest themselves of their childlike disposition. The sense of redemption in Christ, true poverty of spirit, voluntary and constant self-denial and strong love are their characteristics. But they still stand in need of instruction and caution (an old Christian had been victorious in the fight for thirty-nine years, but was overcome in the fortieth year.) They must fight senectute contra senectutem. They have more works than words. They are engaged in ceaseless intercessions for all the people of God, and gather riches for the children (2 Cor. xii. 14). But they must be very careful not to usurp an authority and power, in virtue of which they require others blindly and unconditionally to follow and agree with them; the moment they fall into this snare they cease to be fathers, and become the destroyers of the Christlike spirit in the children.—Young men are those who are still engaged in active warfare, and have to fear most the assaults of the flesh, the world and the devil; they ought to have begun to taste the better delights [of religion] and should overcome Satan. Hence they are always prepared for the battle. He that has become a true child of God must not care for the age of youth. Can any one, by anxious care, add one cubit unto his stature [age]? He that preserves that which he has, to him shall be given more; the process of growth is imperceptible (Mark iv. 28). They ought to have the spirit of power and vigilance; as valiant soldiers they must always be at their post, warring against the enemy. Their dangers are rashness, undue ardor, temerity and negligence. They must have work to do, they must destroy Babylon, but abstain from all things, and fight faithfully unto death. They must not be discouraged in the first ardor of their zeal, for that first ardor may lose its intensity. Their strength will be in proportion to their allowing their strength quietly to strike root; even Christ walked in silence and retirement during His youth, and John was in the wilderness. They must learn to enter into the mystery of godliness, abstain from their doing in order that God may work in them, that thus they may resist the ρουνός, the spoiler, who comes from without and forces his way into them, and would fain seize the youthful warriors. Hence they need circumspection and weapons (Eph. vi).—Children are beginners in Christianity who have already tasted the paternal love of God, who receive from the Father more tokens of love, as it were, more caressing. But they must be truly born of God, have a new mind, the Spirit of adoption whereby they cry Abba, Father. Their general characteristics are these: a childlike disposition, lowliness, obedience, sincerity, joyfulness. Their childlike failings are: credulity, carelessness, rashness, inconstancy, or even wandering from the simplicity in Christ. They are strongly attached to the sweet taste of grace. They require oversight, guidance, nursing, care, keeping; they require milk until they are able to take stronger food and grow. (Here we may refer to the choral divisions among the unitas fratrum: children, older boys, single brethren, single sisters, the chorus of married people, widowers and widows, to the incipientes, proficientes and perfecti of the Moravians, and to the analogies of paganism, Plato de legg. II., where the chorus of boys, of young men to the age of thirty, of men to the age of sixty, used fascinatingly to implant the true and the good into the minds of the people in songs, and Plutarch lacon. instit. according to which, among the Spartans, old men used to sing: "Once we were vigorous youths;" men, "We are so; if thou de-siest it, try;" and the boys, "Some day we shall even be better").—Love is the noblest power in man, which he ought not to waste on unworthy objects, but he ought to love God only.—The world is set before men to try them, whether they will lay hold of it or of heavenly things.—The objects of our desires, as far as they are creatures, are not evil in themselves (1 Tim. iv. 4; 1 Cor. x. 26), but the passionate desire of them is evil, and of the evil spirit. The excusatio of worldlings is: "it is natural, it is innocent." That is to lay the responsibility of sin on God.—Worldly-mindedness and religion are incompatible. There are, indeed, many degrees of this worldly-mindedness and fondness of worldly pleasures, but this much is certain: 1. Those in whom this fondness is strong and supreme, to whom non-gratification causes anger and a blank, are without the divine life. 2. Every worldly pleasure, though indifferent of itself, becomes sin if it leads astray from God, and has to be enjoyed without God. 3. In proportion to the growth of religion is the decrease of a mind and taste for worldly lusts, and vice versa.—It is disgraceful in clergymen [Germ. Geistliche, a technical term for clergymen, of which the English divines is the nearest approximation, or we may also say "spiritual and secular," but, of course, without any reference to the Roman Catholic use of these terms—M.], who ought to be the opposite of the worldly, to exhibit worldliness in the bias of their mind and conversation.—What comes of the transitoriness of the world and of the things which lust desires? What harm does it do to the worldly? 1. Even in respect of this earthly life it is painful and humiliating to take pleasure in enjoyments which are wholly idle and transient, and leave behind them nothing that is refreshing or ennobling, but, perhaps, something that will fill the mind with gloom, paralyze and deject the spirit—a melancholy blank. 2. This holds good still more in respect of the life to come. The objects will cease, but not the desire, which will then lack the instruments and means of its gratification. Painful condition. Such a soul will then behold itself in its miserable emptiness and vileness. Therefore consider the transitoriness and consequences of every sinful lust. (Oriental saying: The treasures of the world are so constituted that they will deprive thee of life, if thou gatherest them).—

NEANDER:—It is not part of the nature of the love of God that we must retire from the world and worldly things, but rather that we should use them according to the purpose which God has assigned to all men, to His glory.

BESSEK:—The forgiveness of sins is the bread on which the great and the small, Apostles and malefactors, the wise and the illiterate, kings and beggars (kings as beggars, and beggars as kings), live in the kingdom of God, even as the fourth and fifth petitions of the Lord's Prayer are significantly joined together by and.

JOHANN BUCHENHAGEN'S motto was: "Si Christum bene scis, satis est, si cetera nescis: si Christum nescis, nil est, si cetera discis."

LEO THE GREAT:—There are two kinds of love from which proceeds every lust according to its kind: man, who cannot exist without love, loves either God or the world.

SPENER.—This either—or is an established thing which will never yield the place to an as well—as. To contribute one cent to ungodliness is as much as to give up to it the whole. St. Bernard calls pride the arch-artificer of fraud, and the true fountain of vice, the tinder of sin, the rust of virtues, the moth of holiness, the beguiler of hearts, that turns medicine into poison, and cordials into stupefying draughts. A soul has nothing in eternity but what it has gathered in time.

NITZSCH:—The principal question of the divine word addressed to fathers: Do you know Him that is from the beginning? Let us consider: 1. Why this question is peculiarly suited to the aged? The excellency and glory of old age is experience, its natural avocation to gather and to have gathered it, its supreme requirement to have wisdom by and in experience. How much more important is it to have seen and felt a thing, to have shared its suffering, than merely to have heard of it! 2. Which knowledge does it speak of? The First and the Last has been revealed in the centre of history, He by whom and for whom all things consist; time has become conscious of eternity. Humanity has been raised from profound misery to high glory. This knowledge compensates the eye for every unavoidable want of light, supplies the solution of many riddles, finds the kernel of many experiences, marks the holy line of human effort, cherishes the sweet hope of beholding [God], and thinks well done that which God doeth. 3. The great monition and the glorious consolation contained therein. Many things improve by age, but not the fundamental error, erring from God. Self-will and unbelief do not break spontaneously by mere events; the secret will of the natural man grows to a fearful height and resoluteness; rather die in sins than present oneself blind and naked, miserable and poor before the only Mediator, the Conqueror on the cross. Do you still know Him, do you know Him again? Be overcome and ye shall conquer; His knowledge rejuvenates you like eagles, makes you wise, and crowns all knowledge and experience with faith in the eternal words. The monition of the divine word to young men that they have overcome the wicked one. Regard it—1, as a congratulation on their participation in the victory of Christ, but also as a threefold test-inquiry of the reality of their Christianity. After the victory of Christ, the time of the mere doubtful struggle between the death and life of mankind, the time of invincible sin, of the immeasurable progress of corruption, belongs to the remote past. If you fear already, or are still afraid in this world, be of good courage and know that you enter into a reconciled world, and stand in eternal peace, and partake of a happiness and liberty that have not to be sought for and devised, but may be seized and enjoyed in true faith. But here you have to inquire after faith in this world,—since the tendency prevails not to believe that which was believed by the fathers; many, all believe to indemnify themselves for childlike faith with the conceits of the unvanishing beauty of the world, of the power of the mind of man and of the innocence and goodness of the heart of man,—to inquire after the knowledge of this truth, after the decision and conversion of the heart, whether that will reign supreme which says, How should I do this great evil and sin against my God? whether you are consciously or unconsciously under the jurisdiction of the prince of this world, and unfitted for the true work of your calling. . . . 2. As a call to resistance, and at the same time as a promise of assistance. This bears on your bravery, your honour, your independence, ye that are in such hurry to be men. There are many adversaries from without that reappear again and again; fight the invisible battles in your souls. It is good for a man to have worn the yoke in his youth, but how much better this yoke; thus you will gain a clear and pure view of your future, thus you spend the time of your transitory youth for the purpose of securing eternal youth, thus you care to-day for to-morrow and ever, even unto the judgment; all things are yours.

Hast thou broken with the world? 1. Art thou perhaps still wholly entangled in its lust? 2. Art thou convinced that it is impossible to love God and the world at the same time? 3. Dost thou daily fight victoriously against the lust of the world tempting thee?

What is the Christian's relation to the world? 1. He knows that its lust, without any exception, is sin (v. 16), and such sin as is incompatible with the Christian profession (v. 15), and on this very account 2. He shuns and flies it (v. 15).

Consider how little the love of the world comports with sincere conversion towards God. 1. The latter imposes renunciation of the world and its lust as a necessary condition. 2. It affords strength for overcoming the world. 3. And is itself a continued combat with the temptations of the world. *

The infamy of a Christian being the slave of worldly lust. 1. He thereby enters the service of worldly vanity, 2. becomes the enemy of God, and 3. will perish with the world (L. in "Gesetz und Zeugnis" for 1860).—

[EZEKIEL HOPKINS:—v. 15. "For these things (Pleasures, Riches, Honours), though they make a fair and gaudy show, yet it is all but show and appearance. As bubbles, blown into the air, will represent great variety of orient and glittering colours, not, as some suppose, that there are any such really there, but only they appear so to us, through a false reflection of light cast upon them: so truly this world, this earth on which we live, is nothing else but a great bubble blown up by the breath of God in the midst of the air, where it now hangs. It sparkles with ten thousand glories: not that they are so in themselves, but only they seem so to us through the false light by which we look upon them. If we come to grasp it, it breaks and leaves nothing but wind and disappointment in our hands: as histories report of the fruits that grow near the Dead sea, where once Sodom and Gomorrah stood, they appear very fair and beautiful to the eye, but if they be crushed, turn straight to smoke and ashes."

There is nothing in the world vain in respect of its natural being or of God the Creator—but all the vanity that is in worldly things, is only in respect of the sin and folly of man. [Augustine: "Utendum est hoc mundo, non fruendum; ut invisibilia Dei, per ea quæ facta sunt, intelligantur; hoc est, ut de temporalibus æterna capiantur."—M.]. The vanity of the world appears in:

1. That all its glory and splendour depend merely on opinion and fancy.

2. In its deceitfulness and treachery. It is not only vanity, but a lying vanity.

3. As all things in the world are lying vanities, so are they all vexatious. "Uncertain comforts but most certain crosses."

4. A little cross will embitter great comforts—another mark of the vanity of the world.

5. The longer we enjoy any worldly thing, the more flat and insipid doth it grow.

6. All the pleasure of the world is nothing else but a tedious repetition of the same things.

7. The world can stand us in no stead, when we have the greatest need of support and comfort.

8. All things in the world are vain, because they are unsuitable.

The soul is spiritual and immortal, worldly things are material and perishable.

Its wants are spiritual—but the world supplies only material wants.

9. The vanity of the world appears in its inconstancy and fickleness and—

10. In that it is altogether unsatisfactory.—M.]

[BARROW:—The world is an enemy, an irreconcilable enemy to our salvation. The world, that is, the wicked principles, the bad customs, the naughty conversation and example which commonly prevail here among men; alluring to evil and deterring from good; the cares also, the riches, the pleasures, the glories of the world, which possess or distract the minds, satiate and cloy the desires, employ all the affections and endeavours, take up the time of men; all in the world which fasteneth our hearts to earth, and to those low transitory things; or which sink them down toward hell and which detain them from soaring toward heaven.

The world passeth away and the desire (ἐπιθυμία) thereof; whatever seemeth most lovely and desirable in the world is very fitting; however, our desire and our enjoyment thereof must suddenly cease. Imagine a man, therefore, possessed of all worldly goods, armed with power, flourishing in credit, flowing with plenty, swimming in all delight (such as were sometime Priamus, Poly-crates, Croesus, Pompey) yet since he is withal supposed a man, and mortal, subject both to fortune and death, none of those things can he reasonably confide or much satisfy himself in; they may be violently divorced from him by fortune, they must naturally be loosed from him by death; the closest union here cannot last longer than till death us depart; wherefore no man upon such account can truly call, or, if he consider well, heartily esteem himself happy; a man cannot hence receive profit or content from any labour he taketh under the sun. (Eccles. i. 8 sqq.)—M.]

[On ἀλαζονεία τοῦ βίου v. 16. "It was a pertinent discourse of Cineas, dissuading Pyrrhus from undertaking a war against the Romans. Sir, saith he, when you have conquered them, what will you do next? Then Sicily is near at hand, and easy to master.—And what when you have subdued Sicily? Then we will pass over to Africa and take Carthage, which cannot long withstand us.—When these are conquered, what will be your next attempt?—Then we will fall in upon Greece and Macedon and recover what we have lost there.—Well, when all are subdued, what fruit do you expect from all your victories? Then we will sit down and enjoy ourselves. Sir, replied Cineas, may we not do it now? Have you not already a kingdom of your own? and he that cannot enjoy himself with a kingdom, cannot with the world." Plutarch in Vita Pyrrhi.—M.]

[PYLE (v. 12-14):—The cautions I here give you ought to be equally regarded by all degrees of Christian professors. The new converts and younger Christians are to consider themselves as newly put into a state of salvation, the pardon of sin, and the favour of God, through Jesus Christ; and to endeavour to confirm themselves in it by the careful practice of true Christian virtue. Such as are come to more maturity in their profession and are in the strength and vigour of their age, have a great advantage, and ought to employ the utmost of that vigour in resisting the strongest temptations of the devil, and perfecting their conquest over him and all his wicked instruments. And the aged Christians cannot but have so dear a knowledge of God, and the revelation of His will by Jesus Christ, during the long season from their first conversion, that it would be utterly inexorable for them to be wanting in their essential duties or be drawn from them by the false teachers.—M.]

7. Warning and consolation against Anti-Christ.

DESCRIPTION OF HIS FORERUNNERS, WHOSE APPEARANCE POINTS TO THE LAST TIME (VV. 18-28). EXHORTATION OF THE FAITHFUL TO STEADFASTNESS IN THEIR ASSURANCE OF POSSESSING THE TRUTH AND ETERNAL LIFE (V. 24-28).

CHAPTER II, 18-28.

- 18 Little children, it is the last time<sup>1</sup>, and as ye have heard that<sup>2</sup> antichrist<sup>3</sup> shall come, even now are<sup>4</sup> there many antichrists; whereby<sup>5</sup> we know that it is the last time<sup>6</sup>.
 19 They went out from us<sup>7</sup>, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt<sup>8</sup> have continued<sup>9</sup> with us: but they went out<sup>10</sup>, that they might be 20 made manifest that they were<sup>11</sup> not all of us. But<sup>12</sup> ye have an<sup>13</sup> unction from the 21 Holy One, and ye<sup>14</sup> know all things<sup>15</sup>. I have not written unto you because ye know 22 not the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth<sup>16</sup>. Who is 23 a<sup>17</sup> liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He<sup>18</sup> is antichrist, that 24 denieth the Father and the Son. Whosoever<sup>19</sup> denieth the Son, the same hath not 25 the Father<sup>20</sup>: [but] he that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also<sup>21</sup>. Let that 26 therefore abide in you, which ye have heard from the beginning<sup>22</sup>. If that which ye 27 have heard from the beginning shall remain in you, ye also shall continue in the Son, 28 and in the Father<sup>23</sup>. And this is the promise that he<sup>24</sup> hath promised us<sup>25</sup>, even eternal 29 life<sup>26</sup>. These things have I written unto you concerning them that seduce you<sup>27</sup>.
 30 But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you<sup>28</sup>, and ye need not 31 that any man teach you: but as the same<sup>29</sup> anointing teacheth you of all things, and 32 is truth<sup>30</sup>, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him<sup>31</sup>. And 33 now, little children, abide in him; that when<sup>32</sup> he shall appear<sup>33</sup>, we may have<sup>34</sup> confidence, 34 and not be ashamed before him<sup>35</sup> at his coming.

Verse 18. [ἡ ὥρα ἡ ἔσχατη—the last hour.—M.]

<sup>2</sup> B. C. Sin. omit the Article before ἀντίχριστος. In Sin. it is clearly a later addition. It would hardly have been omitted, had it been originally there. [Lachm. Tisch. Buttm. reject it.—M.]

<sup>3</sup> German: "Even now have there come into existence" Lillie: "even now are there many become."—M.]

Verse 19. [Better to retain the Greek order with German: "From us they went out."—ἡ ἡμετέρα, A. B. C. Lachm. Tisch. Buttm. Luther, is more authentic than ἡ ἡμετέρα G. K., but less common.—M.]

- [<sup>3</sup> No doubt supplied by E. V. is arbitrary and unnecessary.—M.]
 [<sup>6</sup> German: "that not all are from us" better than the more inferential rendering advocated by Lillie "that none of them are of us," and the less correct translation of E. V. "that they were not all of us."]
 Verse 20. [<sup>7</sup> German: "And." There seems to be no necessity for "but," although  $\kappa\alpha\iota$  may here have slightly adversative force.—M.]
 [<sup>8</sup> German omits the Article before  $\epsilon\upsilon\kappa\tau\iota\sigma\mu\epsilon\nu$  and renders "and ye have unction."—M.]
 Verse 21. [<sup>11</sup> German: "and that every thing which he is not out of the truth," but the rendering of E. V. is a happy inferential translation of the Greek idiom.—M.]
 Verse 22. [<sup>12</sup> German: "who is the liar." The Article is emphatic here and must be retained.—M.]
 [<sup>13</sup> German: "This is the antichrist, who."  $\epsilon\upsilon\tau\epsilon\varsigma$  has demonstrative force.—M.]
 Verse 23. [<sup>14</sup> German: "Every one that denieth;"  $\omega\mu\iota\sigma\tau\eta\varsigma$  qui, Vulg. Aug. Calv. Bengel, and "every one that" Greenfield, Allioli, de Wette, Lillie.—M.]
 [<sup>15</sup> German: "Hath also not the Father." Better render with Rhemish and most foreign versions "neither hath he the Father."—M.]
 [<sup>16</sup> A. B. C. Sin. [Griech., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch. Buttm. Wordsw. Lillie.—M.] have the final clause: " $\epsilon\iota\delta\epsilon\lambda\omicron\gamma\omega\nu$  τὸν υἱὸν καὶ τὸν πατέρα ἔχει," and it is required by the parallel passage 2 Jno. 9 as well as by John's fondness of antithesis. [ $\delta\mu\omicron\lambda\omicron\gamma\omega\nu$  however should be rendered "confesseth" and not "acknowledgeth" as in E. V.—M.]
 Verse 24. [<sup>17</sup> German: "You, that which ye have heard from the beginning, let that abide in you." In this rendering  $\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota$  is left out; but the emphatic you, in the sense of as for you, is decidedly in favour of the German rendering; translate, "you, let that which ye have heard from the beginning, abide in you."—A. B. C. Sin. Vulg. al. omit  $\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota$ .—M.]
 [<sup>18</sup> German: "If that abide in you which ye have heard from the beginning, ye also shall abide in the Son and in the Father." The three-fold rendering of  $\mu\epsilon\mu\epsilon\nu$  in one verse "abide, remain, continue," adopted in E. V. should by all means be avoided. Lillie calls this sacrificing of the simple beauty and force of the original to "a great number of good English" words an "unprofitable exuberance."—M.]
 Verse 25. [<sup>19</sup> German: "And this is the promise which He Himself;"  $\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma$ . The reference seems to be to an oral promise.—M.]
 [<sup>21</sup> German: "The eternal life." The supplement in E. V. is hardly necessary, the Article is indispensable and the order "life eternal" seems preferable; see on the last point E. V. Matth. xxv. 46; Jno. iv. 36; xvii. 3; Rhemish version, Wakef. Macknight, Berleburg Bible, and Lillie.—M.]
 Verse 26. [<sup>22</sup>  $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\upsilon\tau\omega\nu$  ἡμᾶς, "who would deceive you." The context (vv. 20, 21, 27) shows that this is a case of the Present "de conatu, i. e. an endeavour or purpose" (Buttm. § 137. n. 10), and so it is generally understood." Lillie.—M.]
 Verse 27. [<sup>23</sup> German: "And you—the ointment which ye received from Him, abideth in you."—M.]
 Verse 28. [<sup>27</sup> A. B. C. Sin. read  $\epsilon\iota\delta\alpha$  instead of  $\epsilon\iota\delta\alpha\tau\epsilon$  [G. K. Theoph. Oecum. Tisch.—M.]
 [<sup>28</sup> German: "shall be manifested" decidedly preferable both for the sake of uniformity and on doctrinal grounds ("the agency and love of the Father in the second as well as the first coming of the Saviour" Lillie) to "when He shall appear" E. V.—M.]
 [<sup>29</sup>  $\sigma\chi\acute{\alpha}\mu\epsilon\nu$ —B and Cod. Sin. give it as a correction of  $\epsilon\chi\sigma\mu\epsilon\nu$ .
 [<sup>30</sup> German: "and not be put to shame away from Him in His coming." Calvin: Pudescamus ab eius presentia; Steph. ab eo discedamus pudescendi; Hammond: "Turned with shame from Him;" Green and Bloomfield: "shrink from Him with shame;" Paine: "put to confusion of face as being cast away from Him." Wordsworth: "Driven to shame from Him;" Lillie: "Shamed away from Him at His coming."—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The connection. The groundwork on which this portion of the Epistle rests is contained in the individualized addresses (v. 12–14), introducing both warning and consolation against the love of the world (v. 15–17), as well as in the subsequent warning and consolation against antichrist (v. 18–28). As the former particularly connected with the final clause  $\nu\epsilon\nu\iota\chi\kappa\alpha\tau\epsilon$  τὸν παντὸν whose kingdom is  $\delta$  κόσμος, so this connects with  $\epsilon\gamma\chi\acute{\alpha}\tau\eta\varsigma$  τὸν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, τὸν πατέρα,  $\delta$  λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν ὑμῖν μένει. The opening words  $\epsilon\chi\acute{\alpha}\tau\eta$  ὅρα ἐστὶν in the sequel (v. 18) connect also with  $\delta$  κόσμος παρόντων (v. 17). This portion which began (ch. i. 5 sq.) with the Light-Being of God and the Light-walk of believers, concludes with a warning against the lie which is directed against the fundamental pillar of eternal truth, the glory of Christ, and an exposure of its attempt to annihilate the promise of eternal life. The address  $\kappa\alpha\tauὰ$ , v. 18, applies to all the readers of the Epistle, and requires us to consider the sequel addressed to the whole Church (contrary to Bengel). It is incomprehensible that Ebrard on account of the peculiarly childlike character of this section should hold the opinion that the reference is only to the little ones, to children.

The last hour, v. 18. This important and difficult idea, which is liable to many interpretations and has been variously understood, can only be understood and explained with reference to the whole usus loquendi current and the sum-total of clear views on the subject contained in the New Testament. It is not sufficient to refer the reader to Lange on Matth. xxiv., Moll on Heb. i. 1, and Frommüller on 1 Pet. i. 5, 20. Compare particularly Riehms, Lehrbegriff des Hebräerbriefts, pp. 72 sqq.; 204 sqq., and Diederich ad loc.—The representation of two ages of the world is rooted in the Old Testament idea and rabbinical idea of the עולם הזה and the עולם הבא; inside these two ages of the world are the יְמֵי הַמָּשִׁיחַ, the days of the Messiah, the Messianic age proper, which is alternately counted with either age of the world, and consequently may be either after or before the end of the days, or the end of the days itself. The Lord Himself distinguishes ἐν τούτῳ τῷ αἰῶνι from ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι (Matth. xii. 30), ἐν τῷ καιρῷ τούτῳ from ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τῷ ἐρχομένῳ (Mark x. 30; Luke xviii. 30); and this distinction, as well as Luke xx. 34, sq. (οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου γαμοῦσιν—οἱ δὲ καταβαλόντες τοῦ αἰῶνος ἐκείνου τυχεῖν καὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως τῆς ἐκ νεκρῶν) show most plainly that the earthly development-period of the kingdom of God preceding the second coming of Christ in glory, and beginning with the first coming of Christ in the flesh, belongs to the first age of the world, and that the future time is the time of the completed kingdom of God. According to this ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα (Jno. vi. 39, 40, 44, 54; xi. 24; xii. 48) is the day of the resurrection of the dead and the judgment, the last day of the first age of the world and the transition to the second. The turning-point between both ages of the world is the time of Christ's return to judgment (Matth. xiii. 39 sq.; 49; xxiv. 8; xxviii. 20). Thus Paul also contrasts ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ with ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι, and the sufferings τοῦ νῦν καιροῦ with the μέλλουσα δόξα (Rom. viii. 18), and describes Christians as living ἐν τῷ νῦν αἰῶνι looking for the blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ (Tit. ii. 12, 18). The ἐσχάται ἡμέραι in which there shall come καιροὶ χαλεποὶ (2 Tim. iii. 1), and the ὑστεροὶ καιροὶ (1 Tim. iv. 1), like the αἰῶνες οἱ ἐπέρχόμενοι (Eph. ii. 7), denote the period immediately preceding the second coming of Christ. While, according to Paul, Christians still live outwardly in the first age of the world, yet are they ethically beyond it and the character of this present age of the world is described by him as tainted with immorality and alienation from God, Rom. xii. 2; 1 Cor. ii. 6, 8; iii. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Gal. i. 4; Eph. ii. 2; 2 Tim. iv. 10. He regarded also the present age of the world as running on towards its end since the first coming of Christ; hence he speaks of τὰ τέλη τῶν αἰώνων (1 Cor. x. 11) having set in. We have not to inquire here whether he regarded the second coming of Christ to be near at hand.—Peter considers his time as the ἐσχάται ἡμέραι (Acts ii. 17) and laid the first coming of Christ ἐν ἐσχάτῳ τῶν χρόνων (1 Pet. i. 20 cf. v. 5: ἐν καιρῷ ἐσχάτῳ or τῶν ἡμερῶν, 2 Pet. iii. 8 cf. Jude 18).—So also James: (v. 13: ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις).—In the Epistle to the Hebrews also the close of the first age of the world is described as beginning with the first coming of Christ (ch. i. 1), but the συντέλεια τῶν αἰώνων denotes the turning-point of the two ages of the world, ch. ix. 26, and this turning-point is more particularly described as found in the sacrificial death of Christ on account of its important consequences (ch. x. 14; xi. 39, 40), since that which is eternal, is now extant (Χριστὸς—ἀρχιερεὺς τῶν μελλόντων ἀγαθῶν ch. ix. 11; cf. v. 14; x. 1, 18; vi. 5; xii. 22). The beginning of the new time has set in, but only the ideal and objective beginning; since the αἰὼν μέλλον as to the δύναμις is already extant in the redeemed, but will not enter into ἐνέργεια until the second coming of Christ (ch. xiii. 14), so that the first age of the world still continues outwardly and that consequently our time is only a transition-period; with respect to the ethical sense of these ideas we have here the point of contact between the Epistle to the Hebrews and the views of Paul.—John's ἐσχάτη ὥρα ἐστίν must be understood as lying within the limits of these views. The use of ὥρα instead of ἡμέρα, the day which with God is equal to a thousand years (Ps. xc. 4; 2 Pet. iii. 8), indicates a peculiar feature, and the absence of the Article leaves it undefined. We have to think of a period of time belonging to the last days or last times which exhibits their character in a concentrated form, and since the ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα in the Gospel adverts particularly to the κρίσις, the reference seems to be to peculiarly critical manifestations. If now we have to translate: "it is the last hour," the reference to the antichrist and the antichrists is in admirable keeping with the announcements of the coming of false prophets and teachers for the purpose of temptation and trial, so that in them there already takes place a separation of true believers from false believers. Cf. Matth. xxiv. 24 sqq.; 1 Tim. iv. 1 sqq.; 2 Tim. iii. 1 sqq.—Hence ὥρα is neither—the season of the year, the wintry season of the world (Scholiast II), nor ἐσχάτη=χειρίστη (Oecumen., Schöttgen: tempora periculosa, pessima et abjectissima, Carpov and others), which is also forbidden by 2 Tim. iii. 1. Bengel's explanation that it denotes the last hour of John's old age (ultima, non respectu omnium mundi temporum, sed in antithesi puerulorum, ad patres et juvenes), is a singular make-shift in order to guard John from the error that his prediction of the last hour had not been fulfilled. Nor can ἐσχάτη ὥρα designate the time immediately preceding the destruction of Jerusalem (Socinus, Grotius), for the last time is not to be taken with such chronological precision. Nor is there any warrant for the assertion of Huther, that John wrote with a presentiment of the second coming of Christ (an assertion based on what is said v. 8 of the σκοτία and v. 17 of the κόσμος, that they παράγεται which simply marks the transitory character inhering in the σκοτία and the κόσμος), since he writes only under the impression and with a sense of the transitoriness of the powers of this first age of the world, and that he indicates thereby the nearness of Christ's second coming (Lücke, Neander, Baumgarten-Crusius, Gerlach, Ebrard, Huther). Hence we may say with Düsterdieck that "John did not wish to supply a chronological but only a real definition" [that is, one relating simply to the object—M.], which is clearly indicated by ἐὰν φανερώσῃ (v. 28), since εἰς is hardly the true reading there. "The prophetic substance of the Apostolical declaration is true," "the extension of the time from the real beginning (the destruction of Jerusalem, which does not disconcert John, and of the import of which, with reference to the history and the judgment of the world, his mind is fully made up), to the actual end of beings" denotes rather no measure at all than one that is too short. The first Messianic transition-period inaugurated by the Saviour in the form of a servant, governed by Him and terminating the first age of the world is the ἐσχάτη, during which men pass through peculiar troubles, perils and conflicts on to the promised advent of the second world-age of glory. In this transition-period there are however peculiar hours of development, one of which had come when John wrote his Epistle. The term ἐσχάτη ὥρα has therefore to be taken in a prophetic and eschatological sense; it has moreover an important bearing on the history of Christ's kingdom and constitutes a historical reference to the second coming of Christ as the commencement of the second world-age, but not a chronological reference to the time when the second coming is to take place.—Noteworthy is Calvin's explanation: ultimum tempus, in quo sic complentur omnia, ut nihil supersit præter ultimam Christi revelationem, and with reference to the absence of the Article also that of Besser: the time before a special revelation of the judicatory glory of Christ prefiguring the last hour before the universal final judgment.—

The Antichrist and the Antichrists. v. 18.

1. The word ἀντίχριστος occurs only here, v. 22; iv. 8 and 2 Jno. 7. and its meaning has to be ascertained first philologically and then exegetically.

2. ἀντί may mean both hostility and substitution. In the former case it denotes the antagonist of Christ, the antichrist, in the latter the pretender-Christ or pseudo-Christ. Thus ἀντίτυπος is a τύπος set in opposition to another τύπος, and ἀντίλυτρον a λύτρον, paid or given for something; so ἀντίθεος in Homer, denotes godlike, but other authors use it in the sense of adverse to the gods; one and the same word may then be used in both senses; but no word can have both meanings in one and the same place; hence we must not endeavour to combine the ideas of anti-Christ and pretender-Christ as Huther maintains ("the enemy of Christ, who, under the lying appearance of being the true Christ, endeavours to destroy the work of Christ"), although it must be conceded that the enemy of Christ appears at the same time with the pretension of being able to supply His place, of becoming His substitute, and that the pretender-Christ does occupy His place in hostility to Him. But the ἀντίχριστοι manifestly cannot be taken in this double sense. And still less allowable is it with Sander first to attach to the word in the Singular the sense of pseudo-Christ and mimic of Christ, and then immediately afterwards to make the Plural designate the enemies of Christ. We cannot get on purely philological considerations beyond the possibility of taking the word in one or the other of said senses.

3. We have to hold fast the fact that the word denotes persons. This is required of the Plural ἀντίχριστοι in v. 19: ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐξῆλθαν, οὐκ ἴσαν ἐξ ἡμῶν, μεμενῆκεισαν μετ' ἡμῶν. But if the ἀντίχριστοι are persons, then ἀντίχριστος must also be a person, for this is required by ἐρχεται. Hence Bengel's exposition is incorrect: "Sive id vocabulum phrasis apostolica, sive sermo fidelium introduxit, Johannes errores, qui oriri possent, prævisurus, non modo antichristum, sed etiam antichristos vult dici; tibi antichristum vel spiritum antichristi vel deceptorem et antichristum dicit, sub singulari numero omnes mendaces et veritatis inimicos innuit. Quemadmodumque Christus interdum pro christianismo (where?), sic antichristus pro antichristianismo sive doctrina et multitudo hominum Christo contraria dicitur. Antichristum jam tum venire, ita assentitur Johannes, ut non unum, sed multos, id quod amplius quiddam et tritius esse censet, antichristos factos esse doceat. Sepe totum genus eorum, qui bonam aliquam aut malem indolem habent, singulari numero cum articulo exprimitur (Matth. xii. 35; xviii. 17. 29.). Igitur antichristus sive antichristianismus ab extrema Johannis ætate (see above: the last hour—old age!) per omnem seculorum tractum se propagavit et permanet, donec magnus ille adversarius exoritur." This view is adopted by Lange, Baumgarten-Crusius, Besser and others.

4. We have here before us a law of historical development, a fixed ordinance of the history of the kingdom. The point in question is the ἐσχάτη ὥρα and the marks by which it may be known; the reference is to ἀντίχριστος ἐρχεται and to ἀντίχριστοι γεγόνασιν, to that which has happened viv, to that which is still to be looked for and has been announced (ἠκοῦσθαι):

And as ye have heard (through the announcement of the Apostles) that an antichrist cometh, even now have there come into existence many antichrists (καὶ νῦν γεγόνασιν).—It is by no means allowable to insert ita est before καθὼς ἠκοῦσθαι (Bengel): nor must the Present ἐρχεται be put on a line with γεγόναι, so that the antichrist now cometh and is present even as the others also have appeared; nor must ἐρχεται and γεγόναι, made equal in point of time, be only so distinguished from each other that the former comes aliunde, while these have come ex nobis. Γεγόναι, they are become, they have come into existence, denotes the antichrists as a historical product, on whom the surrounding powers operating in time have operated. Hence it is not equal to cooperunt esse (Erasmus) but to "they are become, they are existing."—Ebrard incorrectly renders ἐρχεται=is future, although he correctly explains it by=will some day appear. The Future is implied in the idea of coming and the Present indicates the certainty of the event. [Huther: The Present ἐρχεται instead of the Future; it denotes the future as an event which is sure to occur.—M.]. Accordingly the ἀντίχριστοι exist before the ἀντίχριστος, who however is sure to follow them, and that which appears in the former, the προδρόμοις, only in an isolated, undeveloped and feeble form, is gathered together by the latter in his individual person, and developed in a powerful form. In the course of time malice will so surely become intensified and opposition to God and Christ will reach such a degree of development that the existence of many antichrists warrants the certain result of a future concentration and formation of this spirit in one person.

5. The ἀντίχριστοι come out of the Christian Church, they have themselves been Christians before (ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐξῆλθαν v. 19); the antichrist, in like manner, will of course come forth from the ranks of the Christians, he will also be a man. Hence ἀντίχριστος is not Satan himself (Pseudohippolytos, Theodoret); the idea of Satan becoming man is inexecutable, since the Eternal Word only, the Image of the Father, in which man has been created, can become man.

6. The antichrists deny that Jesus is the Christ (v. 22; iv. 8; 2 Jno. 7); that He did not come in the flesh, that He is not the Son of God, that He is not of God (ch. iv. 14 sqq.; v. 5 sqq.; v. 20 sq.). The doctrine is the denial of the truth, the lie, they themselves are LIARS, and according to John viii. 44, the children of the devil, of the father of the lie (ch. iii. 3-10). The Greeks strikingly observe: ὁ ψεύστης, ἐναντίος ὢν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, ἴσται τῷ Χριστῷ, ἀντίχριστός ἐστιν (Theophylact) and ὁ ψεύστης τὸ τοῦ διαβόλου ὄνομα (Scho-liast II.). The antichrist and the antichrists are to be taken "as expressly connected with Satan" (Düsterdieck), and the two words here denote not substitution, but hostility to Christ exhibited in the form of eminent strength; the antichrist is pre-eminently the instrument and tool of Satan. Hence we have to exclude the exposition of Irenæus, Hippolytus, Cyrillus and others, that the antichrist was tentatus semet ipsum Christum ostendere, and mimicking Christ.

7. The comparison of this passage with 2 Thess. ii. 1 sq. (Hofmann, Heilige Schrift I, p. 807 sqq.) requires this explanation. The name ἀντίχριστος used by John corresponds with the description given by Paul, ἀντικείμενος καὶ ὑπεραίρουμένος ἐπὶ πάντα λεγόμενον θεὸν ἢ εἶδωσκα, to denote his hostility with reference to his pretended ability to supply the place of God (ὥστε αὐτὸν εἰς τὸν ναὸν τοῦ θεοῦ καθίσαι, ἀποδεκνύντα αὐτὸν ὡς ἐστὶν θεός). John contrasts the πνεῦμα τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου with the πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ, while Paul calls him ὁ ἀνθρώπος τῆς ἀμαρτίας, ὁ ἀνομος, ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ὀψωλείας. His appearing also is preceded by an ἀποστασία, and he himself is the precursor of the παρουσία τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν, just as in John. But we must not overlook a difference belonging to this agreement. John speaks in a more general way, and uses less definite terms than Paul, who gives more distinct prominence to the person and approach of the dreaded and dreadful one; but he also refers to τὸ κατέχον and ὁ κατέχων as a power wielded by a living person, and specifies that for the benefit of the Church his progress will be arrested and his appearing delayed, thus pointing, like John, to a historical development. —Remembering all these particulars, we have, first of all, to reject those expositions which limit the application of the subject to a solitary historical fact or a single personage, and regard this statement of the Apostle in the light of a prophesy of a church-historical fact. Thus the Greek expositors, and many others (Augustine, Luther, Calvin, al.) after them apply it to heretics or heresiarchs, e. g., to Simon Magus, Cerinthus, Ebion, the Gnostics, to Basilides, Valentinus, and others, the Nicolaitans (Rev. ii. 6), to Diotrophes (3 John 9.), Hymeneus and Philletus (2 Tim. ii. 17), and Grotius actually applies it to Barcochba, Calov to Mohammed, Luther (Art. Schm. tract. de pot. et prim. papæ, § 39; cf. Melanchthon, Apol. Art. VII. VIII., § 23; XV. § 18) to the pope, and Roman Catholics to Luther. All this is purely arbitrary and unwarranted, and not only depreciates the word of prophecy, but actually deprives it of the prophetic element, as if it had ceased to be valid. Secondly, we have also to reject the modern exposition (both that of rationalistic commentators and that of Lücke, de Wette and Neander) which insists upon separating the idea, "that simultaneously with the development of Christianity, evil also would gradually increase in intensity, until having reached its culmination, it would be completely conquered by the power of Christ," from the form as here indicated, and that the form, as the mere shell, might be dropped. On the contrary, both the idea and the form have to be held fast, for we have here the expression of a law ever recurring in historical manifestations which belongs to the development of the history of the Kingdom [of God] up to and until the end of the time of Messiah and the Church, and this expression is so clearly and distinctly asserted that John feels warranted to draw the emphatic conclusion: "whence we know that there is a last hour." By the appearing of many antichrists we may know and infer thence (ὅθεν) as from a distinct premise, that there is an onward progress in the direction of Christ's coming, which is preceded by the concentration of the antichristian element, thriving and luxuriating of course in different persons according to its different forms of manifestation. [On the different views of the antichrist see Lünemann on 2 Thess. ii. 1-12; p. 204 sqq., and Düsterdieck ad locum; also Trench, Synonyms of the N. T., p. 145 sqq.—M.]

Relation of the Antichrists to the Church. First there is noted the fact that,

VER. 19. From us they went out.—The most natural and primary meaning of ἡμῶν is that it designates the Apostle and his readers, consequently the Church, which is addressed by παῖδια, and to be understood in ἡκούσασθε. The reference is neither to the Jews (Grotius, Rieckli), nor to the Apostles only (Spener, Besser), nor only to the Church with exclusion of the children (Ebrard). Apart from the form ἐξῆλθαν, which in this very verb is by no means uncommon in the New Testament (Winer, pp. 86, 87), the sense is various: prodire, exire, egredi, secedere. Two ideas play into each other: origin and separation, coming out and going away. The nature of the ἀντίχριστοι who are engaged in the ἀποστασία, not μεμενῆκεσαν μεθ' ἡμῶν, requires us to translate secesserunt, evaserunt (Augustine, Bede, Erasmus, Lücke, Düsterdieck, Ebrard, Huther). Prodierunt (Vulgate, al.) misapprehends the origin of the antichrists, and denotes origin only. ἐξῆλθαν does not point to their development and origin, but only to their separation, their apostasy, which ἐξ ἡμῶν requires us to regard as their apostasy from the Church; γενῶσιν, to be sure, shows that they are within that Church from which they have now separated. This is brought out "by the emphatic position of ἐξ ἡμῶν before the verb" (Huther), for ἐξ ἡμῶν in connection with the verb ἐξέρχεται merely denotes the circle, the fellowship from which they have separated. "John does not indicate the extent to which that formal separation has been carried; still ἐξῆλθον implies that they had not only opposed the Apostolical doctrine (Beza: "ad mutationem non loci, sed doctrine pertinet"), but also those who, by the faithful preservation of the unadulterated Gospel, had proved themselves to be children of God" (Huther).

But they were not of us.—Εἶναι ἐξ ἡμῶν indicates the internal relation. Here the idea of origin combines with that of appertaining and affinity. Ἀλλὰ (Winer, pp. 462, 472, ἀλλὰ) denotes the strong opposition of ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐξῆλθον and ἐξ ἡμῶν ἦσαν. While the former simply betokens external origin and coming out from, the latter indicates internal relationship; they were the former, not the latter; the aforesaid fact expressly denies this internal relation. Both origin (coming from) and relationship (affinity, appertaining to) are contained in εἶναι ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς, ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου (v. 16) and in ἐξελθεῖν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ (Jno. viii. 42; xvi. 28; while ἀπὸ θεοῦ, Jno. xiii. 3, and παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, xvi. 27, denote only the former.) [Augustine: Quandoquidem adhuc curatur corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi, et sanitas perfecta non erit nisi in resurrectione mortuorum; sic sunt in corpore Christi, quomodo humores mali. Quando evomuntur, tunc revelatur corpus: sic et mali quando ezeunt, tunc revelatur ecclesia. Sic dicit quando eos evomit atque projicit corpus, ex me exierunt humores isti, sed non erant ex me. Quid est, non erant ex me? Non de carne mea præcisii sunt, sed pectus mihi premebant dum inessent.—M.] But John here sharply contrasts the two and excludes the one by the other, adding moreover,

For if they had been of us, they would have abode with us.—Consequently, they had been μεθ ἡμῶν, they had belonged to the Christians, they had lived among and with the Christians, they were Christians outwardly and to be considered as such. Although they had been μεθ ἡμῶν, they were not ἐξ ἡμῶν, for in that case they would have abode μεθ ἡμῶν. On the very frequent omission of the augment in the Pluperfect see Winer, p. 85. On the dogmatical and ethical import of this passage, see below in Doctrinal and Ethical, especially sub. Nos. 4. 5.

But—that they might be made manifest, that not all are of us.—Here is an imperfect and involved construction. After ἀλλὰ we have of course to supply the thought suggested by the previous words: but they did not abide with us, that—(Huther, Winer, Grammar p. 333. where may be found the corresponding illustrations Jno. xiii. 18: ἐξελεξάμην, ἀλλ' (ἐξελεξάμην) ἵνα;—Jno. xv. 25: μεμίσῃσιν—, ἀλλ' (μεμίσῃσιν) ἵνα—). In general ἐγένετο τοῦτο would have to be supplied, which would however depend on the context for its meaning, as in Jno. i. 8: ἀλλ' (ἦλθεν) ἵνα;—ix. 3: ἀλλ' (but he was born blind) ἵνα—). But de Wette has very correctly pointed out that two sentences are here interlaced, and Huther has rightly arranged them thus: 1, ἵνα φανερωθῶσιν ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶν ἐξ ἡμῶν, 2, ἵνα φανερωθῇ ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶ πάντες ἐξ ἡμῶν. The secession of the antichrists has taken place and constitutes an event that does not take place without some providential design, an event in which God the Lord takes an active part both as Ruler and Judge, hence ἵνα, to the end that, in order that. The Apostle's design is to mark a purpose and not a consequence, as Lange and Paulus maintain without any reason for their view. The purpose is first, that they shall manifest themselves as those who do not sustain to us an inward and ethical relation of kinship and appertainment, and secondly, that it shall become manifest in general that not all those who are in the Church and outwardly belong to it (μεθ ἡμῶν, in ecclesia) do also belong to it inwardly (ἐξ ἡμῶν, de ecclesia). We have to connect οὐ πάντες in the sense of nonnulli; for if we were to connect οὐκ εἰσὶν so that the negation would belong to the predicate, John would have written οὐκ εἰσὶν ἐξ ἡμῶν πάντες, and we should be obliged to explain, "All are not of us," or "none is of us." In this case there would be something predicated of the antichrists, they would be the subject in πάντες. But this is not allowable on account of the position of the words. The meaning is rather: "Not all are of us, only some, although the majority are of us." But this cannot be predicated of the antichrists; for they are not all true, living church-members, none of them belongs truly to the Church. But their seceding furnishes actual proof that not all Christians (baptizati, vocati) are and remain real Christians (electi, fideles). "While in φανερωθῶσιν the seceders only are considered as the subject, the conception is enlarged in the clause ὅτι—ἡμῶν, and the Apostle declares in respect of the former, that in general not all who belong outwardly to the Christian Church, are really members of the same (Düsterdieck). It is not allowable to understand οὐ πάντες with Socinus in the sense of nulli: the connection is right, the explanation is wrong. [Wordsworth: "They all pretend to be of us, and the heathen confound them with us. But their secession from us, and opposition to us, clearly prove that they are not all of us. Some false teachers [or false brethren M.] there are still who propagate heresies in the Church. They are tares in the field, but as long as they are in the field, it is not easy to distinguish them from the wheat. They are not of us, but they are not manifested as such by going out from us. But the going out of those who have left us, and who resist us, is a manifest token to all men, that they and their associates are not all of us, as they profess to be, and as the heathen suppose them to be; and as even some of the brethren in the Church imagine that they are, and are therefore deceived by them. By their going out they are manifested in their true light; and by their opposition to us Truth is distinguished from Error and Error from Truth."—M.]

Testimony of the gifts of believers. vv. 20. 21.

VER. 20. And you have ointment from the Holy One and know all things.—The address ὑμεῖς has regard to the readers, to the Church, from which the antichrists have seceded. They are referred to a gift: ἐχετε.

This gift is χρίσμα, unguentum, not unctio as explained by Vulgate, Augustine, Luther, de Wette, Sander, al. It is chrism. "Alludit appellatio ONCHRISMATIS ad ANTICHRISTI nomen" (Bengel). [They have the chrism from Christ.—M.]. Thus John came to use this word which besides this place occurs only in v. 27. In obedience to the command of God kings (1 Sam. x. 10; xvi. 18, 14; Ps. xlv. 8), priests (Ex. xxix. 7; xxx. 81) and prophets (Is. lxi. 1) were anointed, and ointment is both figuratively, and in the ordered act itself, a symbol of the Holy Spirit. Thus Christ is anointed (Acts iv. 27) and that with the Holy Spirit (Acts x. 38), and thus Christians also are anointed. The chrism or ointment will have to be understood as the Holy Spirit and ἡμεῖς ἔχετε χρίσμα reminds the readers of the great gift which makes them priests, kings and prophets, the γένος ἐκλεκτόν, βασιλεῖον ἱεράτευμα, ἔθνος ἁγίον, 1 Pet. ii. 9; cf. Ex. xix. 6; Is. xliii. 20, 21. This gift of the Holy Spirit must not be made the "divinum beneficium cognoscendi ipsas res divinas, quatenus homini est opus" (Socinus), or the "auditio evangelii, institutio christiana" (Episcopius, Rosenmüller), or the "docendi auctoritas" (Sauler), or "the true tradition concerning Christ distinguished by its being primitive, originating with the Apostles and vitally propagated" (Köstlin, Lehrbegriff, p. 243), or the "gratias quæ diffunditur in cordibus nostris per spiritum sanctum" (Didymus). And this having is a gift ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου, they have received what they have; hence v. 27: τὸ χρίσμα—ἐλάβετε. Christ is called ἁγὸς ch. iii. 8 and δίκαιος ch. ii. 2; in Jno. vi. 69 He is called: ὁ ἁγίος τοῦ θωῦ, Acts iii. 14: ὁ ἁγίος καὶ δίκαιος, Rev. iii. 7: ὁ ἁγίος ὁ ἀληθινός. The primary reference therefore seems to be to Christ who received the Spirit without measure (Jno. iii. 34), and baptized with the Holy Ghost (Jno. i. 33) and sends Him from the Father (Jno. xv. 26; Acts ii. 33) and hence the idea is that the Χριστός makes the χριστούς.—Ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου consequently denotes neither God the Father (Socinus, Episcopius, Rickli, Neander, Besser, al.) nor the Holy Ghost (Didymus, Grotius).—It must be remembered that nothing is said here of the time when they received this gift nor of the means by which it was conveyed to them, but we read simply: ἔχετε. Hence there is no warrant for finding here an allusion to baptism (Augustine, Bede, Oecumenius), and the inference of the ungueness of the Epistle from the supposition of an allusion to a usage connected with baptism introduced at a later period, is wholly unjustifiable (Baur). [The argument for an allusion to baptism, rests on the hypothesis that this whole section is addressed to παῖδες, pueruli, children, who received the gifts of the Holy Spirit in their baptism; it is then by implication extended to adults, and the use of chrism in baptism, a practice which does not belong to the Apostolical Age, seems to have been occasioned by this passage. Bengel: "Eam unctionem spiritualem habent τὰ παῖδα, pueruli: namque cum baptismo, quem susceperunt, confunditum erat donum Spiritus Sancti, cuius significandi causa ex hoc loco deinceps usu receptum esse videtur, ut oleo corpora baptizatorum ungerentur."—M.]. It is more allowable to connect with v. 24 cf. v. 18, and to refer to the preaching of the word of God (Düsterdieck). We read simply "ye have—! Thus John reminds his readers of an important and responsible gift from which they might derive comfort and enjoyment in opposition to the antichrists, but which they ought also to keep, use and show against these adversaries. Hence the thought is introduced by καὶ, as John is wont to do, without indicating an antithesis which is contained in the matter itself; his object being to develop his argument by way of comfort and exhortation. [It is doubtful whether there is even an adversative implication in the thought, for John surely did not want to inform his readers that because they had the χρίσμα they were the opposite of the antichrists. I do not mean that ὑμεῖς is not antithetical, but doubt whether καὶ is intended to mark an emphatic antithesis; in which case the Apostle would most probably have used ὁ or dispensed with the particle altogether. So Huther.—M.]. There is no reason at all to discover here with Semler a "captatio benevolentiae," or with a Lapidé an apology for the shortness of the Epistle; and still more objectionable is the view of Lange that "a certain anxious care is unmistakable which puts forth even rhetorical efforts;" nor is Calvin right in saying: "modeste excusat apostolus, quod eos tam sollicitè admonet, ne putent oblique se perstringi, quasi rudes ignarosque eorum, quæ probe tenere debuerant." The further particular

And know all things denotes the immediate gain they derive from this gift. Bengel rightly explains "et inde." Πάντα is evidently newer. The Syriac translates therefore falsely "omnes." Although Calvin rightly says of πάντα: "omnia non universaliter capi, sed ad præsentis loci circumstantiam restringi debet," we must not restrict it with Bengel to "ea, quæ vos scire opus est: hoc responso repellendi erant seductores." Still less must it be applied with Estius to the Church, as knowing all things, whereas individual Christians know only implicite if they hold to the Church [He says: "Habetis episcopos et presbyteros, quorum cura ac studio vestras ecclesias satis instructæ sunt in his quæ pertinent ad doctrinæ christianæ veritatem."—M.]. The reference, according to v. 21 and agreeably to Jno. xvi. 13: τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας ὁδηγήσει ὑμᾶς ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ πάσῃ cf. ch. xiv. 26) is rather to πᾶσαν τὴν ἀλήθειαν (so Huther and most expositors). The sentence οἴδατε τὴν ἀλήθειαν, v. 21 is wholly=οἴδατε τὰ πάντα.

VER. 21. I have not written unto you, because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it.—Ἐγραψα refers to the words immediately preceding v. 19 [that is to what the Apostle had just said concerning the antichrists—M.], and not to the Gospel, as Ebrard arbitrarily asserts. Not ignorance or want of knowledge on the part of the Church induced the Apostle to write this Epistle, on the contrary it was their knowledge and ability to form a right judgment of what was transpiring among them which prompted him to indite this Epistle, anxious as he was to foster and stimulate the truth possessed by his Church. Lorinus: "non ut vos hæc doceam, sed ut doctos confirmem."—Ἀλήθεια is "the truth as announced by the Apostles, determining the whole walk in the light of believers (ch. i. 8; ii. 4), begetting all love, giving life and founded on Christ (v. 23 sqq.).

Whatsoever falls within the compass of this truth is the object of Christian knowledge, all this is known by believers" (Düsterdieck).

And that every thing which is lie is not of the truth.—Kaì òτι is not connected with ἐγγραφά: and because—as if indicating the motive which prompted the Apostle to write this Epistle, but the sentence depended on the second αἰδῆ and is an object-sentence coördinated with αὐτῇ: ye know it (the truth)—and that.—Thus render almost all commentators. Hence springs the question (v. 22) τίς ἐστιν ὁ ψεύδης; John assumes that they know who is the liar, as well as what and whence the lie is. Here εἶναι ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας denotes not only origin but also appurtenance conditioned and defined by the origin. Of course πάν-οὐκ must not be explained here as a Hebraism (Grotius and al.)=οὐδέν, since οὐκ evidently belongs to the predicate, but=every lie is not out of the truth, which, however, amounts to=no lie is out of the truth. The reference to the antichrists is plain and the sense manifest: every thing which is lie neither originates from the truth, nor can it remain with the truth; it is not matter of complaint or of surprise that the antichrists with their lies and denials are seceding. Ψεύδος consequently is not only error, but the distinct opposite of the truth, nor is it the abstract put for the concrete, viz.: the false teachers (Lange). Our Lord Himself tells us whence the lie originates, it is from the devil (Jno. viii. 44). The truth is from God and full of God, and therefore incompatible with any and every lie. [Diversity of origin renders the truth and the lie incompatible. Christ is the truth (Jno. xiv. 6).] Lorinus: "Lex vero non nisi verum sequitur et verum vero consonat."—M.J. All knowledge and ability to form a right judgment of moral phenomena are founded on the χρῖσμα, the Holy Spirit, consequently on a gift, even the gift which begins with sanctifying the will and renewing the heart. Sanctification leads to illumination. This points to the powerful exhortation which accompanies the consolation.

The substance of the antichristian lie. vv. 22. 23.

VER. 22. Who is the liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?—The interrogative form marks the vivacity with which John passes from the general abstract (πάν ψεύδης) to the definite concrete (ὁ ψεύδης) as in ch. v. 4. 6. [Huther.] There is here surely no reference to children (Ebrard). Hence Bengel rightly explains: ὁ vim habet ad abstractum v. 21=quis est illius mendacii reus? The Article is by all means to be retained (Luther translates wrongly: who is a liar? [also E. V.—M.J.] and to be explained as bringing out with emphatic distinctness the idea "the liar kar' ἐξοχῆν i. e. he in whom the lie appears in concrete form=ὁ ἀντιχριστός" (Huther). It must not, however, be restricted to one individual besides whom there is none like him, but rather be taken generically or collectively with reference to the genus of antichristians, like ὁ υκῶν in ch. v. 5 (Düsterdieck); πάν ψεύδης of course concentrates in him, if we exclude lies in other spheres, e. g. those of the natural sciences, history or jurisprudence; here we have to do with the sphere of religion, with church-life. All comparative explanations dilute the conception of the Apostle; under this head we may enumerate those of Calvin ("nisi hoc censeatur mendacium, aliud nullum haberi posse"), Socinus ("mendacium quo nihil possit esse majus"), Grotius ("Quis potest esse major impostor?"), Episcopus ("enormitas mendacii"), J. Lange ("mendax principium et periculosior?"), de Wette ("who deserves more the name of liar?").—Huther very justly says that Baumgarten-Crusius has altogether missed the Apostle's meaning in his explanation: "What is an erroneous doctrine, if not etc."—In the sentence εἰ μὴ ὁ ἀποβήμενος, the term εἰ μὴ is=nisi, except; εἰ οὐ, si non would be inapplicable (Winer, p. 498) cf. ch. v. 6; Luke xvii. 18; Rom. xi. 15, etc. The negative οὐκ in the sentence: ὅτι Ἰησοῦς οὐκ ἐστιν ὁ Χριστός might have been omitted, since it is preceded by ἀποβήμενος; but the affirmation of the liar is fully indicated, although it is couched in the form of a negation; this is in perfect agreement with the genius of the Greek language. Similar terms are found Luke xx. 27; Gal. v. 17; Heb. xii. 19; cf. Kühner, II. p. 410; Winer, p. 532 β. The essential feature and the height of the lie of the antichrist is this: Jesus is not the Christ, the Saviour promised by and come from the Father, the λόγος ὁὐρῆ γενόμενος; this is the gnostic error which does not distinguish Jesus from Christ, but tears them asunder and thus constitutes the strongest antithesis to the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The reference therefore is neither to the form of Jewish unbelief that Jesus is not omnium hominum patronus (Semler) nor to the two forms of heresy one of which denies that Jesus was the Eternal Word, and the other that the Eternal Word became flesh (Besser following Tertullian), [who says: de Præscript. c. 83: Joh. in ep. eos maxime antichristos vocat, qui Christum negarent in carne venisse et qui non putarent Jesum esse Filium Dei; illud Marcion, hoc Ebion vindicavit.—Wordsworth, following Irenæus and Waterland, refers also to Cerinthus and his followers, who denied that Jesus was the Christ, dividing Jesus from Christ; and they denied the Son, because they did not acknowledge that Jesus was personally united with the Word, the Eternal Son of God; nor that the Word was the only begotten of the Father; and so they disowned the divine Sonship of Jesus and Christ; and thus they denied the Father and the Son."—M.J.] The reference is only to one lie.

This is the antichrist who denieth the Father and the Son.—ὁ ἀντιχριστός here and ὁ ψεύδης in the preceding clause, are evidently identical, and for the very reason that the liar denies Christ [or as Huther puts it: the liar, who denies the identity of Jesus and Christ, is the antichrist.—M.J.] John adds "a new particular, exhibiting the wholly fatal consequence of that antichristian lie," (Düsterdieck) to this name in the following clause: ὁ ἀποβήμενος τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱόν; here, to use the terse language of Luther, John knocks the bottom out of the barrel.—The antichrist denies also the Father. First he denies Christ and then proceeds to deny that He is the Son of and with the Father until he reaches the extreme position of denying the Father Himself. The Χριστός belongs to history, to the economy of salvation. The idea υἱός reaches further, even down to the innermost Being of God; the denial of the Son violates the very Being of God, consequently the Father and thus far must it come with one who denies Christ. In Jesus appeared as Christ, as the Saviour of the world, the Son of the Father full of grace and truth, the Eternal Word which is from the beginning, and in the Son is manifested the Being of the Father, His Spirit and His Love, so that the knowledge of the Father is impossible without the knowledge of the Son. Hence he who denies Christ is led to the point that he has an ideal conception of God of his own making, an εἰδωλον, as Luther puts it, but not the true God. [Luther, to whom Braune is indebted for the thought, puts the logical sequence more lucidly than the latter; he says: He who denies the identity of Jesus and Christ, denies first the Son, for the Son is none other than Ἰησοῦς ὁ Χριστός (neither an Aeon called Christ who did not become man, nor Jesus who is not Christ, or according to Jno. i. 14, who is not the Logos); but whoso denies the Son, denies also the Father not only in as far as Father and Son are logically convertible terms, but because the Being of the Father manifests Itself only in the Son and because all true knowledge of the Father is conditioned by the knowledge of the Son, so that the God of those who deny the Son is not the true God, but a false creation of their own thoughts—an εἰδωλον.—M.]

VER. 23. Every one that denieth the Son, hath also not the Father [neither hath he the Father].—Here is the progression from denying (ἀρνέσθαι) to having (ἔχειν), and from the particular (ὁ ψεύστης) to the general (πᾶς).—Ἀρνούμενος evidently cannot be without an object, so that we have to connect πᾶς ὁ ἀρνούμενος τὸν υἱόν, but not: every one that denieth hath not the Son also (hath not) the Father; neither ὁ ἀρνούμενος nor the immediately succeeding ὁ ὁμολογῶν can be independent subjects, and πατέρα joined to υἱόν cannot be governed by ἔχειν as in 2 Jno. 9.—Ἀρνέσθαι τὸν υἱόν signifies to disown the Eternal Word of the Father, the Logos (not only in Jesus who without the Logos is not and cannot be the Christ, but absolutely), and as such disowning implies not only mere ignorance or a limited understanding, but also infirmity and impurity of the heart and the will, it points to a separation of man from the Son of God, so that it becomes an οὐκ ἔχειν, and contains and operates an οὐκ ἔχειν 2 Jno. 9. It is therefore "habere in agnitione et communione" (Bengel), a possession in vital fellowship (Düsterdieck); "habere in mente et fide, in ore et confessione" (a Lapide), "in faith and in love" (de Wette), "in knowledge, faith and confession" (Lücke). False are the expositions of Socinus ("non habere opinionem, quod Deus sit"), Grotius ("non cognoscere Deum seu quæ sit ejus voluntas erga humanum genus"), Episcopus and others.—Οὐδὲ emphatically denotes the further loss that one cannot separate oneself from the Son without giving up the Father. The Apostle now concludes affirmatively:

He that confesseth the Son hath the Father also.—On ὁμολογεῖν see above on ch. ii. 9. It is an act of the inner life and of a more intimate fellowship. Cf. Matth. x. 32; Rom. x. 10. [Düsterdieck: "In the denial of the Son is involved necessarily the denial of the Father, since the Father cannot be known without the Son, and the Father cannot be received, believed on, loved, by any man, without the Son, or otherwise than through the Son, i. e. the Son manifested in the flesh, the Christ, which is Jesus. So that in John's development of the argument there are three essentially connected points: denial of the Christ, of the Son, of the Father. The middle link of the chain, the denial of the Son of God, shows how the denial of the Father is of necessity involved in the denial of Christ. And the cogency of this proof is made yet more stringent by another equally unavoidable process of argument. The antichristian false doctrine consists mainly in a negation, in the denial of the fundamental truth, that Jesus is the Christ. But in this is involved the denial of the Essence of the Son as well as of the Father, and again in this denial is involved the losing, the virtual not having of the Son and of the Father. In the sense of John, we may say, taking the first and last steps of his argument and leaving out the intervening ones: He who denieth that Jesus is the Christ, hath not the Father. And this necessary connection between denying and not having is perfectly clear, the moment we understand the ethical character, the living realism of John's way of regarding the subject. As (v. 23) we cannot separate the knowledge and confession of the Christ, the Son, the Father, from the having, the real possession of, the practical fellowship with, the actual remaining in the Son and the Father, so conversely, together with the denial is necessarily given the not having: together with the loss of the truth of the knowledge, the loss of the life which consists in that knowledge (Jno. xvii. 3). In such a connection, the confession of the truth is as essential on the one side, as the denial on the other. Each is the necessary manifestation of the belief or unbelief hidden in the heart. And this ὁμολογεῖν is not to be understood of the "confessio cordis, vocis et operis," (Bede), but only as ch. i. 9, of the confession of the mouth (ὁρῶματι ὁμολογεῖται, Rom. x. 9, see Jno. xii. 42). It is parallel with ἐπέχειν διδάχην, 2 Jno. 7. 10; and indicates the definite utterance of the doctrine which was made known by the Apostolic preaching, verse 24."—M.]

VER. 24. Ye, let that which ye have heard from the beginning, abide in you.—The sentence is anacoluthic. It is well explained by Theophylact: ἔκεῖνοι μὲν οὖν οὕτως ὑμεῖς δὲ ἀπὸρ ἠκούσατε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς—φυλάττετε παρ' ἑαυτοῖς.—ὑμεῖς therefore must not be connected with ἠκούσατε, as if it were a mere transposition; there would be no reason whatsoever for such a connection and no reason or necessity for such an emphasis. So in v. 27, and frequently. See Winer §. 8. 28, 8; 64, 2. d. Kühner II, 156. Hence the explanations of Bengel ("antitheton est in pronomine; ideo adhibetur transpositio"), de Wette ("ὑμεῖς is really the subject of the relative sentence, placed before"), and others are erroneous. Neither can ὑμεῖς be the pure Vocative (Ebrard, Paulus), nor be taken as an absolute Nominative (Myrberg).—The spurious οὖν after ὑμεῖς is not improper per se (Düsterdieck in opposition to de Wette with whom Luther agrees), for it is not an antithesis of what goes before, which is also assumed by Theophylact, because the preceding sentence closes affirmatively thus: ὁ ἀπολογῶν τὸν υἱόν, καὶ τὸν πατέρα ἔχει; and this is the ground of the present exhortation.—On δὲ ἠκούσατε cf. v. 7. John points to the apostolical announcement. Ἀπ' ἀρχῆς is more clearly defined by it (ex quo institui cœpistis in primis christianæ religionis rudimentis, Beza, so also Lücke and others). There is no necessity to think of the prima ecclesiæ nascentis tempora (Bede). The substance of δ, not ἀ, seems to be simple. But it is not enough to understand in general evangelium Christi (Calvin), or the truth that Jesus is the Christ (Huther, Lücke), or θεολογούμενον τὸν χριστόν (Theophylact), but we had better understand with Bengel (de patre et filio) the theologoumenon of the Father and the Son besides that fundamental truth (Düsterdieck), as indicated in the preceding verses.—Ἐν ὑμῖν μένειν describes ἔχειν as a possession that has to be kept. The preposition must preserve its proper meaning; that which has been heard must “be in dwelling within as something that determines the life” (Neander). This meaning is also urged by the parallel passage Jno. xv. 1–10, where μένειν appears as a favourite expression of our Lord. In the sentence immediately following it is indeed impossible to render ἐν, with. The same holds good here. Hence Theophylact's παρὰ and Luther's with are false. The truth and doctrine as announced by the Apostles “is really to dwell in them, as a living power in their hearts” (Düsterdieck), and if that takes place, ἔαν ἐν ὑμῖν μένῃ δ' ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ἠκούσατε.

If in you—emphatically placed first—abides that which ye have heard from the beginning, ye also shall abide in the Son and in the Father.—Bengel well observes: καὶ vicissim. Düsterdieck hits the mark: “John denotes by the position of καὶ before ὅτι the promised consequence which will correspond with the indicated destination while at the same time he makes prominent the fine turn contained in the thoughtful change of ἐν ὑμῖν μένῃ and ὅτι ἐν τῷ υἱῷ μένῃ.” The reciprocal effect of the Word abiding in you and of the Church abiding in Christ does not refer to the origin of the relation of the Church and of her conduct, but only to the further development of the same. But the expression and its order intimate that the word must first be brought, preached and explained, and then be heard, received and kept, and that it must have found in individual Christians an element in which it is vitally efficient, even as it is full of life, in order to enable them to have (ἔχειν) and to live in Christ as their element. ἐν τῷ υἱῷ stands naturally before καὶ τῷ πατρὶ because the Son is the Mediator of this life-fellowship. Hence Theophylact's exposition, based on Jno. xvii. 2. 21: κοινωνοὶ αὐτοῦ ἔσονται, goes hardly far enough. The life of believers must really and essentially be rooted in God, derive nourishment, grow and mature to completeness from Him. Faith has not only brought news and intelligence and become acquainted with God, but has entered into personal intercourse with Him and carries away from Him the separate gifts, benefits and powers. The possession of this life is not left to the distant future, although the life is an eternal life, but the object of Christian hope in respect of its perfection and at the same time something present and the object of present experience; to speak with Calvin: deum ac totum nobis in Christo fruendum dedit, non dabit (Düsterdieck). Besides the principal passage Jno. xv. 1 sqq. the following places are very similar Jno. vi. 56; xvii. 23; Gal. ii. 20; 1 Cor. iii. 16; Eph. iii. 17. Hence the evaporating and diluting views of Grotius (“conjunctissimi Patri et filio eritis, summo eorum favore et amicitia fruemini”) Semler (“vis certi, nobis patere omnem hanc felicitatem unico veram”) and others, as well as the scholastic, orthodox views of Schmid (“gratiosa filii et Patri inhabitatio”) and J. Lange (“unio cum deo mystica, communicio cum eo jam inchoata, communicatio, per quam omnes regni divini dotes homini in usum sanctum et beatum contingunt”), are insignificant to bring out the mind and the thoughts of John in their living fullness.

VER. 25. And this is the promise which He hath promised us, the life eternal.—Αὐτὴ ἔστιν should be explained here as in ch. ii. 23. v. 11. 14 where the same words occur in the same position or as in ch. i. 5: καὶ ἔστιν αὐτῇ; the reference is to the words which follow—τὴν ζωὴν τὴν αἰώνιον. The substance or object of ἐπαγγελία is qualified here by a Substantive, while the substance or object of ἀγγελία or ἐντολή or μαρτυρία or παρήρηγία in the other passages is indicated by a clause connected with ὅτι or ὅσα according to the context. Instead of the Accusative (ζωὴν), the Nominative (ζωή) ought to have been in apposition with ἐπαγγελία, but it was both attracted as apposition to the relative clause ἣν αὐτοὶ ἐπαγγέλλονται ἡμῖν annexed in the same case as ἦν. See Winer, p. 552 sq. Therefore manens in filio et patre is not the ἐπαγγελία and ἡ ζωὴ ἡ αἰώνιος not a pure apposition, so that the abiding itself is described as eternal life (SANDER, BEASER), but “the life eternal is the promise” (so Huther and most commentators). The ἐπαγγελία is promissio, consequently not res promissa (J. Lange, Estius), as if it were true contrary to the genius and usage of Greek to add ἦν—ἐπαγγέλλομαι. Αὐτός designates Him “who is the centre of this whole section” [Huther], that is Christ, and neither the Father (Hunnius), nor the Father through the Son (Socius). But ἡ ζωὴ ἡ αἰώνιος, as the substance and object of the ἐπαγγελία of the Son, is not viewed as a gift remote from and subsequent to this promise, but as present and experienced, acquired and enjoyed wherever the pre-requisite of the promise is complied with, namely the abiding of the word in you. Where the promise applies, it is forthwith fulfilling itself. Therefore it is not said that we should acquire the life eternal, but that at which this promise is aimed is simply mentioned and connected by attraction with ἐπαγγέλλομαι.—Καὶ accordingly has here its ordinary force as copula, connecting this sentence with the one preceding, adding and explaining something implied, but not yet particularly mentioned in the preceding sentence; the reference is to something directly connected with abiding in God; καὶ therefore must not be taken αιτιολογικῶς (Oecumenius) or as designating the further consequence of holding fast the Gospel (Lücke). Düsterdieck strikingly observes: “The present reality of eternal life in believers is no more annulled by the fact that it is not yet perfected in them than that inversely continued growth, a holy and fruitful development, and the final glorious perfection are excluded by its real possession."

Conclusion, with repeated warnings and exhortations vv. 26-28.

VER. 26. These things I have written unto you concerning those who deceive you.—Here ταῦτα connected with ἔγραψα refers back to the preceding verses, and the object περὶ τῶν πλανούντων ὑμᾶς points back as far as v. 18. The πλανούντες ὑμᾶς are the antichrists, and denotes that they are dangerous per se, really and not only unsuccessfully dangerous, as is evident from v. 19. [It is doubtful whether the reference to v. 19 warrants the inference of their actual success in the case of those whom the Apostle is addressing. The deceivers themselves had succeeded; that is all we can gather from v. 19, and that they were anxious to deceive others we learn from this verse, but nothing is said of their having been successful in their endeavour.—M.] This is also intimated by the Accusative ὑμᾶς and 2 Jno. 8; Matth. xxiv. 5, 11, 24. [This is certainly a singular conclusion, for ὑμᾶς indicates that they, the readers of the Epistle, the Church, are the object of the deceiver's endeavours.—M.] The word itself denotes an act, a continuing activity, and therefore more than a "studium, conatus," "seducere conantibus" (Bengel, Huther). [See Apparat. Critic. v. 26, note 27.—M.] Hence the reiterated exhortation to fidelity.

VER. 27. And you—the ointment which ye received from Him, abide in you, and ye have no need that any one teach you.—Thought, expression and construction, as in vv. 20, 21: καὶ ὑμεῖς τὸ χρίσμα—φυλάττετε—μένει ἐν ὑμῖν. From ὑμᾶς, v. 26, the Apostle takes καὶ ὑμεῖς, and contrasting them with οἱ πλανούντες, places said words emphatically in anteposition, for they would be too strongly emphasized if we were to connect them with the relative clause. cf. v. 24. Τὸ χρίσμα here, as χρίσμα, v. 20, is in the Accusative, but must not be connected with the relative clause, per trajectionem. The Article denotes what is known and what has already been mentioned. Ἐδάθε distinctly marks their reception and points to a greater obligation than the previous reference to possession (ἔχετε, v. 20). The gift is not without its task and work, here, under the impulse of gratitude. Ἀν' αὐτοῦ of course designates Him round whom the Apostle's thoughts revolve as round their centre, the same who is described in ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου, Christ, v. 25. This verse proves that τοῦ ἁγίου, v. 20, relates to Christ (Huther). While the Future was used in v. 24 (μενεῖτε), we have here the Present (μένει) in order to express the Apostle's certain assurance (Huther) and to exhort at the same time to that which he does expect. Bengel ("Habet hic indicativus perquam subtilem adhortationem (conferendam ad 2. Tim. iii. 14) qua fideles, a deceptoribus sollicitatos, ut eis respondere facit: unctio in nobis manet: non egemus doctore: illa nos verum docet: in ea doctrina permanebimus. Vide quam amena sit transitio ab hac sermocatione ad sermonem directum versus sequenti" Manet in vobis: manebitis in Illo" correlata).—Kai, and because the Holy Spirit is and abide in you (Bengel: et ideo), οὐ χρειαν ἔχετε, ye have no need whatever; thus is brought out here the αὐράκεια θεοδιδάκτων, and we have here a new particular, which was not expressed in v. 20. The construction with iva occurs also Jno. ii. 25; xvi. 30.—Τοῦ διδάσκειν, Heb. v. 12. The Infinitive only, Matth. iii. 14; xiv. 6; 1 Thess. i. 8; iv. 9. This teaching is taken here not as a simple consequence, but as the end and aim because of the condition of the persons to be taught. Love prompts thereto, for love deems it its duty and cherishes the intention to teach. Hence the meaning is: "You are not at all in the situation that somebody should or ought to teach you" (Düsterdieck after Lücke and against Huther, who takes iva in a weakened sense and thinks that it is simply used to indicate the object). Hence we may think also of Apostolical instruction, fraternal encouragement and (with reference to τις v. 21) friendly teaching, perhaps that of the Apostle himself (Bengel, de Wette, Lücke, Düsterdieck). There is no occasion here to think of πλανῶν; so Semler, Spener, (τις=who asserts a new revelation). Sander, Gerlach, Besser. But with reference to πάντα v. 20 and περὶ πάντων we must not restrict iva διδάσκῃ ὑμᾶς to instruction concerning the false teachers (as Lücke does), although that is included (Huther).—It is important to bear in mind that this passage does not hold out the least encouragement, or give support to the vagaries of fanatics, because the Holy Spirit works on the basis of the word given and received, and does not communicate any thing new, but only imparts to believers clearer perceptions and views of that which they already have.

But as the ointment of Him teacheth you concerning all things, and is true and is not lie, and as it hath taught you, so abide in Him.—As we read τὸ αὐτοῦ χρίσμα and not τὸ αὐτὸ χρίσμα, it is only necessary to observe that Bengel ("idem semper, non aliud atque aliud, sed sibi constans, et idem apud sanctos omnes") finds here the unchangeableness, and Düsterdieck and others the identity of the chrism, which unceasingly teaches believers and which they have received from Him, the Christ; our reading brings out this identity and also reiterates its origin: [See Appar. Crit. v. 27, note 29, where the other reading is advocated, according to which we render "the same ointment," i. e., the identical χρίσμα, δ ἐδάθε.—M.]—The structure of this sentence presents peculiar difficulties. Ἀλλὰ introduces the antithesis μενεῖτε ἐν αὐτῷ. While, on the one hand, the Apostle had assured them that they have no need of being taught by any one, because they have the Spirit reminding them of the words of the Lord and leading them into all truth, he now declares, on the other, and by way of antithesis, that they have need of abiding faithful with Him. Hence the words in parenthesis belong to the first καί, although the vivacity [of the Apostle's diction] which never repeats without indicating some new feature, has occasioned various modifications. The exhortation: μενεῖτε ἐν αὐτῷ requires fidelity toward and steadfastness with Christ, as is unmistakable from the context and v. 28. Erasmus explaining ἐν τῷ χρίσματι erroneously thinks of the Holy Spirit, and Baumgarten-Crusius of the doctrine of the Spirit, while Schottgen strikingly observes: "in Christo, quem Johannes semper in mente habet." The motive for abiding with Christ is: τὸ αὐτοῦ χρίσμα διδάσκει περὶ πάντων. Hence the context also recommends the well authenticated αὐτοῦ [the authorities on Braune's own showing are all the other way; they stand thus: αὐτοῦ C. Sin (?) against αὐτὸ A. B. (?) G. K.—M.]; it is the ointment of the Holy Ghost from Him [αὐτοῦ?], Christ, with [ἐν?] whom they are to remain; and this ointment teaches them concerning all things, as we read v. 20: οἰστέ πάντα. But not only the extent of that concerning which they are taught of the Holy Spirit is the motive for his exhortation that they should abide with Him. The chief motive is the characteristic: καὶ ἀληθὲς ἐστίν. The χρίσμα is called absolutely ἀληθές, implying of course that that also which it teaches, is true; the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of truth (Jno. xiv. 17), therefore He leadeth you also into all truth (Jno. xvi. 13). So Düsterdieck; also Lücke, de Wette, Brückner, Ebrard. There is no ground for restricting the reference to that which the χρίσμα teaches, as do Oecumenius, Theophylact, Luther, Neander, Besser, Huther. The importance of the true essence and substance of the χρίσμα occasions the additional clause which denies all lie: καὶ οὐκ ἐστὶν ψεύδος, and lie is not, is not extant. John evidently here recurred to the thought expressed in v. 21: πάν ψεύδος ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας οὐκ ἐστίν, and that there is no lie where the Spirit teaches. Now the Apostle resumes with the fuller form καθὼς that which he had begun with ἀλλ' ὥς, and moreover, by way of reminding them that the Holy Spirit had taught them for some time: καθὼς ἐδίδαξεν ὑμᾶς. This Aorist after the preceding Present ought not to occasion any difficulty; and the καὶ before καθὼς instead of the ἀλλὰ before ὥς is readily accounted for by the one immediately preceding it; the sentence, thus resumed, connects with the testimony of the truth of the Spirit and His teaching; agreeably to which He has taught and teaches believers. Hence we should not divide the second clause of this verse into two parts (with Luther, Calvin, Baumgarten-Crusius, Sander, Brückner, Besser, Huther, and others), so that ἀλλ' ὥς τὸ αὐτοῦ χρίσμα διδάσκει ὑμᾶς is the first antecedent, and καὶ ἀληθὲς ἐστίν καὶ οὐκ ἐστὶν ψεύδος its consequent, and again καὶ καθὼς ἐδίδαξεν ὑμᾶς is the second antecedent, and μενετε ἐν αὐτῷ its consequent. The explanation given by us is supported by Oecumenius, Theophylact, Lücke, de Wette, Neander, Düsterdieck, Ewald and others. [This applies only to the structure of the sentence, not to the exposition of the passage. As to the former we cannot but think that the one adopted by Huther and the many authorities who agree with him, is preferable to that of Braune, and on the following grounds: 1st, it assigns to περὶ πάντων its proper position, whereas in the former view is no relation whatsoever to μενετε (μενετε) of the consequent; 2d, ἀλλὰ indicates that the Apostle is about to introduce an antithesis to οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχετε, a sentence in which the teaching of the χρίσμα is to be described as exempting them from the necessity of another human teacher, and 3d, because the clause καὶ οὐκ ἐστὶν ψεύδος added to ἀληθὲς ἐστίν raises this thought above the character of a mere parenthetical and secondary observation, and stamps it as the leading thought. These are the grounds on which Luther, Calvin, Baumgarten-Crusius, Sander, Brückner, Besser, Huther, and many more, deem it preferable to divide the whole into two clauses, and to take καὶ ἀληθὲς ἐστίν καὶ οὐκ ἐστὶν ψεύδος as the consequent of the first clause. "But as the anointing teaches you all things, so it is true and is no lie," etc. (Luther).—M.]

The conclusion of the whole section, v. 28.

V. 28. And now, little children, abide with [in, ἐν] him.

Καὶ νῦν connects the exhortation, repeated on account of its great importance and already expressed as a hope and in confidence v. 27, with the preceding verses. Καὶ νῦν occurs very often (Jno. xvii. 5; Acts iii. 17; iv. 29; vii. 84; x. 5; xxii. 16; 2 Thess. ii. 6), or καὶ νῦν ἰδοὺ (Acts xiii. 11; xx. 22, 25), or νῦν οὖν (Acts xvi. 36; xxiii. 15), on the other hand ἀλλὰ νῦν (Luke xxii. 36), νῦν δὲ (Jno. viii. 40; ix. 41; xv. 22, 24; xviii. 36), but always so that out of the originally sentient description of the present there has sprung a certain logical significance in order to mark the consequences from a present situation, to draw an inference or conclusion, to annex the features involved in a given case or to denote an antithetical relation (Düsterdieck). Hence Paulus errs in rendering: "Even already now—as in opposition to the Parthian-magian doctrine, that union with God cannot take place except in the future kingdom of light."—The seasonable address τεκνία frees the Apostle's earnestness from all severity, and intensifies his exhortation as a paternal right, by reminding them of the fellowship of love as the consequence of his Apostolical discharge of duty. "Repetitio est præcepti cum blanda appellatione, qua paternum erga eos amorem declarat" (Estius). It is inconceivable how Socinus applies the ἐν αὐτῷ not to Christ, but to Deus per Christum, and how Semler could hit upon this doctrine. Rickli, who explains v. 27 of abiding in the confession that Jesus is the Christ, suggests here abiding in righteousness.—Now follows a reference to the judgment.

That if He shall be manifested we may have confidence and not be shamed away from Him at His coming.—Since ἵνα and not ὅτι is the true reading, we have here not an intimation of the time, or the nearness of the time, but of the reality of the manifestation of Christ (Huther, Düsterdieck). Although the same word is applied to our Lord's appearing in flesh, in the form of a servant (ch. iii. 5. 8. ἐκπερσῶν), still it may be applied with equal propriety to the future manifestation of His glory as in Col. iii. 4. That will be manifested which as yet is hidden. The Apostle now passes to the first person Plural: παρρησίαν ἔχετε. He ever places himself under the laws (ch. i. 6 sqq.; ii. 2 sqq.; iii. 16, 18 sqq.) and promises (ch. iii. 1 sqq.; 21; iv. 17; v. 11. 20), applicable to all without being able to exclude himself from the hope here presented (de Wette, Düsterdieck). Hence it is not from modesty (S. Schmid), nor because he would suffer loss if any members of his Church were falling away (Sander). Παρρησία is literally frankness, free-spokenness (Acts iv. 13. 29. 31; xxvi. 26; xxviii. 31; 1 Thess. ii. 2) then confident assurance with respect to all the threats and terrors of the judgment. The Vulgate translates fiducia, Luther properly freudig (vredic i. e. free), Freudigkeit (vredicheit i. e. freeness), which sheer ignorance has turned into joyful (freudig) and joyfulness (Freudigkeit). Compare Vilmar Pastoral-theolog. Blätter 1861, Nos. 1. 2; Jütting, Biblisches Wörterbuch (1864) s. v.—A Strasburg edition of 1537, indeed, has already Freudigkeit, but the original word is Freydigkeit (Nürnberg ed. 1524), Freydigkeit (Wittenberg ed. 1525), Freidigkeit (1530), and in a sermon on Jno. iv. 16-21 he speaks of boldness (Trotz) in the last day. The Greek Scholiasts and Lexicographers explain the word by ἀδεια, ἐξουσία, ἡ ἐπὶ τοῖς κακίοις ἐπιτολμός ἀπολογία. The ordinary antithesis is αἰσχύνεσθαι (Prov. xiii. 6; Phil. i. 20) to be ashamed, to shame oneself or feel ashamed, so as to depart from Him the Judge. The preposition ἀπὸ therefore is not=ἀπὸ (Socinus), nor=coram (Luther, Ewald), nor both together (S. Schmid, Sander), but=away from (Calvin, Beza, de Wette, Düsterdieck, Huther); but it is necessary to retain the Passive and not the Middle, because we do not retire and withdraw ourselves, but are rejected and driven away. Cf. Matth. xxv. 41. It is impossible to agree with Erasmus, who says: "ut illum non pudeat nostri."—Παρουσία occurs only here in John's writings, but often elsewhere (Matth. xxiv. 8, 27, 87, 89; 1 Cor. xv. 28; 1 Thess. ii. 19 etc.), corresponds with φανερωθῇ, and as φανερωθῇ answers to παρήρσιαν ἔχειν so παρουσία answers to αἰσχύνεσθαι. All this, connected with ἵνα, constitutes a motive for abiding with Him, walking in the light, in fellowship with Him.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The unmistakable reference here to the immanent Trinity is theological in the strictest sense of the word. According to the final clause of v. 22 and v. 28 we have here a reference to a paternal relation with respect to the Son, and to a filial relation with respect to the Father existing above and before the world within the Godhead. The Son is not only a power or principle before He became personal in the Christ, but He is personal in virtue of his Being, the Son of the Father who is a Person, the Son who as the Image of the Father is also a Person. But He became a historical Person, a Person belonging to the history of man in the Christ who did appear in Jesus. See EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

2. The knowledge of God without the knowledge of Christ is impossible, because the knowledge of God is impossible without fellowship with God, which is solely the result of confession of Jesus the Christ.

3. Fellowship with God is not the act of men but the act of God through Christ. It begins in the word which is preached and heard, continues in the communication and reception of the Christ, the Holy Spirit, and it consists in the truth and in the constancy of faith and confession. The Word of Christ and the Spirit given of Him must first come to us and do His work and in us and then we shall be able to abide with Him in virtue of His power.

4. The question here is as to what constitutes the difference between esse in ecclesia and esse de ecclesia. As surely as these two conditions must be distinguished from each other, so certain it is that in point of fact they do coexist alongside each other. So CONFESS. AUG. ART. 8: "Quid sit ecclesia?—in hac vita multi hypocritæ et mali admixti—; APOC. IV. de ecclesia §. 11: malos nomine tantum in ecclesia esse, non re, bonos vero re et nomine: Hieronymus enim ait: qui ergo peccator est aliqua sorde maculatus, de ecclesia Christi non potest appellari nec Christo subjectus dici."—"Like tares they stood in the same field alongside the wheat (Matth. xiii. 28 sqq.) and had part in the divine manifestations of grace whereby the whole field is made fertile and the genuine wheat brought to ripeness. But they shewed themselves to be tares and by their seceding did execute on themselves the divine judgment. Augustine and Bede, with whom Luther agrees in his second exposition, also compare the antichrists with the evil humours of the body. The body of Christ also, so long as it is undergoing the process of being cured, that is so long as it has not attained to perfect health through the resurrection, has such noxious humours (quandoquidem adhuc curatur corpus ipsius et sanitas perfecta non erit nisi in resurrectione mortuorum; sic sunt in corpore Christi, quomodo humores mali). Their expulsion liberates the body and enables it to attain unto perfect health (quando evomuntur, tunc relevatur corpus). But this does not happen to keep up Bede's figure, with the providential care of God" (Düsterdieck).

5. The present section cannot be pressed into the service of predestinarianism. Augustine, indeed, says with reference to this passage (de bon. persever. 11, 8): "non erant ex nobis, quia non erant secundum propositum vocati, non erant in Christo electi ante constitutionem mundi—non erant predestinati secundum propositum ejus, qui universa operatur." So Calvin, Inst. III. 24, 7. But although Calvin the theologian [German "Dogmatiker," not=dogmatist, i. e., one who is certain or presumes to say he knows, whether he be mistaken or in the right, but the teacher of a theological dogma—M.] cannot be corrected by Calvin the interpreter, yet Augustine the theologian can be corrected by Augustine the interpreter in his Tractat. ad h. l., where he says: "DE VOLUNTATE SUA unusquisque aut antichristus, aut in Christo est; qui se in melius commutat, in corpore membrum est, qui autem in malitia permanet, humor malus est." The Apostle distinguishes inward and true Christian fellowship from that which is only outward and in appearance; those who belong to the former are so thoroughly fettered in their believing and regenerated mind, that, as Lücke thinks, they can nevermore separate from that fellowship. It is, to use the striking language of the Ozymoron of Didymus, a voluntaria necessitas, but no contrarietas naturarum, although in the course of moral development there should arise a diversitas substantiæ.—The phrases οὐκ ἐξ ἡμῶν εἶναι and ἐξ ἡμῶν εἶναι used by the Apostle to denote simply the opposite results of the ethical life-process, which in the former case leads to ἐξελεῖν and in the latter to μένειν μεθ' ἡμῶν. But, as Augustine says, every Christian may become an antichrist, according as his will refuses to be determined to μένειν ἐν Χριστῷ, which beginning with the hearing of His word and advancing to πιστεῖς εἰς αὐτόν, to childlike and unremitting trust and cleaving to Him, develops itself by ever determining, guiding, strengthening, purifying and confirming the will, is a veritable history of the word heard with the outward ears and inwardly in the heart filling and conquering the heart until it has become wholly believing, but for all that may and does offer resistance at every point, so that it often does resist for some length of time and so undoes all its previous acquirements, that it often conceals unpardoned sins which may again draw it down or at least arrest its progress and bring it to the point that, unless it submit to being cleansed anew, it will apostatize and thus a Christian may become an antichrist, which is however of rare occurrence, because the eternal powers of the word of Christ and His Spirit are very strong and mighty and the heart of man has been created for and with special adaptation to said powers. Hence the universal experience that it is difficult to get to Christ through self-denying and world-renouncing penitence, but that it is even more difficult to get away from Christ through the denial of the conscience and of faith as well as of the word of Christ quickened in the conscience by faith,—and the Apostle speaks from this experience. But in all this there is neither predestination nor necessity, especially since the Apostle's exhortation to abide leaves room for the possibility of their apostasy, as to the reality of which the Apostle confidently entertains no fear in the case of those who are vital Christians. Nor is it to be overlooked that John does not throw out the faintest allusion to the difference between the electi and vocati and the donum perseverantiae. In the passage Heb. vi. 4-6 the lapse of the truly regenerate (as is evident from their description) is supposed to be possible, but the re-conversion of such apostates only is said to be impossible, so that we ought to be afraid. [Huther: the words εἰ ἴσταν ἐξ ἡμῶν, μεμελῆκεσαν ἀν' μεθ' ἡμῶν contain the idea that he who truly belongs to the Church will never leave it, but he that leaves it shows thereby that he did not truly belong to it. This confidence of the Apostle in the love of the Lord which keeps and preserves those who are His, and in the fidelity of those who have been redeemed by Him, seems to contradict the idea pre-supposed in Heb. vi. 4-6, that they also who were once enlightened and had tasted of the heavenly gift and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, can fall away. But John speaks here, as he does throughout his Epistle, absolutely, without any reference to the state of gradual development, from whence however it does by no means follow that he did not know it. The one circumstance that he exhorts believers, as such to abide in Christ, is sufficient to show that he does not wish to deny the possibility of their apostasy, all he is sure of, and rightly so, is this that he that does not abide, had never truly entered into fellowship with the Lord with his whole heart, but although he was touched by His love and felt somewhat of its power, he had not entirely abandoned and renounced the world."—M.]

6. The Apostle here asserts a double law of historical development in its definite application to the development of the kingdom of God. "Evil by a gradual process of development culminates, then in the conflict between the kingdom of God and evil, the former develops itself, and at length, through a new coming of Christ in power, the kingdom of Christ is once more subdued." (Neander). This is the one, and of the other the same author speaks thus: "In this respect also we shall see how the workings of one uniform law ever appear in the course of the development of the kingdom of God, that in good and evil there are certain individual personages constituting as it were, the centre and appearing especially as representatives of the conflicting principles, uniting and concentrating in themselves as one great whole, the fragments scattered in many individuals." "When in the times before the Reformation the secularized Church under the secularized papacy, was especially instrumental under the cloak of Christianity to obscure and oppose true Christianity, people might believe that they saw in this the visible manifestation of antichrist, and Matthias of Janow, the Bohemian reformer before Huss, might suppose to have detected the effect of Satan's craft in the circumstance that believers instead of identifying antichrist in the present, viz., the rule of the secularized Church and the sway of a superstition even unto the idolizing of the human, were beguiled into seeking it at some distant period." The increasing revelation of the depths of evil in the world, runs therefore parallel to the development of the kingdom of God even up to its ultimate completion and both pass through personages in whom the former does concentrate. See also Dürstiedick: "The development of the Christian principle and that of the antichristian principle are reciprocally related. Christian truth cannot be revealed without forthwith exciting the contradiction of the darkness. The wheat and the tares grow together until they are ripe. The antichristian spirit works already in many antichrists; but the one antichrist is still future, still to come, and is only announced by his precursors. Although therefore the last hour has already come, yet its full close is still to come, viz., the real, personal advent of the Lord which will take place immediately after the appearance of the personal antichrist. But John did neither tell us when this antichrist would come nor give us a chronological clue to the exact time of the personal advent of Christ. In both respects he confines himself to the statement that the events are to take place."—

7. Although John in giving prominence to the marrow and vitalizing centre of Christianity, viz., to the belief that Jesus is the Christ and the Son of God, does not warrant us to undervalue the articulated confession of faith as a whole or as to its component parts, which are only developments of the pushing germ, he yet attaches, and for this very reason, the greatest importance to the faithfulness of abiding, the fides qui creditur, with reference to said centre.

8. His account of the χρῖστα and its gifts, characteristically and emphatically adverts to the universal priesthood, indicating its origin and glory.

9. The "critical ability" (Dürstiedick) of Christians founded on the full knowledge of the truth, like the advancing knowledge of the truth itself, goes hand in hand with progressive holiness. The point throughout is not mere knowledge, tidings or information of a life in and of

(from) God, but the actual possession and enjoyment of this life, the life itself and the personal converse of the human soul with the living and revealed God; and it concerns man's inmost and most profound being, which is neither the understanding nor the reason, but the will, and the point in question is not science but conscience.

10. It is only in the way of obedience to the word and will of God that man is able to keep and intensify fellowship with Him in order that he may become a partaker of the divine Being, the divine Nature. It is contrary to the will of God that man departs from the Being of God until he is wholly rejected.

11. The decision and the separation will not take place until the last, the last judgment; consider this.—

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

See what time it is in the kingdom of God? 1. Hearken to the word which is preached (vv. 18, 24); 2. be led by the Spirit whom thou hast received (vv. 20, 27); 3. take note of the separations which take place in the Church (vv. 19, 22); 4. hold fast to Jesus the Christ, who is the Son of the Father (vv. 26, 28).—In all the separations in the Church be sure not to forget to decide.—In every separation the sorrow of having been deceived before is connected with the joy of greater purity hereafter.—In the uncertainty as to who are true vital Christians take care lest thou lose the conviction that the vital Christian abides constant.—Act as Gideon did who encountering the Midianites numbering 135,000 with an army of 82,000 at the Lord's bidding reduced the same by 22,000 and made a selection of 800 from the remaining 10,000 even as directed by the Lord, and then gained a glorious victory with them (Judg. vii.).—The source of the anointing is the Holy Ghost, its pre-requisite regeneration, its power an assured conviction of the importance of the truth, its impulse an earnest desire to bring it home to the hearts of others; it was a protection from the hierarchism and episcopalianism of the 2d and 3d centuries. Is. xli. 15 applies to it. [I should rather say in more strict agreement with the text that the chrism of the Holy Ghost from Christ is a sure protection from any and every form of spiritual secessionism, separatism and individualism.—M.] Because of a sorrowful experience in the Church do not give up the joy of the glory of the Church.—Comparison of the ointment as the figure or symbol of the Holy Spirit: 1, its value; 2, its use in the anointing of kings, priests and prophets; 3, its power of strengthening and stimulating the spirit of life; 4, its influence on a life well-pleasing to God; 5, its far-spreading fragrance.—The fundamental doctrine of salvation is: Jesus is the Christ. 1, With it and in it we find our way into the rich heart of God and bring God into our poor heart; 2, in opposition to it we bring eternal ruin into our heart and ourselves into eternal ruin. Or, 1, By it you learn the corrupting false teachers; 2, in it the true and living Christian shows himself; 3, out of it you pass to the inheritance of God.—Do not drive Christ and His word from thy heart, or Christ will drive thee from His kingdom.—v. 28. Confirmation-address.

GREGORY:—“Nisi Spiritus Sanctus intus sit qui doceat, doctoris lingua extus in vanum laborat.”

AUGUSTINE:—“Cathedram in celo habet, qui intus docet.”

LUTHER:—It is dangerous and terrible to believe something against the uniform testimony, faith and doctrine of the universal holy Church, which has now thus held it unanimously in every place from the beginning these fifteen hundred years past.—Many a man has a paternoster round his neck and a rogue in his heart.

STARKE:—As the betrayer of Christ was one of His most intimate Apostles, so antichrist did not arise among Jews or Turks, but in the very midst of Christendom.—The Church remaineth not without offences of which that is not least that within her fold there arise men who hold false doctrine and apostatize from the known truth; the tares do not grow by themselves, but in the midst of the wheat.—Constancy in good is an infallible sign of a true Christian, just as temporizing and changeableness indicate a false heart.—Christians are anointed, and their name should daily remind them of what they owe to God and their neighbour as spiritual kings, priests and prophets.—A teacher ought not to despise his hearers, for they also, if they believe, are anointed with the Holy Spirit and the knowledge of divine truths, although there may be differences in the measure of their anointing.—He also denies Christ the Saviour, who does not prove in deed that He is His Saviour who has indeed delivered him from the guilt and punishment of sin.—We have need to be especially on our guard against the denial of Christ which takes place, not only in words and in doctrine, but also in our life.—The word of God must remain in the whole man, and not only enter his understanding.—A Christian, an anointed one, that is his name, but also the greatest prerogative to divine wisdom, it opens to him the school in which the most learned are seated below on the bench of humility, who follow in the simplicity of their heart, who know all things, and ever learn what they know, love and do.—As is a king without a kingdom, a ruler without subjects, a general without soldiers, so is a Christian without the anointing. Because the last coming of the Lord will be terrible, we should be diligent to be so well prepared that we may be found worthy to stand before the Son of Man.—The day of our Lord's coming may properly be called the believers' day of honour, for they shall be manifested, declared righteous, and advanced to the full enjoyment of heavenly blessing.

SPENER:—It is a great blessing that God does not allow the heavenly [?] deceivers to remain in the Church but overrules it that they are made known and we learn to be on our guard against them, that they must manifest themselves and make themselves known, whereby the danger is lessened and believers rendered more cautious and prompted to be diligent in prayer and to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling.—Even those who truly believe and have made great advances in the faith, may be deceived, and therefore let those who think that they stand, take heed lest they fall. None but those who have the Holy Spirit and the anointing can be sufficiently on their guard against the lies of antichrist. All other knowledge is too weak by far to be able to withstand temptation and spiritual conflicts.

UHLHORN:—He only has God, who has Him as the Triune God. Let us only begin with what the Apostle puts in the middle, He that hath not the Son, neither hath he the Father, add that with which he begins, of the Son we can only know through the Holy Spirit, and conclude the statement in virtue of what the Apostle says, that the anointing cometh from Him who is holy: The Holy Ghost cometh from the Father and the Son.

LAVATER:—Every one who is not an evangelical Christian, does not believe in Jesus Christ, is an atheist.

HEUBNER:—A hostile power, an opposition to Christianity, has stirred from the beginning. And this is a recommendation of Christianity; a proof of the mighty power of Christianity against evil, which is terrible to the wicked one. The more the good raises itself the more also does evil bestir itself. Where God builds a temple, Satan is sure to build a chapel by the side of it.—It serves also to exercise and try the soldiers of Christ. Without an opposing power, the divine drama would be without life or interest.—Unbelief which pretends that the kernel and characteristics of Christianity are irrational, is a very important epoch in this history.—Who thought Christianity imperilled by the growth of antichrist would betray great weakness of heart and understanding and want of confidence. The Christian should rejoice at every further manifestation: the end is drawing nearer: the catastrophe in the kingdom of Christ is the point to which the eyes of Christians are longingly directed.—The enemies of Christianity draw nourishment from the Church: it is in their interest not to suffer themselves to be deprived of the name "Christian;" they would then accomplish less and be less dangerous.—The manifestation of all, the good as well as the bad, is the design of the Kingdom of God. The evil cannot long conceal or disguise itself or stand back: it only waits for the time of coming out. God wills it thus. The appearance of evil tries and purifies the Church: it is a refreshing relief to Christians to see the separation of the unclean.—A Christian is insured and protected from false teachers. He has the Holy Spirit 1. Who interpenetrates every thing like precious perfume, enters into every thing, and imparts to it fragrance and the breath of life—to his thinking, judging, feeling and willing. The Christian is thereby clothed with a royal and priestly dignity in the Kingdom of God (Rev. i. 6). The anointing is the signature of the Christian. 2. The Spirit enables him to try, to identify the spirit of error, to judge; to such a Christian no false teacher can be dangerous.—The Christian has a fine sense of discrimination (sagax odoratus); he quickly perceives the essence and tendency of every doctrine; hence his Christian severity of judgment and his antipathy to syncretism.—Bad opinions, seductive principles among Christians, originate not in Christianity. The Church of Christ must not be charged with the evil that is in it.—He that will not know God in Jesus—where else will he know God?—There is no revelation of God which resembles the revelation in Christ; if one is not satisfied with this revelation, which revelation will satisfy him?—Whether they like or do not like it, neologians are obliged to assert that true Christianity was unknown before them; for what they now call Christianity is known to the whole antiquity.—The true Christian faith is immutable and needs no perfecting.—This faith is of the utmost importance; our eternal salvation depends upon it; it is not a useless, subtle question raised by the schools, but it concerns the promise of eternal life, and the virtue of this promise depends on the Person of Jesus; only if He is truly the Son of God He is able to promise and give eternal life. This must attach us strongly to the faith, and those who have felt the power of this faith, live and die for this faith.—Even anointed Christians stand in need of warning and admonition, because deceivers are never quiet and because within us there is not wanting that which meets them half-way.—Other gifts decrease in the course of time, the Holy Spirit does not decrease. Other frames of mind and tendencies of thought change, the Holy Spirit does not change. Yield to the promptings of the Spirit and be vigilant lest thou mistake thy own spirit for the Holy Spirit and be deceived. Be pure and meek.—Abiding with Christ and in Him in steadfastness of faith and faithful following Him is the more honourable, the more fall away from Him, and it is necessary, because our acceptance depends on it. If one becomes unfaithful to Christ, how can he appear before Him with joyfulness [confidence]? That thought has an overwhelming influence on the heart of a Christian. How shall unbelievers appear before Him who to please the world leave Christ, and esteem the world's honours more highly than the grace of Christ? How well it would be if all men would only examine themselves in all their judging and doing; could you act thus in the presence of Jesus? would you dare to say such and such a thing in the presence of Jesus? would you dare to maintain such an opinion before Him? If you are honest and conscientious according to your interpretation, so that He may not even blame you, why have you twisted my words after your liking?

BESSER:—It is the last hour. But those who read the history of the Church wrongly, and consider the time of her highest inward beauty and manifest power over the world to belong to an earthly future, will be inclined to suspect the holy Apostle, to have been in error for assuring us to have experienced the beginning of the last hour; those, on the other hand, who consider that the Sun of the Gospel shone in his brightest splendor, when in the preaching of the Apostles he came forth as a bridegroom out of his chamber and rejoiced as a giant to run his race from one end of the heavens back to the same end again and that there sounds through the whole history of the Church the sigh of the saints "Abide with us, Lord Jesus, for it is toward evening"—aye, that even her most glorious victories, like the victory of the Reformation, are only like the reflection of the setting sun on the darkening clouds,—those who see this cease to be surprised at what the Apostles tell us of the last hour and read the merciful cause of this prolonged duration of the last hour, prolonged for more than eighteen hundred years, in the words of the Apostle "the Lord is long-suffering to us-ward" (2 Pet. iii. 9).—We must not only be on our guard against one antichrist, one great adversary and deceiver, but against a multitudinous progeny of the antichristian seed.—When somebody praised the sainted Oettinger shortly before his death, on account of his great wisdom, he replied with a smile: "Yes, I have learned many things; but the most precious knowledge I learned as a child in Luther's Lesser Catechism, which comprises every thing which I desire to keep and carry away with me to the seeing face to face."—A learner of the Catechism, that hath the Holy Spirit, is able so far to discover all errors which militate against the Gospel, that he is protected from deception and may immovably stand on the foundation of his faith.—Neither the Jesus of the rationalists nor the Christ of the philosophers hurts the kingdom of Satan.—The antichrists showed themselves to be antitheists.—Declension begins with men's loathing that which they have heard from the beginning (Rieger).—Every true doctrine the assertion of which is assigned to the church during the time of her growth, is already contained in the treasury of Holy Scripture.

Johann Tauler had preached many a learned sermon when Nicolaus of Basle, the Waldensian, visited and told him: "You are a kind-hearted man and a great priest, but have not yet tasted in truth the sweetness of the Holy Spirit." From that time Tauler sought the true Teacher in the Scripture and the cross, who teaches us more in one hour than all earthly teachers can teach us to the last day.

[WARBURTON:—The late appearance of antichrist was a doctrine so universally received in the primitive Church, that it was like a proverbial saying among them; and thence St. John takes occasion to moralize on the doctrine, and warn his followers against that spirit, which in after times was to animate "the man of sin." "Little children," says he, "it is the last time; and as ye have heard that antichrists shall come, even now there are many antichrists: whereby ye know that it is the last time." As much as to say, we are fallen into the very dregs of time, as appears from that antichristian spirit, which now so much pollutes the Churches; for you know it is a common saying, that antichrist is to come in those wretched days. The Apostle goes on to employ the same allusion through the rest of the Epistle; v. 22. ch. iv. 8; 2 Jno. 7. Where we see the appellation "antichrist" is employed to signify an enemy of God and godliness in general, by the same figure of speech that Elias was designed in those times to signify a prophet, and Rachel, a daughter of Israel; and that in these times Judas is used for a traitor, and Nero for a tyrant. But as these convertible terms necessarily suppose that they originally belonged to persons of the like characters, who had them in proper, so does the name "antichrist" transferred by St. John to certain of his impious contemporaries, as necessarily suppose, that there was one who should arise in the latter times, to whom the title eminently belonged; as marked out in the prophecies by the proper name of antichrist.—M.]

[HURD's two sermons on 1 Jno. ii. 18, the one entitled "Prophecies concerning Antichrist," the other "Prejudices against the doctrine of Antichrist," are well worth reading, as they embody much of the literature on the subject.—M.]

[WHITBY:—To deny the Father here, is not to deny Him to be the true God, as the heathens did: but 1. to deny the truth of His testimony, see ch. v. 10; Jno. iii. 83; 2. to deny the doctrine of the Father, or that doctrine which proceedeth from Him; "for He whom God hath sent, speaketh the words of God," Jno. iii. 84. Whence it is evident, that he who denieth the Son, cannot thus retain the true knowledge of the Father; Jno. i. 18; Matth. xi. 27. By Him alone can we come acceptably to the Father, so as to have life; for "He is the Way, and the Truth and the Life," Jno. xiv. 6. And by Him alone are we taught how to "worship the Father in spirit and in truth," Jno. iv. 23, 24. Hence Christ so often tells the Jews, they therefore wanted the true knowledge of the Father, because they knew not Him, Jno. viii. 19; xiv. 7; xvi. 3.—M.]

[ARP. SHARP:—Abundance of fanaticism, enthusiasm and other mischiefs have been brought into the Church of Christ, by the misinterpreting and misapplying of those texts which speak of the gifts of the Spirit, which some men so understand as to make no distinction between the times then and the times now.—(Joel ii. 28; Acts ii. 17; Jer. xxxi. 34; 1 Jno. ii. 27).—Hence they conclude that in these days, which are the last days, the Spirit of God is poured upon all flesh, and that every one hath a right to expect immediate impulses and revelations, as to what he is to believe and to practise: that by this assistance of the Spirit, every brother may understand the mysteries of the Holy Scriptures, without the troublesome way of studying human learning; nay and may take upon himself the pastoral office, and become a guide and teacher of others, without any warrant from human authority, merely upon the impulse of the Spirit of God. These consequences have been drawn from these and such texts of Scripture: and so far have they been promoted and improved by several amongst us, that reason and prudence and all acquired learning, are rather accounted by them hindrances to the work of God's Church, than any ways contributing to it. Nay, they are arrived to a pitch above the Scriptures themselves, which they look upon as a dead letter in comparison of the light within them, the witness, the anointing which they have received from above, which is the only measure with them of truth and falsehood, of good and evil. The colour, which these enthusiasts derive for this their notion from the letter of some passages of the Old and New Testament, would quite vanish, if they would but take care to distinguish between the effects of the Spirit, which belonged to the converting of the world, and those which were to be His constant permanent operations among such as were already Christians. There is no one will deny but the Apostles, and those in their times, had these inspirations, these revelations they speak of: and the texts, that they produce, are some of them plain proofs that those promises were made good.

They did see visions, and were endowed with extraordinary talents of wisdom and knowledge, without human methods, and might expect particular impulses of the Holy Ghost upon occasions, where they wanted either light or direction; and all this was indeed little enough for the discharge of that great work they had upon their hands, namely, the bringing of the world over from Judaism and heathenism to Christianity. But that being done once, and the Gospel of Christ, and all things pertaining to it, being plainly left in writing by the Apostles or Apostolical men, as there would be from henceforward no need of those assistances of the Spirit, so it would be a vain thing to expect them. We are not to desire those immediate revelations, nor to expect that God should vouchsafe them, if we prayed for them. God hath declared all His will, that is necessary for us to know, by our Saviour and His Apostles: and the rules which they have given us, together with our own natural light and reason, and the other outward means and helps of instruction, which are every day at hand among us, are sufficient, abundantly sufficient, to guide and direct us, both as to belief and practice, through all the cases and emergencies that can ordinarily happen to us. And in extraordinary cases God will take care, some way or other, that we shall not be at a loss. And therefore to pretend to the Spirit in these days, either for preaching, or praying, or prophesying, or denouncing God's judgments, or for any other thing, in such a way as implies immediate inspiration; or to set up a light within us, contrary to the light of reason, or different from the light of Scripture without us, is the extreme of folly, enthusiasm and madness."—M.]

[The chrism is 1. a general gift, vouchsafed to all Christians;

2. not transient but permanent;
3. leads them into all truth;
4. moves them to the practice of all the precepts of Christ;
5. assures them of their Christian privileges; (children of God, members of Christ and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven);
6. teaches them in all things; they are therefore disciples and learners all the days of their life;
7. preserves their fellowship with the Father and with the Son; (abide).
8. and makes them the Temples of God.—M.]

III. PRINCIPAL PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER II. 29—V. 12.

HE THAT IS BORN AGAIN (OUT) OF (THE BEING OF) GOD THE RIGHTEOUS (II. 29) IS A MIRACLE OF HIS LOVE NOW AND HEREAFTER (III. 1-3), IS BOUND BY HIS WILL (III. 4-10a), ESPECIALLY TO PRACTISE BROTHERLY LOVE (III. 10b-18), IS BLESSED BEFORE HIM AND IN HIM (III. 19-24), TRYING LIKE GOD THE FALSE SPIRITS (IV. 1-6), HE ENJOYS THE LOVE OF GOD AND EXHIBITS BROTHERLY LOVE (IV. 7-21), HE TRIUMPHS OVER THE WORLD AND IS SURE OF ETERNAL LIFE (V. 1-12).

1. The leading thought: He that is born again of God the Righteous doeth righteousness. Ch. ii. 29.

29 If ye know that he is righteous, ye know<sup>1</sup> that<sup>2</sup> every one that doeth righteousness is born of him.<sup>3</sup>

Verse 29. [German: "If ye know that He is righteous, know ye." The Imperative is found in the margin of E. V. Wicl. Tynd. Cranm. Rhemish, Syriac. Latin (except Pagn. Beza), German, Dutch, Italian and French versions, and adopted by the authorities cited below in Exegret. and Crit.—M.]

<sup>2</sup> καὶ after ὅτι and before καὶ is the reading of A. C. Sin., many cursives and versions. "Cujus addendi nulla causa erat; ex Johannis vero usu est." (Tischendorf, who omits it in his 7th edition). [If καὶ is genuine it serves "to mark the congruity of the inference and the premise," as Ebrard observes.—M.]

<sup>3</sup> German: retaining καὶ: "that also every one that doeth the righteousness hath been born of Him."—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The subject of δικαίος is not specified. It has to be ascertained either from the connection with the preceding verses, or from the verse itself. On this point Sander very justly lays down the Canon: "If δικαίος designates Christ, ἐξ αὐτοῦ refers to Him. But if the latter is impossible, that is, if ἐξ αὐτοῦ must be referred to God, δικαίος also must designate God." There is no formal connection of this verse with the preceding verses containing reference to Christ; it is the beginning of a new section. Hence this verse, standing alone, must be explained by itself, and the question of the subject has to be determined from an examination of the verse itself. Hence there is no warrant for an outward occasion of a reference to Christ, especially since the oneness of the Father and the Son of God and Christ, is everpresent to the mind of John, so that he frequently and easily passes from the one to the other without a special indication of such transition. Nor can we gather from the word δικαίος whether the reference is to Christ or to God, for it is applied to God in ch. i. 9 and to Christ in ch. ii. 1. But ἐξ αὐτοῦ γεγέννηται decides the point. The idea of γεννᾶσθαι ἐκ Χριστοῦ or ἐκ Χριστοῦ notwithstanding Spener's reference to Is. ix. 6; liii. 10; Ps. xxii. 31, cx. 3; Matth. ix. 2; Jno. xiii. 83; Heb. ii. 17 occurs nowhere. But γεγέννημένος ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ occurs ch. iii. 9; v. 18 cf. vv. 1. 4; ch. iv. 7; and ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ in the very next verse ch. iii. 1: consequently: he is born of (out of) God. "Justus justum gignit" (Bengel). We have therefore the valid conclusion: God is righteous, he that is born of (out of) God doeth righteousness. [Like begets like.—M.]. Hence Christ is neither the subject of δικαίος and ἐξ αὐτοῦ (a Lapide, Bengel, Rickli, Frommann, al.), nor Christ the subject of δικαίος and God the subject of ἐξ αὐτοῦ (Storr, Lücke, Heubner al.); but God is the subject of δικαίος and ἐξ αὐτοῦ (Neander, Küstlin, Düsterdieck, Ebrard, Huther, al.).

V. 29. If ye know that He is righteous.—Besides what has been said on δικαίος at ch. i. 9; ii. 1, we have further to add that if God is ἀγίος as to His Essence, He is δικαίος as to His doing, and just because He is ἀγάπη (ch. iv. 16). His energizing Will aims at the revelation of His holiness in laws at once agreeable to the holiness of His Being and adjusted to the nature and destination of His creatures, for whose benefit they are enacted, showing how His words are to be kept and His promises to be fulfilled, and how those who obey Him are to be rewarded and those who disobey him are to be punished. Legislation, denunciation and promise, punishment and reward, redemption and the forgiveness of sins are the acts and exhibitions of His δικαιοσύνη, which is the energy of His holy love directed outwardly, or the energy of His love conjoined with His holiness. Accordingly there is no righteousness whatever outside of God, or separate from God and His energizing, so that He is not only the prototype and original, but also the primordial source of all human righteousness. This is an important object of Christian knowledge, which, whilst it may indubitably be presupposed in the case of all Christians, is not always and readily found in the desired strength and purity in individual Christians. Hence ἐὰν εἰδῆτε. The Apostle appeals to the consciousness of the Church, desiring not to teach anything new but to render their knowledge vital and fruitful. [Hollaz: "Justitia Dei est attributum divinum ἐνεργητικόν, ἐν ᾧ cūctis Deus omnia quæ æternæ suæ legi sunt conformia, vult et agit; creaturis convenientes leges præscribit, promissa facta hominibus implet, bonos remuneratur et impios punit." M.].

Know ye.—Since it is grammatically correct (Kühner II., p. 550) that such a supposition may be followed either by the Imperative or the Indicative of a chief tense, especially of the Future, the prominent use of the Indicative Future, which is very nearly related to the Imperative, renders it highly probable that our γινώσκετε is the Imperative. Now since we read at ch. v. 15 (referred to by de Wette and Düsterdieck) ἐὰν οἰδαμεν—οἰδαμεν, but in the verse immediately succeeding ch. iii. 1, ἵδετε (to which Huther calls attention), the latter consideration decidedly outweighs the former and constrains us to take γινώσκετε in the Imperative. To this must still be added the sense of the verb and the verse. The verb γινώσκειν denotes an activity ever deepening, quickening and enlarging, the knowing (εἰδέναι) grows thus into experimental knowing (γινώσκειν). The truth is the object of all knowing, and the Christian shall be led into all truth, that is, he is to know thoroughly, to pass on from one point which he knows and whereof he has cognition, to another [and a deeper knowing and insight—M.], even by the aid of the Holy Spirit. If ye know that He is righteous, ye know not yet, but are to know that—Hence we must not construe here in the Indicative (Beza, Bengel, Düsterdieck, Ewald, Neander and al.) but in the Imperative (Vulgate, Grotius, de Wette, Lücke, Ebrard, Huther and al.).

That also every one who doeth righteousness has been born (out) of Him.—Καὶ indicates the relation of appurtenance and congruity of the second to the first thought. It does not belong, however, to γινώσκετε, as if only expressing a logical relation (Düsterdieck): if ye know—then ye know also (Neander); but it belongs to the subject, πᾶς ὁ ποιῶν, and sets forth the relation of the two truths: God is righteous, and every one who doeth righteousness, is born of God. We have here to do with a real relation.—Ὁ ποιῶν τὴν δικαιοσύνην is he that has the δικαιοσύνη within himself and causes it to be operative in his walk, his works, his words, his conduct and thinking, in his judgment, attitude, bearing and appearance, to come forth and become perceptible in himself. Doing is here not a merely outward and isolated act but an activity continuous and connected, having as much respect to the inward as to the outward, the energy of something possessed inwardly, of a gift received, of a communicated nature and life. Ποιῶν is emphatic; righteousness must be done, and not only lauded, confessed, preached, known, felt and believed. It may be done as yet imperfectly, in weakness, under repeated interruptions, but every Christian must and does do righteousness, πᾶς "omnis et solus" (Bengel). Nor is it enough to do only some parts of this righteousness, respect must be had to the whole τὴν δικαιοσύνην. As to the nature of this δικαιοσύνη we have to think of the righteousness which comes from God, passes before Him, is His and His work. It is, therefore, a righteousness, Divine as to its kind, an effluence of God's primordial righteousness, from God Himself. It manifests itself in obedience to the Divine commandments, in shunning sin, in striving after holiness, in love of the brethren, in the life and growth of faith; and although much be wanting in its full exhibition and its perfection lie far remote, still this is the righteousness here referred to. Compare ποιεῖν τὴν ἀλήθειαν ch. i. 6 and ἰδετε

עשה Gen. xviii. 19; Is. lvi. 1; Ps. xiv. 15.—

This points to a powerful and specific cause and condition, without which ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην is impossible and inconceivable: ἐξ αὐτοῦ γεγέννηται The Present ποιῶν, and the Perfect γεγέννηται denote the sequence; the first in order of existence is: to be born of (out of) God, the second, which is the effect and result of the former, is: to do the righteousness. Precisely this order was necessarily implied in the exposition of the substance of ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην.—As with regard to δικαίος the turn δικαιοσύνην and ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην have to be taken in a full and living sense, so likewise the phrase ἐξ αὐτοῦ γεννᾶσθαι. The reference is consequently to a beginning life, a birth, a coming into existence (becoming) of something which did not or does not yet exist; not only a change or an improvement, but something altogether new—and that out of God. The sense of the preposition ἐξ also, has doubtless to be held fast; out of Him, that is out of God's Self-own Holy Essence. "Nasci ex Deo est naturam Dei acquirere" (Luther) or "constituitur in quadam participatione supernaturali esse divini" (de Lyra), having received a new being or nature out of God (Spener), perfectly analogous to γέννηθε θείας κοινωνίας φύσιν, 2 Pet. i. 4.—Cf. Jno. iii. 8, 5, 6; i. 12, 13; Tit. iii. 5; Eph. iv. 23, 24; Rom. xii. 2; 1 Pet. i. 3, 23. There is a Divine seed (ch. iii. 9) in those who are born out of God; they have not become God, deified or absorbed in God or God absorbed in them, but only partakers of the Divine nature, germ-like, like new-born babes, so that a beginning has been made, but only a beginning, although the beginning of a life, Divine, coming from and leading to God, whose perfection is not wrought magically or by enchantment at one stroke, but is subject to the law of Divinely appointed growth. This birth out of God is a translation of man from death to life (ch. iii. 14), brings him to the Light of the world and gives him eternal life (ch. v. 11, 20), and effects the blessed result that God is in us and we in Him (ch. iv. 15), as the children of God (ch. iii. 1, 2, 9, 10), out of God (ch. iii. 10). But this is brought about by means of an ethical life-process (ch. iii. 9; v. 1). We become the children of God. But nothing is said here on this point, or on the meditation of Christ and faith in Him. We have therefore to set aside all expositions, which weaken the thought, like those of Socinus ("Dei similem esse") and Rosenmüller ("Amari a Deo" and "beneficium ab eo ornari," or introduce a foreign element, like that of Hilgenfeld (a destiny and necessity of nature represented in gnostico-dualistic manner), and those which misapprehend or reverse the right order in making the doing of righteousness the condition of our adoption (Socinus, Episcopus, Semler, al.); the false relation also of doing righteousness to standing in the judgment (a Lapide, Emser, Estius) has to be excluded as irrelevant.—Lücke (2d ed.) says "properly one ought to have expected ὅτι πᾶς ὁ γεγεννημένος ἐξ αὐτοῦ ποιεῖ τὴν δικαιοσύνην," this is not correct although the thought is correct per se. John makes the perceptible and cognizable ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην a sure token of the hidden life of the inner man, which began with the birth out of God, of the adoption, of the life out of which death cannot destroy and which can glory against the judgment. The relation between γεννησθαι ἐκ θεοῦ and ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην is exactly like that between κοινωνίαν ἔχειν μετὰ θεοῦ and περιπατεῖν ἐν τῷ φωτί in ch. i. 6.

Connection with the preceding, and development in the sequel.—The rich and independent thought is the introduction to or the text of the next part. Its fundamental tone is δικαίος ἐστι, parallel to φῶς ἐστι, which is a further confirmation of the presumption that God is the subject. It is impossible to restrict the notion δικαίος by the side of the inference which is here drawn from it, to justitia judicialis. Hence we must not seek or find an internal reciprocal relationship between the judgment, (to which v. 28 is supposed to refer, but of which nothing is said, the reference being simply to Christ's Advent), and righteousness; we need not think of the judicial function of the Divine righteousness nor of our being able to stand before the righteous Judge only through doing righteousness. But John in concluding the first part with the strong consolation which on the ground of the walk in light, adverts with hopeful promise to the blessed destination of Christians, passes from the καθάρσις in the Advent to the thought of the Sonship, of the hope, the glory and heritage of the children of God. This is the connection with what goes before. The next main part of the Epistle is analytically divided by the development of this idea of a glorious birth out of God.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. God's attribute of righteousness is not only energetically active, but also communicative.
2. The import of regeneration should be laid hold of by its indispensable consequence; viz.: ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην, and even its nature defined as a beginning of a new, Divine life.
3. The vital power and root of a truly valid righteousness in our being and walking, lie not in man as he is, but only in God, and out of God only in man as he has become a Christian.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Determine [find out experimentally,—M.] what thou knowest.—Not only every gift of God is good and perfect, but both all the good, and all perfection are the gifts of Him, the Righteous one.—God gives and man—not only has but becomes [comes into existence.—M.]—God rules over thee and has His work in thee, that thou mayest become and remain His child.—Whatever is Divine prompts and impels the ethical, by which the Divine may be identified.—The cause of regeneration is the righteous God, and an ethical status is its mark and sign.

SPENER:—No man has by nature the power to do right or to work righteousness, but it comes only from his regeneration, from Christ, who makes us strong by regeneration and His dwelling in us.

LANGHE:—The Gospel is careful with the law to connect the righteousness of faith with the righteousness of life and therein lies a true mark of a sincere evangelical preacher and a sincere evangelical hearer.

STARKE:—Believers are assured by their doing right, that they have become the children of God by grace, that consequently they may joyfully appear before the judgment seat of God knowing that no Father will suffer his children to be put to confusion of face, and in this faith and undoubting hope they may joyfully take leave of this world.

BESSEMER:—The Apostle's rejoicing over the present power of the children of God over sin is, as it were, a ladder on which he ascends to the glory that is still reserved for them; and the hope of this future glory impels him once more to charge his little children to use with all diligence the Christian virtue already accorded to them, uninfluenced by the seducers who pretended to be able to see the Lord without holiness.

[EZEK. HOPKINS:—Those who do God's commandments, have a right of heirship and inheritance unto eternal life. For they are born of God and therefore heaven is their patrimony, their paternal estate: for the Apostle saith "Every one that doeth righteousness is born of God," and if they are born of God then according to St. Paul's argument Rom. viii. 17: "If children, then heirs; heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ," who is the "heir of all things." The trial of thy legitimacy, whether thou art a true and genuine son of God will lie upon thy obedience to His commands, for "in this the children of God are manifest and the children of the devil; whosoever is born of God does not commit sin . . . and whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God." 1 Jno. iii. 9. 10. Now if by our obedience and dutifulness, it appears, that we are indeed the children of God, our Father will certainly give us a child's portion; and that is no less than a kingdom. So saith our Saviour Luke xii. 32; "Fear not, little flock: for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."—M.]

<sup>4</sup> καὶ ἐσμὲν after κληθόμεν is inserted by A. B. C. Sin; many cursives and versions. Vulg.: et sumus; others; et sumus. Erasmus took it to be an addition; the Recept. omitted it. The false translation of the Vulgate was a stumbling-block to many, also Luther, and they omitted the words accordingly. [The German retains καὶ ἐσμὲν and renders in an independent clause: "and we are (it i. e. God's children)."] Occumenius explains: ἰδωκεν ἡμῖν τέκνα αὐτοῦ γενέσθαι τε καὶ κληθῆναι; and Theophylact: γενέσθαι τε καὶ λογισθῆναι. The authorities are decidedly in favour of the genuineness of the addition.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1a. Behold!—John desires to call the attention of his readers to their filial state, (Mark xiii. 1; Jno. i. 29), not without his own amazement at its glory, whereof, he himself, as a child of God, had made experience and therefore he uses in the sequel ἡμῖν not ὑμῖν. The former (noted only by Augustine, Sander and Huther) should be combined with the latter (to which Lyra and Grotius call attention), so that the right view lies not midway between these two thoughts (Düsterdieck), but in their combination.

What manner of love the Father hath given to us.—Παρατός, of frequent occurrence in the New Testament, and (according to Buttmann, Lexicog. 125, 302) probably derived from ποῦ, πόθεν, and ἀπό (πο-από) with an inserted δ (pro-d-ice, pro-d-esse), and properly ought to be written ποταμός, as it used to be written formerly, denotes literally whence? whence? whence? The question relates to extraction and race. Descent and quality are inquired after. So Luke i. 29: ποταμός ἐστὶν ὁ ἀσπαρμός; Matth. viii. 27: ποταμός ἐστὶν οὗτος. Descent and extraction are wholly lost sight of and there remains nothing but kind and quality. Luke vii. 39; 2 Pet. iii. 11; Mark xiii. 1. In the last passage the word slightly touches the sense of quantus. Hence it is wrong to translate "qualem et quantum amorem" (Socinus, Episcopus, Estius), what or "how great love" (Lücke, de Wette, Sander, Ewald) although we may admit that the signification of "qualis" plays into that of "quantus" (S. Schmidt, Dusterdieck, Huther).—Luther renders very well: "what glorious, sublime love!" The quality has, at any rate, to be retained. The fact, however, of its being undeserved is not implied in ποταμός (Calvin), but rather in ἡμῖν, indignis, inimicis, peccatoribus (a Lapide), just as the ἀγάπη and its nature involves the idea of its greatness, even as the strength and greatness, the intensiveness and extensiveness of love are concentrated in Jno. iii. 16: οὕτως ἠγάπησεν ὁ θεός. Luther pertinently observes in his Scholia: "Usus est Johannes singulari verborum pondere: non dicit, dedisse nobis deum donum aliquod, sed ipsam caritatem et fontem omnium bonorum, cor ipsum, idque non pro operibus aut studiis nostris, sed gratuito." Ἀγάπη does not mean caritatis munus (Beza), effectus, documentum, beneficium, token or proof of love (Socinus, Episcopus, Grotius, Spener, Neander, al.); this is occasioned by δέδωκεν. Bengel: "non modo destinavit et contulit, sed etiam exhibuit." God has not only given in love, but He has given love itself, made it our own, absolutely given it to us so that His love is now ours. [a Lapide explains ἀγάπην in the R. C. interest, thus: "i. e. charitatem tum activam (actum amoris Dei quo nos mire amat), tum passivam nobisque a Deo communicatam et infusam. Videte quantum charitatem nobis praestitit et exhibuit Deus, cum charitatem creatam nobis dedit et infudit, quia filii Dei nominamur et sumus." Calvin's turn lies hardly in the Apostle's expression: "Quod dicit DATAM esse caritatem, significat: hoc merere esse liberalitatis, quod nos Deus pro filiis habet."—M.]. The Apostle, writing from a sense and consciousness of the adoption, says ὁ πατήρ and thus points to the sequel.

That we should be called children of God.—As we have not ὄν: as in Matth. viii. 27, the reference is not merely to the substance, the standing fact that we are called God's children (in opposition to S. Schmidt, Episcopus, al.); as we have not ὅπως, as in Jno. xi. 57, the reference is not purely telic, as maintained by Lange, Lücke, de Wette, Brückner, Neander, al., who are compelled to specify as the gift of love something which is not contained in the text, e. g. that of God sending the Son in order to indicate the purpose of our sonship. But being God's children is not a gift shortly to be communicated, not simply a present fact, but a task and problem, a fact only in process of becoming, only gradually accomplishing, not a creation of instantaneous occurrence or an immediately finished act of creation, but a work of God passing through different stages of development, and a history of man, a life wrought by God in man from a beginning to a high end, like the forgiveness of sins. Hence here, as in ch. i. 9, ἵνα signifies—that we should be called. Our adoption by the Father is the substance and aim of His love.—Καλεῖσθαι (Jno. ii. 23: φίλος θεοῦ ἐκλήθη does not denote a predicate without substance, a name without a meaning or an empty title, for He that calls us children is God, and the blessed and glorious spirits in heaven. Then we are called so by men, by the brethren in earnest, by the world in mockery. "Where God gives names, He always gives also the being [the thing signified by the name M.]. Besser.—We have not the name of children without the sonship, even as we do not only call God Father; He is also our Father. But the acknowledgment of this sonship given by God and exhibited in the life, is here brought out. Although Augustine is wrong ("hic non est discrimen inter dici et esse"), yet is Calvin right ("inanis titulus esse non potest"). Hence the Greek commentators explain: εἰδετε γὰρ ὅτι ἔδεκεν ἡμῖν τέκνα αὐτοῦ γενέσθαι τε καὶ κληθῆναι (Occumenius), or καὶ λογισθῆναι (Theophyl.).—Baumgarten-Crusius and Neander after him, explains καλεῖσθαι with reference to Jno. i. 12, by ἐξουσίαν ἔχειν γενέσθαι, but this is only the presupposition of καλεῖσθαι and it is not said that we should have the right to call ourselves children.—The position τέκνα θεοῦ indicates the notion of the sonship, the choice of the word τέκνα instead of υἱοὶ the beginning, the birth, the dependence, and the Genitive θεοῦ instead of αὐτοῦ the glory and highness of this sonship. Bengel: "Quid majus, quam Deus? quae proprior necessitudo, quam filius?"

And we are!—This adjunction, externally testified and internally required, is neither a gloss nor governed by ἵνα (Vulgate "et simus") but an independent sentence designed to give special prominence and testimony to the reality of the sonship and the essence of the name; it is the gladsome expression of the certainty and of the consciousness founded on experience respecting this gift, although not exactly a triumphant exclamation over a hostile world. The assumption of Ebrard that κληθόμενι indicates the relation of God to us and ἵσμεν our relation to God, the former the fact of His being reconciled, the latter that of our changed nature and renovation, is unfounded. Both, indeed, are implied but not thus separated and distributed.

Therefore the world knoweth us not.—Διὰ τοῦτο refers back to what goes before: Because we are the children of God, the world knoweth us not. The Apostle mentions a necessary consequence of our being children of God, viz.: the world knoweth us not. He desires neither to meet an objection of believers (S. Schmidt), nor to express a ground of consolation [with respect to the persecutions to which they are exposed on the part of the world M.]. (Luther, Grotius, de Wette, Lücke al.), but to adjoin an ever-recurring truth of our experience [I should prefer to say with Huther that the Apostle here describes the contrast between believers, τέκνα θεοῦ, and the world and the greatness of the love of the Father who gave them that endearing name. M.]. Ἡμᾶς denotes the relation and attitude, the nature and walk of the children of God, not external personality or relation.—On ὁ κόσμος compare notes on ch. ii. 15, and on γινώσκειν notes on ch. ii. 8.—“The essence of the notion ὁ κόσμος according to John’s manner of thinking is antagonism to God; this,—and not the consideration of the numerical strength and influence of those who were opposed to the few and obscure Christians, and without being properly godless were wont to judge every thing by the standard of worldly wisdom (Episcopius),—is the basis of the Apostle’s argument.” (Düsterdieck). γινώσκειν signifies a knowing which moves the whole man, rests on personal experience, voluntary agreement and lively interest, and agrees with the frame of mind, and the bias of life. The world does not understand Christians, seeks no intercourse with them, takes no part with them, or stands by them, and has no liking for them: all this is involved in οὐ γινώσκειν and signifies: does not know them [thoroughly or experimentally; the world has no conception of the spiritual nature of Christians.—M.]. Cf. v. 18; Jno. xvi. 88; xv. 20, 21. Hence the explanations of Grotius “non agnoscit pro suis,” Semler “rejecit, reprobavit,” Baumgarten-Crusius and others—μισεῖ, are wrong. This relation subsisting between an ungodly world and the children of God the Apostle further explains in the following proposition:

Because it knew Him not.—“Οτι does not depend on διὰ τοῦτο; John’s purpose is to explain how it happens that the world does not understand the Christians, because they are children of God, and he observes accordingly that the fault lies not with the children of God, but it is the fault of the world itself, because it has not known God. Γινώσκειν of course must be taken here in the same sense as in the former clause and, neither—credere in Deum (S. Schmidt), nor—nosse doctrinam, curare divinam legem, iussa Dei observare (Episcopius), but “the whole contrast in mind and bias, also hatred and persecution” (de Wette) are embraced in the world’s not knowing God, both with reference to the children of God and to God Himself. The conclusion is valid: οὐκ ἔγνω τὸν υἱοθετήσαντα (Oecumenius), therefore οὐ γινώσκει τὰ τέκνα αὐτοῦ. Hence αὐτὸν must designate God and not Christ. Because we are born of God, and have been made partakers of the Divine nature, the world knoweth not us, which did not know God.—The change of tense in γινώσκει and ἔγνω must not be overlooked. The fact of the world not knowing the children of God is conditioned by the fact of its not knowing God. This is the first, on which depends the second. The knowledge of God is the ground of the knowledge of man and the knowledge of the world, which are not wanting in the children of God; self-knowledge also depends on it. All these are wanting where the knowledge of God is wanting; there is wanting the knowledge and understanding of believers and personal knowledge with respect to the whole and the general to which people belong, and with respect to the particular, even down to their own heart and nature. They know nothing, not even, what they do (Luke xxiii. 84).

The hope of the Sonship. v. 2.

V. 2. Beloved.—This address, ἀγαπητοί, denotes a relation in which love is experienced, and in the present case experience of the love of God, whose children they are, and of the love of those with whom they are connected, and accordingly constitutes an antithesis to the preceding clause: We are children of God and therefore the world knoweth us not.

Now are we children of God.—The former ἐσμὲν culminates in τέκνα θεοῦ and the preceding participle νῦν and is repeated after the parenthetical antithesis pointing first to the fact that the world does not know the children of God now, and secondly to the future. The context and position of νῦν require it to be taken as a participle of time (in opposition to de Wette: now, pursuant to that purpose of love). Thus it is emphatically asserted, that, notwithstanding the opposition of the world, we are already the children of God, although the glory of our sonship is still concealed and imperfect. So Lücke and Düsterdieck against Huther [who denies a reference to the preceding verse and considers νῦν used with respect to the future (ὁ ὅτι) to indicate the present glory of the children of God; adding that the Apostle before mentioning the future glory, notices the fact that it is as yet concealed.—M.].

And it hath not yet been manifested what we shall be.—Antitheses to the preceding are νῦν and ὅτι, ἐσμὲν and ἐσόμεθα, τέκνα θεοῦ and τί, which is further answered by ὅμοιοι αὐτῷ, just as ὅτι ἐφανερώθη is carried further in ἐὰν φανερωθῇ and οἰδαμεν continued in ὁφείμεθα. These antitheses, however, are not contraria, but developments of the present τέκνα θεοῦ ἐσμὲν, the development of the adoption into the inheritance. The argument therefore is properly carried on by καὶ (in opposition to Beza, Grotius, Spener and others, who construe καὶ as a Hebraism in the sense of ἀλλά), and δὲ after οἰδαμεν is rightly wanting (contrary to S. Schmidt, Lücke, Sander and others).—Ὅτι ἐφανερώθη points to something actually existing but as yet concealed. For φανεροῦν means to make manifest, to bring to light, so as to be open to sight and to be known; not from the word itself, but from the context it has to be determined whether this manifestation is to take place factually, by means of historical development and events, or logically by means of instruction and teaching; here the former course is very distinctly marked (so Huther in opposition to Ebrard) so also ch. ii. 19; Jno. ii. 11; vii. 4; xvii. 6; xxi. 1. The context in like manner implies to whom this manifestation is to be made, if it is not explicitly stated. The primary reference is here probably to the world, the secondary to believers (Düsterdieck). The interrogative (τί ἐσόμεθα) presents no difficulty, and contains nothing to favour Ebrard’s opinion, since not only after verbs of knowing, inquiring etc., and in direct questions, but also in cases where classical writers would certainly have used ὅ, τι, the N. T. writers use the interrogative pronoun; cf. Winer p. 181; Buttman p. 216. On the thought itself compare Col. iii. 8 (ἡ ζωὴ ὑμῶν κέκρυπται σὺν τῷ Χριστῷ ἐν τῷ θεῷ) Rom. viii. 17 (εἰ δὲ τέκνα, καὶ κληρονόμοι—θεοῦ, συγκληρονόμοι δὲ Χριστοῦ) and v. 18 (οὐκ ἔδει τὰ παθήματα τοῦ νῦν καιροῦ πρὸς τὴν μέλλονσαν δόξαν ἀποκαλυφθῆναι εἰς ἡμᾶς), also Gal. iv. 1 (ἐφ’ ὅσον χρόνον ὁ κληρονόμος νηπιὸς ἐστὶ, οὐδὲν διαφέρει δούλου κυρίου πάντων ὧν).

It is important to remember that what is said is: "it has not yet appeared what we shall be" and not, that "we shall be something which as yet we are not": οὐπω negatives not the being, but the having appeared, the being manifested. There is only one Divine sonship (child-ship); non dantur gradus viότητος (Calov). But it has its status or stages, its unfolding and development, the development of the inner being of a child of God and the unfolding of their manifold privileges and possessions. "The future already exists in the germ and is latent in the present" (Düsterdieck). Augustine: "Quid est ergo, quod jam expectamus, si jam filii Dei sumus? quid autem erimus aliud, quam filii Dei?" However different the future state may be from the present and although we must distinguish the one from the other, the former is not absolutely new [Huther—M.]. This is the force of οὐπω ἐφανερώθη, which only brings out and opens to sight that which is concealed, and this is the ἐσμεν become ἐσόμεθα. [Oecumenius: τὸ γὰρ νῦν ὁδῶλον φανερὸν γενήσεται, ἐκείνου ἀποκαλυπτομένου. ὅμοιοι γὰρ αὐτῷ ἀναφανέντες τὸ τῆς νουθεσίας λαμπρὸν παραστήσομεν. οἱ γὰρ υἱοὶ πάντες ὅμοιοι τῷ πατρὶ.—M.]. But what does that consist in?

We know that when it shall be manifested, we shall be like (similar to) Him.—Οἰδαμεν signifies certainty of knowing, not only guess-knowledge (Jauchmann), and knowing participated in not only by the Apostles (Episcopius), but by all Christians (Calvin), by all of whom it is said: τέκνα θεοῦ ἐσμέν. The object of that knowing is: ὅτι ὅμοιοι αὐτῷ ἐσόμεθα. The occurrence of this future condition is indicated by ἐὰν φανερώθῃ. As we have ἐὰν and not ὅταν the reference is not only to the time when (Socinus and al.), but to the reality of the matter, cf. notes on ch. ii. 28. Also Jno. xii. 32; xiv. 3; xvi. 7. The Vulgate gives the precise shade of thought: cum apparuerit, bringing out the force of the Fut. exact. applied in the Subj. Aorist. The subject of φανερώθῃ is τὸ ἐσόμεθα, which is clear from the unmistakable reference to ἐφανερώθῃ τὸ ἐσόμεθα. No expositor has seriously thought of God, but several supply Christ (Augustine, Bede, Calvin, Calov and others.).—φανεροῦσθαι τὸ ἐσόμεθα coincides with the coming of Christ and quoad rem, it is very possible to think here of Christ. But φανεροῦν would then have to be explained here of His appearing in glory, whereas it is used in v. 5 of His appearing in the flesh and expressly referred to Him by the demonstrative pronoun ἐκεῖνος, and the same verb had different subjects in the two sentences immediately succeeding each other. We may admit here "the possibility of that reference, the reality of which" is stated in v. 5, but have to maintain with the greater number of expositors that the concinnity of the diction requires us to supply to φανερώθῃ the same subject which belongs to ἐφανερώθῃ, namely τὸ ἐσόμεθα, especially since the latter is explained by ὅμοιοι αὐτῷ ἐσόμεθα; the latter two as well as the two forms of φανεροῦσθαι are correlatives. Oecumenius excellently remarks: τὸ γὰρ νῦν ὁδῶλον φανερὸν γενήσεται, ἐκείνου ἀποκαλυπτομένου: ὅμοιοι γὰρ αὐτῷ ἀναφανέντες τὸ τῆς νουθεσίας λαμπρὸν παραστήσομεν. οἱ γὰρ υἱοὶ πάντως ὅμοιοι τῷ πατρὶ.—"Ὅμοιος is resembling, similar to and not=equal to (Sander); it is not=ἴσος [the English "like"] is ambiguous signifying both "similar" and "equal." I have retained "like" in the text, but given "similar" in brackets.—M.]. Of Christ Paul says: τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ Phil. ii. 6; and His enemies: ἴσων τῷ θεῷ, Jno. v. 18. Luke calls οἱ τοῦ θεοῦ—ἰσάγγελοι but not ἴσοι θεῷ.—Recollect the controversy of ὁμοούσιον and ὁμοούσιον.—"Ὅμοιος signifies similarity in external form and appearance (ὁράσει, Rev. iv. 3; cf. i. 13, 16; ix. 7, 10, 19), and then in kind and authority (Jno. viii. 55; Rev. xiii. 4; xviii. 18). It is certain that "the creature will never become Creator" (Luther I), and "Non erimus idem, quod Deus, sed similes erimus Dei" (Luther, Schol.). That the connection requires us to supply αὐτῷ to God and not to Christ, is clear and almost universally acknowledged; hence Bengel says very pointedly: "Deo, cuius sumus filii." Now although the notion of resemblance to God is somewhat vague, the question arises whether the context does not shed light on the subject. Huther indeed rightly observes that commentators are not warranted in arbitrarily restricting it, but the attempt of deriving more light from the context must not be absolutely repudiated. Much will depend on the right understanding of the adjoined sentence.

Because we shall see Him as He is.—The annexation by ὅτι points to a casual relation of resemblance to God and seeing God. This is almost universally acknowledged. Hence it is wrong to take ὅτι=ἀλλά καὶ (Oecumenius), or=ὅτι καὶ (Scholiast. II.), or=et (Luther, Schol.), for this disturbs and negatives the internal relation of the two. Nor does ὅτι describe the "Modus hujus transformationis" (Lyra). It is most natural to take the internal relation of resemblance to God and seeing God, so that the cause of resemblance to God lies in seeing God: we shall be similar to God, because we shall see Him face to face. For grammatically and dialectically this course is pointed out to us. We shall be similar to Him, because we shall see Him, says the Apostle, and not: ὁρῶμεθα αὐτόν, ὅτι ὅμοιοι αὐτῷ ἐσόμεθα (Düsterdieck). The resemblance to God is the end of the love of God, and not the seeing God which is simply the instrument of the former. Cf. Jno. xvii. 24. As γινώσκειν conduces to having (ἔχειν), so seeing God effects the being, and more particularly the being similar to Him. Hence the internal relation of the two is reversed if ὅτι is supposed to add only a "testimonium aut signum similitudinis" (Carpov), not the cause of it, or if the seeing God is taken as the effect, from which is inferred the cause, resemblance to God (Calvin, Socinus, Episcopius, Rickli). Nor may we infer with Huther that because we shall see Him, therefore we know now (οἰδαμεν) that we shall be similar to Him; particularly as that knowledge rests on the sonship, which is a fact, and the word of promise given to the children of God. But this seeing must be taken in the full acception of the word, a real perfect seeing in the resurrection-body, and not only a real knowing. The believer is in the σῶμα πνευματικόν (1 Cor. xv. 44) and sees face to face (1 Cor. xiii. 12); it is "maxime practica visio, summi boni aīdhoris plenissima" (J. Lange).—The object of this seeing is God, καθὼς ἐστὶ: "As He is not only in His image etc., but in Himself and in His Being, His perfect majesty and glory (Spener). Such a seeing of God is a real ground of resembling God according to Rev. xxii. 4: καὶ ὄψονται τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ καὶ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τῶν μετώπων αὐτῶν. 2 Cor. iii. 18: ἡμεῖς—ἀνακαλυμμένοι προσώπῳ τῇ δόξαν κυρίου κατοπτριζόμενοι τὴν αὐτὴν εἰκόνα μεταμορφούμεθα ἀπὸ δόξης εἰς δόξαν, καθάπερ ἀπὸ κυρίου πνεύματος. Hence Bengel: "ex aspectu similitudo." Spener: "The seeing is the cause of the likeness." So likewise de Wette, Neander, Düsterdieck, Ebrard. The seeing God must react on him who sees by glorifying him into that which is the object of his seeing, making him similar to Him whom he sees. Thus is fulfilled the promise that we shall be θείας κοινωνοὶ φύσεως (2 Pet. i. 4). Hence we must not think with Ebrard of "the light-nature of God," or with de Wette of "the δόξα of God," and still less with S. Schmidt and Düsterdieck only of ch. ii. 29: δικαίως ἔστιν, but rather with the Greek expositors (συμβασιλεύσομεν καὶ συνδοξασθῶμεν αὐτῷ) also of our joint inheritance with Christ, since ch. ii. 28 (cf. Rom. viii. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 12) suggests as much, and we may say with Luther that we have become lords of sin, of death and the devil. But although Calov clearly passes the bounds of exegesis in his dogmatical thought ("ratione mentis sapientia, ratione voluntatis sanctitate et iustitia, ratione corporis immortalitate, ratione utriusque gloria et felicitate æterna deo similes erimus"), those who are held fast in the enlightenment of the understanding by no means do justice to the text; and of these men Oertel caps the climax in his philosophical exposition: "I believe that the reference here is simply to the higher perfection of the knowledge of the Christian religion and the sense to be as follows: Some day, after several generations and centuries, mankind, which as yet clings overmuch to the spirit of coarseness, will be more enlightened, ennobled and happy and thus by means of the more perfect light that is to rise, attain to a perfect knowledge of the plan of God and the purpose of Jesus.—Ah, John, if thou hadst had a presentiment of the bloody Nicænes, Costnitsiades, Dragoonades, edicts, etc. and the times when thousands were slaughtered in honour of religion!—But—thy presentiment of the education of mankind in religion, virtue and philanthropy will yet be perfected by the Providence of the Almighty Father." [Augustine (Tract. in Ep. Jno. iv. 5) who however understands αὐτῷ and αὐτόν of Christ, exclaims: "Ergo visuri sumus quandam visionem, fratres, quam nec oculus vidit, nec auris audivit, nec in cor hominis ascendit: visionem quandam, visionem præcellentem omnes pulchritudines terrenas, auri, argenti, nemorum atque camporum, pulchritudinem maris et æris, pulchritudinem solis et lune, pulchritudinem angelorum, omnia superantem, quia ex ipsa pulchra sunt omnia."—M.].

The power of this hope. v. 8.

V. 8. And every one that hath this hope on Him, halloweth himself.—With καὶ which is not ὅτι, John annexes the sentence expressing "the moral effect of Christian hope" (Huther), which although it contains an exhortation in point of sense, yet formally expresses it as a fact and that more emphatically, since it intimates in decided terms that he who does not hallow himself, surrenders that hope in ingratitude. For πᾶς ὁ ἔχων is omnis et solus; "Every one—and only such an one; for as this hope (v. 2) peculiarly and exclusively belongs to the children of God, they and they only enjoy the power of such a hope whether it is to exhibit itself in sanctification, as here, or to afford patience and joyfulness (Rom. viii. 14 sqq.; 28 sqq.);" (Düsterdieck), and ἐν αὐτῷ i. e. θεῷ denotes "the fulcrum" (Huther), or still better "the real foundation of this hope" (J. Lange), the ground and soil out of which it grows up, so that S. Schmidt rightly observes: "Deus gignit spem." Grotius weakens the thought: "Sicut Deus eam spem vult concipi." Besides ἐλπίζειν ἐν αὐτῷ (God) occurs Rom. xv. 12 and ἐπὶ πλοῦτον ἀδελότητι, ἀλλ' ἐν τῷ θεῷ 2 Tim. vi. 17, although ἔχειν ἐλπίδα ἐπὶ cum dat., occurs only here and with εἰς θεόν Acts xxiv. 15.—Ὁ ἔχων τὴν ἐλπίδα is not the same as ὁ ἐλπίζων, the latter denoting only the act of hope, but the former describing hope as a permanent property, as a fixed possession, so that the act of hoping is uninterrupted and lasting. Hence it is neither necessary nor correct to explain ἔχειν, as holding fast or preserving (Benson, Spener), or to take here ἐλπίδα as the object of hope, that which one is objectively entitled to hope (Ebrard). τὴν ἐλπίδα ταύτην naturally leads us to think of ὅμοιοι αὐτῷ ἐσόμεθα. This was v. 2 the object and substance of οἰδομεν. Now it is designated by ἔχειν τὴν ἐλπίδα ταύτην ἐπ' αὐτῷ as the object of a yearning desire in the power of God, in order to bring out the purifying reaction in our earthly life. The mere ἐλπίζειν would be incongruous with the ἀγνίζειν ἑαυτὸν, which is affected and to be effected. Primarily, however, this hope and self-sanctification only are here connected (Hofmann), but the state of having hope and participation in this hope are presupposed in the case of the acts of such sanctifying of oneself. "Qui habet hanc spem et credit, se esse filium Dei, et expectat donec fides sua reveletur, is sine dubio ita accendetur spe illa, ut se purificet, nec involvat se vordibus carnis, sed carnem mortificabit" (Luther). Self-sanctification necessarily combined with Christian hope (de Wette) is its effectus (Hunnius). Hope is the mother of sanctification, not the reverse, as Grotius maintains. Nor is sanctification the condition of the fulfilment of this hope (Lücke and several Roman Catholic commentators), nor must we find here the combination of both views (Schlichting, Episcopius). Ἀγνίζειν from ἀγνός=καθαρός (Suidas), τίθη (Numb.

viii. 21; vi. 2, 8; Ps. xl. 7) clean, pure; applied in the New Testament to wisdom (Jas. iii. 17), to one fulfilling a vow (Acts xxi. 24, 26; xxiv. 18), to the Christian walk (1 Pet. i. 22; Jas. iv. 8; 2 Cor. vi. 6; 1 Tim. v. 22), and to the chaste (Tit. ii. 6; 2 Tim. iv. 12; v. 2; 2 Cor. xi. 2). It signifies accordingly ἐλευθερία παντὸς μολυσμοῦ σαρκὸς καὶ πνεύματος (Phavorinus), ἡ τῶν ἀμαρτημάτων ἀποχή (Clement. Alex.). Hence it is the opposite of impure, and ἀγιος the opposite of profane, although the latter denotes inward impurity and the former outward profanity [pollution] as a consequence and in a secondary sense. The reference to God, who is δικαίος and whom we are to resemble, necessitates us not to restrict the meaning of ἁγίζειν to castificare (Augustine), but to take it in a wider sense like καθαρίζειν (ch. i. 7, 9.). "Hoc non tantum de illa turpitudine carnis intelligendum est, sed de omnibus passionibus animi vitiosis, ira, avaritia, invidia, odio, superbia, glorie cupiditate etc." (Luther). The object of this hallowing is ἑαυτὸν, that is to say our own self, and not only particular details of our life or our outward life. The exhortations of Peter (2 Pet. iii. 18, 14) and Paul (2 Cor. vii. 1) are analogous in point of matter. The Present denotes uninterrupted self-purification (Beza, Spener, Grotius, al.), because the Divine life in us constantly encounters impurity and unrighteousness and because these must be done away (Düsterdieck). But this self-purification does not proceed from our own self in the same manner as it bears upon it; hence there is no αὐτὸς by the side of ἑαυτὸν. Augustine pointedly says in this respect: "Quis non castificat nisi Deus? Sed Deus te nolentem non castificat. Ergo quod adjungis voluntatem tuam Deo, castificas te ipsum. Castificas te, non de te, sed de illo, qui venit, ut habitet in te. Tamen quia agis ibi aliquid voluntate, ideo et tibi aliquid tributum est." The power, the impulse and initiative of self-purification do not reside in the liberum arbitrium of man, but in that on which rests the hope which impels self-purification. [See Huther.—M.].

Even as He is holy.—Ἐκεῖνος is Christ, according to the constant use of that word in juxtaposition with αὐτὸς, in the writings of John. Cf. ch. ii. 6. While the context required us to apply αὐτὸς to God, ἐκεῖνος may and must be applied to Christ, as the more remote subject. We cannot refer both to Christ (Aretius, Estius, Calvin), or both to God (Lyra, Socinus, al.). Christ is the pattern, and expressly shows us how we may become similar to God. If the Apostle had said only: καθὼς ἐκεῖνος, we should then have been obliged to supply ἁγίζειν. This is impossible, and the Apostle therefore adjoins ἀνὴρ ἅγιος; purity belongs to Him essentially, He is absolutely and originally holy and righteous, "in most perfect harmony with the original righteousness as well as the original purity of the Father" (Düsterdieck) see vv. 5, 7, ch. ii. 1. "The ἀνὴρ is an attribute inhering in Christ" (Lücke), and ἅγιος, not: ἁγίος, indicates an uninterrupted and permanent condition (Jno. i. 18). There is no reason why καθὼς should be explained by quandoquidem and the purity of Christ should be construed into a second motive of self-purification (as Ebrard does). Even the externally direct relation to Christ is sufficiently manifest to the specifically Christian way of thinking, in virtue of the position of Christ as our only and eternal Mediator, and indispensable to John's manner of contemplation; the immutable state of Christ is the perfect standard of Christians, and not only an outward example set before us, but a vital power. Cf. i. 1; ii. 1, 6; iii. 5, 7, 16; iv. 17; [that is: the purity of Christ is the immutable and perfect standard and pattern according to which Christians should shape and mould their whole life, not only outwardly in acts, but inwardly in the disposition of the heart and the determination of the will.—M.].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The state of our being the children of God is a gift of the preëminent love of God; this is a point to be insisted upon in opposition to Pelagius and all Pelagian errors. A chaste exegesis requires us not to go beyond this general character of this passage and neither to beat (with Calvin) with it "the sophists" who postulate the foreseen future dignity of those whom God adopts, nor to find here the Lutheran principle "regeneratio præcedit fidem," while the (German) Reformed hold: "fides præcedit regenerationem." Here is simply the assertion of the preventive love of the Father as the cause of our adoption, as in ch. iv. 10.

2. But not only from God, but from God only, from God exclusively proceedeth all the divine life, which passes before him. Our life of faith takes us back to Him, the Father, whose Nature is love.

3. Christianity brings not new information but a new life, not a new doctrine but a new nature, which like the natural, bodily birth has however its growth and development from the hidden, germ-like beginning to the most glorious perfection.

4. The world with all its glory does neither understand the kingdom of God nor the people and history of this kingdom; here is the ground and beginning of all enmity against the Church of Jesus and Christian Church-ordinances (Luke xxiii. 84). Our Lord's prayer: ἵνα βόσκῃς κτηνὰς —Jno. xvii. 21, does not contradict the language of John. Christ adverts to the means designed to break through the mind and hardness of the world, while John here bears testimony to the mind and hardness of the world without intending to exclude that they may and should be counteracted and that not in vain.

5. But the first thing the world ought to be helped to get is that it may know God and the Divine. The knowledge of God, which however is only excited under the influence and manifestations of His love, conditions the knowledge of His people and kingdom.

6. The adoption of God has a history from its first beginning to its perfected glorification in the likeness of God, which takes place in consequence of the perfect vision of God, the seeing God effecting the transformation into the Image of God.

7. That which one day will become perfect in seeing God must begin here on earth in faith, and the glorification into the Image of God has its beginning in the sanctification wrought on earth. But this does by no means put the sanctificatio in the power of man. For first it does not go before the justificatio (as is assumed by Roman Catholics) and secondly it has respect only to those who are born of God and takes place only by means of the power conveyed and appropriated in regeneration; consequently although it takes place with our own power, yet is this power not originally our own but only bestowed by the grace of God and made our own in faith, so that Wolf is perfectly right in saying: "aliud est ducere, aliud dyvitiis, prius illud in hominem non cadit,— ut vero posterius. Compare the quotation from Augustine in Exegetical and Critical on v. 3.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Two wonderful things: 1. The love of God which desires to adopt us as children; 2. The perverseness of the world which does not know such a Lord.—Art thou more astonished at God's loving attitude to the world, or at the world's hateful attitude to God and His children? Dost thou think it more strange that God treats thee as a child than that the world does not and will not understand thee? Dost thou not see that it is more natural and reasonable that the world is against thee than that God is for thee?—See that thou find thy way through all the proofs of the love of God even to that of His adoption of thee and through all the enmity of the world even to the knowledge of its ignorance and want of understanding! He only that does the former is able to do the latter.—Think of thy own and thy children's adoption by God and inquire even in the case of one who is distasteful to thee, whether he is not as well as thou a child of God, and perhaps better entitled to be one than thou art thyself. This is very important and profitable for one's own discipline, the education of one's children and one's intercourse with and among men.—Hope for the future, but do not expect to reap hereafter without sowing now; wouldest thou hereafter see God and become like Him it is necessary for thee to begin here to purify thyself by strenuous application.—Thy adoption rests on the foundation of God's eternal love, reaches even into God's eternal felicity, but in this temporal present and the present transitoriness it may be lost and therefore must be preserved all the infirmity of thy own flesh and all the enmity of the world notwithstanding.—Happy is the man whose joy flows from the grateful love of God and whose troubles proceed from a hostile world, but woe to him, whose joy is from beneath and whose troubles come from above, who is the friend of the world and the enemy of God, because he will not be His child.—At peace with God and at war with the world is a wholesome foundation for the alternatives of joy and trouble in thy life.—The import of our adoption by God: 1. Its Origin—the love of God. 2. Its Opposite—an ignorant world without understanding. 3. Its hope—blessed likeness to God. 4. Its power—the zeal of self-purification.—Vital questions and answers for the guidance of life. 1. Who is for thee? God in His eternal love. 2. Who is against thee? The world in its short-sightedness. 3. Whence? From God. 4. Whither? To God's glory. 5. How? In the work of sanctification.

CLEMENS ROMANUS:—How blessed and how wonderful are the gifts of God! Life in immortality, splendour in righteousness, truth in joy, faith in confidence, chastity in holiness—all these are goods present to our mind.

CHRYSTOSTOM:—Those who depise and deride us, know not who we are, citizens of heaven, belonging to an eternal fatherland, associates of the Cherubim; but they will know it in the day of judgment when they will exclaim with sighs and amazement, these are they whom we used to despise and deride.

[CASSIODORUS:—Let us therefore so live, that when He shall come again, we may be able to behold Him, as He is, in all the fulness of His grace and glory.—M.]

AUGUSTINE:—The whole life of a Christian is a holy longing. What we long for, we do not yet see; but by longing thou art enlarging thyself so that when it is visible, thou mayest be filled therewith.—It is God alone who purifies us; but He does not purify thee, thyself unwilling; thou purifiest thyself, but not of thyself, but of Him [de Illo] who comes to dwell in thee.

LUTHER:—If God were strictly to reckon with us, He would owe us nothing but hell; but if He gives us heaven, it is of grace.

STARKE:—Dost thou bear here the image of the devil and thinkest to become like Christ there? O, folly! O, deceit! Without the renovation of the divine image none can attain to the glory of God.—Without purification hope of the future glory is impossible. The hope of the impure is daring, impudence and insolence.—Our Christianity is not so much a being pure as a continuous purifying oneself.—Believers purify not only one thing or another, but themselves, wholly, body and soul. The main work lies within and in the soul.—O, the shameful abuse of the Gospel! to be ever appealing to Christ and His merits, and yet never to follow His example!

DANIEL:—Christian, whose is the best nobility? His, who is born of God. Who is the most honoured man? He whom God regards in grace.—A missionary in India (Ziegenbalg) is translating the New Testament with the assistance of a native. Coming to this verse the Hindoo youth translates: that we may be allowed to kiss his feet. The missionary asks: Why do you render thus? The Indian replies: A child! that is too much! too high!—That had never entered into a heathen's heart.

STEINHOFFER:—A child of God is always an enigma to the world.

HEUBNER:—The children of God bear the image, the glory of the Father, enjoy his whole fatherly love and are destined to own what He owns. All this God bestows upon us, apostates and former enemies. Every one is asked to become such a child.—The Christians should have called themselves the children of God? 'Twere pitiable indeed, if they did assume this title and as it were raise themselves to the divine nobility, and worse than if a fool would presume to call himself baron or count. We should be called thus by God and the heavenly children of God; in the Bible the name and the thing are one; the Bible does not know empty trifles.—The sonship is nothing that dazzles the eye, fascinates and attracts in a worldly point of view; it is rather something that is hidden. The world has no eye for it; why? because it knows not God, whereas we see in God the highest and most glorious good, and deem that only glorious which comes from God.—The Christian is quiet, calm, courageous under all the want of appreciation he experiences at the hands of the world; it neither surprises nor disturbs him; being misunderstood by the world cannot injure him.—Christians are the children of a prince, who are obliged to travel in lowly garb, incognito, and as it were in order to be tried, through a foreign country before they take possession of their kingdom. A secret, inward sense of his sonship accompanies the Christian on his journey through the world, through its busy noise; in his heart he walks with God—virtue is not to become a display and an ostentation, therefore the children of God have neither coat of arms nor the badge of an order. The future dignity of Christians cannot be guessed from his appearance any more than it could be determined from the appearance of Christ in His manger-cradle.—They are not condemned to eternal obscurity.—O day beyond compare when God will call His children, saying; Come forth from your obscurity, rise from your lowliness!—The promises of Christianity are transcendently glorious; Christians are not to be like the blessed, the perfect saints or the angels, but like God; what man could have laid hold of this daring hope without revelation?—The Christian should, as it were, keep himself up in a state of excitement. He is terrified at the thought: What? Shouldst thou exchange thy heavenly birthright for the world's mess of pottage? denounce thy faith and lose thy Christian rank for the lust of the flesh, mammon or worldly honour?—Sanctification, though it does not acquire salvation (for it is the gift of grace), yet preserves it. Purification continues day by day; we are often polluted.

EBERARD:—Our future glory is not an object of curiosity, not an object for inquisitiveness to be exercised about.—Not to purify oneself is tantamount to saying to God: "I do not want the jewel which thou holdest up before my eyes as the most precious jewel and promisest one day to give me: to be freed from sin I do not esteem a jewel."

BESSER:—Says David as a Christian before Christ: "I am as a wonder unto many," Ps. lxxi. 7; much more are Christians after Christ the real children of wonder. The world, indeed, which will remain in the Wicked One, sees in the name of our sonship nothing but an empty, imaginary title.—Even though rejuvenated to the state of apostolical power and consecration the Church would yet have the world—although against her, yet not only outside of her (for bad fish also are found in the net), and woe to her, if she were ever to forget in the time of her militant state that her holiness is not perfected in those who are sanctified but only in Him who sanctifies them, and that in the administration of discipline over her members with which she is solemnly charged, she must use the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God for the condemnation of sin and the salvation of sinners, and not the winnowing shovel for cleaning the threshing-floor.—John, in particular, cherishes the most profound conviction that there is only one life for the children of God in time and in eternity, and he knows of no future happiness but that which, like the rose in the bud, is already contained germ-like in faith.—As the eye cannot endure the presence of the smallest particle of dust but sheds tears until it is clear again, so also the Christian's eye of hope eagerly looking forward to the coming glory will not tolerate the presence of a particle of the world's dust, and if any fly into it, it contracts with the keenest sensibility and the Lord gives tears of penitence which wash away the dust.—

THOLUCK:—How blessed is the lot of a believing disciple of the Saviour.

1. How blessed such a disciple is even now. Who recognizes in mankind, as we see it, who recognizes in it a family of God? The heathen, when they saw how Christians were so intimately united in the bonds of so novel a life, exclaimed; "See, how they love one another!"—Blissful joy and astonishment at one and the same time. A child-like mind cannot understand how and why it was thought worthy of so much grace and favour. i

2. How blessed he will be hereafter. If you like, you may call it a defiance, but it is a divine defiance, as Luther says: "That faith gives man a defiant heart toward God and toward all creatures." But what is the centre of all the hope of these poor and miserable people? is it honour, glory, enjoyment? Certainly. Rom. ii. 7-10.

3. Whereto that faith and this hope impel him. It cannot be the centre of Christian longing and hope in the hour of death that we shall see again our loved ones, but its centre is rather that we shall see Him again. Does it well forth from a weakly sense, or from that manly-strong sense, that seeing Him and to be like Him, freedom from sin and error, are one and the same thing? Purify your faith, steel your hope in the faith and hope of the disciple whom you regard only too often as the preacher of a weakly, morbid love.—That resemblance will not fall to thy share without thy own will. Thou must feel within thee the thirst for it and ask and examine thyself with holy love, what is still unclean in me?—Compare the notes on vv. 4-10.

[MACKNIGHT:]—And every man that hath this hope of seeing Christ, and of being like Him "purifieth himself." The felicity, which the Gospel teacheth us to expect in the world to come, is not that of a Mohammedan paradise, in which animal pleasures are the chief enjoyments. The happiness of the children of God in the kingdom of their Father will consist in being like Christ, not only in respect of His immortality, but in respect of his transcendent virtues, especially His boundless benevolence. And the joy, which will flow from the possession and exercise of virtues similar to Christ's is so great, that no one, who hopes to become like Christ in virtue and happiness, will indulge himself in the unrestrained enjoyment of sensual pleasures; but will purify himself from the immoderate desire of those pleasures, in imitation of the purity of Christ.—Purifieth himself, namely, from the lusts of the flesh and from every sin. The Apostle, as Beza has observed, does not say, "hath purified himself," but "purifieth himself," to show that it is a good man's constant study to purify himself, because in this life no one can attain unto perfect purity. By this text therefore, as well as by ch. i. 8, those fanatics are condemned, who imagine they are able to live without sin.—M.]

[HORSLEY:—Would God a better conformity to the example of his purity, than actually obtains, were to be found in the lives of nominal Christians! the numbers would be greater, which might entertain a reasonable hope that they shall be made like to Him when He appeareth. But thanks be to God, repentance, in this as in other cases, genuine, sincere repentance, shall stand the sinner in the stead of innocence: the sinner is allowed to wash the stains, even of these pollutions, in the Redeemer's blood.—M.]

[EZ. HOPKINS:—We shall see Him as He is: we must not understand it as if we could ever arrive to such a capacity as to see and know God as He is in His Infinite Essence: for God's Essence being altogether indivisible, to know God essentially, were to know Him comprehensively; to know Him, as much as He is to be known in Himself; that is, to know Him as much as He knows Himself; which is impossible, for no finite understanding can comprehend an infinite object. And, yet, our sight and knowledge of God shall so far surmount those dim and glimmering discoveries which here He makes of Himself to us, that, comparatively, the Apostle might well call it, a seeing Him as He is, and a knowing Him as we are known by Him.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Connection. The Apostle having traced the glory of the sonship up to the power (which it derives from hope in God) of working out self-purification, annexes v 4 with a more general antithesis which, as usual, contains a progression of the argument. The positive: "Every one that hath this hope purifieth himself;" is contrasted with the negative: "Every one that doeth sin, doeth lawlessness." He does not negatively resume the notion of the subject ("every one that hath this hope"), but that of the predicate ("purifieth himself"). However, by this annexation of the notion of the predicate he denies also, by implication, that such an one is the child and heir of God, and adds a new point, viz. such an one not only injures himself and his portion but he violates also the law and ordinance of God, at the same time, referring back to the leading thought in ch. ii. 29, since all doing of sin is repugnant to the righteousness of God revealed in the law (v. 4) and in Christ (vv. 5-7), and delineates rather the children of the devil (vv. 8-10), than the children of God, who, abiding in Christ, do righteousness and not sin (vv. 6, 9, 10).

V. 4. Every one that committeth sin, committeth also lawlessness.—"The Apostle is anxious to show that the truth of the thought is unexceptionable." (Huther.)—The first point to be determined here is the notion ἀμαρτία. Suidas derives ἀμαρτία from μάρπτω to grasp, to seize, consequently=missing the mark (Rom. xxi. 8, 802, 811, 23, 62); then moral omission. Oecumenius: ἀποτυχεῖν σκοποῦ, ἡ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ ἀποπτώσις, on the other hand ἀνομία=ἡ περὶ τὸν θεὸν νόμον πλημμέλεια (πλὴν=μέλος contrary to the melody, a false note, an error). Ἀμαρτία, of course, is as much an opposition to the Divine righteousness (ἀδικία), as a departure from the Divine law, a violation of the same (ἀνομία), and this ἡ ἀνομία is here not only a not having the law (as ἀνομος 1 Cor. ix. 21 denotes one who has not a law), but signifies the refractoriness opposed to the law. Neither ἀμαρτία nor ἀνομία are qualified by anything which would narrow this their meaning, nor may such a qualification be added from the context. Although the Article distinctly takes sin in the sense of an offence [old English: missing. M.] towards God, and ἀνομία as an opposition to the law of God, and removes all indefinite generality, yet no qualification within this ethico-religious sphere is admissible. But we must not attach too much importance to this, since the Article is wanting in v. 9: ἀμαρτίαν οὐ ποιεῖν and ποιεῖν τὴν ἀμαρτίαν and ἀμαρτάνειν (vv. 4, 6, 8, 9) are used promiscue, so that we must not attach too much importance to ποιεῖν. To this must be added that καὶ before τὴν ἀνομίαν conveys the idea that the doing of the ἀμαρτία is as such also as the doing of the ἀνομία. (Düsterdieck.) "Quisquis committit peccatum, idem committit iniquitatem." (Erasmus.) Kai must neither be taken in a causal sense, nor changed into "yes" (Brückner); but we have to hold with Ebrard that the fuller idea, ποιεῖν τὴν ἀμαρτίαν, in the beginning helps to qualify the other terms, ποιεῖν ἀμαρτίαν, and ἀμαρτάνειν, and that the antithesis ἀγνίζειν ἑαυτὸν is also coefficient, and that the reference, so far from being to sins of haste or infirmity, is rather to sin, though only a single act, yet a voluntary act. Hence the following explanations cannot be received: that ἀμαρτία denotes peccatum mortale (Estius and the Roman Catholics), or "grave, unrepented sins" (Luther, al.), or that ποιεῖν τὴν ἀμαρτίαν is=peccare contumaciter (Aretius), contra conscientiam et impenitenter (Rosenmüller), or peccato operam dare (Beza), peccare scientem et volentem (Spener), or the actual moral bias of life (Brückner). It is equally inadmissible to assume an intensification of the notion ἀμαρτία into ἀνομία (Baumgarten-Crusius, Bengel), or that ἀνομία includes crimes and vices proper, as if ἀμαρτία were the principle and source of the ἀνομία (de Wette). Paraphrases of ποιεῖν ἀνομίαν, such as Deum offendere (Grotius) and religioni adversari (Carpov), do incorrectly weaken the idea. The two ideas, although distinguished from each other, are not convertible. We have here the general proposition: "whoever doeth sin, of whatever kind it be, doeth also lawlessness, violates the Divine rule and order," which is not directed against Antinomians, but against all those who are loose on the subject of sin; the idea of ἀνομία imparts a peculiar severity to that of sin.

And sin is lawlessness.—We must of course take ἀμαρτία here in the same sense, as in the clause immediately preceding, and in the same generality. Hence the first ἀμαρτία is not sinful doings, and the second an offence against God (Köstlin). The Article also forbids our taking ἀμαρτία as the predicate of the subject ἀνομία, as in Jno. i. 1. Ὁ θεὸς ἦν ὁ λόγος (Köstlin). Ἀνομία also is as general here as in the preceding clause. Νόμος denotes not only the Mosaic law of the O. T. but also the law of the N. T. in Christ, and by Him explained in the word and exhibited in the life (ii. 16; ii. 7; iv. 21; v. 3. of Math. v. 17-19), as the law written in man's heart for his special direction; it embraces the whole complex of the divine ἐντολαί. Hence this proposition contains not so much a definition (Sander), as the nature of sin viewed from that side on which its absolute opposition to every Divine fellowship shows itself in the most decided form (Brückner): "the Apostle could not have more sharply drawn the contrast of the nature of a believer who is a τέκνον θεοῦ and will be ὁμοιος θεῷ than by declaring ἀμαρτία to be ἀνομία." (Huther); or he that leads an ungodly life, abrogates the Divine rule of life to which he is subject as a Christian (Hofmann). Hence Hilgenfeld's exposition disfigures the thought: "not every one who deviates from the ceremonial laws, but the sinner only falls under the category of ἀνομία." Calvin also goes far beyond the contents of the verse in affirming the sum and substance of the thought to be that the life of those who yield themselves to sin is hateful and unendurable to God.—The Apostle annexes the sentence with καὶ and not with ὅτι, because he thereby gives the thought a more independent form. We cannot agree with Bengel in explaining καὶ by imo, as if before there had been only conjuncta notio peccati et iniquitatis, but now eadem; the identity is already expressed in the first sentence.—[The following definitions will shed additional light on this passage. Ambrose: "Quid est peccatum nisi prævaricatio legis divinus, et celestium inobedientia præceptorum."—Augustine: "Peccatum est factum vel dictum vel concupitum aliquod contra æternam legem."—"Quid verum est, nisi ei Dominum dare præcepta, et animas liberæ esse voluntatis, et malum naturam non esse, sed esse aversionem a Dei præceptis?"—"Neque negandum est hoc Deum jubere, ut nos in faciendis justitiis esse debere perfectos, ut nullum habeamus omnino peccatum; nam neque peccatum erit, si quid erit, si non divinitus jubeatur, ut non sit."—M.]

Aid against sin. vv. 5. 6.

VER. 5. And ye know that He was manifested in order that He might take away our sin.—Appealing to their own consciousness, as at ch. ii. 12-14, 20, 27, the Apostle now refers to the Lord and affirms of Him two things: First: the purpose of His manifestation is the redemption from sin. Ἐκεῖνος denotes Christ, as in v. 8. It is wholly untenable to understand here the Gospel (Socinus, Episcopus, Grotius), concerning which it surely cannot be said that it ῥᾶς ἀπαρτίας αἰσεν, or that this is its end and aim.—Ἐκπερὶ ὧν the context requires us to apply to Christ's manifestation in the flesh. Cf. 1, 2. It points to Christ's previously hidden existence in heaven (Huther). The purpose of this manifestation is, ἵνα ῥᾶς ἀπαρτίας ἡμῶν αἰσεν. The reading ἡμῶν is well authenticated and intensifies the appeal to personal experience, without restricting the forgiveness of sins to those only who "suffer the beneficial purpose of the incarnation of the Son of God to be carried out on them in faith" (Düsterdieck), and to set back the universality of the Divine purpose of salvation (ch. ii. 2.); we would rather say that paracletic element, which after all is the main point here (v. 8), comes out more strongly; the oldate, at least, does not contain sufficient ground for finding here a specific indication of the doctrinal. Nor is there any necessity for extending ἡμῶν to all men (Spener). "The Plural, ῥᾶς ἀπαρτίας, affords a far more lucid and forcible view than if we had here, as in v. 4, ῥᾶς ἀπαρτίας; John does not take sin in its general character, but he adverts to all the forms of it." (Düsterdieck). It is wrong to explain it by peccati reatum, dominium, pœnam (J. Lange and others); but it signifies: the sins themselves. The αἰσεν connected here as at Jno. i. 29, with ἀπαρτία signifies in John's writings (Jno. xi. 48; xv. 2; xvii. 15; xix. 31, 38) auferre, to carry away, to take away. The ἀμνός, Jno. i. 29, the idea of the sacrificial lamb, implies what is expressed at 1 Pet. ii. 24, with reference to Is. liii. 4 sqq., by the verb ἀνάπερην: to take upon oneself by way of atonement, substitution, death and reconciliation, while αἰσεν indicated a taking away by sanctification; Jno. i. 29 we have a blending of both meanings, while Peter adverts to one, the first, and John to the other, the second work of Christ, the former to His atonement, the latter to His work of redemption. John, who discusses the former at ch. ii. 2, dwells here upon the latter, and hence denies neither; nor does he separate the one from the other, as if the first were without this consequence, and the latter without that cause (ch. i. 7; iv. 9, 11; v. 6). But the context with its ethical import, that sin must be avoided and shunned, suggests the reference to the fact that Christ came for the purpose of removing sin, of taking it away from us; what Christian would then oppose or frustrate the design of Christ! Hence Oecumenius correctly observes that Christ came ἐν ἀναπέσει τῆς ἀπαρτίας (so also Luther, Calvin, Neander, Ebrard, Düsterdieck, Huther, and al.).—Bede's remark, "Tollit peccata et dimittendo, quæ facta sunt, et adjuvando, ne fiant, et perducendo ad vitam, ubi fieri omnino non possunt," is perfectly true, but considerably transcends the measure of what is contained in this passage. The same applies to those who combine here said two references, e. g. Spener, Bengel (explains indeed "tolleret," but refers to his exposition of Jno. i. 29: "primum a mundo in se recepit, deinde a se ipso devolvit peccati sarcinam"), Lücke (in his 1st ed.), Sander, Besser.—Lücke (in the later edition), de Wette and others take αἰσεν=carry; false!

Secondly: He is sinless.

And sin is not in Him.—Καὶ coördinatedes this clause with the former. Oecumenius errs in his καὶ ἀντὶ τοῦ ὁμοῦ as well as in the paraphrase: καθ' ὅτι ἀμέτοχος ἦν ἀπαρτίας. So also Augustine: "In quo non est peccatum, ipse venit auferre peccatum; nam si esset et in illo peccatum, auferendum esset illi, non ipse auferret," and a Lapidé: "Ideo Christus potens fuit tollere peccatum, quia carabat omni peccato, imo potestate peccandi." So also Sander, Neander and al. Ἐστὶ also must be retained and is not to be taken in the sense of ἦν Oecumenius, Grotius: "peccatum in eo non erat, nempe, cum vitam mortalem ageret," and al.); the reference here, as in v. 8, is "to the nature of Christ in its eternal consistence" [Huther]. Hence we may not say with Winer (p. 283) that "the sinlessness of Christ is considered as still present in faith." Ἐν αὐτῷ, the reference of which has always to be determined by the context, denotes Christ understood in ἐκεῖνος, it denotes Christ Himself as to His Person and not (as Calov supposes) totum corpus, the Church, or as if we ought to explain ἐν αὐτῷ by ἐν κοινωνίᾳ μετ' αὐτῶν. Thus the clause "and sin is not in Him" coördinated with that preceding it, is the foundation of the sequel, since the Sinless, Pure and Righteous One is held up not as an example or pattern, but as the vital power and element of life in which the Christian must be and abide.

VER. 6. Every one that abideth in Him sinneth not.—By all means retain the full force of μένειν ἐν αὐτῷ to be and abide in Him, to derive nourishment from Him and His life (ch. i. 3. 6; ii. 5. 6; 28 sq.; 27 sq.), and do not exchange it for credere in Christum, or weaken it into Christi discipulum esse (Semler and al.); nor is ἀναπράξεν to be taken as = persistere in peccato (Luther), sinere regnare peccatum (Hunnius), sceleratum esse (Capellus), peccata mortalia committere (Roman Catholics), and to be thus enforced. The Apostle sets forth "abiding in Christ and sinning as irreconcilable opposites; but he does not mean to say that believing Christians entirely cease to sin or that those, who are yet sinning, are not yet in Christ (ch. i. 8-10; ii. 1, 2; iii. 3)" (Huther). "John is here dealing with realities and about to give us the signs whereby we may know whether we love the Lord or not, whether we are the children of God or of the wicked one" (Sander). Hence it is rather hazardous to refer here with de Wette and Dürst dieck to the Apostle's ideal mode of representation, and a misapprehension of the fact that the Christian, though he sins, is yet free from sin, has actually parted company with it, and it is his properly Christian and inmost being in decided opposition to it, so that not sin, but his opposition to it (as something alien to his being), determines the conduct of his life, exactly as St. Paul puts it (Rom. vii. 17): "νυνὶ δὲ οὐκ ἐστὶ ἐνδὸν κατεργάζεσθαι αὐτῷ, ἀλλ' ἡ οἰκονομία ἐν τοῖς ἀμάρτιαις." Augustine: "Etsi infirmitate labitur, peccato tamen non consentit, quia potius gemendo luctatur."—"In quantum in ipso manet, in tantum non peccat." Besser excellently says: "A Christian does not sin, but suffers it."

Every one that sinneth hath not seen Him, neither known Him.—As usual John turns the thought and develops it by an antithesis. The verb ἀμαρτάνειν has the same sense as in the preceding clause; actual sinning in word, or work or in the thought of the heart. Of such an one he says quite generally οὐχ ἑώρακεν αὐτὸν οὐδὲ ἔγνωκεν αὐτὸν. First of all we have to take οὐδὲ disjunctively (Winer, p. 509 sq.); and although this does not decide the question which of the two verbs ὁρᾶν and γινώσκειν is the stronger and more important, yet it does indicate that they are different from each other. The pronoun αὐτὸν requires us to think in both verbs of the Person of Christ. Hence the sentence: ἀμαρτία ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν is not the object of ὁρᾶν, nor is the sentence: ἐπαγγελίᾳ ἵνα τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἄρῃ the object of γινώσκειν, in order to indicate the purpose of the whole redemptive work of Christ (Rickli, Neander). Ὁρᾶν, to see, physically (ch. i. 1, 8; iv. 20; Jno. i. 18; vi. 36, 46; viii. 57; ix. 37; xv. 24), spiritually (8 Jno. 11; Jno. iii. 11, 32; vi. 46; viii. 88; xiv. 7, 9), and that directly and immediately if used of Christ in heaven, or indirectly and mediately if applied to believers in consequence of their illumination,—denotes consequently in this passage "seeing Christ," "when we become absolutely conscious of the glory of Christ so that our spiritual eye beholds Him as He is in the totality of His Essence" (Huther); γινώσκειν means to know as the result of searching contemplation of His word, His life, the history of His kingdom, or of one's own experience in the life around us, or within ourselves, and indicates here "the right understanding of Him," brought about by said instrumentality, "so that we have become fully conscious both of His Nature and of His relation to us" (Huther). This intimates already that in the case of the former, viz. spiritual intuition and contemplation, the efficient agency belongs more to the object which represents itself before the eye of the spirit, and that in the case of the latter, viz. knowledge acquired by reflection in the way of reasoning and inquiry, the efficient agency belongs more to the subject, which makes it the object of contemplation (Sander, Huther). Hence it follows that ἑώρακεν is not something less, and οὐδὲ—"much less" (Sander, Lücke 1st ed. al.), nor something more than ἔγνωκεν and οὐδὲ—"and not even" (Socinus, Neander and al.); there is no reference whatever to a difference in degree. Although despite all their difference the two have something in common, we cannot, because of this latter circumstance, overlook or under-rate the former [the difference] and say with Dürst dieck that the two notions are essentially equal and that ἔγνωκεν is simply added in order to indicate the spiritual import of ἑώρακεν. Of course it is impossible to interpret (with Lücke) ὁρᾶν of outward knowledge in spite of which one may sin, and γινώσκειν of real, spiritual knowledge. This connection is analogous to that of πιστεύειν and γινώσκειν (ch. iv. 16; Jno. vi. 69), so that ὁρᾶν and πιστεύειν might be combined yet so as to keep up the difference of πιστεύειν—ἄρῃ from γινώσκειν. The force of these notions is very shallow in the explanation of Grotius: "Negue de Christo sic cogitat, ut oportet, neque facit ostendit, se scire, quanti sit habenda Christi voluntas."—The Perfects, ἑώρακεν, ἔγνωκεν are to be preserved; they point to the past when the beginning of seeing and knowing took place, yet so that that which had its beginning in the past still acts and continues in the present, which is especially noticed by Erasmus (cognitum habet), Lücke, Brückner, Dürst dieck and Huther. It is wholly unwarranted to take the Perfect in the sense of the Present (Didymus: "non videt eum;" Augustine: "non credit;" Bede, Grotius, Estius, who construes the Perfect as a Hebraism for the Present). John's idea therefore is this: Every one that sinneth, and that while he is sinning, is one in whom seeing and knowing Christ is a fact of the past, but without continuing to act and to last to the present. Hence Bengel says not amiss: "In ipso peccati momento talis fit, ac tunc nullo viderit modo."—Instructive is the reference to ch. ii. 19 (J. Lange, Sander) and the comparison with Matth. vii. 23: οὐκ ἔγνωτε ἔργον ὑμῶν (i. e. as mine). The reference is, as the ancients rightly observe, to an efficax scientia (Didymus), an affectiva et dilectiva (Estius), although Lyra goes as much beyond the mark with his fides formata caritate, as Ebrard with his loving knowledge, or S. G. Lange with his γινώσκειν—amara. [Ignatius, the disciple of John, says: "No one who professeth faith, sinneth; and no one who hath love, hateth. They, who profess themselves Christians, will be manifested by what they do." (Ignatius, ad Eph.; also Jerome in Jovin. ii. 1, and contra Pelagianos I. 3).—M.]

VER. 7. Little children, let no one seduce you.—This impressive address, (unchanged whether we read radia or rexvia) introduces an admonition in respect of the clearly-perceived and ruin-fraught danger, unless they avail themselves of the aid provided in their glorious Lord and Saviour. The Apostle speaks of ἐαυτοῦς πλανώμεν, ch. i. 8. Here, however, he adverts not to self-deception, but refers "in matters affecting the energizing and outwardly operative exhibition of the Divine life" (Dürst dieck), to deception and seductions coming from without, not springing from relations and events, but from men (ὑπόδει), who are more dangerous by far than relations or events. But there is no reason why we should think here of distinct forms of error, say e. g. those of the antinomian Gnostics (Dürst dieck, Huther). [On the other hand Ebrard and Wordsworth see here an unmistakable reference to the Gnostics. The latter observes: "that these verses cannot be understood without reference to their tenets and practices," and then mentions the followers of Simon Magus, who said that they could please God without righteousness, and that whatever might be the case with others, who had not their spiritual gnōsis, they themselves had no need to work righteousness, but that they would be saved by grace, whatever their works might be. "Liberos agere quæ velint; secundum enim ipsius (Simonis) gratiam salvari homines, sed non secundum operas justas." Irenæus I. 20 ed. Græbe. Hippolytus, Philosoph. p. 175; Theodoret, Haer. fab. i. 1, who testifies that on the presumption of the indefectibility of special grace within themselves, they fell into all kinds of lasciviousness."—M. J.—This admonition is in point of form like 1 Tim. iv. 12; Tit. ii. 15, in point of sense like μη πλανᾶσθε, 1 Cor. vi. 9; 15-33; Luke xxi. 8. But that form at the same time exhibits a more lively sense of danger.

He that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as He is righteous.—On δικαιοσύνην ποιεῖν and δικαίος, see notes on ch. ii. 29. The Apostle does not say here πᾶς ὁ ποιῶν, but only ὁ ποιῶν; the idea of unexceptional universality makes room for the importance of the fact. Instead of the predicate ἐώρακε αὐτὸν καὶ ἔγνωκεν αὐτόν (v. 8), or μύνην ἐν αὐτῷ (v. 5), or ἐξ αὐτοῦ γεγεννηται (ch. ii. 29), there follows, as usual with the addition of a new particular, the consequence thereof, viz.: δικαίος ἔστιν, either with reference to ἄνθρωποι αὐτῷ ἐσόμεθα (v. 2) or in order to denote the corresponding attitude towards the law. It is evident that the predicate is not acquired after that which is affirmed in the subject-sentence has taken place; the predicate is immanent in the subject, the nature of the righteous appears from his doing righteousness, it is already in its existence and does not only become so, as held by the Roman Catholics (Lyra, Emser, Estius, al.), and the Socinians, Arminians and Rationalists (Socinus, Grotius, al.) against the Protestants (Luther, Calvin). "He that doeth not righteousness, proves thereby that he is not righteous" (Huther). [Compare the words of Ignatius in the last note on v. 6. M.] The additional clause refers to the righteousness of Christ, as manifesting the righteousness of God and standing out as a bright pattern. The Apostle once more uses ἐκείνος, although the previous αὐτός designated Christ, so that he might have put αὐτός without giving rise to misunderstanding, and thus have absolutely removed any and every want of clearness, that αὐτός in ch. ii. 29 had reference to Christ. By Him the Christian should ever measure and adjust himself. Baumgarten-Crusius's explanation is altogether irrelevant; viz.: "he that is good, follows the example of Christ," or "he only that hath been righteous through Christ, doeth righteousness." [Huther justly observes, that as there is no reference whatever to justification in this passage, a Lapid's assertion, that the thought of this verse contradicts the Protestant Dogma of justification by faith, is altogether futile. The explanation of Lortius also, that "ὁ ποιῶν τὴν δικαιοσύνην is —qui habet in se justitiam, i. e. opus gratiæ, videlicet virtutem infusam," is manifestly false.—M. J.]

Vers. 8. He that committeth sin, is of the devil.—This is the progressive antithesis. On ὁ ποιῶν τὴν ἀμαρτίαν compare note on v. 4. It is "the more significant and precise" expression for ἀμαρτάνειν v. 6 (Düsterdieck). Of such an one John does not say: ἀδικός ἐστι but ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν and thus states the final cause of the thought. The phrase ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου εἶναι must be interpreted after the analogy of ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ εἶναι (cf. on ch. ii. 16), and this is the more incumbent upon us because verse 10 specifies τὰ τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ and τὰ τέκνα τοῦ διαβόλου, and the paternal name is actually given to Satan at Jno. viii. 44. Still there is wanting an analogy to γεννηθῆσθαι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ (cf. on ch. ii. 29) both for the adherents of the devil and the κόσμος, although we have ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου εἶναι at ch. ii. 16 and οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου at Luke xvi. 8. Hence, although ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου εἶναι contains no reference to a regeneration from beneath,—as if the devil had created the sinner, into whom he has only infused evil (Rusmeyer), so that the Apostle adverts simply to corruptio and not to generatio (Bengel), and that consequently the phrase must be construed ethically and not physically (so that we cannot say τέκνον τοῦ διαβόλου in the same sense and with the same right as we say τέκνον θεοῦ, see note on v. 10a),—yet are we obliged to think of an origin from the devil and of a sameness in kind and an intimate union with the devil as well as of an inheritance of woe in hell to be meted out to the devil and his adherents, and to reject the volatilization of the idea by perversion into a mere belonging to (de Wette), following (Semler), resembling and spiritual affinity with the devil (Grotius, Socinus, al.). Nor does the analogy warrant the assertion that it is not at all necessary to assume John to believe the existence of the devil, that this is only a mode of representation current among heretical Jewish Christians (Semler), or a Jewish formula of teaching without all dogmatical importance, or used only for the purpose of intensifying the idea of sin as hostility to God (Baumgarten-Crusius). See no. 4 below in "Doctrinal and Ethical."

Because the devil sinneth from the beginning.—The connection by ὅτι specifies the reason of the sentence, "He that doeth sin is of the devil;" hence the reference is to man's sinning and his relation to the devil. For this reason ἀπ' ἀρχῆς emphatically put first, is to be interpreted of the beginning of man's sinning, like Jno. viii. 44, and the Apostle declares that from that beginning the devil has been showing himself as the sinner [the sinning one], he is not only a sinner in himself, but he did also bring about the first sin of man as a seducer, and not the first sin only, but he does bring about every sin even until now (the Present ἀμαρτάνει); sinning is his work from the beginning. Bengel: "Omniū peccatorum causa est; nunquam satiatur." Hence there is no reference here to the beginning of the devil's existence from the creation of the world (Bede; for that would contradict Jno. viii. 44, ὃν ἐστηκεν), or to the beginning of the creation of the earth and the solar system (Estius), or to the beginning of the res humanæ (Semler), or to the beginning of the devil's fall (Calvin, Calov, Bengel: "Ex quo diabolus est diabolus; minime diu tenuisse videtur statum primum," Neander, Sander and others.). Nor may we interpret ἀμαρτάνει like Bengel: "Peccat et ad peccandum inducit," but rather compare Rom. vii. 17. The influsus, suggestio, inspiratio, directio, coöperatio of the devil (Calov) lie not in the verb ἀμαρτάνει, but in the whole context: because the devil has sinned from the beginning and goes on sinning, every one that is sinning is of the devil; for the real connection of the person sinning with the devil or of the devil with the person sinning, is here evidently presumed, yet so that the first proposition describes the state of the sinner as essentially belonging to the sphere of the devil's life and kingdom, while the second proposition, connected with the former by ὅτι, marks the continuing activity of the devil, so that the latter is the cause of the former.

For this was the Son of God manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil.—Bengel: "Diabolus peccandi finem non facit; peccatum solvere filii dei opus est." Without using a conjunction the Apostle rapidly and in terse language specifies with sharpness and distinctness of outline the antithesis: διάβολος—υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ; ἐκείνος would have been too weak and inadequate here, and contrasts the hidden seduction of Satan with the manifestation (ἐφανερώθη) of the Son of God for the destruction of the works of the devil (Jno. xii. 31; xvi. 11; Matth. xii. 29; Luke x. 18). He is not only δικαίος (v. 7) but He also destroys sins (λύση). This is the end of His coming, as in v. 5: αἰρεῖν τὰς ἀμαρτίας is parallel to λῦειν τὰ ἔργα τοῦ διαβόλου. The last expression consequently denotes sins and, with reference to διάβολος ἀμαρτάνει, as the works of the devil who committeth them. Hence the reference is here to the ἔργα τοῦ διαβόλου, sins, not to the wages of sin—affliction, death, condemnation (Calov, Spener). For these are rather the works of God who is righteous and decrees the penalty, and only by way of consequence the object of the redemptive work of Christ, but not the object of λῦειν. This verb signifies the destruction of a building (Jno. ii. 19; 2 Pet. iii. 10–12), or of a ship (Acts xvii. 41) and also the loosing of chains (Acts xxii. 30). Bengel: ("Opera confortissima quæ solvere res digna erat filio Dei"), Spener, Besser and others retain the sense of "loosening, untying," as if sins were the cords or bands of Satan; but this is manifestly a departure from the plain sense of the words and although useful for practical purposes, a rather artificial interpretation. Since nothing is said here of the three offices of Christ concurring in this work, or how that concurrence is to take place, the text neither authorizes us to assume that the officium sacerdotale and the officium regium without the officium propheticum will be engaged in the destruction of the works of the devil and to think only of the passion of our Lord, nor to infer anything for or against that sentence from "Etiamsi Adam non peccasset, Christus incarnatus esset." Besides, John adverts only, as he had written (ἐφανερώθη—λύση), "to what Christ did purpose and achieve by His manifestation in the flesh" (Düsterdieck), without intending to describe or even to deny the continuous victory of Christ; he refers to that ch. i. 7; ii. 1, 2, 13, 14; iv. 4, 14; v. 5, but not primarily here. [Ignatius, the disciple of John, uses λῦειν in the sense of the text, viz., the destruction of evil, ad Eph. i. 3, 19, λύεται ὁλόκληρος, ἔλβeto πᾶσα μάγια.—M.]

V. 9. Every one that is born of God, doth not commit sin, because his seed abideth in him.—This is the antithesis of v. 8a, and ὅτι here like there denotes the reason why; the structure of the sentences too is alike, with the sole difference that by the usual inversion the subjects and predicates have changed places. Ὁ γεγεννημένος ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ὁππότε ἐκ διαβόλου ἔσται, ἀμαρτίαν οὐ ποιεῖ ὁππότε δὲ ποιεῖ τὴν ἀμαρτίαν, ὅτι ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ὁ διάβολος ἀμαρτάνει ὁππότε δὲ σπέρμα αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ μένει. Thus John contrasts sinning in its extreme and inmost nature with the children of God in the possession of their highest and most glorious gift and an attitude conformable thereto. ἵνα denotes the general character of the sense. We know from ch. ii. 29; iii. 6, that being born of God, doing righteousness or not sinning belong together and that the former is incompatible with the commission of sin. Cf. ch. i. 5. Hence ἀμαρτίαν stands emphatically in ante-position; the Apostle regards sin as devilish, and righteousness as divine; and hence righteousness and sin are as absolutely and diametrically opposed to each other as are God and the devil. The clause annexed by ὅτι specifies the reason why one born of God does not commit sin, and being parallel to the similar clause in v. 8, sheds a light on the latter in confirmation of the interpretation given here. The reference of σπέρμα αὐτοῦ to θεοῦ is obvious. The seed of God necessarily denotes something that proceeds from God, is instinct with vital power and full of life, develops itself, blossoms and bears fruit, and begets the Divine. We cannot see here a reference to the word of God (with Clement of Alex., Augustine, Bede, Luther, Calov, Spener, Bengel, Besser, Socinus, Grotius and others), notwithstanding Matth. xiii. 8 sqq.; Jas. i. 18; 1 Pet. i. 23; cf. 1 Cor. iv. 15; Gal. iv. 19, because that simile from the vegetable kingdom does not answer to the reference to begetting and birth, and because the Word of God or the Gospel in other passages is mentioned only as the instrument of begetting, as a carrier and conductor of the Divine σπέρμα, but not the σπέρμα itself. [Alford, who takes the view impugned here, says: "But whether we regard the generation of plants, or animal procreation, which latter is more in question here, what words can more accurately describe the office of the seed, than these? And what is the word of God but the continually abiding and working seed of the new life in the child of God? Nay, it seems to be that exactly of which we are in search: not the Holy Spirit, the personal agent; not the power of the new life, the thing begotten; but just that which intervenes between the two, the word, the utterance of God,—dropt into the soul of man, taking it up by Divine power into itself, and developing the new life continually. This is in the most precise and satisfactory sense the σπέρμα τοῦ θεοῦ; and in this all Scripture symbolism is agreed: cf. 1 Pet. i. 23; Jas. i. 18. In fact, the very passage which is the key to this, is Jno. v. 88, τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἔχετε μένοντα ἐν ὑμῖν. Nor should any exception have been taken by Huther and Düsterdieck to the comparison with the parable of the sower ("wie viele ältre Ausleger mit ungeschickter Vergleichung von Matth. xiii. 8 sqq." Düsterdieck), for though the attendant circumstances of generation are different, the analogy is the same."—M.] It follows from this that the reference is to the Spirit of God, even the Holy Spirit, who communicates Himself in and of His own. Hence σπέρμα must not be applied to His whole Person but as the πνεῦμα radiating from Him which is at once He Himself and His gift, a gift from Him and of His Nature. This construction is rendered imperative by ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ in the final and substantiating clause of this verse which runs parallel to σπέρμα. Just as one who is born of God is not on that account God and has not like Christ the fulness of God bodily indwelling, so σπέρμα is not the full Person of the Spirit of God, of the Holy Spirit, but something that comes forth from His Being, which, while it cannot be separated from Him, must be distinguished from Him. Therefore we have to say with the Greek expositors that σπέρμα is πνεῦμα νοητίας, τὸ πνευματικὸν χάρισμα, the Spiritus Sanctus et ejus virtus (Calvin, Beza, Düsterdieck), nativitas spiritalis (Estius), vires regenerationis (S. Schmidt), Divine life-powers (de Wette, Neander), the πνεῦμα begotten of the Holy Spirit (Sander), the germ of the new life, of the new man, Christ implanted in us (Ebrard, Lücke, Huther). But it is not σπέρμα as analogous to σπέρμα—ἐκ τούτου (Bengel):

"semen dei i. e. qui natus est ex deo", or "semen quasi divinum" (Semler), the formative principle of the good (Paulus), or religion (Fritzsche).—It is important to recollect that while μύει is used of σπέρμα, μύει is also said of the believer (v. 6), and that he is bidden notwithstanding: μύετε (ch. ii. 28). On this account, and because the reference is not to a full ear of grain gathered in the barn, but to σπέρμα cast into the earth destined to grow under the influence of all kinds of weather, we need not suppose, that therefore it must abide and could neither be lost again nor perish. Nothing is said on this point, it is neither affirmed nor denied, and therefore we are not warranted to introduce or assume it here: the subject in question is simply and solely that in the σπέρμα and its abiding in conformity with its nature, the child of God receives the power of not committing sin. Although we cannot explain ἐν by ἐφ' ὅσον as if it were—quantum, quamdiu, quatenus, it is involved in the thought (The Greek, R. Catholic and Evangelical commentators).

And he cannot sin, because he is born of God.—Now the Apostle adds the most important particular, viz., his inability of sinning on the ground of his having been born of God, with which St. John began, as he now concludes this section. With reference to the seed of God abiding in the child of God, he now asserts the absolute contrariety of a child of God and sinning in the words: ὁ δύναται ἀμαρτάνειν. Non potest peccare is at all events much stronger and more than potest non peccare; it declares not the possibility of not sinning, but the impossibility of sinning. A servant of sin has become a servant of righteousness (Rom. vi. 16-23); in virtue of the seed of God abiding in him he only wills and only can do the Divine, righteousness (Düsterdieck and most expositors); hence ἀμαρτάνειν must neither be intensified into "committing mortal sins" (the Romanists), to sin diabolically (Besser), to sin deliberately and intentionally (Ebrard), nor be limited to hating the brethren (Augustine, Bede), nor must ὁ δύναται be weakened into segre, difficulter est (Grotius, "res aliena est ab ejus ingenio," Paulus, "his whole spiritual nature and HABIT resist it"). Nor must it be changed into ὁ βούλεται (the Greek commentators) or non debet. Nor is this declaration of the Apostle only a goal and standard far above the reality of the Christian life on earth, only of relative importance and without reality. Bengel: "Res se habet, ut in abstemio, qui non potest vinum bibere, et in variis antipathie generibus." On the substantiating clause Bengel strikingly observes: "priora verba ex deo majorem habent in pronunciendo accentum; quod ubi observatur, patet, non idem per idem probari, collato initio versus." Because he is born of God, he that is born of God cannot sin; the child of God cannot sin, because it is the child of God. Very pertinent also is the note of Luther: "In summa nos Christiani nascimur, nec fuco quodam aut specie, sed ipsa natura sumus Christiani, quare non est possibile ut peccemus." [Wordsworth: "He that hath been born of God, and liveth as a son of God cannot be a sinner. It is inconsistent with the essential condition of his spiritual birth, by which he is dead to sin. It is contrary to the nature which he has as a child of God. This is well expressed by Didymus here, who says, 'St. John does not assert that the man who has been born of God will never commit sin; but he asserts that he does not work sin.—Non scriptum est non peccabit, sed non peccatum facit, non idem est peccare et peccatum facere; a child of two days old, by reason of his natural childhood, cannot sin, but a child of God cannot be a sinner.' This distinction he draws from the difference between the Present Infinite and the Aorist Infinite; see Winer § 44, p. 346, 348, 349, who quotes from Stallbaum, Plat. Euthyd., p. 140: "Aoristus (Infinit.) quia nullam facit significationem perpetuitatis et continuationis, prouti vel initium vel progressus vel finis actionis verbo expressè spectatur, ita solet usurpari, ut dicatur vel de eo, quod statim et e vestigio fit ideoque etiam certo futurum est, vel de re semel tantum eveniente, quæ diurnitatis et perpetuitatis cogitationem aut non fert aut certe non requirit, vel denique de re brevi et uno veluti temporis ictu peracta." Thus e. g. πιστεύσαι is to make a profession of faith, or an act of faith, at a particular time; but πιστεύειν is to believe, to be a believer; δουλεύσαι is to do an act of service, δουλέειν, to be a slave; οὐδεὶς οὐκ ἐπὶ δύναται δουλοῦσθαι, no servant can be a slave to two masters; so ἀμαρτάνειν is to commit a sin, but ἀμαρτάνειν is much more than this, it is to be a sinner."

Ignatius, ad. Eph. 8 says: "Let no one deceive you. They who are carnal cannot do the things which are spiritual; nor can they who are spiritual do the things which are carnal. Faith cannot do the works of unbelief, nor can unbelief do the works of faith. The works which ye do in the flesh are spiritual, because ye work all your works in Jesus Christ."—M.]

Conclusion. v. 10a.

V. 10a. In this are manifest the children of God and the children of the de-vii.—Ἐν τούτῳ refers back to the preceding. Cf. on ch. ii. 3. The point under notice is ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ and ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου εἶναι. This is apparent in the doing of righteousness or in the working of sin, the sinner entangling himself in sin, as a child of the devil, while the believer, as being born of God, resists it. Being a child of God or a child of the devil is hidden and manifest in doing. Hence this clause must not be referred to the sequel (Grotius, Spener, Ebrard and others) as there is not the least occasion for it; de Wette, Sander, and others leave this point undetermined. It is not said here to whom τὰ τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ and τὰ τέκνα τοῦ διαβόλου φανερὰ ἔστιν, but v. 1 (κόσμος οὐ γινώσκει ἡμᾶς) renders it certain that it is not manifest to the world but only to the Christian. That difference is only manifest in the light of the divine κρίσις, the uncritical world blends together and confounds good and evil, God and the devil (Lücke, Sander). "To the children of the devil their own moral nature remains a mystery until they accept the judgment of the Holy Spirit and through the divine seed are born of God and become the children of God." Cf. Matth. vii. 16–21; Luke vi. 43–46.—The phrase τὰ τέκνα τοῦ διαβόλου occurs only here in the New Testament although we encounter the following variations: ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ διαβόλου said of Elymas Bar-Jesus, Acts xiii. 10; ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας said of Judas, Jno. xvii. 12; and ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπειθείας and τέκνα φέσκει ὀργῆς, Eph. ii. 3, instead of which τέκνον τοῦ διαβόλου might have been used, if that expression had not been studiously avoided in order to prevent the misunderstanding that we might as well speak of a birth (out) of the devil as of a birth (out) of God (see notes on v. 8) and in order not to give nourishment to the dualistic notion that their conversion or regeneration is impossible, to intimate, on the contrary, that it is more probable to see a child of the devil become a child of God than a child of God become a child of the devil. But it cannot be inferred from these different expressions that the terms τὰ τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ and τὰ τέκνα τοῦ διαβόλου denote the two extremes between which other men are found. This antithesis embraces rather the totality of mankind just as ἀμαρτάνειν and οὐχ ἀμαρτάνειν comprise the whole attitude of men. Socinus is surely right: "Ex apostoli verbis satis aperte colligi potest, quod inter filios dei et filios diaboli nulli sint homines medii."

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The nature of sin. The word ἀμαρτία while indicating aberration from the right way, the right goal, the straight direction and order does not tell us wherefrom said aberration takes place. On this account the word ἀνομία is added. It is evident that sin is in direct antagonism to the νόμος, the divine ordinance. Hofmann pertinently compares 2 Thes. ii. 7 (Schriftbeweis I., 487). The first thing is that sin contradicts the divine ordinance. The extent of ἀνομία is also that of ἀμαρτία; whatever does not accord with the divine ordinance of life, be it little or small or as it please, is ἀμαρτία, which is always to be regarded primarily as an injury done to God who has appointed the νόμος. Hence the notion of guilt adheres at all events to the notion of sin, although the sinner be not conscious of it at the time or soon after the act; the sense of guilt is sure to come sooner or later, but invariably with the knowledge of sin, even as David expresses it: "Against thee only, have I sinned" (Ps. li. 4) and St. Paul ἐπιδόκω τῷ θεῷ (Rom. iii. 19). The injury done to one's own soul which lies at the bottom of ἀνίψεν ἑαυτὸν, and is declared in τῇρῃ αὐτὸν as contrasted (ἀλλὰ) with ἀμαρτάνειν is likewise the reason why the sinner is outside of fellowship with Christ who is life, gives life and takes away sin.

[Pearson (p. 639) says: "The law of God is the rule of the actions of men, and any aberration from that rule is sin: the law of God is pure and whatsoever is contrary to the law is impure. Whatsoever therefore is done by man, or is in man, having any contrariety or opposition to the law of God, is sin. Every action, every word, every thought, against the law, is a sin of omission, as it is terminated to an object dissonant from, and contrary to, the prohibition of the law, as a negative precept. Every omission of a duty required of us is a sin, as being contrary to the commanding part of the law, or an affirmative precept. Every evil habit contracted in the soul of man by the actions committed against the law of God, is a sin constituting a man truly a sinner, even then, when he actually sinneth not. Any corruption and inclination in the soul, to do that which God forbiddeth, and to omit that which God commandeth, howsoever such corruption and evil inclination came into the soul, whether by an act of his own will, or by the act of the will of another, is a sin, as being something dissonant from, and repugnant to the law of God. And this I conceive sufficient to declare the nature of sin."—M.]

2. The nature of righteousness, as the opposite of sin, is therefore a conduct consonant with the νόμος, a doing regulated by the divine ordinances of life, from the work of our hands to the act of thinking and the power of the will.

3. The corruption of sin is manifest in that it entangles men in a relation to Satan which at once defines his attitude and shows itself in it. It comes from Satan and is the act of Satan, so that living in sin and the working of sin are evidences of the sinner's dependence on the devil, his appurtenance and similarity of nature to the devil. Although man's sin is the sin of the seduced, in virtue of such seduction he is yet as much doomed to the power of the kingdom of the Evil One as he is guilty before God; and he that ought and might have become a child of God, has become a child of the devil. As surely as fellowship with God and righteousness are gained in Christ, so surely does sin evidence fellowship with the devil.

4. Satan is a person, opposed to God, the opposite of God and not only of Christ, who came to take away sin and to destroy the works of the devil. Strauss (Dogmatik II. 15) justly observes: "The whole idea of Messiah and His kingdom is as impossible without its counterpart of a kingdom of demons with a personal head, as the north pole of a magnet without the south pole. If Christ came to destroy the works of the devil, there was no necessity for His coming if there was no devil; if there is a devil, but only as the personification of the principle of evil—well, then we ought also to be satisfied with a Christ as an impersonal idea." Besides to deny the existence and personality of the devil is to give up the personality of God Himself. God would be the Absolute and not the absolute Personality, if in this Johannean complex of ideas we are permitted to understand Satan to be only a principle, though it be the cosmical.—But there are here no data whatsoever for a dualistic conception. Two things are certain; First: the devil's opposition to God cannot be so construed as to give the devil the character of the contestant counter-god from all eternity and to divest him of the attributes of the creature; the text contains no warranty for either; the purpose of Christ's manifestation and the circumstance that this purpose must be supposed to be fully accomplished and accomplishing in all essential points, warrant us rather to conclude that said true assumptions, as a perfectly dualistic opposition of the devil and God, are incompatible with the fundamental views of the Apostle. Secondly: it cannot be inferred from this passage that men are naturally and essentially devilish. For John plainly declares that not the devil's nature (to which he does not make the faintest allusion), but the devil's work shows itself in the sins of men and that Christ came not to destroy the nature of the devil but to destroy the works of the devil. Nor must it be overlooked that, as contrasted with the terms γεννημένος ἐν τοῦ θεοῦ, σπέρμα θεοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ, ἐκ θεοῦ εἶναι, ἐκ αὐτοῦ μένων, τέκνον θεοῦ, the Apostle is very sparing in his reference to the devil and does not go beyond saying ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου εἶναι and τέκνον τοῦ διαβόλου, opposing the latter term, as it were by constraint, to the phrase "child of God," so that Augustine justly refers to an imitari diabolium, observing: "Omnes peccatores ex diabolo nati sunt, in quantum peccatores. Adam a deo factus est, sed quando consensit diabolo, ex diabolo natus est, et tales omnes genuit qualis erat." There is not the faintest intimation for the supposition that man does not sin of his own will, not voluntaria but naturaliter, and that the sin which he commits is not his fault, but solely the devil's fault; the contrary is evident from the exhortation in v. 7 and the paradoxical tendency which lies at the bottom of the whole. Neither dualism nor determinism can be deduced from this passage. But concerning subjection and personal transactions reference is made to cosmical powers in God the Father with the Son and in the devil, as the ultimate and chief factors of all personal development.

5. The work of Satan is sin, and sin from the beginning, i. e. from the beginning of sin on the part of mankind, which is the only subject under notice here. Hence he is most truly the sinner, the original sinner. As he was actively engaged in the first sin, so he still is actively engaged in every sin. But beyond this fact nothing is said as to the nature of his activity, as to its concurrence with that of man which is not excluded, and as to the manner how sin comes to pass. But it is intimated that contrary to Christ who was manifested and did appear in order to destroy the works of the devil, the devil was not manifested but remained and continued to walk in concealment, and that the children of God and the children of the devil cannot be identified at once, even as the world (which knows neither God nor the children of God (v. 1), nor itself) does not discover the devil's work in its own sin; for the reference is to πνευματικὰ τῆς πονηρίας (Eph. vi. 12). It is just the man, who, as St. James says (ch. i. 14 sq.), is incited and enticed by his own lust (ὑπὸ τῆς ἰδίας ἐπιθυμίας ἐξελαόμενος καὶ δαλεαζόμενος) and commits sin without an inward struggle, without offering any resistance, in a calm course of development (ἡ ἐπιθυμία συλλάβουσα τίκτει τὴν ἀμαρτίαν), has the devil as the father of sin and is himself a child of the devil. In sins it becomes manifest that the anti-divine on earth is intimately and vitally connected with the kingdom and influence of the devil and that ultimately the whole matter resolves itself into a world-combat between God and the devil, and a world-victory of God in Christ over the devil (compare Harless, Ethics § 28. ***: Nitzsch, System. p. 244. sqq.)

6. Redemption from sin is the work of the Sinless One, the purpose of the manifestation of the Sinless One, whose aim it is not to bring a new doctrine but to produce a new life. According to this the most important thing is, of course, not the exposition of the law marked by the utmost profundeness of apprehension and lucidity of statement, but the exhibition of the law to its full extent in a pure life, which not only evinces its strength in suffering and the assumption of human sin, but also satisfies and reconciles the Father, so that for the Son's sake He now once more turns to mankind as hallowed and mankind overcome and attracted by the Sinless One, parts company with sin and turns away from it. It is inconceivable to have known and understood the Sinless One and yet to continue in sin all the same; to abide in Christ and to abide in sin are incompatible opposites; the one excludes the other. John, to be sure, has respect only to the principle or the result, as the issue is a life that terminates not in a moment but has its historical course and internal development. This is predicated of the life in Christ (vv. 2, 3,) and by analogy we are constrained to assume it of the life in sin.

7. Being determines the doing, the doing does not determine the being, but we know the being from the doing. The being is the cause, the doing the effect. Hence he that does not commit sin but worketh righteousness (vv. 6, 7, 8, 9) must be born of God (ch. ii. 29; iii. 9, 10) and have seen and known Christ (ch. iii. 6), but he that is of the devil, commits sin and worketh no righteousness (v. 8). So Luther (Erlangen ed. 27, 191): "Good, pious works nevermore make a good, pious man, but a good pious man will do good, pious works. Evil works nevermore make an evil man, but an evil man will do evil works. Consequently the person must everways be good and pious prior to all good works, and good works must follow and proceed from the good, pious person (Matth. vii. 18)." Hence a man must have become righteous by justification, before he can act righteously in sanctification. This is the truth and the right of the Lutheran and Reformed confessions in opposition to Rome; but on the subject of becoming righteous John confines himself to saying that it takes place (out) of God in Christ by regeneration and propitiation; hence it simply indicates the objective ground and not the subjective accomplishment. On this point no other particulars can be inferred from our passage.

8. While the *not-sin*ning and the impossibility of sinning on the part of a Christian born of God, must be held fast as a fact, we must be on our guard against hasty inferences therefrom, for which John gives us no warrant. In the first place this passage (v. 9) must be susceptible of a construction that does not contradict ch. i. 8 sqq., for John could not have made both statements, if they were incompatible with one another. Hence the Roman Catholics are as much in the wrong for holding, as de Lyra says, that it is the prerogative of the saints, i. e. only individuals in virtue of special grace in regeneration, not to sin and not being able to sin, as are the Lutherans for contending that all truly regenerated persons live without sin; for such an assertion is as arrogant as that contained in the sentence of Seneca, the Stoic (see Düsterdieck II. 148 from Wetstein): "Vir bonus non potest non facere, quod facit; in omni actu par sibi, jam non consilio bonus, sed more eo perductus; ut non tantum recte facere possit, sed nisi recte facere non possit." 1 Jno. i. 8 sqq. forbids such a construction of ch. iii. 9. The Gichtelites, who in virtue of Matth. xxii, 30 used to call themselves the brethren of the angels and refusing to be considered a sect laid claim to being the invisible Church, and the Molinists who were Quietists, claimed with some Pietists such a state of perfection and being called Perfectists by their adversaries, called them in turn Conatists; the Methodists who maintain that they stand daily and hourly in need of the atoning merits of Christ do not belong to this category although they hold the sinless perfection of the regenerate; but this certainly exposes them like the Roman Catholics to the danger of regarding or treating concupiscence as a matter of indifference. The Synod of Dort, moreover, cannot on the strength of this passage reject the following proposition (see Niemeyer, p. 719 sub III): "Vers credentes et regenitos non tantum posse a fide justificante, item gratia et salute totaliter et finaliter excludere, sed etiam reipsa non raro ex eis excludere atque in æternum perire," nor is Calvin warranted to say: "Johannes non solum docet, quam efficaciter agat semel deus in homine, sed clare affirmat, spiritum suam gratiam in nobis ad EXTREMUM USQUE PERSEQUI, UT AD VITÆ NOVITATEM INFLEXIBILIS PERSEVERANTIA ACCEDAT," because the Apostle teaches here not a word on that subject. He neither says ch. i. 8 sqq. that the regenerate in reality does not seldom fall from grace and perish eternally (!), but only, that his sinning notwithstanding, his sins would be forgiven him, nor here at ch. iii. 9, that the gift of sonship and regeneration can never be lost again or impaired, or that the σκήπη is and must be brought to perfection in every child of God, or that the donum perseverantiæ is added by God to the gift of His grace, so that the two are intimately united and inseparable. A view hitting the truth may be found already in Jovinian (at the end of the fourth century) as stated in the controversial writing of his opponent (Hieronymus adv. Jovinianum libri II), if we remember that he said besides what here follows, viz: "eos, qui plena fide in baptismo renati sunt, a diabolo non posse subverti," or "a diabolo non posse tentari;

quicumque autem tentati fuerint, ostendi eos aquas tantum et non spiritu baptizatos"—that the Christian is not called upon to fight and to labour "ut majora præmia accipiat" but only "ne perdat quod accepit," and that he did add "qui suum baptismum servaverint." For John neither affirms nor excludes by an intimation that the work and act of God to man must be accepted and received by man, that man with the divinely-given strength must become self-acting so that he not only do not resist and thus not resisting, obicem non ponens, become sanctified after having been justified, but also that entering into the work and act of God he exercise himself by his own personal efforts and thus appropriate more and more and receive into his own nature that which is God's, by giving up and sacrificing his self without doing injury to his self. All these things John does not touch upon because he is not concerned with subjective execution but solely with the objective ground and foundation. Hence he says: he that is born of God, as such (as God's child), without any reference to his former condition and its reaction, does not really sin in the literal acceptance of the term; sin may still take place in him, but he himself, as the child of God, in the power of regeneration, does not and cannot commit it (cf. Harless Ethica § 26. *).—Hence we cannot see at all why the regenerate, if he neglects, in conflicts and collisions which may arise, to be on his guard and to hold fast all that God has given to him, done for him and is offering to him, may not by degrees fall entirely from grace, and such an issue necessitates or justifies the assumption that God did not seriously intend, energetically will and efficiently accomplish his regeneration and that lastly the lapsed was right and God in the wrong, that it is God's fault that he, though already redeemed from the power of the devil, had again fallen a prey to the devil. Heb. vi. 4 sqq. which only declares that it is impossible to recover those who have fallen away from such true regeneration has no connection with this passage (in opposition to Ebrard), but we ought rather to take note of μετέωρον in v. 6., which points to that unexpressed train of thought. Cf. Rom. vii. 15 sqq. where mention is made of the ἐσω ἀνθρώπου as the σκήπη θεοῦ and the ἐγὼ of the regenerate warring against the old ego.—[Düsterdieck: "The difference between the older and more modern expositors" lies in this, that the former are more anxious to moderate the details of the Apostle's sentiment, and to tone down his assertion to the actual life of Christians, while the moderns recognize the full precision of the text as it stands, but then remind us that the ideal truth of the principle announced by St. John continually, so to speak, floats above the actual life of believers as their rule and aim, and that, in so far, the Apostle's saying finds in such actual life only a relative fulfilment. None however of all the expositors, who in any way has recognized the ideal character of St. John's view, has overlooked the fact, that even in the actual life of all that are born of God there is something which in full verity answers to the ideal words "they cannot sin." The children of God, in whom the Divine seed of their eternal life abides, have, in reality, a holy privilege, as Steinhofer says,—they sin not and they cannot sin, just in proportion as the new Divine life, unconditionally opposed to all sin, and manifesting itself in godlike righteousness, is present and abides in them. Expositors of all these logical tendencies, in all times, e. g. Didymus, Oecum., Estius, Schlichting, Luther, Hunnius, Seb. Schmidt, Calov, Bengel, Joachim Lange, Rosenmüller, Lücke, Neander, etc. point to this, that the new life of believers, veritably begotten by regeneration from God, is simply incompatible with sin; the life which essentially alienates the spirit from all sin,* fills it with an irreconcilable hate against every sin, and urges it to an increasing conflict against all unrighteousness. Luther excellently says, that a child of God in this conflict receives indeed wounds daily, but never throws away his arms or makes peace with his deadly foe. Sin is ever active, but no longer dominant; the normal direction of life's energies in the believer is against sin, is an absence of sin, a no-will-to-sin and a no-power-to-sin. He that is born of God has become, from being a servant of sin, a servant of righteousness; according to the Divine seed remaining in him, or, as St. Paul says, according to the inner man<sup>1</sup>, he will and he can work only that which is like God,—righteousness, though the flesh not yet fully mortified, rebels and sins: so that even in and by the power of the new life sin must be ever confessed, forgiveness received<sup>2</sup>, the temptation of the evil one avoided and overcome<sup>3</sup>, and self-purification and sanctification carried on."<sup>4</sup>

—M.]
9. John speaks of being born in order to live, Paul of dying in order to live.

[Ezek. Hopkins: This place may, perhaps, be among the number of those, that had been more clear, if they had been less expounded. I shall only give you the genuine native sense of the words and then proceed to manage them to my present purpose. Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin. Some from hence have concluded a possibility, at least, of a sinless state in this life: others, the infallible certainty of it; not only that a child of God might attain to such a perfection as is exclusive of all sin, but that whoever is a child of God cannot upon that very account be guilty of any sin: so like are errors to precipices, that, if a man lose his firm footing, usually he falls headlong; nor does he stop, till he dash himself against the bottom and foundation of all religion and piety: had these men but seriously pondered what the same Apostle saith in his first chapter, vv. 8, 10: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us;" and "If we say that we have not sinned, we make God a liar," they would not have entertained such an over-weening conceit of a spotless perfection of life here; whereof the greatest part is no better than sin and the best of it, but too, too much defiled with it. Others interpret thus: So long as we are the children of God, we cannot sin; and so the Papists go; but these go upon an erroneous supposition, that every mortal sin, as they call them, makes an intercision of justifying grace; and doth, as it were, annihilate the new creature. Others interpret it thus: in quantum sumus filii Dei: we cannot sin under that respect and notion, as we are the children of God; but even so far as we are, the best of us in the most part, unrenewed; though this is a certain truth, yet it is but a dilute and waterish exposition of this place; and it amounts to no more than this, that a regenerate man sins not as he is regenerate, that the principle of grace in him is not that principle from whence sinful actions proceed; and certainly, no man, that considers the weight of this Scripture expression, will think that the Apostle, by such an instance and ingemination, would press so thin a meaning as this is. The interpretation, therefore, that I judge to be the most natural and unforced is this: He, that is born of God, doth not commit sin; that is, he doth not sin in that malignant manner, in which the children of the devil do: he doth not make a trade of sin, nor live in the constant and allowed practice of it. Neither can he thus sin, because his seed remaineth in him; that is either the energy of the word of God whereby he is begotten again to a spiritual life, or the complexion of the graces of the spirit that are as it were the seminary and the seed-plot of glory. Nor he cannot sin, because his seed remaineth in him: this seed remains, and keeps him, that he cannot sin; either as apostates do who totally forsake the ways of God, or as profane persons do, who never embraced them. There is a great difference betwixt regenerate and unregenerate persons, in the very sins that they commit: all, indeed, sin; but a child of God cannot sin; that is, though he doth sin, yet he cannot sin after such a manner as wicked and unregenerate men do: there is a vast difference betwixt them, even in that wherein they do most of all agree: see that place in Deut. xxxii. 5. Their spot is not the spot of his children: even deformities themselves are characteristic: and a true Christian may come to know by his sins, that he is not a sinner. And, as they differ in the committing of sin, so much more in the opposing of it."—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Thou art wont in other respects to attach importance to the right name and the right word. Well, sin is immorality; what thou callest a slip, an error, an infirmity or a foible, is essentially—immorality.—Be not concerned as much about earthly losses or disgrace before men as about outraging the Divine majesty, which marks the nature of sin even more graphically than the outrage done to thy own soul.—What does it avail thee to be praised of men, even in newspapers, if God regards thee as a transgressor? Remember the case of Chrysostom, Bishop of Constantinople, who was hateful to the Emperor; the courtiers said: "Burn him, confiscate his property, put him in irons, and have him killed." But others replied, saying: "You will not gain anything by all this; for in exile he would find a home with his God; you deprive the poor, not him, of property; he kisses his chains; death opens heaven to him. There is only one way to render him unhappy; force him to sin; he fears nothing in the world but sin.—Dost thou honestly abide the law of the land, especially the fundamental law—then maintain also the law of God's kingdom, His fundamental law.—The sinner does the very thing which Christ desires to remove: he twines for Him a crown of thorns and crucifies Him anew.—Hold fast the sinlessness and death of Christ. Why was it necessary for the Sinless One to die if not for the sin of men? What is he that does not like the Sinless One and does every thing in his power to put Him out of the way? What is the public opinion which crowned that attempt with success? Of what consequence must sin be, if He had to die by and for it?—He did not come for the sake of the doctrine, which did not take away sin, that the prophet might be praised, but He came for the sake of sin, that the Lamb of God and the High priest might be praised together.—He came to acquire for Himself a people that it might live of and by Him; He came not to receive from it what were its possessions, but to take away from it, what is its grievance and to grant to it His glory.—A Christian, as a Christian, never does sin, he only suffers it.—In and with Christ we lose all pleasure in sin and loathe its service.—Sin dazzles men and prevents their seeing and knowing the glory of Christ.—To overlook the glory of Christ denotes not a low degree of immorality.—The illumination of our spirit is not without the purification of our heart, without the deliverance of our will from the chains of sin.—As sin is ever growing so that thin threads of lust become cords of vanity and cart-ropes of unrighteousness (Is. v. 18), the small rent of doubt grows into a shipwreck concerning faith (1 Tim. i. 19) and a little spark causes a great fire (Jas. iii. 5), so in like manner the forgiveness of sins in justification grows to the annihilation of sin in sanctification, and the regenerate grows into manhood, so that while Ahab, though wholly mail-clad, was mortally wounded in one place, Paul though bitten by a venomous viper, shook off the beast into the fire and remained unhurt.—Christ is the point where men must choose the way that leadeth to the kingdom of darkness, or that which conducts to the kingdom of light.—Man's way ends in the former kingdom with his belonging to Satan, but it begins in the latter with his regeneration.—Just those who are the devil's know least of him, deny his existence and personality; those who with God resist him, know his nature and power much better than his servants.—Be not deceived, 1. Concerning the nature of sin; 2. Concerning the glory of Christ; 3. Concerning the activity of Satan; 4. Concerning the power of regeneration.—Fear sin! 1. It breaks the ordinance of God; 2. It is the cause of Christ's sufferings; 3. It leads to the slavery of Satan; 4. It destroys thy adoption of God.—Child of God, rejoice! 1. God's law is a sure and straight path; 2. The merit of Christ affords thee a mighty help; 3. The gift of the Spirit will yield thee precious fruit.

AUGUSTINE:—The doing of righteousness does not precede but succeed justification.

STARKE:—Whatever is contrary to the law of God, whether done inwardly or outwardly, in thought, manner, words or works—is sin.—Let every one diligently study the law of God so that he may learn what is right and wrong and not do ignorantly what might have been avoided.—Sin must be a terrible and horrible thing, because for its sake Christ had to come, to suffer and to die. Every thing is in harmony: begone, sin! there is no room for thee with the redeemed! It is apostasy from the law, the opposite of the Image of Christ, the progeny of Satan, a mark of his slaves.—Thou sayest: I am a sinful man and not a sinful angel! True; but if thou art truly a believing Christian, sin must not reign in thee but thou must reign over sin and not serve sin in any particular.—Not certain, believers are exposed to the danger of being seduced.—Appearance, propriety of conduct, and observance of the externals of worship are not paramount in Christianity, but the heart must be changed and that takes place in regeneration.—It is ill-befitting a Christian to appeal to and boast of his illustrious descent, the distinction of his family and connections; the grace of regeneration, which invests him with the prerogatives of the adoption, truly ennobles him before God and men.—The children of Satan are often unknown, but more to themselves and those like them than to the godly.—The godly also are often hidden, but more from the ungodly than from themselves, for they know very well in virtue of the spirit of adoption both what they have received and what is promised to them.—There is a difference between the children of God and the children of the devil; they may and ought to be identified, but the identification requires a spiritual discernment, otherwise it cannot take place.—Honest preachers must not give evangelical consolation to those who are openly ungodly, though they say that preachers cannot condemn. True; they cannot condemn but they can denounce the damnable condition.

BENGEL:—"Iniquitas horribiliss quiddam, apud eos præsertim, qui legem et dei voluntatem magni faciunt, sonat, quam peccatum. Ex lege agnitio peccati. Linea curva cernitur per se; sed magis, ad regulam collata."

STEINHOFFER:—The children of God in whom the divine seed of their eternal life is truly abiding, have really the holy privilege of not being able to sin.

HUBNER:—Not the hurtfulness of sin is its nature, for that is accidental, but its opposition to God.—The chief purpose of the manifestation of Christ was the cancelling of sin, the atonement for our sin, and sanctification by means of reconciliation. Hence continuing in sin frustrates the purpose of Christ and contradicts His holiness.—Christianity is not gnosis, but an honest mind and conversation.—Recollect that as long as sinning is thy element, thou art in the devil's sphere and exposed to his influence.—Take note: 1. That the destruction of the works of the devil is not something that has been done, finished and perfected once for all but is progressive in its nature, advancing to perfection to the end of time. 2. That Christ has laid the foundation by His suffering and death as well as by the establishment of His Church, that incessant warfare may be waged against the kingdom of the devil and that at the last it shall be entirely destroyed. 3. That Christ has enabled all who believe in Him and receive His power to overcome Satan. The power of Satan is broken in believers. The works of the devil are being destroyed in proportion as the Gospel spreads intensively and extensively. 4. That the absolute and total destruction of the kingdom of the devil will take place at the second coming of Christ. Then it will be fully consummated. At present believers are only called upon to make war against Satan.—As the seed does only push forth the fruit it contains, and cannot produce a fruit different in kind, and as it is peculiar to the nature, even to the germinating principle in the seed to produce the right fruit, so it is also with those in whom is laid the seed of God, the Spirit of God; its germinating principle prompts godliness of living. But this does not warrant the assertion of absolute sinlessness.—It is not a physically absolute impossibility, but a moral impossibility; it is impossible to the sanctified will.—The indwelling spirit effects so essential a difference among men, that it seems as if they were wholly different races. But because it is invisible, God causes it to become manifest in its persevering fruit.—How sharply does Holy Scripture distinguish between men; they are either the children of God or the children of the devil; it knows nothing of half-Christians, of an amphibious race; man can only be one or the other.—Be not deceived by this sharp dichotomy, as if it were unkind and uncharitable thus to judge, for it is not taught here that we should thus judge and classify others (for that is the prerogative of God), but that we should judge and range ourselves.

REINHARD:—Christ takes away
1. The deception and fraud of sin—by His doctrine.
2. The punishment of sin—by His death.
3. The dominion of sin—by His Spirit and example.

BESSER:—With God every transgression is a crime; the Judge above does not treat sin as a trifle, a peccadillo (peccatillo, a little sin). Every sin and all sin has the character of treason.—True Christians know that the Saviour was manifested as the enemy and atoner of sin, and they agree with Him in heart and mind in pronouncing the same sentence on sin which was passed upon it in His bitter sufferings and painful death. Every one that abides in Christ, to whom he belongs once for all, does not commit sin, but says no to sin, which belongs to the old man, and resists its foreign power. The Christian's will, his ego resting in and governed by Christ is not one with sin but one with Christ in whom there is no sin. Hatred of sin is the feeling which the children of God have in common, the love of sin the universal dowry of the children of the devil. Just as only those truly love good who know the Good One, so they only hate evil with perfect hatred who hate the Evil One as actively engaged in every evil and abhor sin as the work of the beginner of sin.—The will which worketh sin, is of the devil and not of God. Out of the new, divine life-ground laid in the children of God grows up the pure delight in the good and perfect will of God, and whatever is displeasing to the Father (and sin is unrighteousness and wrong) is equally displeasing to the child.

THOLUCK:—Do not trifle with sin. 1. Because our hope is so glorious. Here the blessed rights of children, there the splendour and joys of children; should not he shun sin that hath such a hope? Ingratitude is one of the meanest vices; he that does not experience the necessity of gratitude for benefits received is one of the poorest and most hopeless of men. Christ who burst the chains and shunned no indignity in order to help us, should we not be grateful to Him—by fighting against sin? 2. Because sin is so culpable. Sin, did it only hurt us, we might get over it, but as it hurts God, it becomes a more fearful thing. The true child of God ceases to commit sin and greatly grieves at the presence of any and every sin. [A stanza of a German hymn.—M.] Every, even the smallest sin always hits the nerve of the law, unlike the eye, where the skin only and not the ophthalmic nerve needs to be injured; and the sinful lust is followed by the culpable word and the culpable word by the culpable deed. Misfortune is seldom alone and sin even more seldom. To become free from sin is the life-task of the Christian. He knows of no care greater than that of getting rid of a diseased conscience. Repentance cuts the nerve away from the lust of sin.

GEORGE:—(on ch. ii. 28—iii. 8). Of the paradise of the divine sonship. 1. of the noble state of being a child; 2. of the holy duty of a child; 3. of the blessed children's right of the children of God.

[V. 7. BURKITT:—The Scriptures speak of doing righteousness in two senses: 1. in a legal sense, which consists in an exact obedience and fulfilling of the law; and thus there is "none righteous, no not one;" 2. in an evangelical sense, which means walking uprightly according to the rules of the Gospel, conscientiously avoiding all known sin, and performing every commanded duty, observing a constant course of holy actions and making it our daily care to please God in all that we do. And it is the duty of every Christian, who would not be deceived as to his spiritual condition, to try himself by this infallible mark: "He that doeth righteousness is righteous;—whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God."—M.]

[V. 8. BR. HALL:—He that gives himself over to the commission of sin, and makes it his willing practice, that man is not of God but of the devil: for it is and hath been, the trade of that wicked spirit, even from the beginning, ever since his fall [?], to sin against God, and to draw others into sin and condemnation with him.—M.]

[SECKER:—Herein is the plain trial of our condition. If we are destitute of "the fruits of the spirit," it is bad; if we find them in our hearts and lives, we have proof enough of its being good, and need never disquiet ourselves for want of any other. Being able to tell the very moment when we became pious and virtuous, is not material, provided we are so now; and happiest of all are they, who remember not themselves ever to have been otherwise. All feelings are imaginary and deceitful, unless they be accompanied with that one, which the Apostle experienced and mentioned: "For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity we have had our conversation in the world." 2 Cor. i. 12. Our Saviour's rule of "knowing every tree by its fruits" Luke vi. 44, is the only sure way to judge of ourselves as well as of others. And though we may perhaps be sometimes at a loss how to judge, or inclined, and even strongly, to fear the worst; yet if this arise not from presumptuous sins or habitual negligence, but merely from excessive humility or weakness of spirits, a modest diffidence will never hinder our future happiness, nor will a bold positiveness ever forward it. Good men may be cast down and bad men elevated without any reason. The former may see much in themselves to dislike; and yet God may see enough of what He approves to accept them: they may experience little joy in serving Him, and yet "walk" more completely "worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing," Col. i. 10, for doing it without the encouragement of a present reward. The latter, on the other hand, may build upon groundless fancies of their own, mistaking them for Divine communications: may be absolutely confident, wonderfully transported, yet find themselves at last fatally deceived. It is not, therefore, by their fears, or their hopes, or their raptures, that men are to judge of their spiritual condition. "Hereby," saith St. John, "do we know that we know God, if we keep His commandments," ch. ii. 3. "Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doeth righteousness is righteous; he that committeth sin is of the devil."—M.]

[TUCKER:—As therefore we are well assured, that repentance will re-instate us, and that obedience will continue us, in the Divine favour, according to the gracious terms of the Gospel, so let us likewise remember, that he who wilfully and habitually committeth sin, whatever evidence of his new birth or justification, his adoption or acceptance, he may fancy himself possessed of, is actually no other than the servant of sin and the slave of the devil. In short, virtue and vice, holiness and wickedness, Christ and Belial, can never, never unite together. If therefore we design ourselves to be the candidates for heaven, we must endeavour to acquire such qualifications as will render us fit for that holy place. Because unless we really acquire them during the present state, the alternative is dreadful indeed: for he who committeth sin is of the devil. How shocking even to repeat; yet much more shocking to feel! to feel not only for a time but forever! Whereas on the contrary, "he who doeth righteousness is righteous, even as He is righteous;" righteous he is, because he will have, not only his manifold failings and imperfections all forgiven, through the mercies of the Gospel-covenant, but even his deliberate sins and offences cancelled and blotted out on his sincere repentance: and what is still more than ever could have been thought of, much less petitioned for, he will find himself permitted to appear before God as "holy, unblameable and unreprouvable in His sight," Col. i. 22.—M.]

[VER. 9. PRLE: Whoever is born of God, etc. As if he had said: In fine, while a man preserves his Christian principle, and answers the character of a true member of God's Church, he can never be guilty of deliberate and habitual vice. Make it therefore a sure test to whom a man belongs, in whose service he is listed, and from whom he may expect his wages, whether of God or of the devil, by the good or wicked practices of his life, by his behaviour towards God and towards his brethren.—M.]

[HAMMOND:—The phrase "born of God" is not to be taken here, as to denote the single transient act of regeneration; but rather a continued course, a permanent state, so that a regenerate man and a child of God are of the same meaning, and signify him that lives a pious and godly life and continues to do so. For the phrase "a child" or "a son" of any kind of father, signifies a resemblance or similitude of inclinations and actions; as a child of the devil, Acts xiii. 10; sons of Belial, Judges xix. 22; children of Abraham, Gal. iii. 7. And so generally in this Epistle, he that is "born of God," signifies a man truly pious, an obedient servant of God: and such is the subject of this proposition when of such an one it is said, that "he cannot sin:" not affirming that he cannot cease to be what he is, cannot fall off from the performance of his duty, of the possibility of which the many warnings and exhortations that are given to pious men are evidences, see ch. ii. 1; 1 Cor. x. 12; Heb. iii. 12; 2 Pet. iii. 17; but that remaining thus, a pious follower, imitator, and so a "child of God," he cannot yield deliberately to any kind of sin.—M.]

[WHITBY:—He cannot sin. Now that doth not import a good man cannot be overtaken with a fault (Gal. vi. 1). No, even those "little children" whose "sins are forgiven," and who have "known the Father," may and will be obnoxious still to some infirmities and wanderings out of the way. (ch. ii. 1). They may "sin not unto death," and therefore may still have the spiritual life remaining in them (v. 16-18). But the true import of that phrase is this (Ita de Catone Minore Velleius Paterculus: Homo virtuti simillimus, et per omnia ingenio diis quam hominibus proprius, qui nunquam recte fecit ut facere videretur, sed quia aliter, facere non poterat. Hist. R. II. 34. Omni-bus humanis vitiis immunis. Ibid.): That he hath such an inward frame of heart, such a disposition of spirit, as renders sin exceeding odious and hateful to him; so that he cannot entertain the thoughts of doing it, or a temptation to commit it, without the utmost detestation and the greatest horror, and so can very rarely, and only through surprise, or want of due deliberation, or through such violent temptations as prevent or hinder his consideration, be obnoxious to sin; and when he comes to consider of such an action, is presently condemning himself for it, bitterly repenting of it, and for the future watching most carefully against it. Cf. Matth. xii. 34; xvii. 18; Jno. vii. 7; viii. 43; xii. 39; xiv. 17; Rom. viii. 7, 8; 1 Cor. ii. 14; Rev. ii. 2.—M.]

He that committeth sin is of the devil. It is not he who committeth one or more sins of infirmity, for so did Christ's disciples while they were with Him; nor he who committeth one great sin through the power of a strong temptation, of which he bitterly repents, and from which he returns to his obedience; for thus did David and Peter, who yet were not then the children of the devil; but they who comply with the lusts of Satan and who will do them. Jno. viii. 44. The other interpretations which are given of these words seem either vain or impertinent, or false and dangerous, and words: "He that is born of God, non debet peccare, ought not to sin," or that it is absurd for him to sin; for the Apostle speaks not of what he ought not to do, but of what he doth not. Such is that also of those fathers, who interpret this of him who is perfectly born of God by a παλγγενεσία, or "a resurrection from the dead," for the Apostle doth not speak of what he shall do hereafter, but of what he doth not do at present.

2. False seems to be the sense which Origen, Jerome, and Ambrose put upon the words, that "he that is born of God sinneth not, quamdiu renatus est, whilst he is born of God, because he ceaseth to be a child of God when he sins; for this is not only confuted by the examples of David and Peter, whose faith under that great miscarriage failed not (Luke xxii. 32), but by the words of the Apostle, 'Little children, if we sin we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous, and He is the Propitiation for our sins' (Jno. ii. 1), who yet is only the Advocate for the sons of God. For the same reason I cannot assent to that exposition which saith: "A child of God cannot be guilty of any great or deliberate crime," as Tertullian, de pudicitia c. 19.

3. Dangerous is the exposition of Bernard (In Septuag. Serm. 1), that "they who are born of God sin not, quia etiamsi peccata illis neutiquam imputentur, because their sins will never be imputed to them;" and of those who think it sufficient to say, "He sins not without great reluctance, or not willingly, the evil that he doeth being that which he would not do;" for the will of that man, who, after some contest in his soul, yields to the commission of sin, is more strongly inclined to sin than to the avoiding of it, and so is not renewed. Nor doth the Apostle say, he that is born of God sins not willingly, or without reluctance; but absolutely, "He doth not commit sin."

[I conclude with Gataker: "He that is born of God sinneth not," that is: Vitam a peccato immunitum quantum potest sibi proponit, nec peccato unquam sponte dat operam; si aliquando præter animi propositum deliquerit, non in eodem persistit, sed errore agnito, ad institutum vite præstatum quamprimum quantumque potest, festinus revertitur.—M.]

4. Brotherly love is the sum-total of the Divine law.

CHAPTER III. 10b-18.

10b Whosoever<sup>1</sup> doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither<sup>2</sup> he that loveth not his 11 brother. For<sup>3</sup> this is the message<sup>4</sup> that ye heard from the beginning, that we should 12 love one another. Not as Cain, who was of that wicked one,<sup>5</sup> and slew his brother.

And wherefore slew he him? Because his own<sup>6</sup> works were evil, and<sup>7</sup> his brother's 13 righteous. Marvel not, my brethren,<sup>8</sup> if the world hate<sup>9</sup> you. We know that we 14 have passed from<sup>10</sup> death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not 15 his brother<sup>11</sup> abideth in death. Whosoever<sup>12</sup> hateth his brother is a murderer:<sup>13</sup> and 16 ye know that no murderer<sup>13</sup> hath eternal life abiding in him. Hereby perceive<sup>14</sup> we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down<sup>15</sup> 17 our lives for the brethren. But whoso hath this world's good,<sup>16</sup> and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion<sup>17</sup> from him,<sup>18</sup> how dwelleth the<sup>19</sup> 18 love of God in him? My<sup>20</sup> little children, let us not love in word, neither in<sup>21</sup> tongue; but in deed and in truth.

Winer: "Properly, there is nothing to be supplied (ὡμεν or τοῖς ὡμεν would not suit οὐ), but, the comparison being negligently expressed, the reader easily adjusts the clauses for himself: that we love one another, not as Cain was of the wicked one, etc., shall it or may it be so with us." ## EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The transition. v. 10b.

VER. 10b. Every one that doeth not righteousness, is not of God.—Thus the Apostle compresses the one, positive, formally taken and described side of the preceding section and having thus fully, concisely and distinctly recapitulated, he now quickly adds the essential characteristic of that righteousness as the leading theme of what follows, viz:

And he that loveth not his brother.—

Calvin: "Hoc membrum vice expositonis additum est." It is interesting to compare the progress of thought in this part with that in the first part: this section ch. iii. 10-18 is related to ch. ii. 29 and iii. 1-10 like ch. ii. 6-11 to ch. i. 5 and i. 6—ii. 5; ii. 6, 7, 11: ἡ ἐντολή, ὁ λόγος, ἡ ἀγγελία brotherly love, and ch. iii. 11 the ἀγγελία, ch. ii. 7: ἦν εἰχετε—v. 11: ἦν ἠκούσατε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς as in ch. iii. 11; the ὁρεῖλεν ch. ii. 6 and iii. 16; and both times after the example of Christ; respectively disclosing our relation to death and life here (vv. 14, 15) and to light and darkness there (ch. ii. 9-11). But this section draws more on life (Cain and Abel v. 12, poverty and benevolence vv. 17, 18) and reaches more into life.

Πᾶς ὁ ποῶν δικαιοσύνην refers back to ch. ii. 29; iii. 7, but the omission of the Article renders the idea more general and indicates the leading thought with the self-evident reference to God and Christ. Thus ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ εἶναι denotes here both to be born of God and to be the child of God. Καὶ before ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ is exegetical, and explains δικαιοσύνη as ἀγάπη; hence it is neither=proinde (Episcopus) nor adds a new particular, something different (Rickli, Socinus, who defines ἀγάπη as Christian virtue excoiling Jewish legality); nor is ἀγάπη a part or moment of δικαιοσύνη (Bengel, Spener, Neander, Gerlach), but its "substance and nature" (Huther* also Düsterdieck). Cf. Rom. xiii. 8-10; Gal. v. 14; Col. iii. 14; 1 Tim. i. 5; Jno. xiii. 84 sq.; xiv. 15; xv. 12, 17. "Brotherly love is the sum-total of all right-doing" (Besser), love is the fulfilling of the law. Ἀλλήλων, in the Johan-nean passages like ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ here, denotes brotherly love, the love which Christians have for one another; so also in the corresponding sections ch. ii. 9-11 and iv. 20, 21. Ἀδελφός is consequently not=πλησίον Luke x. 86 (Ebrard, who sees here a contradiction to Matth. v. 44; 1 Cor. iv. 12, but without sufficient reason; Rickli and others).

The commandment of Christ. v. 11.

VER. 11. Because this is the message which ye have heard from the beginning, that we should love one another.—He that loves the brother must be (out) of God, and brotherly love is the deed of righteousness, because the commandment is from Him. Ἀγγελία is here=ἐντολή ch. ii. 7. Bengel's remark is only half true: "liberalissima appellatio, nunquam legem appellat;" ἐντολή occurs often, but νόμος never. But the message implies the commandment as indicated by ἵνα. The reading ἐπαγγελία, promise, cannot be sustained without a forced interpretation: it is the goodness, power and grace of God that we should love one another. The commandment of brotherly love has been given from the beginning, since the Gospel has been preached, since you have been Christians; it is and remains indissolubly united with the Gospel and Christianity; ἠκούσατε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς applies to the first and to all Christians. Ἴνα denotes the purpose, the work to be done and not only the substance or contents of the ἀγγελία (Huther), for the reference is not only to the substance of a commandment, but to a commandment specified by means of the message, which lies in the message given as a task, a work to be done.

The opposite in Cain. vv. 12, 18.

VER. 12. Not, as Cain was of the wicked one and slew his brother.—The sentence is imperfect like Jno. vi. 58, and is a breviloquentia, of frequent and diversified occurrence in the classics; cf. Winer, p. 646, who cites in a note a parallel sentence from Demosthenes (Mid. p. 415). The comparison is left incomplete, as in animated conversation when there is no room for misunderstanding; there is nothing to be supplied; the reader or hearer knows from the context what is meant. In the present case: Not, as Cain was of the wicked one and slew his brother, (shall it or may it be so with us). [See note 5 in Appar. Crit.—M.]. Hence it is neither an independent exclamation (Sander); nor need we supply ὡς ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ (Grotius, Lücke), nor ὅς (Beza, Socinus), nor stis or the like.—Ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ refers back to v. 8 as contrasted with ἐκ

[* Huther in a note [2d ed. p. 163] replies to the objection of Ebrard and Myrberg that this could only apply to our love of God and not to our love of the brethren, that in John's opinion Christian love of the brethren is identical with the love of God, because the Christian loves his brother as one born of God. He suggests also that ἀγάπη might be better defined as the "essential exhibition" of δικαιοσύνη.—M.]

τοῦ θεοῦ v. 10b. Hence the reference is to the wicked one. The sentence specifies the reason of that action, even as v. 8. ποτεῖν τὴν ἀμαρτίαν and ὁ διάβολος ἀμαρτάνει are correlates. [The wild notion of the Rabbis concerning the diabolical nature of Cain may be interesting to the student (Zohar in Genes. iv. 1): "Rabbi Eleazar dixit: Cum projecisset serpens illi immunditatem suam in Evam, eaque illam suscepisset, regnans cum Adam habuisset, peperit duos filios, unum ex latere illo immundo et unum ex latere Adami; fuitque Cain similis imagine superiorum h. e. angelorum et Abel imagine inferiorum h. e. hominum, ac propterea diversæ fuerunt viæ istius ab illius viis. Equidem Cain fuit filius spiritus immundi, qui et serpens malus; Abel vero fuit filius Adami; et propterea quod venit de parte angelis mortis, ideo interfecit fratrem suum."—M.] The verb ἀφ᾽ οὗθεν denotes cultro jugulum aperire ut sanguis effluat, then to kill, in sacrifice, as the martyrs were slain by the ungodly. Rev. v. 6; vi. 4, 9; xviii. 24. Hence the word does not warrant the inference that the knife was the instrument of the murder (Piscator), but rather denotes that the death of Abel was martyrdom inflicted by an ungodly hand, or finely intimates that Cain, in his hatred, offered a sacrifice to his God, the devil. The next clause, at all events gives prominence to the diabolical character of Cain's deed, the eager question "And wherefore slew he him?" being promptly answered thus: "Because his works were wicked, but his brother's righteous. Τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ πονηρὰ ἦν answers to ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἦν, and denotes Cain's whole manner of life" (Spenser), of which the murder of his brother was one form of expression, his whole manner of life as well as this specific exhibition of it being identical as to cause and origin—namely the devil. For if the wicked one had not influenced Cain's whole manner of life and if that had not been wholly wicked, he would not and could not have committed this specific act of fratricide. The term πονηρός, as distinguished from κακός is very significant. πονηρός, from πονεῖν or πόνος, denotes toil or hardship (and is opposed to χρηστός, good, honest, useful, friendly, serviceable) and then malignity, malignus; κακός, bad, malus, is the opposite of ἀγαθός, good and valuable. Rev. xvi. 2; Sir. xxxi. 4; Matth. vii. 11; xii. 35; v. 11; Luke xii. 35; 3 Jno. 10. The inwardly evil nature is κακόν, that which is inimical, hurtful and displeasing to others is πονηρόν. Ὁ πονηρός is the most suitable term to describe the nature of Satan, the enemy of God, His kingdom and His people, as well as the works of the devil's children. The additional clause τὰ δὲ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ δίκαια the context requires us to refer to ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ εἶναι, as pointing out that the piety and the walk of the children of God exactly answering to the law of God are loathsome to the anti-divine world. That devilishness continues still Jno. iii. 19; vii. 7; xvii. 14. Hence the monition:

VER. 13. Marvel not, brethren, if the world hateth you.—The same idea is already expressed in v. 1 (διὰ τοῦτο); Cain is the type of the κόσμος (ch. ii. 15-17). "Magis esset mirabile, si diligerent eos." (Didymus). The address ἀδελφοὶ in this connection exerts a beneficial influence: John expresses his love of those whom the world hates and this expression contains a ground of their rejoicing and conveys to them the sweet consolation of the fellowship of love. The particle εἰ is and remains—if; if it had been the Apostle's object to describe the hatred of the world as actually present, he might have used ὅτι; but he signifies by εἰ that the readers collectively or individuals at the time being, will not in the end have to endure hatred; but the Indicative μωαε denotes that the case will doubtless arise. So Mark. xv. 44 (Vulgate falsely: si jam odisset); Acts. xxvi. 8; Winer, Grammar p. 307; Kühner, ii. 480 sq. Hence Sander, who makes εἰ=ὅτι, S. Schmidt who makes it=ετιανοί, and Ebrard who explains—if ever the case occurs, are in the wrong, for the reference is to a necessary condition. [“Εἰ denotes neither a doubt nor only a possibility, for it is not only possible but from the nature of the case necessary, that the world hates the children of God; only the form of the sentence is hypothetical, not the thought it expresses. Cf. Jno. xv. 18.” Huther.—M.]

Amplification of the Antitheses: Love and Life, Hatred and Death; vv. 14, 15.

VER. 14. We Know.—In ἡμεῖς John includes himself among those he had just called ἀδελφοὶ and expresses their confident assurance, the world and its hatred notwithstanding, which is and ought to be a source of strength and consolation. The object affirmed in the sequel shows that the reference is to the experience of believers, of the children of God, and not to the Apostles only, (Lyra) or that it is only the conclusion drawn on the ground of a good conscience, (Estius).

That we have passed over out of Death into Life.—The Prefect μεταβεβήκαμεν signifies an action of the past or the past of an action still continuing in the present, in the condition that has been effected: we are those who have passed over, Winer, Grammar, p. 288, 299. The Perfect must not be taken per enallagen, for the Future (Sohlichting) or the Present (Didymus, Oecumenius), or the verb must not be construed = jus or spem habere ad vitam (Grotius, Carpov). Cf. Jno. v. 24: ὁ πιστεύων—μετεβέβηκεν ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωὴν. Of course ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωὴν cannot be taken physically but spiritually, but it must be taken as a real fact; it is=γεννηθῆσαι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, ch. ii. 29: for ἡ ζωὴ is the real life, divine, eternal life (ch. i. 1, 2; ii. 17, 25),=the φῶς and the ἀλήθεια (ch. i. 5; ii. 21, 22) of which the children of God are partakers; the θάνατος is the opposite of this life,=the σκοτία and the ψεῦδος, all of which belong to the ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου. The Apostle, therefore, does not speak of a sentiment (Paulus) or caligo, infelicitas, moralis (Semler), but of relations and conditions, of regeneration, of the new life of the reconciled child of God. This implies that those who have not yet passed over, are still or will be ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ before this transition into life in Christ; hence there is not the faintest colour for the assertion of Hilgenfeld, that the Apostle did share the gnostic view of the original metaphysical difference of men.

Because we love the brethren.—From this conduct we may know that relation, from these acts of brotherly love that state of adoption by God. Hence the former is the first and this the second and it is false to consider brotherly love as the cause of regeneration or even as a part of justification in order to complete it, and as conditio gratiosa a Deo requisita, as do the R. Catholics (Estius, Lyra) and the Pelagians (Episcopius). Brotherly love is only the condition of the certainty of the knowledge that we are justified and the children of God, and not the condition of this new life itself. [ζωή and ἀγάπη are really one and the same thing with this difference that ζωή is the state and ἀγάπη the activity of the believer; from this blissful, eternal life groweth love, and love in its turn worketh happiness and eternal life; hence the Apostle adds—(Huther)—M].

He that loveth not, abideth in death.—As usual (ch. i. 8, sqq., ii. 22, sqq.), the negative is added in a concise, pregnant form. [See note 11 in Appar. Critic.—M]. The statement is quite general “he that loveth not,” without specifying the object, viz. the brother. The force of the Present μένει should be retained. To be in death is connected, as something permanent, with not loving. They are one in the other, yet not so that the not loving is the cause of the abiding in death, but, as is manifest from the context, so that we may know the abiding in death from the not loving. [The two are identical. Besser, “Where hatred is there is death, where love is there is life; yes, love is life itself.”—M.].

VER. 15. Every one that hateth his brother is a man-killer.—ἵνα denotes the universal application of this thought. Not loving is described as equal to hating one's brother. [Not to love—to hate.—M.]; “pure indifference is impossible to the living spirit of man” (Huther). Luther rightly observes: Nova sententia coram mundo, quod non diligere sit occidere.” Bengel: “Omne odium est conatus contra vitam; at vita vitam non insecutur; qui odit fratrem, aut illum aut se ipsum vult occidere.” Lyra (odisse pejus quam non diligere.), Schlichting (“Qui non amat, nec bene vult nec male; qui vero odit, male vult”), and others are wrong. Not loving is only the state of quiescence exhibited in acts of hatred. According to our Lord's exposition of the fifth commandment (Matth. v. 21–26) he is an ἀνθρωποκτόνος that hateth his brother. “Nam quem odimus, vellemus perisse” (Calvin); hatred is not only a beginning or cause of murder, but a murder in heart, be it a wish, a thought or a purpose or only the passion which afflicts the brother's life without thinking of his death. “Latro es, antequam inquines manum” (Seneca). Here is evidently a reference to Cain, v. 12; the case of Cain shows plainly how hatred of one's brother and homicide go together. The word ἀνθρωποκτόνος, only here and Jno. viii. 44, in this place applies to Cain who slew Abel, his brother, in the Gospel to Satan who destroyed, murdered Adam. Notwithstanding this difference, the two passages are connected with each other, the one shedding light on the other. Cf. Lange on John viii. 44; Vol. IV. p. 244 sq.—The devil, having seduced Eve, and Adam through her to sin, to the transgression of the divine law of which death was the penalty fixed by God.—Sin causing mortality is itself a kind of dying, the fall or falling into death [German: The fall of sin, i. e. the fall, a fall of death.—M], and sin, born of lust, when it is finished, bringeth forth death (Jas. i. 15); the first sin was a falling from the life created (out) of God into death threatened as a punishment. Thus Satan became the murderer of Adam and Eve in the strictest sense of the word (Wisd. i. 11–18; ii. 23, 24). With the entrance of sin, moreover, there died in Eve the love of her husband whom she had seduced, and in Adam the love of his wife whom he accused to God and on whom he laid the guilt. There hatred and death are again together. In Cain also there was the hatred of his brother united with the murder of his brother, whereby he showed that he was ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου. Cf. Stier, Reden Jesu, Vol. IV. 414 sqq.

And ye know that no man-killer hath eternal life abiding in him.—This concludes the thought: μὴ ἀγαπῶν τὸν ἀδελφὸν v. 10b led the Apostle to speak of μὴ ἀγαπῶν v. 14, then of μισῶν τὸν ἀδελφὸν v. 15 and in remembrance of Cain of ἀνθρωποκτόνος; he first said οὐκ ἔστιν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ v. 10b μένει ἐν θανάτῳ, but here οὐκ ἔχει ζῶν αἰώνιον ἐν αὐτῷ μένουσαν. Before he said, he is in death, but now, in him is not eternal life, consequently death is in him. The Apostle denies that he “possesses permanently and fully” (Lücke) eternal life and thus denotes the “permanent state of death” (Düsterdieck) of him that hates and kills his brother. The Present ἔχει has respect to this present life; it is not habebit (a Lapidé). Hence ζῶν αἰώνιος not the future glory (a Lapidé, Bede and others). Μένουσας certainly intimates the existence of eternal life, of baptism, etc., out of or in the word of God by means of Christian instruction and the Christian family-discipline; for the Apostle speaks of and to Christians. But even such gifts of God are consumed by hatred abiding; hence he loses entirely the possession of eternal life, so that nothing thereof abideth in him; μένουσας is therefore not an intensified to be (Huther), nor must the want of the Article be pressed as if the reference were only to powers of the future world (Ebrard). This the Apostle lays down as an undeniable fact of Christian experience and consciousness (οἰδατε); hence they know it not from the fifth commandment (S. Schmidt) or from the Old Testament with its death-penalty in the case of murderers, spiritually interpreted (Grotius, Lücke).

Description of brotherly love, vv. 16–18.

VER. 16. Hereby have we known love that He laid down His life for us.—S. Schmidt: “Ne quis vel se ipsum decipiat, vel ab aliis decipiat, exponendum etiam erit, quæ sit vera et Christiana caritas.” First after the example of Christ. On ἐν τούτῳ cf. on ch. ii. 8; on ἐκείνος, vv. 8, 7; ii. 6; ἐγνώκαμεν = cognitum habemus. Τὴν ἀγάπην should be taken in a general sense without any further qualification: love.—Bengel: “Amoris natura.” In Christ may be known love, the being and nature of love. Hence we must not supply τοῦ Χριστοῦ (Carpzov and others), or τοῦ θεοῦ (Grotius, Calov, Spener, al.); the Vulgate (amorem Dei) constrains the Romanists to do so. Ebrard's explanation is rather forced: “we have known love as consisting in this,” as if we had ἐν τούτῳ οὖσαν, and this were described in the following ὅτι as the predicate and as if ἐγνώκαμεν had only an introductory and secondary sense. Both the form (the position of the words) and the thought (to give His life=love) render that exposition untenable. The point is that whereby love is known: τὴν ψυχὴν τάθειναι (Jno. xv. 13; cf. x. 11, 15, 17, 18; xiii. 37, 38) = vitam ponere (Cicero ad Fam. ix. 24); this is the highest proof of love; for love imparts her very best, her most precious goods, παράδουναί the ψυχὴ or εαυτὸν (Gal. ii. 20; Eph. v. 2); this makes Christ the object of the Father's love (Jno. x. 17). The context required here ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, for our protection; literally over us, who had fallen, were wounded, in danger of perishing from our wounds or in the hands of enemies, fighting against the enemies, protecting us, becoming our substitute and assuming the fight for us: hence it is not exactly identical with ἀντί, and yet the two prepositions touch each other in thought "in indissoluble correlation" (Düsterdieck) cf. ch. ii. 2.

And we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.—From the act of Christ's love for us springs a duty towards our brethren, incumbent on us (ὀφείλομεν); the thought is similar to ch. ii. 8, 6. The example of Christ must not be without corresponding works on our part (ch. iii. 8, 7). The essential union of believers to Christ must exhibit itself in the real moulding of their life after the pattern of Christ, in the use of the imparted gifts and the solution of the task assigned to us by the bestowal of that gift. Cf. Jno. xiii. 34; xv. 12, 18; xxi. 18, 19; Rom. xvi. 3, 4.

Vxx. 17. But whoso has the world's goods (sustenance of life).

By the adversative ὁ "John denotes the progress from the greater, which is justly insisted upon, to the less, the non-performance of which, therefore, appears as a correspondingly greater violation of the rule just laid down." (Düsterdieck), "Ὅς δ' ἂν makes the sentence quite general. The proverb quoted by Grotius: "βίος βίου δεόμενος οὐκ ἐστὶ βίος" gives the double sense of life, and the necessities of life, or the means of sustaining life. Cf. Mark xii. 44 (Luke xxi. 4); Luke viii. 45; xv. 80. Col. v. 12. Beza: "res mundanæ," "des biens de ce monde." The Genitive τοῦ κόσμου simply points to the sphere to which the βίος belongs, and, according to ch. ii. 17, denotes the profane and worthless character of these goods, as contrasted with the eternal love and the eternal life in Christ. βίος τοῦ κόσμου is the antithesis of ζωὴ αἰώνιος; the Christian shares the latter with Christ, the former with the world. The reference is not to uncommon wealth, but rather to any kind of property (ἐγγ, emphatically in anteposition), though it be in limited circumstances, a mere mite, or bread and potatoes. He that hath the means to give and

Seeth his brother have need.—θεωρεῖ pictorially describes the attitude and activity of the spectator; it is not a hasty look, but permanent looking on and into it (Matth. xxvii. 35; Mark xv. 40, 47; xii. 41; Luke xxi. 6; xiii. 35; Jno. ii. 23; vi. 19, 32; vii. 3; ix. 8; x. 12; xiv. 17; xvi. 10, 16); he has it before him like a picture which he contemplates with calmness and attention, τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ χρεῖαν ἔχοντα. On the expression and the thought cf. Eph. iv. 28; Mark ii. 25; Acts ii. 45; iv. 35; xx. 34; xxviii.

10; Phil. iv. 6. [He beholds the brother's need with unmoved eye—M.].

And shutteth up his bowels [inwards] from Him.—After the analogy of the Hebrew

סָתַם, σπλάγχνα is = καρδία, Prov. xii. 10 and very often in the New Testament. Bengel: "Cum visceribus clauditur vel aperitur res familiaris. Aspectus miserorum corda spectatorum illico pulsant vel etiam aperit." The heart ought to open itself in compassion and sympathy and move and open the hand to communicate; but it is under the aggravating circumstances of his having the means and beholding his brother's need that he shutteth up his heart and turns away from him (ἀπ' αὐτοῦ). The same pregnancy of thought occurs at ch. ii. 23. A similar use of κρύπτειν ἀπὸ may be seen at Luke xix. 42; Jno. xii. 36 b. Hence we need neither supply ἀποστρεφόμενος (Carpzov), nor ἀπὸ = coram (Socinus). [This was the case of Dives. He saw Lazarus flung at his gate, Lazarus desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table, but he desired in vain; Dives saw him lie in misery; the dogs had pity and sympathized with the poor man, but Dives, who fared sumptuously every day, looked with un pitying eye on his brother's distress; he saw in him a beggar, not a brother. See Augustine, Sermon 178, c. 8, and Massillon's beautiful Lent Sermon on this subject.—M.]—The negative is emphatically expressed with an implied paraetical inference in the interrogative sentence:

How abideth the love of God in him?—A similar construction may be seen ch. iv. 20; Jno. iii. 12; v. 47. The substance of the question answers to v. 15: οὐκ ἔχει ζωὴν αἰώνιον ἐν αὐτῷ μένουσαν, where eternal life not abiding and even not being in him is inferred from the non-existence of brotherly love, while here the non-existence of the love of God is inferred from the same premises. Ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ is our love to God and indicates the motion of eternal life to its fountain, as in ch. ii. 5. This love to God does not abide, where it does not become operative and preserve its vitality in the active exhibition of brotherly love. Hence it is neither God's love to us (Calov), nor the love prescribed by God (Socinus, Grotius), nor the love which answers to that of God and Christ (S. Schmidt).

Final exhortation. v. 18.

Vxx. 18. Little children, let us not love [German: that we do not love] in word, nor with the tongue, but in deed and in truth.—The affecting address, τέκνα, denotes at once the geniality and zeal of John; his earnestness is brought out in the rapid, hortatory, all-embracing expression: μὴ ἀγαπῶμεν. The four substantives occur in pairs and as correlates. First: λόγῳ and τῇ γλώσσῃ to describe false love; then: ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ and (ἐν) ἀληθείᾳ. It is important to note that the first pair in the Datives indicates only the means by which love is or becomes operative, while the preposition ἐν which by the copula καὶ belongs also to ἀληθείᾳ denotes the element wherein it moves (Jno. iv. 24). The first pair simply denotes the outwardness of a love which only makes use of words and the tongue, while the contrast indicates that it is destitute of deed and truth, that it is of real activity and inward heartiness which are the characteristics of true love. The Apostle accordingly annexes to λόγος, the word, which possibly might announce or accompany the deed, the emphatic μηδὲ τῇ γλώσσῃ, the Article serving the purpose "of rendering the expression more conspicuous" (Lücke); the tongue, "as the member appointed to utter the word" (Huther); so that love is not simply the word which might flow from the heart and be the instrument of its application, but stops with the tongue, the means and sole instrument of the word which does not proceed from the heart. Therefore λόγος is contrasted with ἐν ἔργῳ and τῇ γλώσσῃ with ἐν ἀληθείᾳ.—ἔργον and λόγος frequently connected together, as in Luke xxiv. 19; Acts vii. 22; sometimes λόγος and δύναμις (1 Cor. iv. 19, 20), or λόγος and δύναμις καὶ πνεῦμα ἁγίον καὶ πληροφορία (1 Thess. i. 5) are placed in opposition. Bengel: "Sermone otioso, lingua simulante." Lyra says excellently: "Verbo, facto nihilo; lingua fallaci; hic amor non solum, fictitius et vanus, sed etiam proditorius." τῇ γλώσσῃ denotes "the hollow nothingness," "the purely outward babble which without inward truth produces only a hypocritical show" (Düsterdieck). Hence we need not supply μήνιον to λόγῳ (Bede, Socinus, Sander and others); and Grotius is also wrong who obliquely [i. e. crosswise—M.] opposes: λόγος and ἀληθεία, γλώσσῃ ἔργῳ, thus: "Verbo amat qui prædicat a se diligi proximum, non autem vere diligit; lingua diligit qui egentem dat bona verba." Nor is Huther right, who takes τῇ γλώσσῃ and ἀληθείᾳ as epexegetical additions without introducing a difference to λόγῳ and ἔργῳ respectively, as if the two words of each member expressed only one idea [He says, to express the idea mathematically, that λόγος: γλώσσῃ=ἐν ἔργῳ: (ἐν) ἀληθείᾳ.—M.]. Compare ἀγαπᾶν ἐν ἀληθείᾳ 2 Jno. i.; 3 Jno. i. and Jas. ii. 16, 18.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. All the doings (ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην v. 10b, ἔργα δίκαια and ἔργα ποιηρὰ v. 12) and all the dispositions (ἀγαπᾶν v. 10b and v. 14, ὁμῶς v. 15) of men points to a deeper ground, a fellowship with God or with Satan which is not discernible per se, neither to others nor to the respective persons themselves, but discernible by their disposition and doing.

2. The grossest transgression, e. g. the fratricide of Cain, is never alone, but exhibits itself as one of many, as one of a greater complex of manifold transgressions and plainly indicates, that matters must be bad in other respects, because otherwise this would not have happened (v. 12).

3. Like attracts like, unlike repels unlike: love and antipathy are reciprocal. The Christian need not be surprised that the world from which he has separated himself, has turned away and remains alienated from him, dislikes and hates him; it is just so with himself, with this difference, that the world hates to persecute and destroy, whereas the Christian strives to improve and to overcome.

4. Before it can be said: μεταβεβήκαμεν ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου (v. 14), we are ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ, ἐκ τοῦ ποιηροῦ. Consequently:

1. Before such a stepping forth has taken place and without it, no one is a child of God.

2. Such stepping forth is indispensable in the case of any and every one who desires to become a child of God.

3. It is possible to all who are called to become the children of God.

4. The children of God and the children of the world are perfectly alike in kind and nature before the difference connected with such transition sets in.

5. Consider that those who are not yet brethren, may and shall become brethren as well as thou.—Indeed, it is not said here how it comes to pass, but it is plainly stated and may be seen at Jno. v. 24, a passage to which the Apostle unmistakably refers here, and from which may be inferred what is said here and well expressed by Scholiast II.: τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ δεξάμενος, of course ἐν πίστει. But we must not by any means say with the Roman Catholics that although factū produces the beginning of our justification before God, yet the love to God and to our neighbour increases the same. This love is simply the sign and mark of recognition that our justification has taken place, that we are justified. Augustine accordingly says very correctly: "Redeat unus quisque ad cor suum; si ibi invenerit caritatem fraternam, securus sit—jam in dextera est."

6. The principle affirmed at v. 16 as a duty (ὀφείλομεν) with reference to the example of Christ that we also should lay down our lives, is a general one. We must not regard it with the Roman Catholics as a counsel (consilium), but view and observe it with Evangelical Christians as a precept (præceptum). It applies not only to priests or saints, but to all Christians: "Ministri verbi non debent fugere in periculo pestis" (Luther); neither physicians in case of a pestilence, nor parents and brothers and sisters, nor the government in seasons of insurrection, nor soldiers in war, in the fight, before a battle, nor a mother when she has to nurse her child, nor a man when duty calls. This saying, moreover, must not be treated casuistically after the manner of Socinus, who thinks a Christian ought to die for a non-Christian if thereby his soul may be saved, or if the preservation of a brother is more necessary to the common weal than his own; or after that of Ammon (Sittenlehre 3, 24 sq.) be set aside, who thinks it right that in common danger of shipwreck, fire or self-defence, men are justified to kill others if they cannot save their own life in any other way. Düsterdieck rightly observes: "Concrete directions respecting the practical application of the principle can only be given in the connection of a complete system of Ethics in which especially the duties of Christian self-preservation and the virtues of Christian prudence and simplicity as well as those of Christian self-denial and Christian courage must be exhibited not as limitations, but as sacred ordinances of the fully valid evangelical principle as described by St. John." As St. Paul says 1 Cor. iii. 22: πάντα ὑμῶν ἵσται—εἴτε ζωὴ εἴτε θάνατος and at Phil. i. 21 calls: τὸ ἀποθανεῖν κέρδος, so the giving up of one's own life in the calling and for the love of Christ is an ἀποθανεῖν τῷ κοῦφῳ (Rom. xiv. 8). Cf. Matth. x. 39; xvi. 25.—

6. The duty of beneficence is universal; it relates as much to the rich as to the poor; it is immaterial whether a man has much or little of the βίος τοῦ κεραιου. The having much or little determines the giving with or without self-denial, with or without deprivation, consequently the giving with ease or with difficulty. But nothing is said here on that head or on the situation of the necessitous, his greater or lesser need, which may be very extraordinary; nor is any thing said of the worthiness or unworthiness of the necessitous. But the remark of Luther has a very important bearing on the care of our parochial poor; he says: "Vult nos de nostro largiri; non de alieno aut communi, sicut stulti Anabaptistae faciunt, qui tollunt proprietatem rerum, sine qua non possunt republicas consistere." Private charity, even personal charity, is here distinctly referred to. In this connection it must be supposed as ranged under the fifth commandment.—Its opposite is Stoicism which includes also compassion among the passions to be left off: οὐ μὴ ὁργὴν εἶναι, μὴ μῆλον, μὴ φθόνον, μὴ ἐλπίδα.

7. We must not think lightly of the word and its instrument, the tongue. But as the mouth-work of hypocrisy is hateful to the Lord (Matth. vi. 5), so the mouth-work of brotherly love is equally hateful to John, since neither the word nor the tongue is in the service of the love of the heart and speaks or is spoken separate from the heart and contrary to the life in the heart. The friendly utterance of the mouth must and ought to be in the case of Christians the friendly utterance of the heart. Otherwise it is only a μῦθος of the εὐσεβείας without the δύναμις (2 Tim. iii. 5). For the contrary see, Matth. xii. 34, 35; Rom. x. 8-10.

8. These concrete particulars of the laying down of our lives, of communicating the sustenance of life and of the love to our brother in deed and in truth plainly and pathetically indicate that regeneration and adoption by God, (ch. ii. 29) if it is a reality, penetrates, as the central life-power the whole periphery of life, so that we read not only of a εὐσεβεία but of εὐσεβείαι, 2 Pet. iii. 11 and even of the θεοσεβεία δι' ἧν ἔργον ἁγαθόν (1 Tim. ii. 10). For the diversity of good works induced by the faith of the heart makes it evident to others that the Christian sonship is not a show, but power and truth; his conduct towards the brethren reveals his relation to God the Father and this relation produces such conduct.

[The Apostle's declaration that every one that hateth his brother is a murderer or man-killer embodies the well known ethical principle that the moral quality of an action does not belong to the outward act, nor to the conception of it, nor to the resolution to carry it into effect, but to the intention. Hatred in St. John's view, is murder committed in intention, and he that cherishes hatred towards his brother stands convicted of murder before God and at the bar of his own conscience.—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The twofold piety of a child of God; 1. Obedience to the Father; 2. Love of the brethren.—Like the elder brother thou mightest stay with the Father and work in His field, be envious of and take offence at the friendly reception accorded to the younger son by the Father, in the parable of the prodigal (Luke xvi). Cain was the elder brother. This applies primarily to the servants of the Church but it applies also to many others. Cain did not hate Abel because of his herds, for he had his fair fields; or because of his parent's love, for he was his mother's pride; or because of personal beauty or any outward, temporal good; but he hated him because of his piety, on account of the favour he found before God.—Cain [ἦν] a lance a spear, a weapon.—

M.], called by Eve in feminine rashness her weapon, and in maternal vanity favoured and spoiled by her, made his offering of anything he found without any particular discrimination as to its quality, while Abel, disregarded and neglected, carefully selected the best of the best and presented it as an offering to his God.—Thou art able to take the life of thy brother's body but in doing so thou forfeitest thy own immortal life; thou becomest a man-killer in respect of thy brother's body, but in respect of thyself, a suicide, even a suicide of thy soul; depriving thy brother of his bodily, earthly life, thou deprivest thyself of thy spiritual, eternal life.—Three difficult questions: 1. Canst thou hate these whom God loves? 2. Darest thou shorten or waste the term of grace which God accords? 3. Wilt thou cast from thee the gift of God in thee, eternal life?—Threefold exhibition of brotherly love: 1. Laying down one's life for the brethren at duty's call. 2. Communication of one's possessions to the needy brethren. 3. Friendly and sincere readiness to oblige and aid the brethren.—Three things thou hast for the benefit of others: Body and life, goods and property, hand and heart.

ΕΡΙΣΤΑ ΤΟ ΔΡΟΞΕΡΟΣ [cap. vi]:—As the soul is in the body, so are Christians in the world. The soul dwells in the body but is not of the body; so Christians also dwell in the world, but are not of the world. The invisible soul is, as it were, keeping guard in the visible body; this is the mark of Christians as long as they remain in the world: their piety is invisible. The flesh hates and wars against the soul, which (the soul) is, however, by no means wronged [ἀδικουμένη = affected injuria].—M.] by it because it (the soul) forbids the indulgence of the lusts of the flesh; so the world hates the Christians, although they by no means wrong it but only resist the lusts of the world. The soul loves the flesh and the members which hate it; so also Christians love their enemies. [Cf. Matth. v. 44.—M.]

BASILIIUS:—Because the devil's hatred cannot reach God, he seeks to hurt and destroy man, the image of God.

AUGUSTINE:—The Christian lives, but, as it were, in winter; the root is alive but the boughs look dry; the living pith and marrow is within, and within are hidden the leaves and the fruits—but they wait for summer.

AMBROSE:—"Nemo dicat proprium, quod commune est; esurientium panis est, quem tu detines; nudorum indumentum est, quod tu recludis."

LUTHER:—The world is a den of murderers, subject to the devil. Would we live on earth we ought to be satisfied with being guests therein and putting up at an inn whose host is a roguish host, whose house bears the sign and title over the door: "Murder and lie." For Christ Himself did affix such a sign and title to his house right over the door by saying that He is a murderer and a liar. A murderer to destroy the body; a liar to seduce the soul.

STARKE:—Because God is Love and loves those who are born of Him, therefore love of the brethren is also the mark of the regenerate.—Art thou tempted with the thought that thou art without the grace of God, without the adoption, without salvation: be of good courage! If thou really and heartily lovest the godly, yea even the wicked and thy foes, thou mayest be quite sure that all these blessings are thy own.—Good Christian, whenever thou readest and hearest some portion of Divine truth, consider well the purpose of God in announcing it and shape thy course accordingly.—Contrary dispositions are not uncommon among actual brothers; the one may be good, the other bad, the one may be saved, the other damned.—The power of Satan over those children is so great that he changes even natural love into hatred.—Mad features of the ungodly! they cannot bear that the works of others are good—why? What is it that envy will not do? They also do not like it because it puts them to shame and sometimes becomes the means of their punishment.—Happy state of believers as contrasted with that of unbelievers! The former truly live, the latter are dead though their body is alive. We mourn for the dead—how much more ought we to mourn for the ungodly, for they are spiritually dead, before they die, and if they die, they fall into eternal death.—God has not only connected the hand but also the mouth and the heart with the fifth commandment.—Hatred is not a trifling sin of infirmity compatible with a man's continuing in a state of grace, but so great a sin as to entail the loss of eternal life, which is irrecoverably lost while hatred lasts. He that hates is a double murderer, he wants to hurt others and deprives himself of eternal life.—To have had life does not render us blessed; but he is blessed with whom eternal life abides.—It is one thing to have this world's goods and another to covet them: the one is the blessing of God, the other covetousness.—Poverty is no disgrace: a man may be poor and yet be the child of God, the brother of Christ and of good Christians.—Doing good to the poor is not only incumbent upon the rich, possessed of great abundance, but to every one who has this world's goods and is able to communicate; even as every one has to work, also for this purpose, that he may have something to give to the poor.—Love is blind in not having respect to the person of the poor, whether it be known or unknown, strange or native; but it is not blind in taking cognizance of the need it is to relieve.—Do not always wait for a poor brother's application, begging, supplication and appeal to thy love; many are ashamed to disclose their need; but if thou knowest thy brother's case, show pity unasked and joyfully.—If unable to do anything else, thou canst love with the tongue by words of good counsel and consolation; but see that thy heart be with thy tongue.—The greatness of a benefaction does not determine its worth before God, nor does its smallness lessen it; a great benefaction without sincere love is small, even nothing before God; but a small benefaction prompted by sincere and hearty love is great in God's sight.

NEANDER: As Cain hated and slew Abel in consequence of the contrast between a godly and an ungodly disposition, so the world hates and slays the children of God in consequence of the same contrariety of disposition. Hence the world and the children of God are ever at war like love and selfishness. Hence Christians need not be surprised, if the world hates them. This is to them the stamp of the divine life, the possession of which renders them the opposite of the world.

HUBNER: Being without love makes men like Cain, whose kind is not extinct. The mind of Cain is to destroy the hated children of God; literary murder also belongs to this head. As to its secret, inmost tendency, all hatred aims at murder.—The duplicity of mankind was prefigured in the case of Cain and Abel; this dichotomy runs through the whole Bible. Cain is the prototype of the evil and unloving, Abel the prototype of Christ.—A Christian Nil admirari, Pa. xxvii. Hatred and enmity is that which disquiets, vexes, excites and disconcerts the natural man most. But the Christian is bidden not even to be surprised at it! He knows the world, is aware of what he has to expect of it, he is at peace with God, lives a life of introversion, is so well rooted and grounded in God, so abundantly satisfied with the grace of God, that the world's hatred does not disturb him. God is his fortress: but he must not leave that fortress.—Where the hatred of the world has not yet fully developed, there is most surely a want of decided Christianity.—Love displays its most glorious beauty under the world's hatred. The Christian loves while the world has no idea of the existence of his love.—Formerly this world was extra-Christian, but now there is a world on the soil of the Christian Church. Is it offensive, hostile, presumptuous to speak of this difference? then it is the fault of the Bible, of Jesus Christ. We ought to hold up a mirror to all: you are either this or that. But it would be presumption to refer individuals to the class to which they belong, for this is the prerogative of God.—Death is the state of insensibility and impotence with respect to whatever is good and godly, the conscience is blunted and without receptivity, the heart is dead without any emotion, or interest in religion. Life is activity, emotion, a sense for, an impulse to and ability for the holy, a work after the will of God, a state of holiness, of a walk well-pleasing to God. Brotherly love is mentioned as a criterion, as a test of life.—Think of hatred as the root and beginning of murder. Often a bitter grief is to others more deadly and vitally injurious than a gross bodily injury.—Distinguish between that which passes with men and that which passes with God.—Never make room for secret anger: or life, the Holy Ghost will depart from thee.—The unloving thinks more highly of lifeless, worthless metal than of the living man created in the image of God.—What can you accomplish with the metal? Refresh the weary, comfort their hearts and dry their tears! Then you transmute stones into bread, earthly treasures into heavenly.—The word is only the shadow of the deed and by no means an equivalent of love or gratitude. (Themistius).

BESSER:—Where hatred is, there is death; where love is, there is life; yea, love itself is the life.—Thus Luther showed that he was willing to lay down his life for the brethren when in the year 1527 he stayed at Wittenberg with those who were stricken with the plague. So the ancient historian Eusebius narrates how a pestilence at Alexandria brought out the difference between the Christians and the pagans. So Hans Egede laid down his life when for the sake of the poor Greenlanders he exchanged his comfortable parish for hunger and cold, for unspeakable toil and sufferings; and the coast of Africa, also, lined with grave-hills with the seed of the negroes proclaims the love which is stronger than death. Would that it might be said of the Christians of our time what Tacitus said of the Christians, viz.: that they are as inflexible concerning their faith, as they are ready in the exhibition of mercy.—How can he live on God's compassionating love in whom no compassionating love does live?

On the Epistle for the second Sunday after Trinity, 1 Jno. iii. 15-18.

HEUBNER, during the siege of Wittenberg, in 1818, preached on the hatred of the world to which Christians are exposed, and said, notwithstanding the presence of the French garrison, when he came to speak of deserved hatred: the hatred is deserved, which visits the tyrant who sacrifices thousands and the welfare of thousands to his lust of rule.

The Christian under the hatred of the world.

1. How dignified is his demeanour in bearing it a. with calmness, composure and patience (v. 13); b. with the consciousness of his innocence, his love, as known to God (v. 14); c. with the hope of being one day justified (v. 2); 2. how holily he uses it: a. as a warning against all the motions of hatred (v. 15); b. as a challenge to become more like Christ in love (v. 16); c. as an instrument to reconcile the world to himself by love (vv. 17, 18).

Motives of comfort for Christians under the world's hatred. 1. (v. 13). They are unknown and misunderstood; 2. (v. 14); they become conscious of their life; 3. (v. 15); they are encouraged to fight against all unlovingness; 4. (v. 16); they resemble Christ; 5. (v. 17); become more and more assured of the love of God; 6. (v. 18); they hope to gain their enemies over.

The mind of the Christian and of the world opposed to each other in love and hatred. 1. To hate is natural to the world, to love to the Christian (vv. 13, 14); 2. Hatred destroys, love sacrifices the life (vv. 15, 16); 3. The world shuts up, the Christian opens the heart (v. 18).

Whither do we come if the spirit of love leaves us? 1. Answer: we come from the fellowship of the saints to the fellowship of the world (v. 13), from the life of God to spiritual death (v. 14), to vice and shame (v. 15), to forfeiting our salvation and the fruits of the death of Christ (v. 16).—2. Application: learn the worth of true love (v. 16), fight against every motion of unlovingness (v. 17), practise love in deed and in truth (v. 18).

The strong warnings given to Christians against an unloving mind.—Love appears most beautiful under the world's hatred.—Love, a sign of life.—It is only by love that a Christian can know whether he is a child of God or regenerate. 1. The truth. 2. The laying to heart being reminded of this truth.

Love in deed.

The true life in love and certain death in hatred: 1. The ground, fruit and nature of the true life; 2. Certain death in hatred of the brethren, as to ground and nature.

Brotherly love. 1. Who are our brethren? 2. How do we love the brethren? 3. What moves us to such love?

How operative is the love which flows from the living knowledge of the sacrificing love of Christ! 1. It takes us from death to life; beloved of God in Christ, we love. 2. It alone is able to bear the hatred of the world without ceasing to love (Matth. v. 39-42). 3. It is not only love in words and with the tongue, but in deed and in truth.

We know that we are born of God, for, 1. The world hates us; 2. We love the brethren; 3. We hate hatred, but not the hater; 4. We lay down our life for the brethren.

A heart-test of what spirit we are (Luke ix. 55, 56; Jer. viii. 6). 1. For the satisfaction of the righteous who in their love grieve over the world's hatred; 2. For the terror of the ungodly who hate their neighbour without fear or anxiety; 3. for the awakening of the hypocrites who love their neighbour only in appearance.—Questions of Confession.

[IGNATIUS:—(ad Smyrn, 6.): "Observe those who are heterodox with regard to the grace of Christ, how contrary they are to the mind of God. They have no regard for love,—περὶ ἀγάπης οὐ μέλει αὐτοῖς—they do not care for the widow, or the orphan, or the hungry or the thirsty."—M.]

[WORDSWORTH: (on v. 16).—"And we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren;" a remarkable saying on the duty of Christian martyrdom. It was probably suggested by the seductive tenets of the false teachers (οἱ πλανῶντες mentioned 1 Jno. ii. 26; iii. 7), who courted popularity in times of persecution; by alleging that provided a man had knowledge of the doctrines of Christianity as delivered by them, and adopted their theories, it was not necessary for him to expose himself to any danger in the maintenance of the faith, much less to endure martyrdom and to lay down his life for the brethren: but that he might freely associate with the heathen in their worship, and eat things offered to idols. This was particularly the doctrine of the Simonians (Origen c. Cels. VI. p. 282; Euseb. II. 13), and of the Nicolaitans (Rev. ii. 15. Irenæus I. 23) and of the Cerinthians (Philastr. hæc. c. 36).—Tertullian wrote his book called Scorpiace against these notions and he refers to this passage in proof of the duty of martyrdom, c. 12.—M.]

[MACKNIGHT: (vv. 14. 15):—According to the Apostle in this place, the surest mark, by which we can know our actual state, is to consider whether we possess that characteristic disposition towards our brethren, which the Christian religion enjoins. The high encomiums, passed in this and the following verse on love to mankind, are not to be so understood, as if no virtue but benevolence were necessary to complete the Christian character. The virtues have all such a connection with each other, that they cannot subsist separately. And therefore, if one really loves his brethren, he will not only be charitable to the poor, but he will be just in his dealings, true to his promises, faithful in all the trusts committed unto him. In short, he will carefully abstain from injuring his neighbour in any respect, and will perform every duty he owes to him, from a sincere principle of piety towards God, whereby his whole conduct will be rendered uniformly virtuous.—M.]

[SECKE:—If we do a person no harm, yet if we wish him harm, St. John has here determined the case, "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer." For indeed, hatred not only leads to murder, and too often, when indulged, produces it unexpectedly; but it is always, though perhaps for the most part in a lower degree, the very spirit of murder in the heart; and it is by our hearts that God will judge us.—M.]

[CLARKE: (on v. 15).—This text has been quoted to prove, that no murderer can be saved. This is not said in the text; and there have been many instances of persons who have been guilty of murder, having had deep and genuine repentance; and who, doubtless, found mercy from His hands who prayed for His murderers, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." It is, however, an awful text for the consideration of those who shed human blood on frivolous pretences; or in those vars which have their origin in the worst passions of the human heart.

(On v. 17).—Here is a test of this love: if we do not divide our bread with the hungry, we certainly would not lay down our life for him. Whatever love we may pretend to mankind, if we are not charitable and benevolent, we give the lie to our profession. If we have not bowels of compassion, we have not the love of God in us: if we shut up our bowels against the poor, we shut Christ out of our hearts and ourselves out of heaven.

(On v. 18). There is a good saying in Yalcut Rubeni, p. 145, iv. on this point: "If love consisted in word only, then love ceaseth as soon as the word is pronounced. Such was the love between Balak and Balaam. But, if love consists not in word, it cannot be dissolved; such was the love of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the rest of the patriarchs which were before them."—M.]

his heart against the claims of charity, shutting up his bowels of compassion from him! How unlike Him who, though He was rich, yet for our sake became poor, that we through His poverty might be rich. May we learn more and more that whatever share we enjoy of "this world's good," is intrusted to us as stewards for God; and that all pretence of possessing Christian love is vain, unless we minister freely to the necessities of our brethren what we have so freely received. Hereby alone can we know that we are of the truth, and can assure our hearts before Him."—M.]

[STANHOPE:—The good we would do, but cannot, shall be rewarded; and the evil, which we are disposed to do, though not actually done, shall be punished. Hence, if a man keep malice, though but in his heart, if he wish or rejoice at the misery or harm of his brother, this man is, in the eye of God, and of the Gospel dispensation, a murderer.—If some sudden change befalls my neighbour's fortunes, the diminution of his honour or estate, the blemishing his credit and reputation, and I feel a secret pleasure in such calamities, can it be charity that ties up my tongue from bitterness or slander, or my hands from invasion and cruelty? No, certainly.—He that triumphs in mischief and doth not act it himself; he that is fond of and cherisheth a scandal, but forbears to raise or spread it; it is not religion, but some other consideration, by which even this man is restrained. But alas! how few are there, in comparison, who think themselves bound to stop here! How few who, while they hold their hands from action, make no scruple to give their tongues a liberty of speaking "all words that may do hurt," and so contribute to the disgrace and grief of their injured and afflicted brother! and if they, with these sharp razors, wound and mangle a bleeding reputation, would not the same malice unsheath their sword and thrust it into his bowels, if their own safety, the fear of human laws, or some other prudential consideration, did not bind their hands, which leaves their tongues and thoughts at liberty? For, were religion, were the fear and love of God, their check, they would prevent the very beginnings of malice. This tells us that we must be compassionate and kind; that we must do to every man whatsoever we would that he should do unto us; that but to meditate or delight in evil is a sin, and that no instance of goodness should be wanting which the circumstances of any brother render reasonable for him to receive, and ours have put in our power to give; that a design of making him uneasy is not one whit less murderous and guilty, because not prosecuted in tenderness to one's self, and not to be effected with impunity. Thus God interprets it, and by this rule He will proceed with us; for He declares Himself a trier of the heart, and that in our last great reckoning, "every secret thing shall be brought into judgment."—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Transition and first consequence: the assurance of being of the truth.

VER. 19a.—And hereby we shall know that we are of the truth.—The connection is by the copula kai; the Future γνωσόμεθα is occasioned by the hortatory form of v. 18: μη ἀγαπήμεν, the sense being: "If we love ἐν ἔργῳ καὶ ἀληθείᾳ, we shall know thereby that etc." (Huther); the object of our knowing, ὅτι ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας ἔσμεν, is defined by what is said in v. 18. Thus close is the connection of the Apostle's argument with the preceding section in which he treated of obedience to the commandments of God and more particularly of brotherly love (v. 10—v. 18). Ἐν τούτῳ refers to what precedes, as in ch. ii. 5b., and not to what follows as in ch. ii. 3.—V. 19 is plainly connected with v. 18, not with v. 10 (Rickli, de Wette), or v. 14 (Lucke). The Future has here the same sense as in Jno. vii. 17; viii. 31, 32; xiii. 35, denoting the possibility of a case which may justly be expected to arise. Winer, Grammar, p. 294, sq.—Ἐκ ἀληθείας εἶναι requires to be interpreted like ἐκ θεοῦ εἶναι, τέκνον θεοῦ εἶναι both on account of the force of the preposition ἐκ which signifies principium vel ortum, and of the pregnant sense which John attaches to the word ἀληθεια. It is the truth eternal, originating in and springing from God revealed in Christ, testified to by the Holy Spirit as the Spirit of truth, the real substance of the Gospel, and designed to be expressed in the life of believers; it comes nearest to the idea of φῶς, and we ought therefore to compare the term: violæ patris (Jno. xii. 36). Cf. Jno. xvi. 37.—It is not covered by ἐκ θεοῦ εἶναι, but should be combined with it. The truth (out) of God is the nature of those who love the brethren and a well of life in them.—Hence we must not explain with Bede: "ex veritate quæ Deus est" (so also Calvin, Rickli and others), or with Calov: "ex verbo veritatis" (so also Spener, Bengel, Lücke, de Wette), and still less understand with Jachmann "the true religion," or with Nössel: "doctrina divina," or with Semler: "perfectionis vita." These definitions do not explain the idea ἀληθεια. Nor must we weaken the force of the preposition ἐκ and explain with Oecumenius: "ἀληθεύειν," or with a Lapide: "veracem esse, veraciter ambulare," or with Socinus: "vere talem esse, ut quis se esse se proficitur," or with Grotius: "congruere evangelio."

Second consequence: An assured heart before God, vv. 19b. 20.

VER. 19b. And we shall persuade our hearts before Him.—Πείθεω either to convince or to persuade; the object καρδίας ἡμῶν points to a difference within the personality, qualified by καταγινώσκῃ and hence perceptible. It is an ethico-religious difference: the accusation and condemnation of our heart against our own person. The Apostle designates by καρδία the inmost seat of the emotions (Jno. xiv. 1, 27; xvi. 6, 22), the source of our actions (ch. xiii. 2), and here also the judge within; συνείδησις in John, occurs only in the spurious passage ch. viii. 9, but is frequently used by Paul (Rom. ii. 15; ix. 1; xiii. 5; 1 Cor. viii. 7; 2 Cor. v. 11; Acts xxiv. 16) and also at 1 Pet. iii. 16, 21; Heb. xiii. 18. Origen cites v. 21, plainly either as: "ἐὰν μὴ ἡ συνειδήσις καταγινώσκει ἡμῶν," or as "ἐὰν ἡ συνειδήσις ἡμῶν μὴ καταγινώσκει." The Greeks take καρδία simply for συνειδήσις. Although καρδία is more comprehensive than συνειδήσις, yet the latter is contained in the former, viz., conscience is in the heart, which we must conceive to be disquieted and excited by and with the conscience. The connection requires us to construe πείθειν aimed at the point "ut desistant condemnare" (Bengel), as at Matth. xxviii. 14: πείσομεν αὐτὸν, i. e., the ἡγεμόνα and ὁμ-ῤ-ῥῆνους ποιήσομεν the soldiers on guard who had fled on the morning of the resurrection. According to the context and conformably to ὡς ἀγαπᾷ denotes a pacifying persuasion. The antithesis v. 21: ἐὰν μὴ καταγινώσκει—παρρησιᾶν ἔχομεν likewise makes ἐὰν καταγινώσκει—πείσομεν denote to pacify, to quiet as the effect of persuasion. Hence Fritzsche's explanation: "flectemus animos—ad amorem ostendendum," is false and wholly repugnant to the context. The reference however is not to the last judgment when the final decision and separation will take place, but rather to the inward transactions, which though prophetic of the last judgment, precede the same during this our earthly life. Accordingly, ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ is not coram illo in the last judgment and πείσομεν relates not to eternity (as Socinus, Lücke, de Wette construe), but only coram illo, in His presence, in His light. As the accusing heart on the ground of the Divine word, and in virtue of the impulse of and the fellowship with the Holy Spirit is disquieted, and the voice of God is heard in the conscience, so the heart must be quieted before God, on the ground and in virtue of His word and promise and in the fellowship with Him, so that the following words: "μεϊζων ἐστὶν ὁ θεὸς καὶ γινώσκει πάντα" explain ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ; imaginings of our own spirit and worldly diversions do not promote such quieting. Compare Düsterdieck. Hence we should construe the Future πείσομεν in coördination with γινώσμεθα and so connected with καὶ that it is also governed by ἐν τούτῳ, although the latter connected zeugmatically with γινώσμεθα denotes thereat, with πείσομεν, thereby; this is the more practicable, because ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας εἶναι intervenes and completes ἐν ἀληθείᾳ ἀγαπᾷ and γινώσμεθα introduces πείσομεν. It is therefore wrong to begin a new sentence with ἐμπροσθεν (Paulus, Fritzsche, Ebrard).

VER. 20. Because, if the heart condemn us, because God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.—The reading ὅτι ἐὰν—ὅτι μεϊζων is so well established that neither a conjecture like that of Stephanus, who proposes to read ὅτι μεϊζων, nor the cancelling of the second ὅτι, as done by Grotius, warrants us to lessen or remove the difficulties which are also rather contained in the thought. We have now the reason specified that we shall quiet our hearts before Him in case our heart should condemn us and find a verdict against us. Hence ἐὰν with the Subjunctive is perfectly right. Winer, Grammar, pp. 807, 808.—"Καταγινώσκειν stands midway between κατηγορεῖν, to accuse (Rom. ii. 15), which is still accompanied by an ἀπολογία (Rom. ii. 15), and κατακρίνειν, to sentence [in a bad sense—M.], condemn (Jno. viii. 10 sq.); the latter includes the judicial punishment (Jno. viii. 10; Col. iv.), while καταγινώσκειν denotes only the verdict found against a person accused to be followed by the punishment corresponding thereto. Cf. Deut. xxv. 1, 2. The term is therefore very significant with respect to the verdict found by our own soul against ourself, which is more than the mere accusation, because the καταγινώσκειν implies also the guilt of the person accused, so that the condemnation to the punishment, the κατακρίνειν, may justly be expected" (Düsterdieck). In the heart there is not only a party, but also a judge; the conscience is a court of justice. Hence it denotes here not only reprehenders or accuse (Vulgate, Augustine, Lücke, al.). Why the heart finds a verdict against us the context indicates "in a relative play on the words" γινώσμεθα—καταγινώσκειν, exactly like Jno. xv. 2. (Düsterdieck). Consequently [it finds the verdict against us—M.] that we are not wholly of the truth, that we do not perfectly, gladly and uninterruptedly love the brethren; for these are correlates of extraordinary difference in degree up to perfection. The explanation of the Greek commentators, who think of v. 18, and that of Düsterdieck, who connects it with v. 19, should be combined against those of Luther and Nösselt, who think of every defect except that of brotherly love; but every other defect would also show itself with respect to brotherly love, and render it deficient. Of course, the reference cannot be to a complete relapse, to a knowingly and grossly repeated case of untruthfulness in love or of unlovingness, since the lying words of love would have no corresponding deed (Estius, Episcopius, Lücke, al.) though we may and should think not only of lesser but also of graver offences, seeing that the conscience of Christians is sufficiently tender and acute to find an adverse verdict also with respect to lesser defects of love. The repetition of ὅτι before ἐὰν and μεϊζων is not peculiar to this passage but occurs also at Eph. ii. 11, 12. Lücke cites an example from Xenophon, Anab. 7, 4, 5 and 5, 6, 19 remarking, however, that while ὅτι in both places signifies that, it denotes here "because." The reason of the epanalepsis is not the forgetfulness of the author, but the importance of the thought which allows and requires such a rhetorical emphasis. Lücke admits the epanalepsis without hesitation, Winer, (Grammar p. 604, note 3,) is undecided, Luther hesitates and decides against it, the older and many modern commentators (Calvin, Wolf, Sander, Düsterdieck) are for it. There is hence no reason to read with Bengel, Baumgarten-Crusius, Lachmann, ed. maj. and others ὅταν or ὅτι ἐὰν—quicquid like ὅτι ἐὰν in v. 22 instead of ὅτι. It cannot be maintained with Düsterdieck that this is not Greek, and from the circumstance that ὅτι ἐὰν or even ὅταν ἐὰν never occurs in the New Testament without the variant reading ἀν, while ὅταν ἐὰν frequently occurs without a variant reading, it cannot be inferred that ὅτι ἐὰν cannot be read here. Cf. Winer, Grammar, p. 322, sq.—Matth. viii. 19 ὅταν ἐὰν occurs without the variant reading ἀν, and ὅταν ἐὰν is as well authenticated as ὅτι ἐὰν. But on that account it is only possible to read here ὅτι ἐὰν which is occasioned by the reading ἀν in A; καταγινώσκειν, which may have its object in the Accusative, also allows that reading. But the context forbids it; for it is hardly true that we can quiet our heart at every accusation, and the reason of such quieting to be connected with πεισόμεν is too much separated, while the putting and assumption of the case, as stated in v. 20, and required at v. 21, in which the heart stands in need of such quieting, is all but wiped out.—The main difficulty is, that in the circumstance of God being greater and knowing all things must be found, and that it really contains, a quieting of the heart under its accusations.—The word μείζων is of frequent occurrence in the writings of John; in a similar connection at ch. iv. 4; v. 9; in other connections, particularly at Jno. iv. 12; v. 36; viii. 58; x. 29; xiii. 16; xiv. 28; xv. 20. The context invariably supplies the sense in which it is used; here the sentence καὶ γινώσκει πάντα furnishes the necessary explanation; He γινώσκει, while the heart καταγινώσκει. "Dulce paremgenon in Græco" (Bengel). God is here called greater in comparison with our heart; the heart accuses: it is not that He accuses more than our heart, but that He judges differently, more justly than our heart; for He knoweth all things which our heart does not perceive, know or observe in giving sentence. Πάντα of course points into the heart itself and to the immediate surroundings; what is that? The context answers that question: v. 2: οὐπω γινώσκω ἑαυτὸν ὅτι ἐσώμεθα, v. 9: σπέρμα αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ μένει, we do not altogether know ourselves, we have only the beginnings and germs of the life from Him; Christ, His life, His bearing and taking away sin (vv. 5, 6), His destroying the works of the devil (v. 8), objectively completed, but subjectively to be gradually completed from a life-principle of the regeneration (ch. ii. 29), and moreover passing through man's own weakness and sin (v. 8: ἀνίκεῖ ἑαυτὸν), and through the hatred of the world (v. 18: μισεῖ ὁ κόσμος). God knows the whole (πάντα) of the new life of man even to the δύοις αὐτῷ ἐσώμεθα (v. 2), while man knows only the particular, the particular error of which the heart accuses him; God knows the power of His gift to man and its preservation in penitence, its growth and development both in the hope and the faith in him. Therefore God is greater and knoweth all things; therefore, this greatness of the God who is our Father is a ground of quieting when the heart accuses us, and in its vitality and tenderness finds a verdict against us. So Besser: "Our heart knows some things and pronounces against us: God knows all things and pronounces not against us, but for us, because the seed of the truth out of which we are born, is not concealed to Him." He knows, as Sander says, even the smallest spark of faith in the glimmering wick, or even the hidden germs of true love (Rickli). "Conscientia pusilla est et scit aliquid nostri duntaxat, at Deus magnus est, novit omnia nostra, præsentia, præterita, futura, et omnium, et habet jus voluntatemque condonandi" (Bengel).—Hence this verse is, sensu evangelico, to be understood of the love which forgives and destroys sin (Luther, Spener, Bengel, Besser, Düsterdieck, Huther and others), and not sensu legali, of judging righteousness and omniscience (Calvin, Beza, Socinus, Grotius, Calov, Lücke, Neander, Ebrard and others). Ebrard begins a new sentence and explains thus:

And before the face of God we shall convince our heart, mind, conscience, not the understanding, that if (already) our (easily deceived smaller) heart accuses us (that we do not practise love), God, the Omniscient, is greater than our heart (and that we so much the less can stand before Him, have παρρησία).—Nor must we construe: For, if the heart accuses us, because God is greater than our heart, He also knoweth all things; so de Wette sensu legali, Brückner sensu evangelico. Rather the importance of the thought justifies the epanalepsis of the ὅτι.

Third consequence. Filial confidence. vv. 21, 22.

V. 21. Beloved, if our heart condemn us not.—Ἀγαπᾷ as in ch. ii. 7; iii. 2; iv. 1, 7, 11 is here connected with the enjoyment of the forgiving love of God in order to bring out a new and other feature. The recurrence of the words ἡ καρδία καταγινώσκει ἡμῶν indicates the connection with the foregoing (although, as Bengel maintains, καρδία, v. 20, καταγινώσκει has the emphasis), in the same sense, in order to mark a particular case (ἐὰν with conjunct.), which is sure to arise, and only the negative μὴ marks the antithesis; the word used is μὴ and not μηκέτι, which would make the supposed case the consequence of what goes before (as Huther supposes). A similar construction occurs at ch. i. 8, 9.

We have confidence towards God.—

The words παρρησίαν πρὸς τὸν θεὸν ἔχομεν denote the state of the peace of the soul and of undisturbed confidence to God-ward which is opposed to that described before by πειθεὶν τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν, like at Rom. viii. 15. The παρρησία ch. ii. 28; iv. 17 is indeed the child-like free confidence before the Father in the time of judgment; the reference here also is to a judgment, in the court of the conscience, in one's own heart, but not to the future and final judgment. Hence Estius explains falsely: fiducia evadenda damnationis in die judicii. But the limitation of παρρησία to confident prayer and supplication is neither warranted by the word itself (2 Cor. vii. 4), the context, nor the construction with πρὸς, which simply indicates the direction and relation as in Rom. v. 1: εὐφρόνην—πρὸς τὸν θεόν, nor by the parallel-passage at ch. v. 14. Here it denotes joyful confidence to God-ward at every moment of life (Rickli, Düsterdieck and others), but not fiducia in nostris necessitatibus recurrendi ad ipsum (Lyra), or the girdle or mendicant's bag of all manner of necessities (Luther), fiducia in rogando (Bengel). [Alford: "To God-ward, in our aspect as turned towards and looking to God.—It must be remembered that the words are said in the full light of the reality of the Christian State,—where the heart is awakened and enlightened, and the testimony of the Spirit is active: where the heart's own deceit does not come into consideration as a disturbing element."—M.] But hereby it is not denied that the specific, yea the most significant feature of this filial confidence (Düsterdieck) is, what follows—

V. 22. And whatsoever we may (perchance, German: etwa) ask, we receive from Him.—The conjunction καὶ connects a particular already contained in παρρησία like καὶ in v. 10b (Düsterdieck). Ὅ ἐὰν αἰτῶμεν is to be taken quite generally and to be limited only by the subject asking, namely the child of God and his wants (Düsterdieck, Huther). [The latter beautifully adds: "The child of God asks for nothing which is contrary to the will of his Father"—M.]. The same holds good of λαμβάνομεν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ (θεοῦ). The Present must not be taken for the Future (Grotius); it rather denotes the present, constant intercourse between the child of God with his God. Cf. Jno. xiv. 18; xvi. 24. Augustine: "Caritas ipsa novit, caritas ipsa orat, contra hanc aures claudere non novit, qui illam dedit; securus esto, caritas roget, et tibi sunt aures dei; non fit, quod vis, sed fit, quod tibi expedit."

Because we keep His commandments and do the things which are pleasing in His sight.—Here is evidently a parallelism: ἐντολὰς—τηρεῖν and τὰ ἀρεστὰ ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ ποιεῖν, so that the two together constitute one idea. At Jno. viii. 29, τὰ ἀρεστὰ αὐτῷ occurs in a connection similar to the present. Besides this also in Acts vi. 2; xii. 8.—The term εὐαρεστός of frequent occurrence in the Pauline writings (Rom. xii. 1; xiv. 18; 2 Cor. v. 9; Eph. v. 10; Phil. iv. 18), with the Dative τῷ θεῷ or τῷ κυρίῳ is used Col. iii. 20 of the fourth commandment, and the parallel passage Eph. vi. 1, has δίκαιον. Cf. 1. Tim. v. 4: ἀπόδεκτον ἐνώπιον τοῦ θεοῦ. Hence we must also connect τὰ ἀρεστὰ with the commandments. But while the first clause of the parallel sentence specifies the commandments, the second clause marks that which is pleasing in His sight and the kind of obedience, because God requires not a slavish service, but filial obedience, and that an active one (ποιούμεν). Hence we must not explain with the Roman Catholic expositors ἐντολαὶ of praecepta and ἀρεστὰ of consilia evangelica. The greater difficulty is the right construction of the connection with ὅτι, which indicates the reason why our prayers are heard. But the ground is not necessarily causa meritoria as the Greek writers think who assume an ἀντιδιδόναι on the part of God; and the Roman Catholics and the Rationalists of course agree with them. The context, especially with respect to ch. ii. 29; iii. 6, 9, 23, 24, shows that while prominence is given to their conduct the reference is to the relation in which they stand, or with the description of their activity to the ground on which they move. The relation between God and themselves which conditions and regulates their conduct is the cause why their prayers are heard, because their conduct conditioned by that relation also regulates their prayers according to the will of God (κατὰ τὸ θέλημα αὐτοῦ ch. v. 14); the prayers as they are made, so they are heard, because we are the children of God. The expression of Hunnius, that the particle ὅτι is not causalis but rationaliva, is beside the mark, although the idea is correct. Cf. Düsterdieck. [Huther has multum in parvo: "ὅτι in close connection with the immediately preceding λαμβάνομεν indicates the ground of the Divine exhibition of love in hearing prayer; this ground, which must not be taken as causa meritoria, is the filial obedience of the person asking, whereby God identifies him as His child; the idea of obedience is expressed in two coördinated sentences (resembling the Hebrew parallelism); τὰς ἐντολὰς αὐτοῦ and τὰ ἀρεστὰ ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ are synonymous; ποιεῖν marks the obedience as being active; the second sentence points to the circumstance that it does not consist in servile subjection to the commandment, but in the filial performance of that which is well-pleasing to God." Alford, adverting to the Romish misinterpretation, excellently expounds: "Out of Christ, there are no good works at all: entrance into Christ is not won or merited by them. In Christ, every work done of faith is good and is pleasing to God. The doing of such works is the working of the life of Christ in us: they are its sign, they are its fruits: they are not of us, but of it and of Him. They are the measure of our Christian life: according to their abundance, so is our access to God, so is our reward from God: for they are the steps of our likeness to God. Whatever is attributed to them as an efficient cause, is attributed not to us, but to Him whose fruits they are. Because Christ is thus manifested in us, God hears our prayers, which He only hears for Christ's sake: because His Spirit works thus abundantly in us, He listens to our prayer, which in that measure has become the voice of His Spirit. So that no degree of efficacy attributed to the good works of the child of God need surprise us: it is God recognizing, God vindicating, God multiplying, God glorifying His own work in us. So that when e. g. Corn. a Lap. says, "Congruum est et congrua merces obedientiae et amicitiae, ut si homo faciat voluntatem Dei, Deus vicissim faciat voluntatem hominis," all we can reply is that such a duality, such a reciprocity, does not exist for Christians: we are in God, He in us; and this St. John continually insists on. We have no claim ab extra: He works in us to do of His good pleasure: and the works which He works, which we work, manifest before Him, and before all, that we are His children."—M.].

Fourth consequence: Fellowship of the Spirit with particular reference to the ground of these consequences, vv. 23, 24.

V. 23. And this is His commandment.—Ch. i. 5: καὶ ἴσθιν αὐτὰ. Καὶ is simply copulative and connecting with τὰς ἐντολὰς αὐτοῦ specifies the most essential contents of ἡ ἐντολή, which indeed embraces two commandments, faith and love, but which two commandments, being indissolubly united, contain the sum-total of the being determined by the Divine Will in Christ. Ἐντολή refers neither to the first commandment (J. Lange), nor must it be construed in a sense it does not bear (de Wette); it is and remains the expression of the Divine Will (Düsterdieck). Αὐτοῦ of course is—τοῦ θεοῦ. [Oecumenius: ἐχόντες ἐντολὴν, ἵνα τῇ πιστεὶ τῇ ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ ἴπῳ. Χρ. ἀγαπήμεν ἀλλήλους. Bede: Singulari numero mandatum praemissit, et duo subsequentia adiungit mandata, fidem scilicet et dilectionem, quia nimirum haec ab invicem separari nequeunt. Neque enim sine fide Christi recte nos alterutrum diligere, neque vere in nomine Jesu Christi sine dilectione possumus credere.—M.].

That we should believe on the name of His Son Jesus Christ and love one another.—Here ἵνα indicates the purpose and not only the contents of the commandments, as Huther explains [But the strong telic sense of ἵνα can hardly be pressed here; see ch. iii. 1, 11.—M.]. The Aorist πιστεύομεν is not only the best authenticated and difficilior lectio, but also more thoughtful than the πιστεύωμεν formed after the pattern of ἀγαπῶμεν, and denotes by the side of the Present ἀγαπῶμεν, that the former precedes the latter, πιστός as the pre-supposition, not as being done once for all (against Düsterdieck), but as a root of vital strength, and ἀγάπη as the stem, as in Gal. v. 6: πιστός ἐν ἀγάπῃ ἐνεργουμένη, or 1 Tim. i. 5: ἀγάπη—ἐκ πίστεως. Faith conceived as an ἔργον θεοῦ (Jno. vi. 29) and Jno. xvi. 9 (ἀμαρτία, διὸ οὐ πιστεύουσιν εἰς ἐμὲ) as the ground of a holy being, of the whole obedience, is yet man's work and hence may be required in the commandment, more especially since the construction πιστεύειν τι (Jno. iv. 21; v. 24, 46, 47; viii. 45) denotes the assensus with which man's agency awakes, while πιστεύειν τινα describes the received notitia, and πιστεύειν εἰς τινα the God-wrought fidelitas, which embraces the least, the notitia, and also the moment next to it, the assensus. The object of faith is τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. This ὄνομα is the revelation of the being of the Son of God, and contains within itself and discloses to believers what is testified of Him and by Himself, and is to be testified; it includes both the prædicatio (Rom. x. 14) as Calvin and Beza explain, and the meritum and the promissiones Christi et de Christo, as pointed out by S. Schmidt and others. Doctrina Christiana (Episcopius), and the dignity of the Messiah (S. G. Lange), are consequently insufficient. [Alford: "To believe the Gospel-message concerning Him, and Him as living in it, in all His fulness."—M.] Conformably to the close connection of faith and love (Jno. xvi. 4, 7 sqq.) the Apostle now annexes the Present ἀγαπῶμεν to the Aorist by the copulative καί.—The additional clause—

As He gave us commandment, being a further qualification of love (ch. ii. 7, 8; iii. 16; Jno. xiii. 84; xv. 12, 13), belongs to the latter part of the sentence (Myrberg: non modo amandum est, sed etiam vere et recte amandum), and not to the former (πιστεύωμεν), as Estius, Bengel, Sander.—Hence Christ, and not God, is and remains the subject of this lateral idea. Christ, on whom, as the Son of God, we have to believe, is the origin and standard of brotherly love.

V. 24. And he that keepeth His commandments, abideth in Him and He in Him.—Passing over the lateral idea and the ἐντολή, v. 23, and resuming the ἐντολὰς τηρεῖν, v. 22, the Apostle now makes prominent the fourth consequence, the fellowship of God with us and our fellowship with God, according to which He is in us and we are in Him. Hence αὐτὸν, αὐτῶν, αὐτῶς—all three—describe God and not Christ (Neander, Besser, Sander).

And hereby we know that He abideth in us, from [out of] the Spirit that He gave us.—God's abiding in us is the object of knowledge; and it is important to notice that God's abiding in us is not specified here as res minus verisimilis (Socinus), but as the condition of our abiding in God; the two mutually include each other and must be taken in that sense. And this is known ἐν τούτῳ—ἐκ πνεύματος. Ἐν τούτῳ obviously refers to what follows, as ch. ii. 8, and not to what precedes, as ch. ii. 5. Surprising is the transition from the formula ἐν τούτῳ, placed at the beginning of this sentence and so current in John, to ἐκ πνεύματος, but the transition may be explained by the circumstance that after δὲ μένει ἐν ἡμῖν the clearness and beauty of the structure required substantive proof, and that this substantive proof occasioned the fine and thoughtful description of the source and origin of that knowledge by the preposition ἐκ. Cf. ch. iv. 6: ἐκ τοῦτου γινώσκωμεν. The πνεῦμα is the Holy Spirit who moves us, the living and powerful principle of our life from (out of) and in God. Here we should remember the χρίσμα; ch. ii. 20-26. Inadequate is de Wette's explanation, that πνεῦμα denotes the Divine appropriated in faith and life, but that the reference here is to the right knowledge and doctrine of the person of Jesus, and even more inadequate is the opinion of Socinus, that πνεῦμα is love.—In the annexed relative sentence οὐ must not be taken as a genit. partitivus, but as the result of attraction. Winer, Part III. § 24.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Christian should not be or remain in a state of uncertainty whether he really is a child of God (out of) the truth; his redemption and the reconciliation of God to him and his reconciliation to God and his salvation need not be to him a doubtful or only probable state. But clear and firm knowledge on this subject he does not acquire at one stroke, over-night; he must learn it by living and exercising himself in love. The Christian in process of being [i. e., in the development of this Christian life—M.] is in a state of fermentation, or engaged in single combat, without a survey of the whole field, the battle conducing to victory, although here and there defeats occur, and he is forced to retire even unto flight—without being able to imperil the ultimate victory. Hence he has misgivings which he can and ought to discard, fearless and full of confidence and reliance on the Lord of hosts and of the victory.

2. The final cause of such assurance of faith and blessed certainty of salvation, constantly exposed to the danger of being disturbed by the accusations and charges of the heart discerning and reproving the ever-recurring omissions and imperfections and transgressions in thought, word and deed, lies not in ourselves, neither in the mark, in brotherly love and, generally, in obedience to the commandments of God, nor in such acts of reproof of an anxious and contrite heart, but in God Himself, in that which He has promised and imparted to us, and that He abides by His word and work, also in our hearts, nursing and furthering the same even unto completion. Three things are clearly and distinctly asserted.

a. If the Christian looks at himself, anxiety and doubts concerning the state of grace are justified; Heb. vi. 4-6; x. 26-31, in which passages Luther found "a hard knot," and on which see R. Stier, point to the possibility of a relapse, as also Rom. viii. 13; Gal. vi. 7, 8. This is contrary to Calvin's assumption of the donum perseverantiae given with regeneration, and which is not taught at Jno. x. 28, 29. But if the Christian looks up to the mercy of God, he acquires confidence and joyfulness and the Holy Spirit bears witness of his adoption and Divine life-fellowship (v. 24, Rom. viii. 16-27). This is contrary to the Roman Catholic doctrine except by that the Christian, special revelation, cannot have any certainty concerning his state of grace.

b. The point in question is not a mathematical certitudo, an actus intellectus, but only fiducia as well as confidence in the pureness of a man's disposition.

c. The certain assurance of standing in God's grace is not identical with nor to be confounded with the certainty of being predestinated. The Council of Trent was right, in opposition to the Reformed, to reject this certainty (vi. 15, 16) but wrong in rejecting the former assurance (vi. 9): "Sicut nemo pius de Dei misericordia, de Christi merito deque Sacramentorum virtute et efficacia dubitare potest, sic quilibet, dum se ipsum suamque propriam infirmitatem et indispositionem respicit, de sua gratia formidare et timere potest, quam nullus scire valeat certitudine fidei, cui non potest subesse falsum, ac gratiam Dei esse consecutum." Here, as we may readily perceive, truth and falsehood are suspiciously mixed up. Cf. Frank, Theologie der K. F. 2, 78, 141. Thiersch, Vorlesungen über Protestantismus und Katholizismus, 2, 149-159.

8. The two cases that conscience finds a verdict against us and not against us are opposed to each other, but nevertheless facts belonging to the Christian life and perfectly compatible with it, even as ch. i. 8, 9 and ch. iii. 9 do not cancel each other. These propositions cannot be classed among the paradoxes, which may not be without truth, as stated by Luther, e. g. "Si in fide fieri posset adulterium peccatum non esset," and Proposition 32 in Grund und Artikel, which were unjustly condemned by the Romish bull (1520, Erlangen, 24, 138): A good work done in the very best manner, is still a daily sin, etc.—Nor dare we try to aid the establishment of a morality for the people, and another morality for the saints by drawing with the Roman Catholics a distinction between præcepta and consilia evangelica, between a selfish amor concupiscentiæ calculating on salvation and an amor amicitie surrendering itself in pure fidelity. We may neither separate by false distinctions the objectively given commandments with the will of God nor the subjectively imposed obligations, nor, worse still, men from one another. But we ought to contemplate both truths, that our natural disposition which is sinful before God ever and again mingles without, and contrary to the Christian's will with the works done by the motions of the Spirit from above and in faith, and that the Christian born of God has before his eyes and in his heart the one will of God, as revealed in the Law and in Christ, which aims not at a higher or a lower morality [but at one morality—M.], and that his obedience is well-pleasing to God, not because of his own doings or nature, but solely for the sake of Christ. Our life here on earth is made up of alternate joy and grief, of rising and falling, of forgiveness of sins and cancelling and the commission of sin. Sin, moreover, is more sinful in the children of God than in the servants of perdition, for they have a more profound and lively sense of the slightest stirrings of the wrath of God, because and though their falling is not yet a falling from grace, as at Gal. v. 4 (τῆς χάριτος ἐξενέσθαι). Not every falling involves the loss of grace. But obedience and patience in good works remain marks of the state of grace. Cf. C. A. 6, 20, f. C. 4, 5, 6, Frank 1, 1; 2, 177 sq.; 181 sq.; 189 sqq.; 389 sqq.

4. Filial confidence which does not begin with the entrance upon our inheritance [but here on earth—M.], has a παρρησία not only in the day of judgment, but already here on earth, and it evidences itself both by zealous efforts towards self-sanctification based on the assurance of the forgiveness of sins, and by confident prayer. "Prayer is as essential to man as his conscience, because the conscience, in proportion to its clearness and vitality, necessarily passes into prayer" (Löber, Lehre vom Gebet p. 1.). If the conscience is pacified, prayer will be sure of being heard. If man is so circumstanced that he lives and moves in God's word, his word in prayer to God will also prevail with God, in whose being (as we may learn from the case of the praying God-man), as well as in man's being prayer has its ultimate reason. Harless, therefore, has not very judiciously classed prayer among the subjective means of Christian virtue (Ethik §. 38).—A limitation of prayer that may be heard beyond the pattern-prayer of the Lord's Prayer is not permitted; you may in the state of grace pray for every thing assured of being heard, but equally assured that nothing is said of the time when and the manner how your prayers will be heard. God hears whatever we ask, but not exactly as we ask.

5. Faith in God, who is Love, and (in virtue of our belief in the love of God) love of the brethren are intimately connected, the reference being to "faith as the transition from darkness to light and love as the walk in the light" (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis XI., 2, 337, cf. v. 14).

6. It follows from the testimony of the Holy Spirit within thee (cf. No. 2 above), that thou art a temple of God (1 Cor. iii. 16), or a tabernacle of God among men (Rev. xxi. 8).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Much depends on knowledge, more on knowledge of the truth, most on the knowledge whether we are ourselves of the truth.—He is to be pronounced happy in whom the difficult self-knowledge was acquired and carried out as the knowledge of sin, but more happy he in whom the knowledge of God forces itself through the knowledge of himself.—Four marks of our adoption or four evidences of our being of the truth: 1. Peace of the soul under the accusations of conscience (vv. 19, 20); 2. Filial trust under the wants and deprivations of life (vv. 21, 22); 3. Assurance and decision under the manifold and different requirements (x. 23); 4. Joy of fellowship in solitude or desertion.—How can you pacify your heart disquieted by the accusations of conscience? 1. Know what God has hitherto done for you not in vain: He desires to save you; 2. Feel how in such a judgment the holiness of God is working in you: He desires to purify you; 3. Hope that He will gloriously accomplish it, as He has promised: He is the Master and your life will be a masterpiece at the last.—Prayer and commandment are essentially related to each other; thy word addressed to God in prayer will surely be heard, if God's word addressed to thee in the commandment is observed. God will not be asked in vain by those who suffer themselves to be commanded by Him. The hearing of prayer is not affected by the conduct of man fixed by his relation to God, but by this relation which produces in man childlikeness, childlike obedience, childlike trust, childlike disposition and childlike ways, even as it affords paternal fidelity and paternal aid. With faith in the name of His Son Jesus Christ thou hast the love of God above all things, or the fulfilment of the commandments of the first table; and from faith in the paternal love of God revealed in Christ flows Christian brotherly love, or the fulfilment of the commandments of the second table.—He is in us, this is ever the first and most important thing; His commandments are before our obedience to them; and He is with and in them. But if we do not value His commandments we do not value ourselves, we become ruins and a desert. In desert ruins He does not dwell; we must be builded up, if not into temples, at least into tabernacles. He builds—even the tabernacle into the temple, and instead of cares of the soul in indigence of the Good and the Eternal Good, jubilant hymns of praise for the inheritance of the saints swell in majestic fullness and strength.—Without Christ, the Son of God, God is not thy Father but without the Spirit of the Father and the Son, thou hast neither God the Father nor the Saviour.

LUTHER:—Although our conscience make us afraid and represent to us God as angry, yet God is greater than our heart. Conscience is but a single drop, but the reconciled God an ocean of consolation.—When a man is rebuked and condemned by his conscience, he grows terrified; but against this darkness of the heart we may say, God knoweth all things. Conscience is always fearful and shuts the eyes; but God is deeper and higher than thy heart and searches its inmost state most thoroughly.

STARKE:—We believers do not indulge in idle imaginings and suppositions, but have sure, firm, irrefragable grounds and testimonies, wrought by the Holy Ghost Himself that we are of the truth and born of God.—A man may have a great temptation and yet be a child of God.—Away with forged letters and testimonials! if the inward witness of the conscience contradicts and condemns. Conscience is more than a thousand witnesses. How false is the charge that Christianity causes melancholy and gloominess! Sorrow may indeed be found among Christians but without any fault of Christianity or of God, and moreover with them true knowledge is followed by their sorrow being turned into joy.—A heart rejoicing before God is a great treasure; O, the happiness of being permitted to appear before God in His majesty with joyfulness; therefore let us pray: Lord, give us a cheerful heart!—The spirit of joyfulness is also a spirit of prayer. Believers will receive what they ask of God in the manner which He has promised and at the time He thinks proper.—Nothing can be required of a Christian beyond faith and love: believers will not be taken captive by statutes, but they stand in liberty.—Be ashamed to say or order anything without the commandment of God, and again be ashamed to do anything in opposition to the commandment of God.—To live a good life requires us to abide good; it is not enough to have come into God, one must also abide in Him.—The believer is a great miracle, seeing that the infinite and immeasurable God wholly dwells and walks in him.

HEUBNER:—Is here perchance taught work-confidence? No! faith remains the ground of justification but we may hope that the genuineness and purity of our faith will follow love.—The Christian's prayer is never unheard; for God gives us that which is good although not always that to which we gave utterance, not that which we intended; the Christian ever desires the Good and the Good only, and the better we grow, the more do all our desires coincide with the will of God. Only those are able to ask who are in a state of grace; a serious, pious, honest mind is the condition of prayer; a braggart cannot pray.—The presence and continued operation of the Spirit in keeping us in the right discipline, warning, moving, strengthening and comforting us, is the sign that we belong to Christ, if He leaves us we are separated from Christ.

Adapted from ZIEL (Gesetz und Zeugnis, 4):—How happy they who are of the truth! 1. They may pacify their heart before Him. 2. They have a joyful confidence toward God; 3. They are they that will receive from Him whatsoever they ask.—Compare here hymns like PAUL GERHARD'S: "Ist Gott für mich, so trete (If God is for me, etc.).

*Sein Geist spricht meinem Geiste Manch süßes Trostwort zu;
Wie Gott dem Hülfe leiste,
Der bei Ihm sucht Ruh;
Und wie Er hab' erbauet,
Ein' edle neue Stadt
Da Aug' und Herz schauet,
Was es geglaubt hat.
Da ist mein Theil und Erbe
Mir prächtig zugericht';
Wenn ich gleich fall und sterbe,
Fällt doch mein Himmel nicht. (v. 9.)*

His Spirit cheers my spirit
With words of comfort sweet;
That they God's help inherit
Who rest with Him do seek.
And that He has upbuilded
A city fair and new,
Where eyes and heart forever
What they believed shall view.
For there in glory lying
My lot is held in store
With all my falls, and dying,
My heaven falls nevermore.

Also ERDMANN NEUMEISTER'S: Jesus nimmt die Sünder an (Jesus, sinners does receive); especially v. 7.

*Mein Gewissen quält mich nicht,
Moses darf mich nicht verklagen;
Der mich frei und ledig spricht,
Hat die Sünden abgetragen* (1 Jno. iii. 5),
*Dass mich Nichts verdammen kann;
Jesus nimmt die Sünder an.*

My conscience now is purified,
All plea to Moses is denied,
He acquitteth me to-day
Who all sin did take away;
Nothing can condemn or grieve
Jesus sinners does receive.

[PYLE: vv. 19-21.—This will show us to be Christians indeed; and while the impartial testimony and inward sense of our own consciences assure us of the sincere performance of our own duty, we may safely conclude that God, the Searcher of hearts and Standard of all truth, will approve of and reward us. And on the contrary, whoever by the clear conviction of his own mind knows and feels himself to be a hypocritical transgressor of his moral duty, must be assured that God, who knows him better than he does himself, cannot fail to be his more severe judge and avenger.—M.]

[BULL: v. 20.—If a man be conscious to himself of his own wickedness, yea, the very secret wickedness and hypocrisy of his heart, sure God Himself, who set up in every man this "candle" of conscience, as Solomon calls it, Prov. xx. 27, cannot be ignorant of it; He being the fountain of all knowledge, and all knowledge in the creature derivative from Him, and so knowing all things that are knowable by any creature, and infinitely more.—M.]

[MACKNIGHT: v. 22.—This general declaration must be limited by the conditions, which in other passages of Scripture are made necessary to our petitions being granted by God; such as, that we ask things agreeable to His Will, ch. v. 14, 15; and that we ask them in faith, Jas. i. 6; that is, in the full persuasion of the Divine wisdom and goodness, and with sincerity and resignation. Such prayers, they who keep the commandments of God, may hope will be heard, because they keep His commandments by habitually doing the things which are well-pleasing to Him.—M.]

[PYLE: vv. 23, 24.—These verses may be thus paraphrased: In short, true faith in the doctrine of Christ, and true charity to mankind, especially to our Christian brethren, is the sum-total of our duty. And you, that have already duly performed it, have a sufficient pledge and earnest of your acceptance with God, as true disciples of Christ, by the gifts and graces of His Holy Spirit conferred upon you.—M.]

[RIDLEY: v. 24.—The way of the Spirit is not to be traced; the working of God is not to be perceived. The Divine Author and His operation are hidden from us, but His work is manifest. And though we cannot see God at any time, or feel the motion of the Spirit in our hearts, yet is there certain evidence whether we are brought on by Him or not. St. John gives us an infallible rule, that we may know that God, by His Spirit, dwelleth in us, if we keep His commandments.—M.]

[Ezekiel Hopkins:—A clear conscience gives us boldness of access unto God. Guilt abashes the soul, and makes it both ashamed and afraid to appear in the presence of God: and therefore Adam, as soon as he had sinned against his

Maker, presently hides himself from Him. We may observe in ourselves, what a slavish dejectedness seizeth us when we come to God in duty, after we have wronged Him by any known sin: we come to Him suspiciously; and with such a misgiving fear, as if we would not have God take notice that we are before Him; and are still in pain, till the duty be over. But, when our consciences are clear, oh, with what delight do we haste to God, and with what content do we stay with Him! How doth the soul dilate and spread itself under the smiles of God, beating full upon it! "So, O Lord, here is a heart that I labour to make and keep void of offence; do thou fill it with thy promised grace and Spirit. It is not, indeed, a mansion pure enough for the pure and holy God; yet it is such, as thou wilt accept, and in which thou wilt dwell. There are still many hidden corruptions in it, but do thou search them out; and thou, who hast kept thy servant from presumptuous sins, do thou also cleanse me from secret faults." Thus a clear conscience, with a holy and reverend boldness, addresseth itself to God; and sweetly closeth up every duty and every prayer, with full assurance of obtaining mercy from God. So the Apostle (Heb. ix. 22): "Let us draw near . . . in full assurance of faith:" how may we gain this full assurance, when we draw near to God? By "having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience;" get but a pure and clear conscience, and that will enable you to draw near to God in full assurance of faith, and so here (1 Jno. iii. 21): "Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God:" if conscience be not evil to accuse us, then have we confidence towards God: when the face of man's conscience looks cheerful, and hath not a frown or a wrinkle upon it, this makes us joyfully to apprehend that God's face towards us is serene also, and that we shall be welcome at all times into our Father's presence: this conscience suggests to us, and makes us come with a holy, yet with an awful boldness unto God.—M.]

[BARROW:—No man can otherwise found any assurance of God's special love to him, than upon a good conscience: testifying that he doth sincerely love God, and endeavour faithfully to obey His commandments.—If we desire to judge reasonably about ourselves, or to know our true state, the only way is to compare our hearts and lives with the law of God, judging ourselves by that rule according to which God will judge us. If we find in our hearts the love of God and goodness (sincere although imperfect); if we perceive ourselves disposed to keep God's commandments (to live piously, righteously and soberly in this world); then may we have a satisfactory hope concerning our state; then "we may (as St. John saith) have confidence toward God, because we keep His commandments and do those things that are pleasing to Him:" but if we do not find that mind in us, and that practice, we, in conceiting well of ourselves upon any other grounds, do but flatter and impose upon ourselves; if all the world should account us good, and take us to be in a good case, we should not at all believe them, or mind them; for let no man deceive us, he that doeth righteousness, he (and he alone) is righteous, is the most faithful advice and unquestionable sentence of St. John. It is therefore (that by resting on such false bottoms we be not abused, and drawn thence to neglect the amendment of our hearts and ways, in order to our final account) a duty incumbent upon us thus to search our hearts and try our ways, and accordingly to judge ourselves: the doing which with care and conscience would dispose us to prepare for the judgment we speak of; for, If (saith St. Paul) we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged, or not condemned.—M.]

[NEANDER:—(Christ), when about to part from His disciples, no more to be with them in His personal bodily presence, promised that He would be invisibly near and present among them, no less truly than during His earthly manifestation. The proof of this, His actual presence among them, should be the communication to them of His Spirit. This should be the medium between believers and their Saviour, until vision takes the place of faith; till that immediate view of Christ, enjoyed by His disciples in the familiar intercourse of his earthly life, is restored in heightened glory to believers. It is to this inward experience that the Apostle makes his appeal with these Churches and to it the inward experience of believers in all ages bears witness. Here, then, are conjoined two characteristic marks of fellowship with Christ which cannot be discovered from each other; the one inward, perceptible to the immediate inner consciousness, the other belonging to the outward life, but presupposing the former, of which it is at once the outward expression and the condition of its continuance. The first is—Participation in the Spirit—promised by Christ; the second, Obedience to His commandments, which is the fruit of that Spirit's agency, and in which such participation makes itself apparent. This being the Spirit's work, is also, as the evidence of this work, the condition of its continuance; all Divine gifts being conditioned upon the faithful use of what "is bestowed, according to the words of Christ: Whoso hath, to him shall be given."—M.]

6. Warning and Exhortation with reference to the false teachers.

CHAPTER IV. 1-6.

Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of<sup>1</sup> God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye<sup>2</sup> the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come<sup>3</sup> in the flesh is of God: And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus<sup>4</sup> Christ is come in the flesh is not of<sup>1</sup> God: and this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already is it in the world.<sup>5</sup> Ye are of<sup>1</sup> God, little children, and have overcome them: because greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world. They are of<sup>1</sup> the world: therefore speak they of<sup>1</sup> the world, and the world heareth them. We are of God: he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of<sup>1</sup> God heareth not us.<sup>6</sup> Hereby<sup>7</sup> know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

Verse 2. <sup>2</sup> γινώσκετε A. B. C. G. al. Cod. Sin. has in the text γινώσκουμεν, but corrected γινώσκετε. ἡ ἀληθεία A. C. Sinait.—B. reads ἀληθείαι; Vulgate: venisse conforming to the usage of Latin. [German: "Every spirit which confesseth Jesus Christ come in the flesh."—M.]

Verse 3. <sup>3</sup> Instead of the reading of A. B. τὸν Ἰησοῦν, G. K. and Sin. have Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἀληθυότα, but G. has also the Article and Sin. reads κύριον instead of Χριστόν. Both readings, the shorter τὸν Ἰησοῦν, and the longer agreeing with v. 2, are well authenticated, and either may pass for the original reading, it being equally probable that the longer reading was abbreviated into the shorter, and that the shorter was changed into the longer: the testimony for both renders the decision very difficult; but the shorter form seems to be the lectio difficilior.—By the side of the reading δὲ μὴ δοῦλοισι τὸν Ἰησοῦν, the Church Fathers have the variation ὁ ἄνθρωπος τὸν Ἰησοῦν, among the Latins Tertullian (negantes et solventes, adv. Marc. 5, 16), Augustine qui solvit Jesum et negat in carne venisse) also the two conjoined. It is repeatedly asserted, that the heretics suppressed ἄνθρωπος (Socrates A. I. 7, 32; Fulbert and Hincmar: Eraserunt, in Tischenendorf 1859 editio major). Bengel well observes: humanam potius artem, quam apostolicam redolet (ἄνθρωπος) sapientiam. It is a dogmatical terminus technicus to denote the Nestorianism which dissolves the union of the Godhead and the humanity in Jesus, Christ.

[Socrates, H. E. VII. 32: γράψαντες ἐν τοῖς παλαιοῖς ἀντιγράφοις ὅτι πᾶν πνεῦμα ὁ ἄνθρωπος τὸν Ἰησοῦν, ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν. Irenæus (III, 8, p. 511 ed. Stieren): *Ignitur omnes extra dispositionem sunt, qui sub oblatu agnitionis alterum quidem Jesum intelligunt, alterum autem Christum, et alterum Unigenitum, et alterum Salvatorem . . . Sententia enim eorum homicidia, Deos quidem plures confingens et Patres multos simulans. Communiens autem et per multa dividens Filium Dei; quos et Dominus nobis cavere prædixit, et discipulus ejus Joannes in prædicta epistola fugere eos præcepit dicens: "Multi seductores exierunt in hunc mundum, qui non confitentur Jesum Christum in carne venisse. Hic est seductor et Antichristus. Videle eos, ne perdati quod operati estis." Et rursus in Epistola ait: "Multi pseudo-prophete exierunt de seculo. In hoc cognoscite Spiritum Dei. Omnis spiritus qui confitetur Jesum Christum in carne venisse, ex Deo est. Et omnis Spiritus qui solvit Jesum, non est ex Deo, sed de antichristo est." Hæc autem similia sunt illi quod in Evangelio dictum est, quoniam "Verbum caro factum est, et habitavit in nobis."—Origen on Matth. xxv. 14 (Vol. IV. 359-361 ed. Lommat.): Secundum hæc divinitatis sue naturam non peregrinatur, sed peregrinatur secundum dispensationem corporis quod suscepit. —Hæc autem dicentes non solumvis suscepti corporis hominem, cum sit scriptum apud Joannem "Omnis spiritus qui solvit Jesum non est ex Deo:" sed unicuique substantiæ proprietatem servamus. Si enim omnis homo fidelis qui conjungitur Domino unus spiritus est:" quanto magis homo ille quem secundum dispensationem carnis Christus suscepit non est solvendum ab eo, nec alter est dicendus ab eo? Et vide quomodo ait: "Sicut homo peregre futurus" quoniam non erat homo, sed sicut homo et quasi homo peregrinabitur, qui erat ubique secundum divinitatis naturam." While thus Irenæus and Origen clearly had the reading ὁ ἄνθρωπος before them, Polycarp, on the other hand, seems to quote, though loosely, the received text (Ep. ad. Philipp. cap. 7): Πᾶς γὰρ ὁς ἀντὶ μὴ ὁμολογῇ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέντα, ἀντιχριστὸς ἐστίν. καὶ ὁς ἀντὶ μὴ ὁμολογῇ τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ σταυροῦ ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν. καὶ ὁς ἀντὶ μὴ ὁμολογῇ τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου πρὸς τὰς ἰδίας ἐπιθυμίας καὶ λόγῳ κατὰ ἀνάστασιν καὶ ἡγήσιν ἐλπίαι, οὗτος πρῶτότοκος ἐστὶ τοῦ Σατανᾶ. [Alford].—Huther: Very singular is the opinion of Semler that ὁ ἄνθρωπος originated oculorum vitio; the reading may probably be accounted for from the polemics against Gnosticism (Grotius, Lücke, de Wette, Huther), and this supposition is borne out by the scholion in Matthæi p. 226: πρῶτονθεν γὰρ αὐτοῦ (τοῦ ἀντιχριστοῦ) αἰσθησέμεν, ὅτι χαρακτηρίζεται τὸ διὰ ψευδοπροφητῶν καὶ πνευματικῶν ἄνθρωπων τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἐν τῷ μὴ ὁμολογεῖν αὐτὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέντα.—M.]*

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The difference of the spirits renders the trial necessary, v. 1.

VER. 1. Beloved:—The Apostle begins with ἀγαπητοί as ch. iii. 21 [cf. v. 7. ch. iii. 2.—M.], in the joyful consciousness of the common blessings of the Divine adoption, and earnestly solicitous of inciting and exhorting those to the exhibition of brotherly love who are loved of God.

Believe not every spirit.—Here, as in ch. ii. 18-28, the Apostle adverts to the false teachers. Those who are to believe on the name of the Son of God (ch. iii. 23) in the power of the Holy Ghost (ch. iii. 24) given to them and bearing witness to their spirit that they are the children of God (cf. Rom. viii. 16), must not believe every spirit. The reference is to a plurality, a multitude of spirits (πάντι πνεύματι), not to a Dual but to a Plural. Hence, we must understand the expression of the spirits of men to whom the spirit bears witness. Every human spirit has its peculiarity, its special gifts and views, its mode of expression, which the animating, moving Spirit does not change or render uniform. Many a spirit might secure our approbation, sympathy and attention, which is not influenced by the Spirit of God. Hence the warning, to which, because of its great importance, there is forthwith annexed the exhortation:—"But try the spirits whether they are of God." [Huther: The idea πνεῦμα is closely connected with ψευδοπροφηταί. The true prophets spoke, as we read 1 Pet. i. 21, ὑπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι; the source of the revelations whose utterers (πρόφηται) they are, is the πνεῦμα ἁγίου or the πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ, whereby is described, not an affection of their mind, but the DIVINE POWER, different from their own individuality, which animates and influences them (δύναμις ὑψίστου, the synonyme of πνεῦμα ἁγίου, Luke i. 35.). This πνεῦμα speaks by the prophet, entering into his πνεῦμα and communicating to him the truth to be revealed; and thus the πνεῦμα of the prophet becomes a πνεῦμα ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ. But since every prophet has his own πνεῦμα, there is, although the πνεῦμα ἁγίου is One, a plurality of prophetic spirits. The same relation takes place in an opposite direction, in the case of the pseudo-prophets. They also are under the influence of one spiritual being, to wit, under that of the πνεῦμα, that ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστι, the πνεῦμα τῆς πλάνης; this spirit also is one, but since it penetrates with its lie the πνεῦμα of the pseudo-prophets and makes them like itself, we may say of the πνεῦμα of each individual prophet that is not of God, that it is not a πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, but a πνεῦμα τῆς πλάνης."—The rationalistic interpretation of Socinus ("sensus hominis aliquo modo inspiratus") and Episcopius ("doctrina"), and the figurative construction of the word πνεῦμα=λαλοῦντες ἐν πνεύματι of Lücke, de Wette and Calvin ("pro eo qui spiritus dono se præditum esse jactat ad obeundum prophetæ munus"), are equally irrelevant.—M.]

But try the spirits whether they are of God.—John evidently speaks of a plurality of spirits (τὰ πνεύματα). Instead of a receiving surrender to and of agreeing with them, of the assensus (πιστεῖν) John requires a δοκᾶναι, a cautious criticism before the κατέχειν (1 Thess. v. 21), and he requires it of all like Paul, Rom. xii. 2; Phil. i. 20; Eph. v. 10; 1 Cor. x. 15; xi. 13, although some may have a special gift in discern ing the spirits (1 Cor. xii. 10: διακρίσεις πνευμάτων Calvin: "alloguitur—singulos fideles," as opposed to Lorinus: "Non omnium est probare; unum oportet in ecclesia summum judicem questionum de fide moribusque; id est sine dubio Pontifex Maximus." [This may be conclusive reasoning to Romanists, but will be utterly repudiated by Protestants, as an arbitrary dictum repugnant to Holy Writ.—M.]. The falsity of this exposition is evident both from the object of this text which every man ought to know; εἰ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστίν, whether they are of, originate in or proceed from God: the confession of Jesus Christ come in the flesh (v. 2), and from the danger, urging such a test, to which every one is exposed and which necessitates the decision [the Apostle proceeds to specify the reason why this trial is necessary.—M.].

Because many false prophets are gone out into the world.—These ψευδοπροφῆται answer to the ἀντιχρίστους (ch. ii. 18). Cf. Matth. vii. 15; xxiv. 11, 24 (where also ψευδόχριστοι are specified), 2 Pet. ii. 1 (where ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι are paralleled with the ψευδοπροφῆται of the Old Testament). The idea of predicting something future is not any more the prominent point here than it constitutes in general the leading characteristic of the prophet; he derives his name from πρόφημα, because he has, as it were, behind him the Spirit that inspires him, whose thoughts he speaks out and makes known. The true prophet must be clearly distinguished from the hidden πνεῦμα influencing him, the true prophet is ἐκ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενος (2 Pet. i. 21); this πνεῦμα δύναμις ἰσχύιστον (Luke i. 35). The point at which He unites with the prophet, is the prophet's πνεῦμα, which as an organ to be influenced, must be clearly distinguished from the πνεῦμα ἁγίου who operates through it; for the πνεῦμα ἁγίου is the Source and Principle of the revelation, enters into the prophet's πνεῦμα, moves and imparts to the prophet, animates and prompts him, and thus the prophet's πνεῦμα becomes a πνεῦμα ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, yet so that thereby the characteristics of the prophet's spirit are neither obliterated nor annulled, neither as to his temperament, nor as to his mode of utterance, nor as to qualification for specific relations of the spiritual or material worlds. Hence there are as many πνεύματα as there are προφῆται, notwithstanding the unity of the efficient principle which influences them. But alongside this πνεῦμα ἁγίου, πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, there is a πνεῦμα τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου (v. 3), τῆς πλάνης (v. 6), that makes the ψευδοπροφήτας and whose spirit must not be believed. The πνεῦμα and πνεύματα designate not absolutely ψευδοπροφῆται (Calvin, Lücke, de Wette and others), nor the sensus hominis aliquo modo inspiratus (Socinus), nor doctrina (Episcopus), nor the superhuman principle animating man (Greek Comment., Augustine, Luther, Spener, Bengel (spiritui, quo doctor aliquis agitur), Neander, Düsterdieck and others). Cf. Huther [whose note I have translated above, under "Believe not every spirit."—M.].—With ἐξεληλύθασιν εἰς τὸν κόσμον Düsterdieck appropriately compares γεγόνασιν ch. ii. 18. After ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ we ought to supply a reference to the sending forth, the missionary activity which in the case of the false prophets is an aping of the Apostles and the prophets;

they come from, proceed, go out from him that makes them prophets. Cf. Jno. viii. 42; xiii. 8; xvi. 27, etc. cf. ch. xvii. 18; Matth. xiii. 49. It is therefore neither—in publicum prodire, as Matth. xiii. 8; xxvi. 55; Mark i. 85; viii. 11; Acts vii. 7 (Grotius, Calov, Lücke, al.), nor—ex apostolis et eorum ecclesia, as in ch. ii. 19 (S. Schmidt), nor—ex sedibus suis 2 Jno. 7. (Bengel).—On εἰς τὸν κόσμον cf. Jno. vi. 14; x. 86. They come into the world, which Christ was sent to redeem, which belongs to Him, in order to destroy it with their αἰρέσεις ἀπωλείας. (2 Pet. ii. 1).

VER. 2. In this know ye the Spirit of God.—Ἐν τούτῳ here evidently points to the following sentence and γινώσχετε is not Indicative, but like πιστεῖτε, δοκιμάζετε v. 1, the Imperative [on the other hand Alford, on account of the very frequent ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκωμεν, would let analogy prevail and take it as Indicative; but Huther, de Wette, Lücke and most commentators take it as Imperative.—M.].—That τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ denotes the Holy Spirit is evident both from the expression itself and from the antithesis τὸ τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου v. 3; the reference therefore is not to a loquens de spiritualibus ex inspiratione divina (Lyra). But the sequel shows that we have to think of the Divine Spirit working in the spirit of the prophets, to wit:

Every spirit which confesseth Jesus Christ come in the flesh, is of God.—Ὁμολογεῖν is the oral confession of a doctrinal truth (cf. 2 Jno. 10.), like ch. ii. 23 (Düsterdieck, Huther and al.); confession with a walk agreeing with a Christian is not indicated here (Greek comm., Augustine, Bede), even though only a confession with the mouth emanating from the faith of the heart under the influence of the indwelling Spirit of God can be meant here, as in Rom. x. 9, 10; cf. ch. v. 11 sq.; ii. 22 sq.—The object of the confession: Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα. The form is that of a substantival objective-sentence; hence the participial form should be retained, and the rendering avoided which would make it an Infinitive thus: that Jesus Christ is or has come in the flesh; it is not a predicative sentence, but ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα is added attributively; that which is known is added in the Accusative. The names are taken in their literal sense at ch. ii. 22; here they stand, as in ch. i. 3, in juxtaposition and must not be separated according to ch. ii. 22, as if they imported: Jesus the Christ who is come in the flesh; so Luther renders wrongly in his Scholia, and Huther inclines in that direction. In like manner ἐν σαρκὶ must be held fast and not be made equivalent to εἰς σάρκα, as maintained by Augustine, Luther, Calvin, Piscator, Sander and al.; ἐν σαρκὶ denotes the mode of existence, in which He appeared and came; nor is there any ground here to assume here a pregnancy common among the Greeks who conjoin ἐν with verbs of motion in order to describe the result, the rest (cf. Winer, p. 449), to wit, that He had come into the flesh in order to remain and work in the flesh; so S. Schmidt and others.—Jesus Christ came in the flesh from the time of His birth after He οὐκ ἐγένετο and ἐσκήνωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν (Jno. i. 14) cf. ch. i. 1. sqq.—The conversatio in carne, inter homines, in vera natura humana, nor the incarnatio, which is pre-supposed as the transition, is meant here; nor is here a limiting reference to innumera mala and ipsa cruenta mors, as maintained by Socinus, who erroneously refers to Heb. ii. 14; v. 7, and Grotius who adverts to a Hebraism.—Ἐρχομαι indeed is often used to designate the appearance of teachers, but then it either occurs with a qualifying ἐπὶ τῷ ὄνοματι, Matth. xxiv. 5, or ἐν τῷ ὄνοματι, Jno. v. 43, or εἰς μαρτυρίαν, Jno. i. 7, or with an indication of the subject as ἐμπαῖκται, 2 Pet. iii. 8, or an addition like καὶ ταύτην τὴν διδασχὴν οὐ φέρεῖ, 2 Jno. 10, or as in Matth. xi. 18, of John, μήτε ἐσθίων μήτε πίνων or as in Matth. xvii. 11 of Elias καὶ ἀποκαταστήσει πάντα, so that the context invariably marks either the appearance of the teacher, or distinctly states that he is not exclusively referred to as a teacher, namely in his vocation of teacher. Here also the reference seems not to be exclusively to the office of a teacher or a prophet, which is by no means indicated by ἐν σαρκί. But it is important to notice here the tense; for while we have in this place the part. perfecti ἐληλυθότα, ch. v. 6 gives the part. aor. ὁ ἐλθὼν and 2 Jno. 7 the part. pres. ἐρχόμενον; the Present denotes the fact which is not a single act, in a moment, like birth, but has a longer duration which may be seen and represents this in a timeless form; the Aorist denotes an act as purely historical, the Perfect an act which, though historically completed, has present continuance (Winer, Part III. § 40). Thus this confession contains the fundamental truth of the Gospel; Χριστὸς and ἐν σαρκί ἐληλυθότα indicate the dignity and existence of the Son of God and emphatically assert His humanity as a reality and a historical fact for all time. Bengel excellently remarks: "In carne, est ergo Ipse aliquid præter carnem; hæreses veritatem carnis Jesu Christi negantes præsupponunt et eo ipso confirmant veritatem ejus, quippe cum qua non poterant conciliare carnem, tanquam ea dignam."

V. 8. And every spirit which confesses not Jesus, is not of God.—Τὸν Ἰησοῦν comprehends what was said in v. 2, viz.; Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκί ἐληλυθότα, it is just the historical Christ and none other.—Ὁ μὴ ὁμολογεῖ—if he does not confess, while ὁ οὐχ ὁμολογεῖ would be—who does not confess. From this it is evident that John contemplates not so much distinct persons, as only distinct doctrines. Winer, part III. § 55. [Huther observes that μὴ denotes the contradiction of the true confession, while οὐ would express only a simple denial.—M.]

And this is the (spirit) of antichrist, of which ye have heard that it cometh, and now it is in the world already.—Τοῦτο refers to πνεῦμα, not to ὁμολογεῖν, and τὸ τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου is the (πνεῦμα) of antichrist; for τὸ pre-supposes a substantive or constitutes a substantival idea; were it, as Valla, Episcopus, Huther and al. render, proptrium antichristi, matter of antichrist, τοῦτο would not refer to πνεῦμα but to ὁμολογεῖν; this would be rather an artificial construction and τὸ before τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου would be superfluous. The passages adduced, viz. Matth. xxi. 21; 1 Cor. x. 24; 2 Pet. ii. 22; Jas. iv. 14, are somewhat different, for they import one and all a substantival idea, τὸ τῆς σκῆς, τὸ ἐαυτοῦ, τὸ τῆς παροιμίας; τὸ τῆς ἀβρύων [that of the fig tree, that of himself, that of the proverb, the event of the morrow—M.], while here the Genitive alone would have been sufficient.—Ἀκηκόατε refers not to the written word ch. ii. 18 where we have already ἠκούσατε, but to the previous oral instruction they had received. The last clause καὶ νῦν ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἐστὶν ἡδὴ, which emphatically asserts that the spirit of antichrist is already now, at the present time, working in the antichrists, is not governed by ἀκηκόατε but coördinated with καὶ τοῦτο ἐστὶν τὸ τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου. Cf. ch. ii. 18.

Comfortable strengthening and assurance against the false prophets. vv. 4-6.

V. 4. Ye are of God, little children.—The Apostle moved, and affectionately confident (τεκνία) that they all stand in the fundamental truth and are the children of God (ch. iii. 1, 2, 13, 14), urgently represents to them (ὑμεῖς) emphatically placed first as in ch. ii. 24, 27, what is given to them: ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστέ, agreeing with the leading thought ch. ii. 29 and the context: the trial to be made is εἰ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστὶν (v. 1) and he that confesseth Jesus is ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστὶν (v. 3) and he that confesseth not Jesus ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ οὐκ ἐστὶν.

And have overcome them.—Αὐτοὺς are the ψευδοπροφήτας (v. 1), in whom the πνεῦμα τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου is operative and connected with their πνεῦμα. Hence not: antichristum et mundum (Erasmus); the Vulgate renders falsely eum, which Lyra interprets: mundum, devincendo concupiscentiam, and other Roman Catholics: antichristum or spiritum antichristi in antichristia.—The Perfect νενίκηκατε as at ch. ii. 13, 14, where τοῦτον κενήσας is the person overcome. The victory referred to there is inward in their hearts, here it is a victory not only in their hearts but also outward, visible in the life, in the sphere of their church-life, the Church; in the former place the victory is over Satan himself, here over his false prophets. But it is a victory actually achieved, and moreover a victory of continuous duration notwithstanding a succession of conflicts; through these very struggles and conflicts runs the victory already achieved and decisive, ye have overcome! ye have it! by your fidelity they with their seductive arts and temptations have been confounded (Ebrard). Cf. Jno. xvi. 33. Νενίκηκατε is the Perfect not propter futuritionis certitudinem (Episcopus),—potesis superare (Rosenmüller). Calvin renders not very accurately: "In media pugna jam extra periculum sunt, quia futuri sunt superiores." The ground of their victory and overcoming lies indeed in them, yet nevertheless above them.

Because He (that is) in you is greater than he (that is) in the world.—Ὁ ἐν ὑμῖν is He of (out of) whom they are, who abideth in them (ch. iii. 24; iv. 1, 2), that is ὁ θεός (Greek Comm., Calvin, Bengel, de Wette, Sander, Düsterdieck, Huther); this is also clear from the antithesis; it is understood of Christ by Augustine, Grotius, etc.—Ὁ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ—ὁ διάβολος, whose children (τέκνα) the antichrists are, ch. iii. 10a—God is not only greater than our heart (ch. iii. 20), but also greater than Satan, than all things (Jno. x. 29; 2 Cor. ii. 14); all things belong to Him (1 Cor. xv. 57; iii. 23).—[Huther: "Instead of the more specific ἐν αὐτοῖς the Apostle uses ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ to intimate that the former, though having been for some time in the Church, belong to the κόσμος, which is expressly declared in the words following. Socinus: "Quamvis Johannes, non de eo, qui sit in falsis prophetis, sed de eo, qui sit in mundo, verba faciat, tamen necesse est, ut mundi appellatione falsos istos Prophetas comprehendat, vel potius plane intelligat, quod satis aperte declarant sequentia verba."—M.]

VER. 5. The antithesis as to essence, work and success:

They are of the world.—Ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου, quatenus Satanas est ejus princeps (Calvin), hence not ἐξ ἡμῶν (ch. ii. 19). Cf. Jno. viii. 23, 44. The reference is not only to worldly lusts and carnal desires but to the ground and source of their life determining the exhibition of their life (διὰ τοῦτο).

Therefore they speak of the world and the world heareth them.—The substance of what they speak and their success with the world are conditioned by their being of [out of, from—as to origin—M.] the world. This λαλεῖν ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου also is deep-reaching: ex mundi vita ac sensu sermones suos promens (Bengel). Luther capitally distinguishes λαλεῖν ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου from ἐκ τῆς γῆς λαλεῖν (Jno. iii. 31) by the remark that ἡ γῆ is not an ethical notion like ὁ κόσμος. Although the separate points made by Oecumenius (κατὰ τὰς σαρκικὰς ἐπιθυμίας), the Scholiasts (ἐκ τῆς κοινῆς αὐτῶν γνώμης), Luther (ex quæ mundi intelligit ac probat), Grotius (mundi affectibus congruentia) and others, are correct, yet they shed light only on particular points and not on the whole. The approval and agreement of the world constitute a proof against them on the principle τῷ γὰρ ὁμολῶ τὸ ὁμοιον προστρέχει. Cf. Jno. viii. 37, 48, 47; xviii. 37. [The false prophets left the Church and went out into the world to which they stood in inward affinity, and proclaimed to it a wisdom that originated in it; therefore the world heard them, i. e. approved and assented to their word; τῷ γὰρ ὁμολῶ κ. τ. λ. (Oecumenius); whereas the believers were hated and persecuted by the world, Huther.—M.].—Αὐτῶν ἀκούει denotes hearing attentively with inward delight, while ἀκούειν τινα signifies hearing in general without determining the sympathy of the hearer.

Inference and conclusion. v. 6.

VER. 6. We are of God.—A quickly added contrast of the false prospects without δε. After what precedes there are here implied the two thoughts which are not expressed: διὰ τοῦτο ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ λαλοῦμεν καὶ ὑμεῖς ἡμῶν ἀκούετε, although the latter is indicated by ὁ γινώσκων τὸν θεὸν ἀκούει ἡμῶν. Hence the Apostle understands by ἡμεῖς himself with the Apostles and the teachers in the Church (and not himself and the Church ὑμεῖς), as opposed to αὐτοὶ (v. 5) and the ψευδοπροφῆται (v. 1). This is the view of most commentators in opposition to Calvin, Spener, Lücke and al.

He that knoweth God, heareth us; he who is not of God doth not hear us.—The antithesis ὁ γινώσκων τὸν θεὸν and ὃς οὐκ ἔστιν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ requires, as is well known, that we should understand in the former clause ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ εἶναι and supply in the second γινώσκων τὸν θεὸν as the consequence. Hence ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ εἶναι must not be taken here differently from vv. 1-4 and according to the contrast in v. 5. It is consequently not a general drawing and impulse towards God (as held by Lücke and Neander), but the state of grace of God's children, and their understanding of and conduct towards the word of God as preached to them. But nothing is said here concerning the manner how they did come into this state, nor is here any reference to predetermination (Hilgenfeld) or predestination (Calvin); we know also from ch. ii. 2, iv. 14; of. Jno. iii. 16; i. 10 sqq. 29, that all are desired and may enter into the sonship. [Alford: Here we must remember carefully what the context is and what its purpose. The Apostle is giving a text to distinguish, not the children of God from those who are not children of God, but the spirit of truth from the spirit of error, as is clear from the words following. And this he does by saying that in the case of the teachers of the truth, they are heard and received by those who apprehend God, but refused by those who are not of God. It is evident then that these two terms here, ὁ γινώσκων τὸν θεὸν, and ὃς οὐκ ἔστιν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ represent two patent matters of fact, two classes open and patent to all: one of them identical with the κόσμος above: the other consisting of those of whom it is said above, ἐγνώκατε τὸν πατέρα . . . ἐγνώκατε τὸν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ch. ii. 13, 14. How these two classes are what they are, it is not the purpose of this passage to set forth, nor need we here inquire; we have elsewhere tests to distinguish them, ch. iii. 9, 10 . . . ; we have a striking parallel, in fact the key to these words, in the saying of our Lord to Pilate, John xviii. 37.—M.].

From this we know the Spirit of truth and the spirit of error (deception).—Ἐκ τούτου refers to hearing, but since the matter in hand relates to the trial of the spirits that teach, the reference is to hearing the false prophets and to hearing the Apostles and the ministers of the Divine word [i. e. to the reception given to both classes.—M.]. Hence we must not think here of the criterion specified in vv. 2, 3, as maintained by the Roman Catholic Comm., Calvin, Hunnius, Calov and Neander.

In γινώσκωμεν John includes the Apostles and the Church. On τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, of. Jno. xiv. 17; v. 26; xvi. 13; from which passages it is evident that the Genitive indicates that which the Spirit gives, testifies, whereto He helpeth and whither He guideth and leadeth; He is that Spirit that proceedeth from God and teacheth the truth to men. In like manner, τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς πλάνης is the spirit proceeding from the devil, deceiving and seducing men (ch. i. 8; ii. 26; 2 Jno. 8; 1 Tim. iv. 1; 1 Thess. ii. 8; 2 Thess. ii. 11.) The latter is certainly in him whom the world hears, the former in Him to whom the children of God give ear.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Δοκιμάζειν is used here as by St. Paul, (see notes on v. 1, in Exegetical and Critical) and as the Lord Himself bids His Church do, Matth. vii. 15, 16. The Roman Catholic proposition: "Ecclesia in suis prælatis est iudex controversiarum" is not true; they limit to the ecclesia representans and to the [visible] head of that, what the Lord of the Church and his Apostles say to all believers. However it is important to remember that the Apostle restricts this right and duty of trial simply to the question whether the teachers are of God, and that he does not mean questions affecting the learning, wisdom or eloquence of teachers, or questions of secondary importance and on controversial points; he only refers to that which is necessary to the salvation of our souls. On this head every Christian ought and may, if necessary, apply the test.

2. The believing Confession of One Jesus Christ uniting in Himself the Godhead and the Manhood, even the confession of the historical Christ is necessary to salvation and essentially Christian. John, of course, understands ὁμολογεῖν as engaging the powers of the whole Christian and not only the oral confession without the heart; for he adverts to the πνεύματα, specifies the antithesis μὴ ὁμολογεῖν and proceeds throughout in a contemplative manner. If this were not so, the true disciples of Jesus would have the same confession as the demons as their distinguishing mark (Luke iv. 41; Matth. viii. 29); hence the contents of the confession are not decisive per se. Cf. Harless, Ethik § 89** p. 174.—But Estius has no warranty for limiting St. John's direction to the apostolical age and for considering the confession of the Lord's Supper as the criterion now; on the former confession depends also the latter, for the doctrine of the Lord's Supper reflects of course the Christology, since the fellowship with Christ is accomplished in the most pregnant manner in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Nothing is truly Christian without the living Christ.

3. According to the Johannean mode of expression the contrast brought out here is to be conceived as an error wholly gnostic, spiritualizing and misinterpreting the historic and directed more against the corporeality, i. e. the manhood of Christ than against his Godhead, an error rather Docetical than Ebionite. For σάρξ does not denote merely the human body apart from the human ψυχή, the human νοῦς, the human will or self-consciousness, which could not be done by the preposition ἐν, but it signifies the human nature, the manhood; and this is conceived in the precise manner in which He appeared in the world. Cf. Hofmann, Schriftbeweis ii. 1. p. 76, sq.

4. John does not predicate of man independence, self-glory and perfect freedom in the sphere of his spiritual life; either the Spirit of God or the spirit of Satan determines the spirit of man and conditions his views, inclinations, knowledge, words and deeds. Behind the πνεῦμα of man stands the directing, determining, operating and fulfilling πνεῦμα, which through the former and united with it, works on the world and on men.

5. But any disposition of the human spirit for the Spirit of God or the spirit of Satan is no more taken for granted here than that the Spirit of God and the spirit of Satan are or might be supposed to be in a state of coördination. Rather, we should say, does this victory, of which the Apostle discourses in such lofty strains (v. 4, cf. ch. ii. 13, 14; v. 4, 5), assert the superiority of the Divine Spirit to Satan and denote both the monarchy of God and the enmity of Satan, at the same time intimating however, that, though men may suffer themselves to be controlled either by God or Satan, all men ought to be and might become God's.

6. The Apostle contemplates the reality and the possession of the Divine sonship (ἱθαυ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ—γεννηθῆναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ), which is evident from his specification of the marks whereby the existence of this relation may be determined; the reference, therefore, is not to the origin, the beginning of one's being of God, to the manner how it is attained. The same remark applies to Jno. xviii. 36, 37 and also to ch. viii. 43-47, as is manifest from v. 30: πολλοὶ ἐπίστρευσαν εἰς αὐτὸν and v. 31: ἐὰν μείνητε ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τῷ ἐμῷ. The sonship or state of grace of faith in Jno. viii. is however quite young and only begun, while the case before Pilate and in the passage under notice respects the believing people in His Kingdom and under His Rule. According to the Johannean conception we have to view the sonship or state of grace of believers as complete from the beginning although ever progressing towards perfection and consummation and to the inheritance itself. A young babe or a suckling is surely a perfect man, a rational creature, though only as to the germ, and not yet a man, not yet fully developed in all the powers and gifts wherewith it is endowed.

[7. As supplemental to the exegetical notes on v. 3, and No. 3, above, it may be profitable to put together some of the interpretations of this difficult passage.

1. The Socinian.—Socinus: "Jesus Christum, i. e. Jesum qui dicitur Christum, non modo mortalem hominem fuisse, sed etiam omnimodis malis et denique ipsi cruentis morti obnoxium." Grotius: "Non cum regia pompa et exercitibus, sed in statu humili, objecto, multisque malis ac postremum cruci obnoxio." But it has been shown that ἐν σαρκί cannot be construed in this sense.
2. Those assertive and not only implicative of our Lord's Incarnation. The commentators, most of them orthodox, who give this interpretation, either confound ἐν σαρκί with εἰς σάρκα (Augustine, Luther, Calvin, Piscator, Sander and al.), or waver between ἐν and εἰς, e. g. Hunnius: "Tunc venire in carne dicitur Jesus Christus quando λόγος ex sua velut arcana sede prodians assumpta visibili carne se in terris manifestat. Here we must also name the exposition of Augustine, who introduces in the train of the Incarnation the death and redeeming love of Christ, and makes the confession denial depend on "caritatem habere" (Alford); saying: "Deus erat et in carne venit: Deus enim mori non poterat, caro mori poterat: ideo ergo venit in carne ut moreretur pro nobis. Quemadmodum autem mortuus est pro nobis? Majorem hac caritatem nemo habet, quam ut animam suam ponat pro amicis suis. Caritas ergo illum adduxit ad crucem. Quisquis ergo non habet caritatem, negat Christum in carne venisse."—To put the question in his own words: "Arius and Eunomius, and Macedonius and Nestorius own that Jesus Christ came in the flesh, are not they therefore of God?" and then replies that those hierarchs did not in fact confess Christ to have come in the flesh, because whatever they might do by words, they in their works denied Him (Tit. i. 16). "They have not charity," he says "because they have not unity, and therefore all their other gifts are of no avail." (1 Cor. xiii. 1-8).—But the Apostle says here nothing of charity, or unity, or of the love of Christ, but he simply asserts the true Manhood of our Lord, and this brings us

3. To the true interpretation which takes tv in its proper meaning and applies the passage to the case of the Docetæ who maintained that our Lord had only an apparent and not a real body. See also the extracts from Irenæus and Origen above in Appar. Crit. note 4.—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The command: Try! 1. The occasion (v. 1: many false prophets); 2. The importance (v. 1: whether they are of God); 3. The difficulty (v. 1: the spirits); 4. The right (v. 4: ye are of God); 5. The standard (vv. 1, 8: the confession and the contradiction, cf. v. 6).—Be not afraid of the majority of votes, but fear the majesty of the truth of (out of) God; take care that thou do not violate it; the former cannot and must not have any influence in matters of eternal truth and of eternal life. Not from the masses comes the truth, but from One, with whom you ought to vote and to whom you ought to assent; but though it comes only from One it is nevertheless designed for all and should be brought to and diffused among the masses by means of preaching, testimony and confession.—You ought to regard as a Christian and a brother whoever clings to Christ in faith, no matter how heretical the sect to which he may belong.—Communities and Christians grow more and more imperfect, the former into sects and the latter illiberal in proportion as they strive to give undue prominence to any one point of the truth except that of a believing and vital confession of Christ. You may not even push into the background the sphere of creation with its appointments before redemption and its glory, for Christ is also the Creator of the world.—The question is the pursuit of victory in order to secure and preserve unimpaired eternal peace for eternity.—The fundamental truth is simple and ever plain to the simplicity of the heart. That with which you are familiar you understand and love; what you cling to, cleaves to you; that in which you live, lives in you; that, for and of which you speak, speaks out of you.—Either a prophet of God or a false prophet, either of God or of the world, moved either by the Spirit of God or by the spirit of antichrist, by the Spirit of truth or the spirit of error; a middle way and a third course are not provided.—Neither you nor any of your acquaintance may be able clearly to perceive your point of gravity, but it is there, and One, now a Saviour, but hereafter the Judge, knows where and what it is and will make it manifest in preliminary judgments here, but in the final judgment there.

STARKE:—Trust, believe, whom? It concerns not riches and possessions, but your soul and salvation. It is amazing that most men are concerned about false wares, whereby they incur certain and eternal loss. The prudent will make inquiries and not join in with an inconsiderate credit.—Lying spirit, that sayest that the Christian religion is founded on credulity! Gross lies! It requires faith, but rejects credulity.

—We ought to believe sincere, experienced and honest teachers, yet so that we look only and solely to God and rest in Him as the author of the wisdom which they proclaim. Teachers should willingly subject their teaching to the trial of others, even to the trial of their own hearers, and consequently not only not deter them from it but also to urge them to it, and direct them away from themselves to God and His Spirit; otherwise they will not make honest Christians but render themselves suspicious.—The government alone has not the power of appointing teachers at its option regardless of the views and wishes of the whole Church (or congregation), whose wishes should be duly consulted, for God has clothed it also with the power and ability to try the spirits. [Such a caution, however relevant on the Continent of Europe, is of course unnecessary in the U. S.—M.].—Whatever obscures and lessens in word or deed the person, office, doctrine and glory of Christ, is heretical.—Be of good courage! though the world and the devil rage, thou hast a strong support, for God, who is with, by and in thee, is greater than all.—Whenever we are victorious, we ought to ascribe the glory of our victory not to ourselves but to God; otherwise if we take the least credit to ourselves, we rouse a new enemy, spiritual pride, most dangerous in this that it enables Satan easily to overcome us.—Like, seeks like; the world loves its own but hates those who have gone out from the world.

HUBNER:—The Christian spirit of trial is intimately connected with faith. Faith is not credulity.—This trying is a duty which belongs to every age and especially in our age when so many teach against the Scripture and still set up the pretension that they have the Spirit, and consider themselves full of spirit and others spiritless. It is the duty of all Christians; consequently, also the duty of the laity.—The conditions of this trial are simplicity of heart, a firm faith, and prayer to the Lord for clearness of perception (to open our eyes). The deceived have indeed excuses to offer; but there would not be so many of the deceived, if they had a pure mind and would try. Try the more frequently and carefully, the more the spirit of deceivers flatters thee and thy vanity, and the greater the number of these spirits grow.—Everything which lays irreverent hands on the Person of Christ, from any side, is decidedly unchristian.—Should John have given us a false criterion? Maintaining this is already the sign of a bad cause. Whatever is anti-christian shows its true character by its contradicting the Apostles.—The superiority of the Spirit of Christ to the error-spirit of the world gives to the Christian the preponderance; he need not fear any assaults of unbelief. John foretells certain victory. All the shouts of victory on the part of unbelievers are nothing but false alarm. All antichristianity panders to the spirit of the world; it flatters, if not the loose morality, yet the vanity and conceit of the world which finds it burdensome and confounding to believe in the Crucified One.—The false apostles prove the dignity of the true Apostles.

BASSER:—Any pupil in a catechism-class, in order to be on his guard against the false prophets, may determine whether the teaching of a prophet has the grape-taste of Christ's vine or the aloë-taste of the thorn of the flesh and reason.—It is not because of the parts of the truth they hold in common with the Church, but because of the error wherewith they contradict the confession of the Church, because of the broken branch on the tree of truth, because of the cancer in the body of truth, that the sects are congregated as separate communities.

KRUMMACHER:—The frontier of Christianity. 1. In which way is it decided? Are the cumbersome trinity, God, virtue and immortality, or birth within the pale of Christendom, individual interpretation, the opinion of the majority of one's contemporaries—to determine Christianness? 2. The final infallible decision, over against the skeptics, those who are at variance with the confessions, those who only seek for the word of God in the Scriptures but do not receive the Scriptures as the word of God, is given by the fundamental fact of the supernatural revelation in Christ, the necessity of regeneration, the personal pre-existence of Christ or of the Godhead.

FROMMÜLLER:—Of the trial of the Spirits. 1. Why it is necessary? Many false spirits have gone out into the world, the spirit of antichrist is already now in the world—in the Church, in the school, in the family, in private life, in the great and in the small. 2. Which is its end and aim? Whether they are of God or not. 3. Which is its rule? The confession.

[BURKITT: v. 1.—Believe not every spirit, etc.] That is, every teacher who pretends to be inspired, and every doctrine that lays claim to the authority of Divine revelation: "but try the spirits," that is, examine their doctrine by the rule of the word of God, and try from whom they come, whether from the Spirit of God or from Satan.—M.]

[BR. HALL: v. 2.—Every one who confesseth Jesus Christ to have been God from all eternity, and in the fulness of time to have taken our nature upon Him, and to be come in the flesh, to accomplish the perfect work of man's redemption, is of God and speaks from God. And so by the contraries v. 3.—M.]

[BARROW:—He was not only (as the Gnostics and some other heretics have conceived) in shape and outward appearance (as a spectre, deluding men's sight and fancy), but in most real truth, a very perfect man; having a real body, figured and circumscribed like ours, compacted of flesh and blood, visible and tangible; which was nourished and did grow, which needed and received sustenance, which was tender and sensible, frail and passible, which was bruised with stripes, torn with scourges, pricked with thorns, pierced with nails, transfixed with a spear; which was mortal and underwent death by expiring its breath, and being disjoined from the soul that enlivened it. He had also a soul, endued with the same faculties as ours; with an understanding, capable of learning and improvement (for He was a man, ignorant of some things which He might know: and He grew in wisdom and in stature), with a will, subject and submissive to the Divine Will (see Mark xiii. 32; Luke ii. 52;

Matth. xxvi. 39; Luke xlii. 42; Jno. v. 30; Matth. xxi. 18; Jno. iv. 6, 7), with several appetites, of meat, of drink, of sleep and rest (for we read that He was hungry, that He thirsted, that He was weary), yea with various passions and affections (φυσικά καὶ ἀδιόβλητα πάθη, I mean, that is, natural and irreprehensible passions), and these of the most troublesome and afflictive sort, such as zeal, pity and sorrow; the which were sometimes declared by very pathetic significations and are expressed in high terms; as upon occasion of His friend Lazarus's death it is said, He groaned in Spirit and was troubled; He then and upon other occasions, out of pity and sorrow, did weep; and ye know what excesses of sorrow, what anxieties and agonies, what tribulations, disturbances and amazements, the Evangelists, using those very terms, describe Him to have undergone at His passion; so that, as the Apostle to the Hebrews speaketh, "We have not as highpriest that could not compassionate (or sympathize with) our infirmities, but who was in all points tempted (or exercised and proved) as we are, yet without sin."—M.]

[NEANDER:—Here is no other test of true faith, no other law for Christian union, than steadfast adherence to that one fundamental fact of the appearing of the Divine-human Redeemer. In all which proceeds from this belief, the influences of the Divine Spirit should be acknowledged. Hence it follows, that provided faith in this one fundamental fact be the soul of the Christian life, no minor difference of creed should be allowed to disturb Christian unity; that mistakes and alloys of Christian truth, which trench not on this one fundamental fact, should not hinder us from recognizing the Divine Stamp in him whose faith and profession have their root therein,—that the bonds of Christian fellowship should not thereby be sundered or loosened. Steadfast adherence to this one foundation is the mark of being from God, of the Spirit derived from God.—

Truth and error have each their peculiar history of development. As in the continued development of Christian truth, the Holy Spirit is ever revealing Himself in the inward consciousness of believers, that Anointing spoken of by St. John; so does error, proceeding side by side with this revelation, mingle therewith its own disturbing and adulterating influence,—rending single truths from their connection with the whole system of truth and giving them the stamp of error. These are the two currents, proceeding from the ever operative Spirit of Christ and from the spirit of the world; the latter mingling with the revelations of the former its own disturbing element and imitating them with a deceptive outward seeming.—M.]

7. Brotherly love and Divine love as related to each other on the ground of Christ's advent.

CHAPTER IV. 7-21.

7 Beloved, let us love one another: for<sup>1</sup> love is of God; and every one that loveth<sup>2</sup> is 8 born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth<sup>3</sup> not God;<sup>4</sup> for God is 9 love. In this was manifested the love of God toward<sup>5</sup> us, because<sup>6</sup> that God sent his 10 only begotten Son<sup>6</sup> into the world, that we might live through him. Herein<sup>7</sup> is<sup>8</sup> love, 11 not that we loved God, but that he<sup>9</sup> loved us, and sent<sup>10</sup> his Son to be the propitiation
12 for our sins.<sup>11</sup> Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another.
13 No man hath seen God at any time.<sup>12</sup> If we love one another, God dwelleth<sup>13</sup> in us, 14 and his love is perfected in us.<sup>14</sup> Hereby<sup>15</sup> know we that we dwell<sup>16</sup> in him, and he in 15 us, because<sup>16</sup> he hath given us of his Spirit. And we have seen and do testify that 16 the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.<sup>17</sup> Whosoever<sup>18</sup> shall confess<sup>19</sup>
17 that Jesus<sup>20</sup> is the Son of God, God dwelleth<sup>13</sup> in him, and he in God. And we have known and believed the love that God hath to<sup>21</sup> us. God is love; and he that dwell-18 eth<sup>13</sup> in love dwelleth<sup>13</sup> in God, and God in him.<sup>22</sup> Herein<sup>23</sup> is our love<sup>14</sup> made per-19 fect,<sup>24</sup> that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so<sup>25</sup> are we 20 in this world. There is no fear in love;<sup>27</sup> but perfect love casteth out fear: because 21 fear hath torment.<sup>28</sup> He that feareth is not made perfect in love.<sup>29</sup> We love him,<sup>30</sup>
22 because he first loved us. If a man say,<sup>31</sup> I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how<sup>32</sup> can he love God 23 whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God love his brother also.<sup>33</sup>

Verse 7. [German: "The love."—M.]

Verse 8. [German: "Knew not God;" Alford: "hath never known God;" Lücke "hath never learned to know Him at all." The force of the Aorist is that he hath not once known God should be brought out.—M.]

ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν οὐκ ἔγνω ὅτι ὁ θεός is wanting in Cod. Sin., but adds ἔγνωκεν instead of γινώσκει (from v. 7). A.

<sup>11</sup> German: "And sent His Son as propitiation for our sins." More correctly: "And sent His Son a propitiation for our sins." No need for the supplement to be in B. V.—M.]

Verse 12 [German: "God hath no one ever seen." Alford: "God hath no one ever beheld." But render more idiomatically: "No one has ever beheld God."—M.]

[ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν, ἀγαπῶν, etc., had better be rendered uniformly "abide."—M.]

- <sup>14</sup> There is a great variation in the readings of the final words: ἐν ἡμῖν before τετελειωμένη ἐστὶν A. Vulg; ἐν ἡμῖν after τετελειωμένη ἐστὶν G. K. and many versions; ἐν ἡμῖν between τετελειωμένη and ἐστὶν Cod. Sin. B. [Alford: The love of Him is perfected in us.—M.]
- Verse 13. <sup>15</sup> ἐν τούτῳ—"In this." See note 7 above.—M.]
- <sup>16</sup> German: "that."—M.]
- Verse 14. <sup>17</sup> German: "As Saviour of the world." So Alford, Lillie. No need for the supplement to be in E. V.—M.]
- Verse 15. <sup>18</sup> Instead of ὅς ἐστί, B. reads ὁ.
- <sup>19</sup> German: "confesseth;" so Alford who justly objects to all Futures "shall confess," and ἡμεῖς ἐκμύνησθαι "shall have confessed" and recommends the English Present with an exegesis,—viz., "that this Present betokens not a repeated act and habit, but a great act once for all introducing the man into a state of ὁμολογῆσαι."—M.]
- <sup>20</sup> B. adds Χριστός after Ἰησοῦς.
- Verse 16. <sup>21</sup> ἐν ἡμῖν. German: "an uns" literally "at or on us" to which "concerning us" or "in regard to us" come nearest.—M.]
- <sup>22</sup> B. G. K. Cod. Sin. add μὲν et, which owing to the same conclusion of the preceding verse was more likely to be omitted than added.
- Verse 17. <sup>23</sup> "In this." See note 7 above.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Connection. The whole section vv. 7-21 insists upon the exhibition of brotherly love, because love is the very Essence of God (vv. 8, 16), as is evident from the sending and revelation of His Son (vv. 8, 10, 11, 14, 15), from our past and present experience of the love of God (v. 10, 11, 16), from the experience of our confidence towards Him without fear (vv. 17, 18), and because as the children of God, we ought in grateful obedience, prove our enjoyment of such love by the love of our brethren, His children (vv. 19-21). Based on the γεννηθῆναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ (v. 7), this exhortation belongs under the great leading thought ch. ii. 29, and connects with the warning against the false teachers, because faith in Jesus, in whom the love of the Father has been manifested and brought near to us, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit (v. 18), the Spirit of truth and the Witness of God's love in us, must evidence and manifest their truth and vitality in brotherly love.

Exhortation to brotherly love founded on the Being of God. vv. 7, 8.

V. 7. Beloved, let us love one another.

—Ἀγαπήτοι, ἀγαπώμεν, a very emphatic expression; being loved we must love; being in the enjoyment of love we are and dare not be without love; the exhortation, as ἀλλήλους shows, must be restricted to brotherly [Christian.—M.] love and not be extended to general love of man. [But the ground, on which this exhortation is based, viz. that God is Love (v. 8) and that He sent His Son εἰς τὸν κόσμον (v. 9), shows that the love of man in general is not excluded here. Cf. ch. iii. 18; so Ebrard.—M.].

Because the love is of God, and every one, that loveth, is born of God and knoweth God.—"Οὐ" indicates the ground on which the preceding exhortation is made to rest. The demonstration is conducted on a general axiom of truth: Omnis amor ex Deo est (Bengel), originem habet a Deo (Calov). This thought especially strengthened by ἐκ, must not be weakened into: caritas res divina maxime laudabilis (Socinus, Episcopius), Deo maxime placet (Grotius), love is Divine as to its nature (de Wette), Deus caritatis auctor est, quatenus nobis mutue caritatis causas abunde suppeditat (Schlichting). Neither must we add with A. τὸν θεόν, nor supply "the brother" with S. Schmidt, Lücke and al.—[Didymus singularly understood ἀγάπῃ here of Christ, —ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἄλλην εἶναι νομίστομεν ἢ τὸν μονογενῆ, ὡς περ θεὸν ἐκ θεοῦ, οὕτω καὶ ἀγάπην ἐξ ἀγάπης οὐρα:—and Augustine fitting together "Dilectio est ex Deo," and "Dilectio est Deus" infers that "Dilectio est Deus ex Deo," which comparing with Rom. v. 5, he infers that love is the Holy Spirit' (Tract. vii. 6). Alford.—M.].—Now since love and life are and spring from God, a man that is born of God proves that he is born of God by loving; for he must have part of that which is in God and comes from Him. The Perfect also alongside the Present shows that here again being born of God is regarded as the antecedent fact, as the cause of love, and love as a consequence warrants and necessitates the back-inference of the truth and reality of being born of God. Cf. ch. ii. 29. Every one that is born of God knows also in his belonging to God, in his fellowship with God, God as the Source of love, and love as the Essence of God, and hence he must insist upon love and practise love, so that thereby he may prove his knowledge of and familiarity with God; to love and to know God are correlative, because love is of God. Hence Grotius (ostendit se Deum nosse sicut oportet) errs less than Calvin (vera Dei cognitio amorem Dei necessario in nobis generat).

V. 8. He that loveth not hath never known God.—Consequently: he that lacks love in general, has not known God, has never learnt to know Him at all (Lücke), has never made even the beginning of the knowledge of God (Düsterdieck); this rendering is required by the Aorist ἔγνω joined to ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν. The reason of this is given in the following:

Because God is love.—A proposition which in the negative formula, according to the well-known manner of the Apostle, still further defines the former assertion that "love is of God." This relation of the two propositions and of their contents requires us to give to ὅτι a causal construction; hence it indicates the reason and not the contents of ἔγνω (Tirinus: non novit, Deum esse caritatem); in that case ὁ θεός also ought to be wanting and it would be: οὐκ ἔγνω τὸν θεόν, ὅτι ἀγάπη ἐστίν. Cf. Acts xiv. 18. Winer, p. 469. Ὁ θεός ἀγάπη ἐστίν—Deus nihil est quam mera caritas (Luther), Dei natura nihil aliud est, quam caritas, quam bonitas, quam summum bonum, sui ipsius communicativum (Hunnius). The Being of God is Love; therefore love springs from God. The word is to be taken essentialiter with most Catholic [Anglican—M.] and Lutheran Commentators, and not ἐνεργητικῶς with Calvin and Beza: Dei natura est homines diligere; for this construction makes God's Love-Essence give place to God's manifestation of love and adds the limitation of its application to men, whereas angels and even the Trinitarian God are objects of the love of God. Still farther removed from the depth of this saying, even to shallowness, are the expositions of Socinus (caritas est Dei ipsiusque voluntas effectus et is quidem maxime proprius), Grotius (Deus est plenus caritate), Rosenmüller (benignissimus). In this, that God is love as to His essential Being, lies the reason, why he that is born of God, must also have love and live in love and why the love of God must be allied with the love of the brethren who are also born of God. [Equally shallow are the explanations of Benson: "God is the most benevolent of all beings; full of love to all His creatures," Whitby: "The Apostle intends not to express what God is in His Essence . . . but what He is demonstrative, ἐνεργητικῶς, showing great philanthropy to men," and Hammond "God is made up of love and kindness to mankind."—Alford reviewing these quotations says that in them the whole force of the axiom as it stands in the Apostle's argument is lost; "unless he is speaking of the Essential Being of God, quorsum pertineat, to say that he that loveth not never knew God, because "God is love?" Put for these last words, "God is loving," and we get at once a fallacy of an undistributed middle: He that loveth not never knew what love is: God is loving; but what would follow? that in as far as God is loving, he never knew Him: but he may have known Him as far as He is just or powerful. But take ὁ θεός ἀγάπη ἐστίν of God's essential Being,—as a strict definition of God, and the argumentation will be strict: He that loveth not never knew love: God is love [the terms are co-essential and co-extensive]: therefore he who loveth not never knew God."—M.]

Revelation of the love of God through Christ. vv. 9, 10.

V. 9. In this was manifested the love of God in (on) us.—"We hear the lovely, the living echo of Christ, Jno. iii. 16." (Heubner). Ἐν τούτῳ points to the sequel. Ἐφανερώθη as contrasted with the hidden Being of the invisible God, annexes the objective, actual appearing and manifestation of the ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ, of the love which is God's, in God, as in ch. i. 2; iii. 5; 1 Tim. iii. 16; there is no reference whatever to subjective knowledge. [Huther: "The Apostle does not want to say that the love of God has been known by us through the sending of His Son; cf. v. 16, but that therein it stepped forth from its concealment, and did in reality manifest itself."—M.].—Ἐν ἡμῖν defines either the sphere in which, or the object at which [with regard to which—M.] the manifestation took place; it should be connected with the verb and rendered, either among us, with us, or at [in, with regard to] us. But the context does not introduce us merely as spectators but as receivers of the Divine love (ἵνα ζήσωμεν); and this love is not only to us an object of contemplation, which would be expressed by the Dative ἡμῖν without the preposition; but we ourselves are objects of this love, every one of us believers has experienced it; hence we ought not to leave the matter undecided (Lücke), but must decide for the rendering at [in, with regard to—M.] us (Düsterdieck), according to the manifest analogy of Jno. ix. 3, where ἐν must be thus construed and explained; hence we may not connect it with ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ (Huther and al.); for it was not the love of God in believers which was manifested, as if the believers existed before the manifestation of God's love in Christ, but the love of God appeared in Christ and was manifested not to, but at [in] the believers. On this account Bengel's explanation: "Amor Dei, qui nunc in nobis est," is equally untenable. Still less admissible is it to make ἐν ἡμῖν—eis ἡμᾶς, as is done by Luther, Spener and al. Cf. Winer, pp. 231, 436.—Ἐφανερώθη is explained by what follows:

That God hath sent His son, the only-begotten, into the world.

This is the fact of the manifestation. The designation τὸν μονογενῆ the only child (Luke vii. 12; viii. 42; ix. 38; Heb. xi. 17; Jno. i. 14, 18; iii. 18), ad auxesin valet (Calvin); what love, that He sent His only son (Huther)! It is therefore not—ἀγαπητός, omnium creaturarum longe carissimus, sibi dilectissimus (S. G. Lange, Socinus, Grotius). John thus marks the exaltation of the Son, just as the term ἀπεσταλκεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον denotes His pre-existence (Jno. iii. 17; x. 36): to be sent, to be sent into the world can only be true of one already born, not of one who is only born in the world, but one existing above and before the world, 1 Jno. i. 1.

That we might live through Him.—Thus ἐν ἡμῖν is explained. This indication of the purpose, ἵνα, points as much to the life-fulness in Christ as to our poverty. Cf. ch. iii. 16, 17. [Baumgarten-Crusius: Μονογενὴς and ζήσωμεν are the two emphatic words: The most exalted One—for our salvation!—M.].

V. 10. In this exists love.—[German like Greek "the love," i. e. love in the abstract.—M.]. Ἀγάπη is to be taken quite general, as at ch. iii. 16 (Neander, Düsterdieck, Huther), without the supplement of τοῦ θεοῦ (Spener, Lücke, Sander, de Wette, Brückner and al.), as at Rom. v. 5.

Not that we loved God, but that He loved us.—The simplest construction is to supply ἐν τούτῳ to οὐχ and ἀλλά. Thus preparation is made for the comprehensive term πρῶτος v. 19; the initiation of loving is with God; the beginning and origin of love is in God (ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ); ἡμεῖς and αὐτός are here emphatically contrasted like τὸν θεόν; amari dignissimum, and ἡμεῖς, indignissimos (Bengel), the self-existence, independence, of the Divine love are intimated by the prevenience of that love absolutely unconditioned by any merit on the part of men; the former is what is really said here (Huther), the other, as we may justly infer from what follows, (λασμὸν) and from what precedes (ἵνα ζήσωμεν), is implied (Düsterdieck). Hence there is no reason whatsoever for rendering ὅτι once "because" and then "that" (Baumgarten-Crusius), or for translating both times "because" but only as protases, thus: not because we loved Him but because He loved us, did He send His Son (Lachmann), or for a transposition of the words as if we did read: ὅτι οὐκ (Grotius), or for taking the first proposition as a dependent clause—ἡμῶν μὴ ἀγαπήσαντων (Meyer): that although we have not loved God before, yet did He love us). A Lapidé erroneously assigns to the implication the first place saying: "Ille caritatem Dei ponderat et exaggerat ex eo, quod Deus nulla dilectione, nullo obsequio nostro provocatus, imo multis injuriis et sceleribus nostris offensus, prior dilexit nos."

And sent His Son (as) a propitiation for our sins.—This is the proof in fact of αὐτός ἡγάπησεν ἡμᾶς. The Aorist ἀπέστειλεν, like ἡγάπησεν, simply narrates, while the Perfect ἀπέσταλκεν v. 9 absolutely presentiates Christ's having been sent (Lücke). Ἀπέστειλε stands emphatically in ante-position in order to set the act of God in relief; λασμὸν περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν has an explanatory and substantiating reference to ζήσωμεν δι' αὐτοῦ v. 9. Cf. ch. ii. 2; iii. 16. Insufficient: testatum fecit, se velle condonare (Rosenmüller).

Brotherly love inferred. v. 11. [from vv. 9, 10, and substantiating the exhortation v. 7.—M.]

V. 11. Beloved—ἀγαπητοί has a peculiar emphasis and distinct meaning, i. e. it designates those who stand in the enjoyment of the experience of the love of God.

If God so loved us.—Because εἰ with the Indicative introduces the aforesaid fact, it is described as an indubitable ground for an inference to be built upon it. [Alford calls attention to the difficulty of rendering this εἰ with an Indicative in English, which is neither any expression of uncertainty, nor—since, or seeing that; he describes it as "a certainty put in the shape of a doubt, that the hearer's mind may grasp the certainty for itself, not take it from the speaker." If (it be true that) . . . —is perhaps the nearest filling up of the sense.—M.] ὅτι denotes the preceding description of love; it is here—hac ratione, preventient without any merit on our part, in the sending of His Son for the propitiation of our sins; but it is not—tanta caritate, as in Jno. iii. 16 (where ὅτι—forte requires such a construction, as Düsterdieck rightly observes). There is no warrant for the interpretation: nullo hominum discrimine (Grotius).

We also ought to love one another.—In the first place we have to take notice of ἡμεῖς—ἀλλήλους: we, first the object of the glorious love of God (ἡμεῖς) must now also regard and treat every Christian as an object of Divine love and consequently become the subjects of such experienced Divine love; to this necessitates us the brother whom God loves, and to this compels us the love with which we ourselves are loved. Hence the Apostle uses the word ἀγαπῶμεν not only because there is extant for it an objectively given commandment and example, but also a subjective preparation for it; as God's children, born out of Him who is Love, born out of His Love-Being, we must love one another.

There is no fellowship with God without brotherly love. vv. 12, 13.

V. 12. No one hath ever beheld God.—Cf. Jno. i. 18: ἐώρακεν. The Perfects there, like τεθέαται here are on account of πῶποτε to be emphatically referred to the past with respect to its separate course and periods, and must not be construed according to a Hebraism, as carrying present force (Estius), or as comprehending the past and the present (Lücke). The word τεθέαται denotes calm, continued looking at and contemplation of a thing, but it is real seeing [in the literal sense of the word as distinguished from spiritual beholding, inward vision—M.]; this is the view of the Greek Commentators, (Augustine, Spener, Lücke and al.), as in v. 14 and—ἐώρακεν also v. 20. The sense is: God is invisible (1 Tim. vi. 16). Passages like Exod. xxxiii. 20, and Gen. xii. 7; xvii. 1 etc., are not contradictory, since where God did appear, it was not His face, but some assumed form that became visible. Consequently the passage must not be interpreted in a spiritual sense, as if it imported spiritual seeing and that God cannot be known and apprehended by man's own, natural powers (Piscator), or immediately (Rickli), or as He is (Estius), that He is consequently inscrutable (Neander). The explanation of this axiom follows from,

If we love one another, God abideth in us and His love is perfected in us.—The proposition: θεὸν οὐδεὶς πῶποτε τεθέαται, obviously refers not to the proposition ἀγαπῶν ἀλλήλους, which contains a presupposition and a condition, but to the leading thought: ὁ θεὸς ἐν ἡμῖν μένει. The Apostle is wholly concerned with the inward life-fellowship, with the inward relation between God and man which is to be carried on to perfection and which manifests itself in brotherly love; hence brotherly love is only the presupposition and condition of the assertion and assumption of such life-fellowship with God, but not of that relation itself (contrary to Frommann). So especially Düsterdieck, Huther. The invisibility of God surely does not exclude our love to God (v. 20. cf. 1 Pet. i. 8); nor is the invisibility of God used here to direct us to brotherly love, as if we should show to the brethren what we cannot show to Him (Lücke and al.); in that case θεὸν οὐκ δεῶσθαι and not ἀγαπῶν ἀλλήλους would have been introduced with ἐάν. Ἀγάπῃ θεοῦ denotes His love, the love of God, even the love peculiar to and inhering in Him, which is in us, if He ἐν ἡμῖν μένει. In this life-fellowship with Him we participate in His love, which is τετελειωμένη, has become perfected [i. e. has reached its full completion and maturity.—M.]. This love has its history of growth and completion in us and corresponds pari passu with brotherly love: where the one is, there is also the other; they mutually conditionate each other; it is loving with God, (out) of God, in God, which with Him is in us as His Being; detiful loving (ἀφειλομεν v. 11) is natural in believers. Hence the reference is not to God's love to us (Hunnius, Calov, Spener, Beza, Sander and al.), for the predicate would not suit such a construction; nor to our love to God (Luther, Calvin, Grotius, Lücke, Neander, Düsterdieck and others), nor to ea dilectio quam Deus præscribit (Socinus), nor to the mutual relation of love between God and us (Ebrard).

V. 13. In this we know that we abide in Him and He in us, that He hath given us of His Spirit.—The mark of recognition of the life-fellowship of God with us, and among ourselves with God, agrees exactly with the description at ch. iii. 24, as does also the reference to the gift of the Spirit (ἐν τούτῳ): ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος αὐτοῦ δέδωκεν ἡμῖν. Neither οὐ ch. iii. 24, nor the preposition ἐκ here, has partitive force; it rather answers to ἀπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος, Acts ii. 17; Joël iii. 1 (LXX.), while the Vulgate in conformity to the original text renders spiritum meum effundam, and denotes the origin and source of the Spirit in us, although we, as distinguished from Jesus who has the Spirit οὐκ ἐκ μέτρου (Jno. iii. 34), have only part in Him; the coarse notion of a divisibility or dismemberment of the Spirit must be strenuously excluded. The Spirit Himself is given to us; nothing is said here of His gifts; there is no reference to the διακρίσεις τῶν χαρισμάτων, 1 Cor. xii. 4, 11—(in opposition to Estius). His Spirit (τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτοῦ, the Love-Spirit of God) answers to ἀγάπη αὐτοῦ and confirms the explanation of v. 12, as given above, and supplements the fact that His Spirit mediates in us His love and its perfections.

Evidence of this inward life-fellowship as a certain fact. vv. 14, 15, 16.

V. 14. And we have beheld and testify.—Antithesis to v. 12: No one has ever beheld God, but we have seen the Son of the Father. Ἡμεῖς designates the Apostles and their associates, and this reference is confirmed by τεθεάμεθα καὶ μαρτυροῦμεν, which verbs point to an immediate, personal beholding as contrasted with the knowledge mediated by others (ch. i. 1, 2; Jno. i. 14), to their eye- and ear-witness (Jno. i. 34). What they have beheld, that they testify also; both verbs have the same object:

That the Father hath sent the Son as Saviour of the world.—In Jesus, the Sent One from God, they have beheld δόξαν αὐτοῦ, δόξαν ὡς μονογενοῦς παρὰ πατρός, πλήρης χάριτος καὶ ἀλφειας (Jno. i. 14), and therefore they beheld Him as the Sent One of God. Τοῦ κόσμου (cf. ch. ii. 2; Jno. iii. 16; iv. 42), implies that He is sent for every man, not only for the electi in omnibus populis (Piscator); the universality of salvation is also confirmed by the sequel:

V. 15. Whosoever confesseth that Jesus is the Son of God.—This ὁμολογεῖν is the consequence of the reception of the μαρτυρίαν of the Apostles. Cf. ch. ii. 2, 23. The reference here is neither to the confession in the fact of brotherly love (Bede), nor to the testimony of a holy life accompanying the confession with the mouth (Augustine, Grotius); but the faith of the heart, which receives the Apostolical μαρτυρία is taken for granted. Cf. v. 16.

God abideth in Him and He in God.—The confession, therefore, is to be taken as connected with the life-fellowship with God, and an ungodly conversation surely will not belie the confession; God in Christ Jesus will have appropriated salvation to the believer.

V. 16. And we have known and believed.—The beginning καὶ ἡμεῖς exactly as in v. 14. But ἐγνώκαμεν and πεπιστεύκαμεν is matter of the disciples of Jesus without any exception whatsoever (Estius, Calov, Spener, Lücke, de Wette, Düsterdieck, Ebrard, Huther), not of the Apostles only, as in τεθεάμεθα καὶ μαρτυροῦμεν (in opposition to Episcopius, Rickli and al.). Cf. Jno. vi. 69: πεπιστεύκαμεν καὶ ἐγνώκαμεν; cf. Lange in this Commentary, Vol. IV., p. 166, German edition. "True faith is, according to John, a faith of knowledge and experience: true knowledge of faith" (Lücke); both are in one another; each conditions and promotes the other. Hence it is really immaterial which of the two is put first; the moral act of faith and the intellectual act of knowing are ultimately not without the working of God in His Spirit on our spirit. For the reception of the word of truth in faith is a receiving from the Lord of the word, just as the shining of this bright word into the heart and the luminous rise of the truth of the word in the heart, come also from Him. The two constitute the foundation of man's confession. Hence the Perfects which continue to operate in the present confession. The object follows, viz.:

The love which God hath in us.—Cf. Jno. xiii. 35: ἵνα ἀγάπην ἔχητε ἐν ἀλλήλοις. The Present is emphatically placed first after the preceding Perfects; ἐν is used here as in v. 9. It is, as in Jno. vi. 69 (ὅτι σὺ εἰ δὲ ἀγῶς τοῦ θεοῦ), something objective, God's love on us, namely in Christ Jesus, wherefore Bede says: "Quia videlicet cum haberet filium unicum, noluit illum esse unum, sed ut fratres haberet, adoptavit illi, qui cum illo possiderent vitam æternam." Hence neither the subjective love of God erga nos (Estius, Luther, Socinus, Grotius, Rickli and al.), nor the love of God indwelling in us (Wilke, Hermeneutik des Neuen Testaments, 11, 64.), nor our love, kindled in us by God's love (Ebrard).—Now follows the concluding summary,

God is love and he that abideth in love, abideth in God and God abideth in him.

—A combination of vv. 8 and 16. Ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ denotes Love absolute, as the element of those who are born of God, and neither brotherly love (Lücke and al.), nor God's love to us (Ebrard); it occurs here without any qualifying addition. Μένων, however, denotes the love of man in which he abides and which dwells in him.

Perfecting of love in fearlessness. vv. 17, 18.

V. 17. In this, love is perfected with us.—Ἀγάπη is again absolute as in vv. 16, 18, and must neither be construed as God's love εἰς ἡμᾶς, nor as our love εἰς ἀλλήλους (Socinus), nor to God (Lange), but simultaneously as the disposition and activity of love (Huther), as at ch. iii. 18; and μεθ' ἡμῶν must receive its full force of among, between, with us; see Winer, p. 336 sq.—Were it not parallel with ἐν ἡμῖν v. 12 we might think of fellowship, ecclesiastical fellowship, the Christian Church, within which love has been perfected; the context also points to the individual life and perfection of Christians and not to the life and perfection of the Christian Church as such. Its most natural construction is with the verb τελειωται (Lücke, de Wette, Düsterdieck and al.), not with ἀγάπη, of which it cannot be the object, since it is not εἰς ἡμᾶς, as supposed by Luther, Calvin, Spener, Bengel, Sander, Besser and al. The position of the words is not more decisive for the connection with ἀγάπη here than at v. 9 (in opposition to Huther); μετ' ἡμῶν denotes the place where love was perfected. Hence ἡμῶν must not be resolved into God and we (Rickli) and construed as the mutual love of God and Christians, which would be wholly inadmissible and repugnant to the spirit of the Gospel. Τελειωται should be construed like τελειωμένη ἐστίν, v. 12, and τελεία and τελειωται in v. 18, this ἀγάπη in and on us is something to be perfected, and this perfection itself is not ready and accomplished at once; it has its stages and degrees. This is inconceivable and unreplicable of the love of God. But wherein is it primarily perfected? ἐν τούτῳ—ἵνα παρρησίαν ἔχωμεν:

That we have confidence in the day of judgment.—On παρρησία see Notes on ch. ii. 28 in Exegetical and Critical. ἵνα, which follows αἴτη, ch. iii. 11, 23; Jno. xvii. 8 and also ἐν τούτῳ, Jno. xv. 8, gives the purpose of God in the perfecting of love with us; we shall have confidence. Ἐν τούτῳ therefore must neither be referred to what goes before v. 16 (Spener), nor, with the assumption of a trajecta anticipatio, connected with ὅτι (Grotius, Beza and al.), nor must ἵνα be construed in the sense of ὥστε (Episcopius, Bengel and al.). The ἡμέρα τῆς κρίσεως is ὅταν φανερωθῇ ch. ii. 28. Of course ἐν has its usual sense and must not be explained εἰς; for the reference here is not to the confidence of expectation, the desire of its drawing near (Augustine, Calvin), where men are liable to deceive themselves. Of course, he that may and will have confidence in the judgment, will also have confidence before it takes place; however, it is to be borne in mind that even believers, notwithstanding their activity of love, will be surprised in the judgment (Matth. xxv. 31 sq.); the reference is solely to confidence in the judgment, not to confidence beforehand. It is incorrect to combine the two with Rickli, Huther and al.; nor must τελειωται be taken as a futurum exactum. [It is doubtful whether Braune's exegesis will carry conviction to the mind of the reader. It seems to be rather contradictory, for while he condemns the interpretation of Rickli and Huther, he seems to adopt it when he says that "of course he that may and will have confidence in the judgment, will also have confidence before it takes place." On the whole, Huther's explanation, which is substantially that of Alford, seems to be the most natural. He says: "The difficulty that something future (our attitude in the day of judgment), is to be valid as a mark of perfect love in the present, vanishes by the assumption that ἐν involves both the παρρησία of believers in the day of judgment, and their present παρρησία in anticipation of that day; this combination was natural to the Apostle who thought of the day of judgment not as very remote but as already dawning (ch. ii. 18). In his love this future παρρησία is to him already present."—M.]

world.—Ὅτι annexes the reason of our confidence in the day of judgment. Ἐκεῖνος is Jesus and not God (Augustine, Calvin and al.). The Present ἐστὶ must not be construed ἦν (a Lapide, Grotius, Rickli and al.), nor must the words ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ τούτῳ be referred to Christ. The comparison must be gathered from the context: it is very strict, καθὼς καὶ. The point in hand is the μένειν ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ, which μένειν perfects love even unto filial confidence in the day of judgment (so Huther who cites Lorinus, "redditis nos caritas Christo similes et conformes imagini filii Dei"; Hence not likeness in suffering (Luther) or temporality (Rickli), not likeness in that, though we are in the world, we are not of the world (Sander); for nothing is said on these points; neither is here any reference to the adoption (Lücke), nor to δικαιοσύνη (Düsterdieck). Love is the eternal Being of Christ, cf. ch. iii. 7 (Huther). [The last named author lays stress on ἐστὶν and compares in the passage cited the words: καθὼς ἐκεῖνος δικαίως ἐστὶν.—Alford adopts the explanation of Düsterdieck, who thus develops his view: St. John does not say that Love is perfected in confidence in us, because we resemble Christ in Love; but he refers to the fundamental truth on which our Love itself rests and says: because we are absolutely like Christ, because we are in Christ Himself, because He lives in us, for without this there cannot be likeness to Him; in a word, because we are, in that communion with Christ which we are assured of by our likeness to Him in righteousness, children of God, therefore our love brings with it also full confidence. Essentially, the reason here rendered for our confidence in the day of judgment is the same as that given, ch. iii. 21 sq., for another kind of confidence, viz., that we keep His commandments. This also betokens the δικαιοσύνη, of which Christ is the essential exemplar and which is a necessary attribute of those who through Christ are children of God.—M.]. Ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ τούτῳ applied to ἐγμέν, denotes the place of abode, the earthly sphere of life, whereas Christ is in heaven, and is not an ethical idea, though we should supply with Bengel: amoris experte judicium timentis.

V. 18. Fear is not in love.—Antithesis of παρρησία ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῆς κρίσεως. Quite general. In love is not fear; fear is not a part of love, it is something wholly foreign to it, which is only outside of it (Huther). According to the well known phrase: oderint, dum metuant, hatred and fear are congruous, but love and fear are wholly incongruous. There is nothing said of the fear of God which is the beginning of wisdom (Ps. cxi. 10), nor of love; hence neither our love to God, nor brotherly love (Lücke), and still less God's love to us (Calvin, Calov, Spener).

But perfect love casteth out fear.—Τελεία is more than sincera, opposita simulationi (Beza), and ἐξω is not out of itself (Lücke), as if it were in it, but out of the heart. "Love not only does not contain fear, but it also does not suffer it alongside of itself; the love which wholly drives away fear is not love in its first beginning, love as yet weak, but love in its perfection." (Huther). [Alford says of ἀλλά that it is not here the mere adversative after a negative clause, in which case it would refer to something in which fear is, e. g. φόβος οὐκ ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ, ἀλλ' (ἐστιν) ἐν τῷ μισῇ: but it is the stronger adversative, implying, "nay, far otherwise:" "tantum abest ut . . . ut;" and renders: Fear existeth not in love, nay, perfect love casteth out fear, etc.—M.]—Where such love fills the heart, there is no room for fear.

Because fear hath punishment.—This is the reason why love does not suffer fear alongside itself. Κόλασις often used in the LXX., [Ex. xiv. 3, 4, 7; xviii. 30; xlv. 12, cf. Wisd. xi. 14; xvi. 2, 24; xix. 4.—M.], as in Matth. xxv. 46 in the sense of punishment, pain of punishment (Besser) under the menace of the κρίσις. Bengel: "torturatum habet; nam diffidit, omnia inimica et adversa sibi fugit ac proponit, fugit, odit." Hence it is not consciousness of punishment (Lücke), for the punishment has not yet set in; nor condemnation pronounced in the final judgment on him who does not stand in the fellowship of love (Düsterdieck). 'Ὁ φόβος is neither pro concreto (he that fears (de Wette, Düsterdieck), nor is ἐχει—receives; and least of all: fear holds fast to, tenet, thinks of punishment, knows nothing of clemency and love (Baumgarten-Crusius).—"The pain felt in expectation of the punishment of Him who is feared" (Huther); "Fear by anticipating punishment has it even now" (Alford).—M.]

But he that feareth is not perfected in love.—Negative connected with the main proposition: ἡ τελεία ἀγάπη ἐξωβάλλει τὸν φόβον, and application to the beginning: φόβος οὐκ ἐστιν ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ. Hence δὲ is by all means to be retained, and neither to be cancelled, nor to be construed—οὐν or καὶ [δὲ is strictly adversative.—M.]. It is accordingly both owing to a want of perfection in the individual and to a want of perfection of love (τετελειώται ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ—ἡ τελεία ἀγάπη), if fear is present, fear, as in Rom. viii. 15: οὐκ ἐλάβετε πνεῦμα δουλείας πάλιν εἰς φόβον. Unnecessary [and diluting.—M.] are the conjectures of Grotius, who proposes to read κόλασιν (mutilationem) instead of κόλασιν (metus amorem mutilat aique infirmit, aut prohibet, ne se exerceat), and κολούμενος instead of φοβούμενος (qui mutilatur aut impeditur in dilectione), and of Lamb. Bos who reads κώλασιν instead of κόλασιν. [Oecumenius says that there are two kinds of godly fear, φόβος προκαταρκτικός, which afflicts men with a sense of their evil deeds and dread of God's anger, and which is not abiding; and φόβος τελειωτικός, of which it is said, "The fear of the Lord is clean and endureth forever." Ps. xix., and which δέους τοιοῦτον ἀνήλλακται.—M.]

The love of God is necessarily united with brotherly love. vv. 19, 20, 21.

VER. 19. We love God.—Φοβούμενος is contrasted with ἡμεῖς ἀγαπῶμεν θεόν, without an address, like ἀγαπητοί, v. 7. There is nothing here to indicate the Conjunctive or an exhortation. Ἡμεῖς,—emphatically placed first, who are born of God, His children,—rather notes the fact, the Indicative (Calvin, Beza, Aretius, Socinus, Spener, S. Schmidt, Bengel, Riekl, Neander, Ebrard, Erdmann, Huther, Hofmann, Schriftbeweis II. 2. 338); it corresponds, like the whole verse 19, with οὐχ ὅτι ἡμεῖς ἠγαπήσαμεν τὸν θεόν. Neither the comparison with v. 7, nor the ground and the further development in vv. 20, 21, can warrant the interpretation that we must assume here an imperative Conjunctive (as Düsterdieck does).

For the majority of authorities favour the addition of the object, even the οὐν of A. implies as much. [Alford, who is on the same side, fixes the connection thus: "He that feareth is not perfect in love. Our love (abstract, not specified whether to God or our brother) is brought about by, conditioned by, depends upon His love to us first; it is only a sense of that which can bring about our love: and if so, then from the very nature of things it is void of terror, and full of confidence, as springing out of a sense of His love to us. Nor only so: our being new begotten in love is not only the effect of a sense of His past love, but is the effect of that love itself."—M.] In the ground

Because He first loved us, πρῶτος is emphatic, and this seems to suggest a primary reference to our love to God, cf. vv. 9, 10. From our most natural love to God, grounded on our experience of the love of God, the Apostle now passes on to brotherly love.

VER. 20. If any say, I love God, and hate his brother, he is a liar.—Εάν τις εἴπῃ, cf. ch. i. 6; ὅτι before ἀγαπῶ τὸν θεόν frequently introduces direct speech. This progress confirms the assumption of the Indicative in v. 19. Here the Apostle resolves the communicate form of speech into the singular form as a conclusion and proof. Μισῶ answers to the next following ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν. Cf. ch. iii. 14, 15. "To hate is the positive form of love." (Huther). Cf. Luke xiv. 26. Col. Matth. x. 87. Every defect of love makes room to hatred. Hence ψεύστης ἐστὶ, as in ch. i. 6. The reason:

For he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God (or cannot love God) whom he hath not seen?—The main stress lies in the antithesis ὃν ἐώρακεν and ὃν οὐχ' ἐώρακεν. The Perfect denotes sight continuing in its effect (de Wette, Düsterdieck, Huther); Lücke: ἐώρακεν—to have before one's eyes; a Lapide: vidit et assidue videt. Socinus goes too far in emphasizing the Perfect so as to make it also intimate that it is enough to have seen and become acquainted with one, and that it is not necessary to have him still before one's eyes. The saying of Gregory: oculi sunt in amore duces, and the remark of Oecumenius: ἐπελυστικὸν ὄρασις πρὸς ἀγάπην, supply what is understood in the inference. Love to God, the Invisible, is difficult; also 1 Pet. i. 8: ὃν οὐκ εἶδότες ἀγαπᾶτε expresses both joy and amazement. He therefore who performs the more difficult task of loving God whom he does not see, must also perform the easier work of loving his brother whom he does see. The Apostle's object, consequently, is not to lead us from the love to our brother to the love of God, but only to verify the latter by the former; love to God ever remains the first, the deepest and highest work, which must, however, evidence itself in brotherly love. The interrogative form is as strong and authentic as the simple negation; but the anteposition of the object τὸν θεόν ὃν οὐχ' ἐώρακεν greatly intensifies the thought. Πᾶς or οὐ δύναται ἀγαπᾶν presupposes ἐάν τις εἴπῃ and denotes the supposition of the assertion of loving God [under the circumstances.—M.] to be impossible, and the assertion itself a lie. The Apostle's argumentum ad hominem applies only to the liar (Düsterdieck).

Bengel: Sermo modalis; impossibile est, ut talis sit amans Dei, in presenti. Hence the reference to the imago Dei, which Augustine (apostolus hic pro confesso sumit, Deus se nobis in hominibus offerre, qui inscriptam gerunt ejus imaginem; Johannes nil aliud voluit, quam fallacem esse jactantiam, si quis Deum se amare dicat, et ejus imaginem, quæ ante oculos est, negligat), Sander, Ebrard (who suggests that it is not easier to love one who is visible before us, but has hurt us) and al., find here is by no means warranted, nor that of Grotius who calls man opus Dei pulcherrimum. De Wette also erroneously maintains that God, the ideal, invisible being could only be loved in reality in our brother, the visible, empirical object of love.

VER. 21. And this commandment we have from Him.—Kat simply adds a new reason: the reference is to a specific commandment. This is a firmius argumentum (Calvin): for quomodo diligit eum, cujus odisti præceptum? (Augustine). 'Απ' αὐτοῦ refers to God (Lücke, de Wette, Düsterdieck and al.), not to Christ (Calvin), Sander, Huther and al.). The fact that θεὸν is used afterwards does not militate against the application of αὐτοῦ to θεὸν, since Jesus in His intercessory prayer Jno. xvii, 3 mentions His own name instead of saying ἐμὲ. The analogy of ch. i. 5; ii. 25 can not upset the context and ch. iii. 28, 24, and only indicate that αὐτὸς also may designate Christ, and that not ἐκείνος only does designate Him. The ἐντολή is and remains a commandment, and not—ἀγγελία, doctrine (Carpov).

That he who loveth God, love his brother also.—But this commandment is nowhere found; not even at Matth. xxii. 39. But the Apostle justly puts in the form of a definite Divine command the essential principle of Christian Ethics, which really and fundamentally carries everything which here (v. 7 sqq. iii. 10, 19. cf. Jno. xiii. 34, etc.) is told of the inviolable duty of brotherly love to those who are born of God and in filial love united to their Father (Düsterdieck); ἡ denotes also here the end and aim and not only the substance of the command, as Huther supposes.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. God is Love—a sentence, which “is the summary and most simple expression of what the Scripture, the whole Scripture teaches throughout” (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis I. p. 71), and has an important bearing retrospectively and prospectively. Retrospectively it bears even on the Being of God and on the history of God's revelation in Christ Jesus. If the Being of God is Love it must also be personal and cannot be substance only in the pantheistic sense. Yea, it points to the Trinity or God's vitality and fullness of life; Him that loves, who is yet not without Him that is LOVED, and reciprocal Love, as Augustine tried also this purely ethical construction of the Trinity alongside the psychological analogy (memoria, intelligentia, voluntas) in De Trinitate (VI. 5; and therefore there are not more than three: One who loves Him who is of Him, and One who loves Him of whom He is, and Love itself. If this is nothing, how is God Love? If it is not Substance, how is God Substance? XI. 2: If I love something there are three,—I, what I love, and Love itself. For I do not love Love, if I do not love Him that loveth, for love is not where nothing is loved); hence he could, according to Rom. v. 5, understand in our passage (v. 7) by ἀγάπη the Holy Ghost, while Didymus explained ἀγάπη of Christ. In the middle ages Augustine was particularly followed by Richard of St. Victor, the mystic scholastic, or the scholastic mystic (cf. Liebner, Hugo von St. Victor p. 82 sqq.), in his work De Trinitate, especially III. 14—and in modern times, first of all, by Sartorius: Die heilige Liebe, Part I. p. 1 sqq., and Liebner: Christologie I (in many places). See also Nitzsch on the Essential Trinity of God in the Studien und Kritiken, 1841, pp. 295—345, especially p. 387 sqq.

2. Retrospectively, traces of this truth may be found in the History of the Revelation of God in Ex. xxxiv. 6; Ps. ciii. 8-13; lxxxvi. 5, 16; Deut. xxxii. 6; Is. lxiii. 16; Jer. xxxi. 9. But John treats in the most comprehensive manner, with perfect ease and certainty this most profound thought which would never have occurred to any thinker out of his own strength and reason! The heavens declare the glory and majesty of God only, (Ps. xix.) His word alone declares His grace. In nature we meet His handiwork, His Power and Wisdom, in His word alone do we encounter His Love and Mercy. The axioms “God is a Spirit” (Jno. iv. 24), and “God is Love” set forth the most vital truths concerning the Nature and Being of God.—“Spirit is His Nature, Love His Life” (Schöberlein), or Spirit is the Substance and Nature, Love the character of God and not only in His attitude.

3. Prospectively this Johannean saying points to the life of knowledge and of demeanour. Sartorius in his “Heilige Liebe” has based on this saying the whole of his Ethics. Cf. also Köhler, “Gott der allein Gute” (God the Only Good One) in Studien und Kritiken 1856, p. 426 sqq. “Præcificam definitionem Dei proponit I. Joh. iv. 8: Deus caritas est. Ex caritate omnia Dei opera procedunt, et Spiritus Sanctus a Patre et Filio ab æterno procedens est substantialis amor Patris et Filii. In tempore Deus ex caritate omnia creavit, ex caritate misit Filium ad opus redemptionis: præstandum, ex caritate dat Spiritum Sanctum, qui similes motus in cordibus credentium accendit, ex caritate in vitam æternam a facie ad faciem beatis sese intendam præstabit.—Omnia in caritate et ex caritate agit (Joh. Gerhard Exeg. ii. p. 71). But we must guard against straightway identifying Love, which is the Nature of God, with the Personality of God which is the logical presupposition of the former (against Liebner, i. 1, 111), and to take care not to combine Love with Truth and Righteousness (as does Nitzsch, System § 68. 1), for communication of self is implied in the nature of Love, but not in the nature of truth and holiness, and what becomes of the difference between τὸ ἀγαπᾶν and κἀγαπᾶν, of the anti-scriptural conception of ἀποκατάστασις τῶν πάντων and the wrathless God in Origen and Schleiermacher? Cf. Thomasius, Christi Werk und Person, i. p. 127 sqq.; Philipp, Glaubenslehre, ii. p. 79 sqq.

4. The love of God was revealed in the sending of His only begotten Son. vv. 2, 9, 10, 12, 14. Hence He is called μονογενὴς=μόνος γενόμενος (Jno. i. 14, 18; iii. 16, 18), and not πρωτότοκος (Rom. viii. 29; Col. i. 15, 18; Hebr. i. 6; Rev

i. 5). The greatness of the Sent One and the object of His Mission are designed to mark the love of Him that sent Him. The reference to the first-born would mark the success of the Mission and the work of the Sent One. There is no other proof of the love of the Father, equal to this: Christ, the Son of God by His appearing and message compensates us for the want of seeing the Invisible God (v. 12. Jno. xiv. 9). Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. 71.

5. To see, know, believe on, confess and testify of Jesus the Son of God on the part of the Apostles, to hear, know, believe and confess on the part of the Church, is indispensable to the life-fellowship of God with us, and of us with God, since, through and through ethical, it can only be acquired and preserved by an ethical process. With the new birth out of God, spiritual regeneration, begins the life-process of sanctification. To remain untouched, unmoved in the presence of Jesus, or only to be turned to Him outwardly, or even to turn away from Him, to deny Him in doubt or decided unbelief, is immorality.

6. The nature of this life-fellowship, begun with our regeneration, is mutuality in continuous reciprocity of action; He to and in us, we in Him, believingly knowing and confessing Him, living and loving, we full of confidence, He in His ever preventient grace and work of grace to and in us.

7. The degrees of development are given by Bengel thus: "Sine timore et amore, cum timore sine amore, cum timore et amore, sine timore cum amore." And Augustine: "Timor quasi locum preparat caritati. Si autem nullus timor, non est, qua intret caritas. Timor Dei sic vulnerat, quo medici ferramentum. Timor medicamentum, caritas sanitas. Timor servus est caritatis. Timor est custos et pædagogus legis, donec veniat caritas." Though man in his sin begin with servile fear before God, in the presence of God's Nature of Love and attitude of Love he will progress in filial fear even unto fearlessness and confidence in all humility.

8. Brotherly love is and remains the measure of our life from God, from whom comes all love; he that abides in God, cannot be without love, and he that is without love cannot be in God, nor can God abide in him. He, who is Love, has thus ordained it Himself; it is His Will, His explicit commandment, even as it is in conformity with His Nature.

9. [Wordsworth on v. 10: "A statement of the doctrine of the Atonement, and a statement the more remarkable, because it anticipates the objections that have been made to it in later times.—These objections have taken the following form. God, it is said, is Love (1 Jno. iv. 8). He loves us, and He loves His only-begotten Son. We are sinners; and as long as we are sinners, and without pardon from God, we have no hope of heaven. As sinners we owe an infinite debt to God, which we can never pay. But God is infinite in Love; He willeth not that any should perish (2 Pet. iii. 9), but that all should be saved (1 Tim. ii. 4). He can forgive us the debt. He can do this freely. To suppose that He cannot do so, is to set limits to His Omnipotence. To imagine that He will not do so, is to disparage His Love. To allege, that He will require an equivalent for the debt, is to represent the God of mercy as a rigorous exactor, and to believe that He required such a price for our pardon, as the blood of His own beloved Son, and that He exposed Him who is perfectly innocent, to the death of the cross for our sakes, at the hands of wicked men, is to charge God with cruelty, injustice and weakness; and to suppose Him to be angry with us, at the same time that we say that "He loved us," and gave His only Son to die for us (1 Jno. iii. 16; iv. 10), is, it is alleged, to involve ourselves in inconsistency, and to misrepresent God, as if He were affected by human passions. And lastly, to say that Christ shed His blood as a ransom to deliver us from the captivity of Satan, is, it is argued, to make the Son of God tributary to the Evil One. Such are the objections made by Socinians and others, to the doctrine of the Atonement.—These objections rest on fallacious grounds. They proceed on the supposition that as sinners we are only debtors to God. But in His relation to us, God is not only a Creditor, but He is our Law-giver and Judge, our King and Lord; and He is perfectly just and holy.

Besides, as St. John teaches (ch. iii. 4), the essence of sin is, that it is a violation of God's Law, and all are sinners (ch. i. 10). And God represents Himself in Scripture as a Moral Governor, infinite in justice, and when we contemplate Him as He is represented by Himself in His own Word, and when we regard sin as it is in His sight, and as it is described in the Holy Scriptures, we must conclude that He is grievously offended by sin; and He has declared in His word that He is angry with it and will punish it. The wrath of God is revealed against all ungodliness (Rom. i. 18). The wages of sin is death (Rom. vi. 23).—But this proposition is not at variance, as has been alleged, with St. John's declaration, that God loved us, and sent His own Son, the only begotten, that we might live through Him; and that herein consists Love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son a propitiation for our sins.

That which God loved in us was not our sin, but our nature. It was that nature which God Himself had made in His own likeness, and which we had marred, and which He desired to repair. And because He hates sin, and knows its consequences, even death eternal, and because He loved our nature which was exposed by it to everlasting perdition; and because being infinitely just, He must punish sin, which He, who is infinitely pure, must hate, and which He who is infinitely true, has declared that He will punish; and because the sins of the whole world are so heinous, and because they demand a satisfaction infinite in value, and because without shedding of blood there is no remission (Heb. ix. 22); therefore, in His immense love for our nature, which He had made and which we had marred by sin, He sent His own Son, God of God, to take that Nature, the Nature of us all, in order to be the substitute of all, and Saviour of all, and to become our Emmanuel, God with us (Matth. i. 23), God manifest in the flesh (1 Tim. iii. 16), partaking of our flesh and blood and to be the Lord our Righteousness (Jer. xxiii. 6; xxxiii. 16), and to suffer death, the wages of sin, in our nature, as our Proxy and Representative, and to appease God's wrath by an adequate propitiation, and to take away our guilt, and to redeem us from bondage and death by the priceless ransom of His own blood, and to deliver us by His death from him who had the power of it, even the devil, and to reconcile us to God, and to restore us to His favour, and to effect our atonement with Him, and to purchase for us the heavenly inheritance of everlasting life. See Heb. ii. 14, 17.—As Origen says (in Matth. xvi.): "Homo quidem non potest dare aliquam commutationem pro animâ suâ (Ps. xlix. 9; Matth. xvi. 26); Deus autem pro animabus omnium dedit commutationem, pretiosum sanguinem Filii sui (1 Pet. i. 18)." "Si non fuisset peccatum, non necesse fuerat Filium Dei Agnum fieri; nec opus fuerat Eum in carne positum jugulari; sed mansisset hoc, quod in principio erat, Deus Verbum. Verum, quoniam introiit peccatum in hunc mundum, peccati autem necessitas propitiationem requirit, et propitiation non fit nisi per hostiam, necessarium fuit provideri hostiam pro peccato." (ibid. hom. 4 in Num.) If it be said that according to this statement the just suffer for the unjust, and that the beloved Son of God was delivered to death for the offences of those who did not love Him, but were at enmity with Him, this is perfectly true; it is the assertion of God Himself in Holy Scripture, see 1 Pet. iii. 18; 2 Cor. v. 21; 1 Pet. i. 19.—The just suffered for the unjust. Yes, suffered for a time. But this is not at variance with daily experience. Parents suffer for children; brethren for brethren; friends for friends; subjects for sovereigns, and sovereigns for subjects. And if we are to reject the doctrine of the Atonement on the plea that vicarious sufferings are not reconcilable with justice, we cannot stop short of Deism or even of Atheism. Cf. Bp. Butler's Analogy of Religion. Part II. ch. v.

If any victim was to take away sin, that victim must be innocent. In order to take away infinite guilt, it must be infinitely innocent. The price paid for Infinite Justice must be infinite in value. In order to suffer for men the victim must be human; and in order to satisfy God, it must be Divine. Be it remembered also that the Son of God suffered willingly. He gave Himself a ransom for all (1 Tim. ii. 6). The Good Shepherd giveth His life for the sheep (John x. 11). Cf. Matth. xx. 28; Gal. i. 4; ii. 20; Eph. v. 2; Tit. ii. 14; Heb. ix. 14.—They also for whom He gave Himself are His own flesh and blood. He is their Head, they His members. They are one with Him.—Still further.—By His meritorious sufferings in that human nature, which He has taken, and joined forever in His own Person to the Nature of God, He has delivered that nature from sin and death, and has exalted it to the right hand of God. Therefore He suffered joyfully. To do evil is indeed evil; and to suffer evil in eternity, is dreadful; but to suffer evil in time, in order that others by our means may be happy in eternity, is not evil, but glorious. Earthly conquerors die with joy in the hour of victory. Much more Christ. He knew that suffering was His path to glory. He knew that because he was obedient to death, even to the death of the cross, therefore God would highly exalt Him, and give Him a Name above every name (Phil. ii. 8, 9). He saw of the travail of His soul and was satisfied (Is. liii. 11). Doubtless, in His human flesh He shrank from the cup of agony and from the anguish of the cross. But even in the glorious hour of His transfiguration He had talked with Moses and Elias of His death (Luke ix. 31). His Divine eye pierced through the clouds of suffering, and saw the visions of glory to which it would lead, a victory over Satan, a world rescued from his grasp, God's justice satisfied, His wrath appeased, His love glorified; and so the cross became a triumphal chariot, in which the Conqueror rode in victory (Col. ii. 14), and mounted to heaven, and bore mankind with Him through the gates of the heavenly palace of the everlasting capital and was greeted by the song of the angels, "Lift up your heads," etc. Ps. xxiv. 7.

It has been alleged that if by sin we were prisoners to Satan, therefore the price of Christ's blood which He paid upon the cross for our liberation from Satan was paid to Satan. But this we deny. See Greg. Nazianzen, Orat. 45, p. 862, ed. Paris, 1778. It might as well be said that the ransom paid for the delivery of prisoners from a king's prison, is paid to the gaoler in whose custody they are. We, by our sins, had made ourselves slaves of Satan; and as a just punishment for our sins, we were made prisoners of Satan. Satan was God's executioner against us. He was our gaoler. Tophet is ordained of old (Is. xxx. 33), as one of God's instruments of death (Ps. vii. 14). But Christ, by dying for us, delivered us from death. He rescued us from the hands of Satan, and paid the price of our ransom, not to Satan, but to God. He delivered us from Satan by offering Himself to God. (Cf. Rom. iii. 28-26).

They who contravene the doctrine of the Atonement often claim the credit of exercising their Reason, and deny that unbelief of the doctrine of the Atonement rests on the foundation of reason. But a right use of reason leads to a firm belief in the doctrine of the Atonement; and a denial of it proceeds from an abuse of reason.—

The doctrine of the Atonement cannot be discovered by reason. No; but we can prove by reason that the Holy Scriptures are from God, and that the doctrine of the Atonement is clearly revealed in the Holy Scriptures. And thus this doctrine rests on the foundation of reason. Being a portion of supernatural truth revealed by God in Scripture to the world, it is not to be discovered by reason, or fully comprehended by reason, but it is to be heartily embraced and surely held fast by faith, which implies a right use of reason. And reason teaches us, that it would be very unreasonable to expect, that what is contained in a revelation from such a Being as God to so frail a creature as man, in his present state on earth, should be fully comprehended by reason; and that, if reason could understand everything, there would be no use in revelation, and no place for faith. Right reason itself teaches us that to deny the Lord who bought us (2 Pet. ii. 1), because we cannot understand, why God allowed sin to prevail, which required the sacrifice of the death of His own ever-blessed Son, would be to renew the indignities of the crucifixion, and to smite our Redeemer with a reed, the reed of our unregenerate reason, when we ought to fall down and worship in faith. Reason itself teaches us that it is very reasonable to expect mysteries in revelation; and that they are our moral discipline, and exercise our humility, patience, faith and hope, and teach us to look forward to that blessed time, when we, who now see through a glass darkly (1 Cor. xiii. 12), shall behold the clouds removed, etc. Thus reason leads us to the door of the Holy of Holies; and then we pass within the veil by faith; and there we stand, and with the eye of faith, we behold God enthroned upon the Mercy Seat, sprinkled by the blood of Christ. Further, as reasonable men, looking at the cross of Christ, we see there the most cogent reasons for presenting ourselves, our souls and bodies a living Sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is our reasonable service (Rom. xii. 1).

This doctrine of the Atonement is the root of Christian practice, and they, who impugn that doctrine, are not only undermining the foundations of Christian faith, but also of Christian morality. This was clearly evinced even in the Apostolic age, by the licentiousness and profligacy, engendered by heretical doctrines, against which St. John contends in his Epistles, concerning the Incarnation and Death of Christ.

We cannot adequately estimate the moral heinousness of sin, without considering the sacrifice which it cost to redeem us from its power and guilt. We cannot duly understand the obligations of love and obedience, under which we lie to Christ, and the motives which constrain us to holiness, without remembering that we are not our own, but have been bought with a price—the blood of Christ—and are therefore bound to glorify Him in our bodies which are His. See 1 Cor. vi. 20.

Accordingly, St. John, having stated the doctrine of the Atonement, proceeds and continues to the end of the Epistle, to enforce the moral duties consequent on this doctrine. "Beloved, if God so loved us, we also ought to love one another." He teaches us to contend earnestly for the doctrine of the Atonement, as the groundwork of Christian duty to God and man. Cf. Pearson on the Creed, art. x. pp. 670-688.—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

In love, even in God's glorious Love thou livest—well, let love live also in thee!—the primal fount of the Love in God streams round thee, and onward to thee, also through thy heart; wilt thou enjoy it without having part thereof?—Out of thee must shine forth that which has been manifested to thee, even the love and kindness of God thy Saviour, which seeks that which is lost. Brotherly love must grow warm in filial love which has been kindled at the Father's heart.—In thy child people recognize a member of thy family, thy race; and ought not our heavenly Father to be recognized in thee? Therefore exercise thyself in love of the brethren!—Dost thou boast of thy knowledge of God, of understanding the Holy Scripture? prove it in thy brotherly love!—In nature thou seest His handiwork, the traces of His Omnipotence, in Christ the love-purpose of His heart, His peace-thoughts respecting thee (cf. Doctrinal and Ethical No. 2). He takes care that thy sins be atoned for, that thou become not estranged from Him, or keep remote from His life; do not build anew at the wall of partition between Him and thee; such building destroys thy life and thy salvation.—The anticipating offices of friendship are gratifying and humiliating; realize and receive the prevenient grace of God.—As He took the initiative in creation, so He had to take it also in redemption, which is also a creation; and how has He done it! Though without thee He could create thee, yet He neither can nor will save thee without thee.—Above thee rules thy Father, for thee the Son is sent, in thee works His Spirit; do not hinder the work of God for and in thee; do not in unkindness to thyself and thy brethren arrest the perfecting of His work of love.—Do not reject the testimony of eye- and ear-witnesses; surrender to it, receive it in faith, hold it fast in confession; exercise thyself in the love which thou believest and knowest. For to be unloving is to be ungodly, and to be ungodly is to be unloving. If thou art disposed to disparage confession, recollect that like love it radiates from faith; confession is the love of the mouth, love is the confession of the deed, and both come from the heart.—Behind the judgments in the world's history and in the history of thy life, there is a judgment, to stand in which is salvation and bliss.—The unloving must be undone in the judgment of Him who is Love, before the Judge who desired to become the Saviour.—That cannot be our desire in life which does not give us confidence in the last judgment.—Fear, which does not strengthen but expels love, is worthless; so is also that love, which is unable to overcome fear (cf. Doctrinal and Ethical, No. 7).—Brotherly love, in comparison with the love of God, is as inferior as is rendering unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, in comparison with rendering unto God, the things that are God's; but on that account both must not be undervalued, for both are enjoined upon us. Still it is certain that when the less is wanting, the greater has no room and cannot find the ability to practise it.—Behold of brotherly love: 1. The origin. 2. The measure. 3. The power. 4. The growth. 5. The prize and victory.—Only in obedience to the will of God thou growest in the nature of God and art changing from a creature into a child, from a servant into an heir of God.—The glory of love: 1. Whence is it? 2. Where was it manifested? 3. What does it effect? 4. Whither does it lead?—The power of love 1. on earth with reference to the brethren, even to hostile ones; 2. in heaven, in the judgment, before God and Jesus Christ, the Holy One.—The perfecting of love to the brethren is 1. difficult, 2. appointed, 3. sure, 4. glorious.

BERNARD:—God is Love: what then is more precious than love? And he that abides in love, abides in God; what then is more sure than love?

AUGUSTINE:—Thou beholdest the Trinity, when thou beholdest Love, for there are three, he that loveth, he that is loved, and reciprocal love.

LUTHER:—For what shall one say much of it? If one says in a lengthy way, that it is a lofty, noble qualitas in the soul and the most precious and perfect of virtues, as the philosophers and work-teachers discourse of it; all this is nothing in comparison with this word which he pours forth in overflowing eloquence that "God is Love," and that His Being and Nature is wholly Love. If any one would paint and produce a likeness of God, he must produce a picture which is wholly love; as if the Divine Nature were nothing else than an oven and fire of love, filling heaven and earth. And again, if Love could be painted and portrayed, it ought to be a picture that is neither real and human, nor angelic and heavenly, but God Himself. See thus the Apostle understands to paint here, that he represents God and Love as identical, in order that by such a noble, precious and lovely picture He may draw and attract us more to Himself and to make us strive to have love among ourselves and to beware of envy, hatred and discord. For as Love is a picture of God, neither a dead picture nor painted on paper, but a living Being of Divine Nature, burning and overflowing with whatever is good, so hatred and envy are a veritable picture of the devil, not human or devilish only, but the devil himself, who is nothing in his nature but an eternal burning of hatred and envy of God and all His works, both man and all creatures; so that that would be the best picture of the devil which would represent all hatred and envy.—As there are also among us still many who hear and teach the Gospel with us, use the same sacraments and affect the manners of genuine Christians; but they are among us like chaff among the wheat; if the battle approaches it becomes manifest whose they are and whither they belong. For there is nothing but pride, vanity, envy, contempt and the devil himself.—It is not a great art to begin a Christian life and love; but it is an art and a task to abide therein and perseveringly to continue therein especially in the presence of temptation and opposition. Although there still are many rough, coarse people that fall off spontaneously like rotten worm-eaten apples or pears, and proceed drowned in their avarice, pride, envy, etc., they are spoiled, useless fruit, wholly unprofitable, that shall and can not remain. But we refer to those who are blown off or struck down by wind and weather, that is, those who suffer themselves to be changed by temptations and thoughts like these: Why should I abide by the doctrine? I well perceive, that it yields no other returns than those of being burdened with the disfavour, contempt, enmity, rage and fury of all the world, that I must risk my body and life, and must ever take the lead against the devil, the world and the flesh, etc. Who can come up to this and persevere, if that is all he is to get?—But it is not to be so; the true course is rather to tear through all opposition, to proceed without heeding obstacles, whether we meet with the sour or the sweet, however it fare with us, be it friend or enemy, or the devil himself and ever to think: I have not entered upon this work in order that the people should give, love or reward me; and therefore no desisting from it though I receive the reward of ingratitude, envy and hatred. It (the world) shall not be so ill to me, as to overcome me with its ill: I will the rather, in opposition to it, continue to do good, regardless of thee or any one else, but for the sake of my Lord Christ, even as He did and still doeth.

STARKE:—Have we become partakers of the Divine Nature, if we are heavenly-minded and lead a heavenly life? It is infallible. As much true love, so much resemblance to God. He is a wise teacher who grounds his exhortations more on the Gospel than on the Law. The power and efficacy of encouragements are in proportion to their friendliness and lovingness.—You say much concerning God, but lack the best thing. You know Him in words, but deny Him in works. You do not know Him at all and will not be known of Him.—In order that one, provoked to anger, may not be overcome by the temptation and succumb, he should forthwith remember that "God is Love." That will be a good medicine to him and preserve him.—None can attain the life of glory without having first experienced here on earth the life of grace in Christ.—Holy Scripture does not expatiate in multiplied phrases which mean the same thing; but what it does repeat, is peculiarly emphatic, and intended to be carefully remembered.—Nothing can be more sweet, agreeable and delightful to us poor men in the vale of misery of this world, than to hear and to receive the assurance that God loves us. The love of God is the cause and rule of our love.—Love is not the cause of our union with God, but it assures, cements, confirms, and preserves it.—Beloved, though sometimes you do not feel any thing of the grace of the union of God and your heart, if you love cordially and abide in love, you have sufficient evidence that you are nevertheless united with God.—None is able to commend love to others with a good conscience, joyfulness and success, who does not himself walk in love. Preachers, more especially, ought to remember that when they exhort others to love, they themselves should copy the example of Christ and practise love.—God is willing, if we do not hinder Him, to make His love more full and to increase its efficacy; and then all the powers of the inner man do also grow in us, and among their number, the love of our neighbour.—Of what avail are the best testimonials if conscience contradicts them? A heart, full of love, is the best witness of friendship with God that endures also in the fire of temptation.—Thou art pleased when a loved friend comes to see thee, and is thy guest for a few days. Rejoice! God, thy best friend, dwells in thee, abides with thee, and possesses thee altogether, but thou art His property and possession. With God thou hast all things.—The love of God manifested in Jesus Christ, is the most excellent object of our faith and knowledge. The more we study it, the greater is our taste of its sweetness.—A glorious mark of the Christian religion as the only Divine religion, viz.: it effects so great a union between man and God, that God is in man and man in God.—O, wicked man, how canst thou be joyful in anticipation of the judgment-day? Beware that thou do deceive thyself with a false security instead of joyfulness!—Good Christian, whenever thou art about to do or to omit a thing, ask thyself: did my Saviour also do or omit this? It will be of great benefit to thee and happily further thee in thy Christian course.—Be not afraid if thou art summoned before an earthly court of justice; if thou lookest joyfully forward to the great judgment of the world, why shouldst thou not be equally joyful in respect of a little human judgment day? Wherever a Christian may be, he should always suffer himself to be seen without fear or dismay. [Verse of old German hymn.—M.].

A. H. FRANKKE:—One droplet of faith is more glorious than a whole ocean of science, even though it be the historical science of the Divine word.

HEUBNER:—Love has illuminating power, while hatred darkens the soul. The more you love, the greater the brightness of your knowledge; the more you love, the less it is possible for you to be deceived.—Want of love is a token of want of real knowledge of God. All knowledge, all theology must be rooted in love. Theology without the love of God is deception and show. What dry metaphysics have often been called religion and philosophy of religion, without containing a breath of love!—God who is Love can only be known e praxi, ex usu; as long as I have not made personal experience of the infinite Love of God, I can at the most only repeat what others say of God. Lauding the love of God from what is seen of Him in nature, is not the shadow of the love of God in Christ.—Proud philosophy could assert virtue and morality without the love of God and even go as far as to maintain that virtue without religion is even stronger and purer [than virtue with religion.—M.].—Want of love to God is the most telling proof of the fall. For in the statu integro our first sign of life ought to be love to God, even as a babe is naturally drawn to its mother's breast. It is true that our love to God proceeds from a sense of shame, from conviction [of sin and ingratitude.—M.]; but that cannot now be altered: and he that would deny it ought first to turn the whole world round. And who will most readily own it? They who have begun to love God: they are painfully aware how little they love God!—If there had been no apostasy, no breach, what necessity would there be for reconciliation? If reconciliation could have been effected without the Son, by our own efforts, by our own improvement and amending, what purpose would have been served by the sending of the Son?—This is the miracle of love in God, that He kept immovable in His Love and continued to love His creature now as ever, sought the creature although the creature had rebelled in enmity against Him. The love of God, therefore is eternal, unchangeable and having its cause in Himself, without having ever been greater or less than it is. This miracle of love no man can know before he has become aware of his misery, has had his eyes opened and seen with tearful eyes how loving the Lord is.—God has loved us; He has also deemed my neighbour worthy of His love: if God loves him, am I to refuse loving him? A knowledge of the love of God that has remained unfruitful, is not yet perfected.—There is sympathy or antipathy between the plants of God's planting and of those of his enemy's planting. The children of God are sensible of the spirit of affinity or antipathy in others. So it is said of Coccejus, who beyond all other things strove after a pure heart, that he frequently knew men at the first encounter.—He that underestimates historical evidence, overthrows the whole foundation of Christianity and opens the gate and the door to all deception and delusion. Historical knowledge and personal spiritual life-experience together constitute true Christianity. God is through and through Love, His whole Essence, His real Nature is Love, i. e. is essentially His property to communicate Himself, to impart Himself, to cause His glory and felicity to stream forth on others [i. e. His creatures.—M.], as it is the essential property of the sun to shine. It is true that the love of God, like the heat of the sun, manifests itself to men only by way of gradation. God is Love to all who stand in love and turn to His Love, but He is a consuming fire to those who stand outside of love. Love spurned brings torment: evil men, because of their own guilt, experience a sense of wrath. Every thing depends upon the attitude of men towards God.—The Bible is, as it were, the trumpet of the love of God, not nature, by a long way; it is only to believing Christians that nature becomes the trumpet of the love of God. The first tones of the love of God may be heard in Gen. i. and iii.; but they sound loudest in the New Testament.—Man is not lost as long as he believes in love; but he is lost, when he loses that belief. Chrysostom says that the devil would be saved if he could believe in the love of God.—Love changes God the Judge into God the Father.—He that cannot confide in love, is unable to endure the look of the Most Loving. Who but those who have pure and indefatigable love are in this world like God and representatives of God?—Where we experience fear, a secret dread, aversion to and distrust of God, love is not yet perfected; fear is the first discipline of boys.—v. 19. The whole wonderful structure of the Christian system; the one half is morality: to love God with every thing implied therein; the other half the doctrine of faith, the conditioning ground: the love of God to us sinners in Christ. The ground must be before the superstructure.—Love is most touching where it prevents the unworthy.—We can only exhibit our love to God the Unseen in His children that are seen.—Christianity indissolubly unites the love of God and the love of the brethren; its characteristic is that in it religion and virtue commingle in the Spirit of love.

GEROK (1 Jno. iv. 7-12): Love the fundamental law of the world: 1. As written in heaven: for God is Love. 2. As written on the cross: for Christ is Love. 3. As written in our hearts: for Christianity is Love.

LEONHARDI (1 Jno. iv. 9): The manifestation of the love of God to us in holy Christmas. It shines forth: 1. from the Divine Christmas-gift, and 2. from its blessed destination for us. It was manifested 1. in God sending His only-begotten Son into the world, 2. in that we should live through Him.

CLAUSS:—The sending of Christ is the greatest proof of Divine Love. 1. Christ is the Only Begotten. 2. He brings life to the world.

The same (on 1 Jno. iv. 12-16):—The mystery of the Divine Essence. 1. In which sense does It always remain concealed? 2. In what form has It been revealed? 3. With what eye only are we able to recognize It?

WILHELM:—The Church of the Lord. 1. The good it has; 2. The confession it makes: the signs whereby it is known.

LEONHARDI:—Whereon is based our Trinity-rejoicing? 1. We know that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world (vv. 14, 15); we have learned in the Son the love which the Father has in regard to us (vv. 15, 16); we know from our love to one another, that He has given us of His Spirit.

LUTHARDT (1 Jno. iv. 9, Advent-Sermon):—The love of God in Christ is our life. 1. The love of God; 2. The sending of his Son; 3. Our life.

SPURGEON (1 Jno. iv. 19):—Real love viewed 1. as to its origin, 2. as to its maintenance, 3. as to its progress.

AHLFELD (Marriage address on 1 Jno. iv. 19, and Sermon on 1 Jno. iv. 9-16):—With threefold bonds are we tied to the Triune God. 1. In the love among one another God abides in us; 2. In the Holy Ghost we abide in God and God in us; 3. In the confession of the Son of God, God abides in us and we in God.

On the Epistle for the first Sunday after Trinity, 1 Jno. iv. 16-21.

HEUBNER:—The belief, that God is Love, our only consolation in evil times. 1. Why is it thus? 2. How do we become capable of this consolation? The Divine nature of love. 1. Proof (vv. 16-18); 2. Inferences (vv. 19-21).—God is Love.—1. Explanation. 2. Proof (also Defence); 3. Duties, arising therefrom, incumbent upon us.—Belief in the love of God. 1. Description of what it is, and whereon it is founded; 2. The power of this belief; 3. Inferences (resistance to attacks on that belief; its animation by the imitation of Christ).

C. J. NITZSCH (1813 during the siege of Wittenberg, inaugural Sermon on the Epistle for 1st Sunday after Trinity, 1 Jno. iv. 16-21):—The value of true love under the fear of exciting prospects of the future. Love exalts us above the whole of our earthly future. Her pains are deep, her complainings sincere; yes, she looks so much the more sadly out into the future, because she can never suffer for herself alone, but true love can nevermore cease to confide or despair of deliverance. To all true love is accorded the privilege of overcoming the world and to soar beyond time in the strength of true faith. She casts the brightest looks into the shadow of the future. She is not blind through fear, and knows that every time will have its own salvation, its own footprints of Divine Love, from the ruins of the old there will spring up the new and the better, in the school of distress there will mature and prosper a nobler liberty and wisdom of the nations, our children and the grandchildren of our race in a rejuvenated world will think with emotion and edification of their fathers, and we ourselves shall never fall short of the assistance and comfort which we need in our weakness. And bright-eyed love has also an indefatigable arm; it makes the best provision for whatever may be in store.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—Perfection of love. 1. The token, indicated by the Apostle, of the perfection of love. 2. That that, whereof he treats, can only be achieved by the perfection of love.

KAPFF:—God is Love, and love only makes us one with God.

GEROK:—Another love sermon. 1. The eternal fountain of love. 2. The holy duty of love. 3. The true test of love. 4. The blissful happiness of love.

RANKE:—Life in love is the noblest life! let that be our conviction; we will abide in this love! let that be our resolve; then God will abide with us, let that be our blessing.

J. MÜLLER:—Love, the Essence of the Christian life. 1. The Christian life begins with love to God through Christ; 2. it develops into love to our neighbour; 3. it perfects itself in the perfection of this twofold love.

HARLESS:—Who knows and loves the living God who is Love? 1. He who instead of deifying his own love, knows and loves God in His love-manifestation in Christ; 2. he who, instead of loving God without fear, in his love fears God without torment; 3. he who, instead of calling in such love all the world his brethren, loves every one, but after the manner of God in Christ.

SPITTA:—The word of the Holy Apostle John concerning love. 1. A word of doctrine, wherein he teaches us love; 2. A word of exhortation, wherein he exhorts us to practice love.

CLAUS HARMS:—Let us love God! Consider 1. The ground of the love of God, 2. its power and manifestation inwardly, 3. its power and manifestation outwardly.

BOBE:—God is love! 1. A confession of gratitude (v. 8); 2. a voice of comfort (vv. 17, 18); 3. a rule of life (vv. 19, 20).

FLOREY:—The hallowing power of love on the heart of man. 1. It unites the heart of man separated from God (v. 16); 2. it calms—the anxious heart (vv. 17, 18); 3. it warms—the cold heart (v. 19); 4. it purifies—the impure and sinful heart (v. 20); it animates and fructifies—the dead heart (v. 21).

GENZKEN (Confession-address):—What do I yet lack of true Christianity? 1. Its beginning is that we know the love which God has to us. 2. Its progress, that we abide in this love; 3. Its full measure, that the experience of its hallowing power expels the fear of death and the judgment; 4. The test of all this is brotherly love.

[PEARSON:—v. 9. Our belief in Christ, as the eternal Son of God, is necessary to raise us unto a thankful acknowledgment of the infinite love of God, appearing in the sending of His only-begotten Son into the world to die for sinners. This love of God is frequently extolled and admired by the Apostles. See Jno. iii. 16; Rom. viii. 5; viii. 32. If we look upon all this as nothing else but that God should cause a man to be born after another manner than other men, and when he was so born after a peculiar manner, yet a mortal man, should deliver him to die for the sins of the world; I see no such great expression of His love in this way of redemption more than would have appeared, if He had redeemed us in any other way. It is true indeed, that the reparation of lapsed man is no act of absolute necessity in respect of God, but that he hath as freely designed our redemption as our creation: considering the misery from which we are redeemed, and the happiness to which we are invited, we cannot but acknowledge the singular love of God, even in the act of redemption itself; but yet the Apostles have raised that consideration higher, and placed the choicest mark of the love of God in choosing such means, and performing in that manner our reparation, by sending His Only-begotten into the world; by not sparing His own Son, by giving and delivering Him up to be scourged and crucified for us, and the estimation of this act of God's love must necessarily increase proportionably to the dignity of the Son thus sent into the world; because the more worthy the Person of Christ before He suffered, the greater His condescension unto such a suffering condition; and the nearer His relation to the Father, the greater His love to us, for whose sakes He sent Him to suffer. Wherefore to derogate any way from the Person and Nature of our Saviour before He suffered, is so far to undervalue the love of God, and consequently to come short of that acknowledgment and thanksgiving which is due unto Him for it. If then the sending of Christ into the world were the highest act of the love of God which could be expressed; if we be obliged to a return of thankfulness some way correspondent to such infinite love; if such a return can never be made without a true sense of that infinity, and a sense of that infinity of love cannot consist without an apprehension of an infinite dignity of nature in the Person sent; then it is absolutely necessary to believe, that Christ is so the Only-begotten Son of the Father, as to be of the same substance with Him, of glory equal, of majesty coeternal.—M.]

[BARROW: (on v. 9).—How indeed possibly could God have demonstrated a greater excess of kindness to us, than by thus, for our sake and good, sending His dearest Son out of His bosom into this sordid and servile state, subjecting Him to all the infirmities of our frail nature, exposing Him to the worst inconveniences of our low condition? What expressions can signify, what comparisons can set out, the stupendous vastness of this kindness? If we should imagine that a great prince should put his only son (a son most lovely, and worthily most beloved) into rags, should dismiss him from his court, should yield him up to the hardest slavery, merely to the intent that he hereby might redeem from captivity the meanest and basest of his subjects, how faint a resemblance would this be of that immense goodness, of that incomparable mercy, which in this instance the King of all the world hath declared toward us His poor vassals, His indeed unworthy rebels?—And what greater reason of joy can there be, than such an assurance of His love, on whose love all our good dependeth, in whose love all our felicity consisteth? What can be more delightful than to view the face of our Almighty Lord so graciously smiling upon us?—M.]

P. LEO M., de Nativ. Serm. 1. Semper quidem diversis modis, multisque mensuris humano generi bonitas divina consuluit, et plurima providentia sua munera omnibus retro seculis clementer impertit; sed in novissimis temporibus omnem abundantiam solite benignitatis excessit; quando in Christo ipsa ad peccatores misericordia, ipsa ad errantes veritas, ipsa ad mortuos vita descendit, etc.—M.]

[SECKER: (on v. 18).—For want of cultivating the love of God, the thoughts of Him are dreadful to the generality of men. Too many are tempted to wish in their hearts, if they durst, that He were not, or had no regard to human conduct; and if any of them can but persuade themselves for a while on the strength of some poor caviel, to hope what they wish, they triumph in the imagined discovery, that sets them so much at ease. From the same default, humbler and righter minds consider Him very often in no better light, than as a rigid lawgiver arbitrarily exacting a number of almost impracticable duties, and enforcing them with the dread of insupportable punishments: whence they are ready to sink under the terrors of religion, even while they are conscientiously fulfilling its precepts. Looking on God as the object of love would rectify these mistaken conceptions entirely. We should all see and feel, that a Being of infinite goodness, directed by infinite wisdom, is the highest blessing: and the want of such an one would be the greatest calamity that is possible: we should be satisfied that the strictest of His laws, and the severest of their sanctions, are means which He knows to be needful for our good; that His mercy will forgive on repentance our past transgressions of them; that His grace will strengthen us to keep them better; and that He will never reject a soul affectionately devoted to Him. In proportion then as we are so, all terrifying apprehensions will vanish from us. "There is no fear in love" saith the Apostle; "but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment."—M.]

[JORTIN:—The love of God differs so much from the love of sensible objects, and from our other passions, that it can hardly be called a passion in the same sense in which they are so called. It differs in this, that it is at first raised, and afterwards kept up, by reason. It is therefore a religious habit and virtue, which no other passion is, unless it hath God and morality and religion for its objects. In this also it differs from them, that being both produced and preserved by reason, it is a sober and moderate affection, accompanied with no blind impetuosity, no restless uneasiness, no violent commotion of mind, like other passions; and as it riseth not to the same height with them, so neither does it sink as low at other times, but shews itself in an uniform and sedate love of righteousness, of every thing that God approves. Some persons, not duly considering this, sincerely desire to please God, and carefully endeavour to lead a good life; and yet sometimes are afraid that they have no love for God, because they experience not in themselves that warmth of affection, to which others pretend, and which is expressed and required in some books of devotion. They may learn from the Scriptures, that where there is obedience there is always love; and that whoever delights in holiness, and justice, and goodness, and mercy, and truth, may reasonably conclude that his heart is right towards God. Others looking upon the love of God as upon a mere passion, a disposition of mind producing devotion and ending there, have excited in themselves a high zeal and affection for God, and a firm persuasion, that they were His favourites: and, having done this, have thought themselves arrived at Christian-perfection; whilst at the same time they have perhaps been under the dominion of evil habits, and addicted to wrath, malice, covetousness, censoriousness, injustice, pride, ambition, sensuality. This strange mixture of hypocrisy, vice and enthusiasm, hath been common in all ages, and ever will be so. There are always those, whose religion and devotion is, to use the words of St. Paul, "sounding brass," or clamour and confidence; whilst true goodness is modest and unaffected, and teaches men to make less noise, to live more honestly. To preserve us from such delusions, Christ hath told us, that we should either keep His commandments, or not pretend to love Him; and that it signifies nothing to say to Him, "Lord, Lord," and not to do what He requires.—Other love towards God than this the Scriptures know not: they never recommend that spiritual fever, those warm transports, and that bold familiarity, which some zealots affect; nor that cold, refined, mysterious, and disinterested devotion, which another sort of fanatics require: for, first, the love of God is sober reason, and not blind passion; reverence, and not presumption: secondly, it is gratitude; and we "love Him, because He first loved us."—M.]

[HORN: (on v. 21).—Observe the firm basis on which is forever fixed the morality of the Gospel. How clear in its principles! how powerful in its motives! "We love God, because He first loved us;" "and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins. If God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." For "he who loveth Him that begat, loveth Him also that is begotten of Him." The head of the most unlearned cannot but comprehend the meaning of these few words: and the heart of the most learned must feel the force of them. Such is the ground of that charity, which performeth every duty of social life, and fulfilleth the law. To inculcate and produce in us this heavenly disposition, is the end of the Gospel and all its doctrines. It is deduced in Scripture even from those that may seem to be of the most mysterious and speculative nature: the unity of the Divine Persons; the Divinity and the satisfaction of Christ; doctrines, which cannot therefore be denied or degraded, without removing or proportionably lessening the most endearing and affecting incitements to the Christian life. Indeed the happy temper of a Christian is the natural and kindly effect of the great evangelical truths, when treasured up in the mind, and made the subjects of frequent meditation. The ideas of a reconciled God; a Saviour and Intercessor on high; a gracious Spirit, informing our ignorance, purifying our hearts, relieving our necessities, alleviating our cares, and comforting our sorrows: such ideas as these enable us to bridle the appetites of the body, and to calm the emotions of the mind; to bear with patience and cheerfulness the calamities of life: they sweeten the tempers, and harmonize the affections, resolving them all into one, diversified according to the different situation of its proper object; of which grief laments the absence, and fear apprehends the loss; desire pursues it; hope has it in view; anger rises against obstruction, and joy triumphs in possession. Thus religion fixes the heart on its treasure, in faith without wavering, and resignation without reserve: it draws the affections upwards towards heaven, as the sun does the exhalations of the earth, to return in fruitful showers, and bless the world. M.]

CHAPTER V. 1-12.

Whosoever<sup>1</sup> believeth that Jesus is the Christ<sup>2</sup> is born of God: and every one that loveth him that begat loveth him also<sup>3</sup> that is begotten of him. By this<sup>4</sup> we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments.<sup>5</sup> For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous. For<sup>6</sup> whatsoever<sup>7</sup> is born of God overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh<sup>8</sup> the world, even our<sup>9</sup> faith. Who is he<sup>10</sup> that overcometh the world, but<sup>11</sup> he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? This is he that came by water and blood,<sup>12</sup> even Jesus Christ<sup>13</sup>; not by water only, but<sup>14</sup> by water and blood.<sup>15</sup> And it is the Spirit<sup>16</sup> that beareth witness, because the Spirit<sup>17</sup> is truth. For there are three that bear record<sup>18</sup> in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth, the spirit, and the water, and the blood: and these three agree in one.<sup>19</sup> If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for<sup>20</sup> this is the witness of God which<sup>21</sup> he hath testified of his Son. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness<sup>22</sup> in himself: he that believeth not God<sup>23</sup> hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son.<sup>24</sup> And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this<sup>25</sup> life is in his Son.<sup>26</sup> He that hath the Son<sup>27</sup> hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life.<sup>28</sup>

Verse 1. [German: "Every one that believeth," and so E. V. in second clause.—M.]

[German: "That Jesus is Christ."—M.]

<sup>3</sup> Καὶ before γεγεννημένον is the reading of A. Sin. (which has τὸ instead of τὸν) and several minusc.

[German: "loveth also Him that is begotten of Him."—M.]

Verse 2. [<sup>4</sup> Ἐν τούτῳ, in this, hereby.—M.]

<sup>5</sup> τηρῶμεν, cannot be considered to be supported by A. which omits the following words αὐτὴ γὰρ ἐστὶν ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ, ἵνα τὰς ἐντολάς αὐτοῦ, so that τηρῶμεν there might come from v. 3, although the omission of said words is more easily accounted for, even if we read τηρῶμεν and not ποιοῦμεν (B. and al.) v. 2; but Sin. G. K. al. abundantly sustain the reading in question.

Verse 4. [<sup>6</sup> German: "because" so Alford.—M.]

<sup>9</sup> ἡμῶν; so A. B. G. K. Sin.; ὁμῶν, only in unimportant Codd.

Verse 5. [<sup>10</sup> Sin. reads δὲ after τὸς, B. K. have δὲ after τὸς ἐστὶν; others read γὰρ; e.g. Syriac; others prefix καὶ, while A. and al. [G. Vulg., Lachm., Tischend., Alf.—M.] have no conjunction at all. [German: "But who is it, that etc."—M.]

Verse 6. [<sup>12</sup> καὶ πνεύματος after αἱμάτων, though found in A. Sin., several minuscules and versions, is evidently an interpretation, like the still less authentic καὶ ἐν τῷ πνεύματι after ἐν τῷ αἵματι.

<sup>17</sup> The reading χριστός, instead of τὸ πνεῦμα before ἡ ἀλήθεια is only very feebly supported. Equally devoid of all firm foundation are several readings in this verse which do not even touch the sense, e.g. μόνος, ἀλλὰ καὶ, ἀλήθεια without the Article.

Verse 7. [<sup>18</sup> German: "For they are three that bear witness;" Alford "For those who bear witness are three." German: "And the three are one." Alford: "And the three concur in one."—M.]

Verse 9. [<sup>19</sup> German: "because."—M.]

<sup>20</sup> ὅτι is the reading of A. B. Sin. al. instead of ὅτι, Rec. [K. L. al. German: "because that is the testimony of God, that He hath testified of His Son." Alford: "The testimony of God is this, that He hath borne testimony concerning His Son."—M.]

Verse 10. [<sup>21</sup> The addition of τοῦ θεοῦ after μαρτυρίαν in A., is wanting in B. Sin. al.

<sup>22</sup> ὁ θεὸς in B. G. Sin. is more authentic than τὸ πνεῦμα of A. and in better agreement with the context.

[<sup>23</sup> German: "He that believeth in the Son of God, hath the testimony in himself; he that believeth not God, hath made Him a liar, because He hath not believed in the testimony, which God hath given concerning His Son." The last clause is more correctly rendered thus: "which God hath testified concerning His Son." The variation "record" in this verse in E. V. should by all means be avoided.—M.]

Verse 11. [<sup>24</sup> ἐστὶν, generally at the end of the verse; in A. between αὐτὴ and ἡ ζῶν.

Verse 12. [<sup>26</sup> τοῦ θεοῦ after the first τὸν υἱόν, as Luther reads, is too feebly supported; it is wanting in the best Codd., also in Sin.

CRITICAL NOTE ON VERSES 7 AND 8.

After ὅτι τρεῖς εἰσὶν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες in v. 7, follows: ἐν τῷ ὄψανθ, ὁ πατὴρ, ὁ λόγος καὶ τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα, καὶ οὗτοι οἱ τρεῖς ἐν εἰσὶν v. 8, καὶ τρεῖς εἰσὶν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἐν τῇ γῇ.—Thus Cod. 173, not however in the original Cod. of the 11th century, but only in a copy of it made in the 16th century; Codd. 84 and 162, belonging to the same period, viz. the 15th and 16th centuries, omit the words καὶ οἱ τρεῖς ἐν εἰσὶν, and the Articles before πατὴρ, λόγος and ἅγιον πνεῦμα, which shows the mechanical translation from the Vulgate. Said words are wanting in ALL THE GREEK CODICES, also in the CODEX SINAITICUS, in ALMOST ALL THE ANCIENT VERSIONS, INCLUDING THE LATIN, as late as the 8th century, and since that time they are found in three variations. Notwithstanding the trinitarian controversies, they are not referred to by a SINGLE GREEK FATHER, OR BY ANY OF THE OLDER LATIN CHURCH FATHERS. For the allusions of Tertullian (adv. Prax. 25. connexus Patris in filio et filii in Patre, tres efficit coherentes alterum ex altero; qui tres unum sunt), and of Cyprian (ep. ad Jubal-anum: cum tres unum sunt) are to Jno. x. 30; xvi. 5; and if the latter says in De Unitate Ecclesiae p. 79. "Dicit Dominus: ego et Pater unum sumus; ET ITERUM de Patre et Filio et Spiritu Sancto Scriptum est: ET HI TRES UNUM SUNT, the reference in iterum is clearly to this place, but to v. 8, to wit, according to the symbolical interpretation [of the words τὸ πνεῦμα, τὸ ὄψαν and τὸ αἶμα of the Trinity, as given in the Schol. by Matthæi: οἱ τρεῖς δὲ εἰπεν ἀπορνικῶς, ὅτι συμβόλα ταῦτα τῆς τριάδος, and in the Schol.: τοῦτέστι τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον καὶ ὁ πατὴρ καὶ αὐτὸς ἐάνθρωπος, and on ἐν εἰσὶν: τοῦτέστι μία θεότης, εἰς θεός], as Facundus of Hermiane in the 6th century understood Cyprian, in Pro defensione trium capitulum 1, 3 [tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra?]. Spiritus, aqua et sanguis, hi tres unum sunt . . . quod Joannis apostoli testimonium Cyprianus . . . de Patre, Filio et Spiritu Sancto intelligit.—M.], who was not unacquainted with and free from mystical interpretations (the seamless coat, a type of Church unity, etc.). The aforementioned Greek scholia contain unmistakable traces of the allegorical interpretation. The reading may gradually have originated in them and the passages from Cyprian, whose interpretation of the Persons of the Trinity was placed in juxtaposition with the text on which it was based. These words were mentioned first in a work which is to be ascribed to Vigilius of Thapsus, at the close of the 5th century; they occur more frequently afterwards and are found in most Latin translations [also in several German translations made from the Vulgate—M.]. After a Greek translation of the transactions of the Lateran Council of 1215 they were first inserted in Greek in the Complutensian edition (of 1502 to 1514). Erasmus, who did not insert them in his editions of the Greek New Testament of 1516 and 1518, received them in the version of 1521, and the third edition of 1522, yielding to the pressure of the Church (pium est, nostrum sensum semper ecclesie iudicio submittere), and with reference to the Codex Britannicus (=codex 84), in order to justify himself before the learned. [Erasmus had committed himself to their insertion if they were found in any Greek Manuscript. Learning that they were found in said Codex Britannicus, he inserted them in the 3rd edition of 1522 and added the note: "Ex hoc igitur Codice Britannico reposuimus, quod in nostris dicebatur deesse: ne cui sit ansa calumniandi. Tametsi suspicor codicem illum ad nostros esse correctum."—M.]. Then Robert Stephanus received them 1546–1569, Bess 1565–1576 and the Text. Recept. sanctioned the citizenship of this reading. Luther never translated these words, but commented upon them in his second commentary on this Epistle, although he had pronounced them spurious in his first commentary. They are omitted in all German Wittenberg Bibles from 1522–1545; they are first inserted in Lehmann's Quarto Wittenberg edition of 1596, although they are still wanting in later editions and in the Quarto edition of 1620. They appear first in the Zürich edition of 1529; the next edition of 1531 has this passage in smaller type, the later editions insert it in brackets, which were not abandoned until 1597. The Basle edition of 1552 gives it already without brackets. Of the Frankfort editions, the Quarto of 1582 was the first in which this passage is inserted, although it is omitted in the Octavo edition of the same year. It was of no avail that Luther considered these words as a clumsy addition directed against the Arians which was wanting in the Greek Bibles, and that Bugenhagen, on the appearance in 1549, of a lectionary, containing these words, at Wittenberg, gave this warning: "Obeoero chalcographos et eruditores viros, ut illam additionem omittant et restituant græca suæ priori integritati et puritati propter veritatem."—The genuineness of this passage was still attempted to be defended in the 17th century. Lastly Bengel still upheld it [but with the arbitrary assumption that the text read originally thus: "ὅτι τρεῖς εἰσὶν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἐν τῇ γῇ. Τὸ πνεῦμα κ. τ. λ. εἰς τὸ ἐν εἰσὶν. v. 8. Καὶ τρεῖς εἰσὶν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἐν τῷ ὄψανθ, ὁ πατὴρ, ὁ λόγος καὶ τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα: καὶ οὗτοι οἱ τρεῖς ἐν εἰσὶν." Apparat. Crit.—M.], who was followed by v. Meyer, Sander, Besser and Mayer.—Compare Griesbach's diatribe ad h. l. in ed. a. 1806; Rieckli on this passage; Tischendorf editio major 1859, tom. 2. p. 225–228.—This critical, external evidence is fully sustained by internal evidence, viz. the exegetical reasons against these words. The idea of a witness ἐν τῷ ὄψανθ cannot be carried out. Hence certain commentators, e. g. a Lapidé, change the testari in celo into a testari de celo, or find in it a description of the nature of the testimony (S. Schmidt, Spener), or of the witnesses (Bengel). Moreover the collocation of the words ὁ πατὴρ and ὁ λόγος is altogether contrary to John's diction, which gives only ὁ θεός and ὁ λόγος or ὁ πατὴρ and ὁ υἱός in juxtaposition (Jno. i. 1 sqq.; v. 21 sqq.; xiv. 9 sqq.). Agia τὸ ἐν can only be interpreted of unity of essence and the context affords no ground for such an interpretation. The advocates of the passage have also recourse to arbitrary expedients, e. g. Bengel who places v. 8 before v. 7 [see above—M.]. Lastly we cannot consider them to have been inserted by orthodox Christians against the Arians (as Luther thinks), the reference being to a testimony on earth. The fact is that they cannot be used without arbitrariness grammatically, dialectically or logically. Cf. Huther 2d edition, p. 228 sq.—[Huther: Luther remarks on this passage: "It seems that this verse was inserted by the orthodox with reference to the Arians, which insertion however was not congruous, because he does not discourse of the witnesses in heaven, but of the witnesses on earth, here and there." This is the opinion of most modern expositors, excepting Besser and Sander. If we look at the contents of the whole Epistle, it is indeed not difficult to harmonize the thought of the three witnesses in heaven with scattered sayings in this Epistle; but it does not follow from this that it is appropriate or even necessary at the place where it occurs. On the contrary this is manifestly not the case, since neither the verses immediately following or preceding, with which v. 7 is intimately connected by ὅτι, contain any reference whatsoever to such a trinitarian testimony in heaven. The specification of the three witnesses: πνεῦμα, ὕδωρ, αἷμα, is clearly and plainly substantiated by what precedes, but this is not the case with respect to that of the three witnesses: ὁ πατήρ, ὁ λόγος, τὸ πνεῦμα ἅγιον; this trinity is introduced abruptly, without any preparation; but the sequel also militates against it, especially since it is altogether uncertain which testimony is meant by the μαρτυρία τοῦ θεοῦ, v. 9, that of the three in heaven, or that of the three on earth.—To this must be added that these two different testimonies are placed in juxtaposition without being connected together; it is said, indeed, that the two three witnesses agree together, but nothing is said of the relation of the two threes to one another.—The thought per se, moreover, lacks clearness; for what are we to understand by a testimony in heaven? Bengel (with whom Sander agrees) says indeed: "Non fertur testimonium in cælo, sed in terra: qui autem testantur, sunt in terra, sunt in cælo; i. e. illi sunt nature terrestres et humane, hi autem nature divine et gloriose." But the untenableness of this proposition is evident, on the one hand, from the circumstance that ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ does not belong to εἶναι, but to μαρτυροῦντες, that consequently the text absolutely says nothing of a being in heaven, but asserts a testifying in heaven, and on the other, from the consideration that the πνεῦμα which is afterwards connected with ὕδωρ and αἷμα is to be conceived as something earthly and human.—Add to this the non-johannean character of the diction, for though in John we meet the collocations ὁ θεός and ὁ λόγος, and ὁ πατήρ and ὁ υἱός, we never encounter that of ὁ πατήρ and ὁ λόγος; Sander, to be sure, has recourse to the rather easy expedient of assuming here an ἀπαξ λεγόμενον, but that assumption cannot be admitted here, because those words are of constant occurrence in John—and the collocation is not accidental, but founded on the nature of the case. The interpolator evidently wrote λόγος because he thought that term to be purely Johannean, not reflecting however that its connection with πατήρ was un-johannean. Lastly, καὶ οὗτοι ὁμοῦς ἐν εἰς, is also surprising. Bengel explains: Unum sunt essentia, notitia, voluntate, atque adeo consensu testimonii; and properly begins with the unity of essence, for that is indicated by said words—but this unity of essence is irrelevant here, where the reference is rather to the unity of the testimony.—I subjoin here also Sir Isaac Newton's PARAPHRASTIC EXPOSITION: "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God, that Son spoken of in the Psalms, where He saith, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.' This is He that, after the Jews had long expected Him, came, first in a mortal body, by baptism of water, and then in an immortal one by shedding His blood upon the cross, and rising again from the dead; not by water only, but by water and blood, being the Son of God, as well as by His supernatural birth of the Virgin (Luke i. 35). And it is the Spirit also, that together with the water and the blood, beareth witness of the truth of His coming; because the Spirit is truth, and so a fit and unexceptionable witness. For there are three that bear record of His coming; the Spirit, which He promised to send, and which was since sent forth upon us in the form of cloven tongues, and of various gifts; the baptism of water, wherein God testified, 'this is my beloved Son;' and the shedding of His blood, accompanied with the resurrection, whereby He became the most faithful martyr or witness of the truth. And these three, the Spirit, the baptism, and passion of Christ, agree in witnessing one and the same thing (namely, that the Son of God is come); and therefore their evidence is strong: for the Law requires but two consenting witnesses, and here we have three, and if we receive the witness of men, the threefold witness of God, which He bare of His Son, by declaring at His baptism 'This is my beloved Son,' by raising Him from the dead, and by pouring out His Spirit upon us, is greater; and therefore ought to be more readily received."—"This," Sir Isaac Newton observes, "is the sense plain and natural, and the argument full and strong; but if you insert the testimony of the three in heaven, you interrupt and spoil it; for the whole design of the Apostle being here to prove to men by witness the truth of Christ's coming, I would ask how the testimony of the 'three in heaven' makes to this purpose? If their testimony be not given to men, how does it prove to them the truth of Christ's coming? If it be (given), how is the testimony in heaven distinguished from that on earth? It is the same Spirit which witnesses in heaven and in earth. If in both cases it witnesses to us men, wherein lies the difference between its witnessing in heaven and its witnessing in earth? If in the first case it does not witness to them to whom does it witness? And to what purpose? And how does its witnessing make to the design of St. John's discourse? Let them make good sense of it who are able. For my part, I can make none. If it be said, that we are not to determine what is Scripture, and what not, by our private judgments, I confess it in places not controverted, but in disputable places, I love to take what I can best understand."—M.J.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Connection. That which in the preceding verses had been repeatedly noticed as a proof of the love of God, the appearing of Jesus Christ (vv. 9, 10, 14, 19), and as the immediate consequence of it, had been indicated as the exhibition of our life-fellowship with God,—faith, knowledge and confession—(vv. 15, 16), the Apostle places with emphatic prominence at the end of this section with a primary reference to brotherly love (v. 1), then with respect to the love of God and obedience to His commandment (vv. 2, 3), with reference to the victory over the world (v. 4), viz. faith in Jesus the Christ (v. 1a), the Son of God (v. 5), who is confirmed as such by God Himself (vv. 6-9), and in His work or gift, eternal life (vv. 10-12). Bengel: "Concinne Apostolus in hac tractationis parte mentionem amoris ita collocat ut fides tanquam prora et puppis totius tractationis, in extremo spectetur."

Efficacy of faith in Christ. vv. 1-5.

VER. 1. Every one that believeth that Jesus is Christ, is born of God.—The only limitation of the universality (πάς) is believing (πιστεύων) and the object of faith (ὅτι Ἰησοῦς ἐστὶν ὁ χριστός); the faith may be weak and imperfect, provided that it be sincere (subjective) and right (objective), and consequently true. This believing involves knowledge, inclination, yielding and trust and genders susceptibility for receiving. It is clear from v. 5 that ὁ χριστός refers to the inward nature of Him that has been manifested,=ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, although these ideas are not identical and may occur in juxtaposition (iii. 23): the Divine Sonship makes the Man Jesus the Christ=Saviour. Cf. ch. iv. 15 and ii. 22. The tenses, the Present πιστεύων and the Perfect γεγέννηται denote the regeneration, the birth out of God as the ground, and faith, which is a Divine work (Eph. ii. 8), as the consequence; only a child of God believes in Jesus the Son of God.

And every one that loveth Him that begot him, loveth also him that is begotten of Him.—Πᾶς ὁ ἀγαπῶν is a parallel of πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων, and gives prominence to what was given along with and received in faith. Hence there is no need of an ellipsis to be filled up, like that specified by Huther: "he that is born of God loveth God." The object (γεννησάντα) is evidently God, and hence ἐξ αὐτοῦ=θεοῦ, and τὸν γεγεννημένον ἐξ αὐτοῦ denotes the believer (v. 2: τὰ τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ). Argumentum ex communi naturæ ordine sumunt (Calvin), or a propensione naturalis, quæ cernitur in hominibus (Estius). Cf. Eph. v. 28-30. The reference therefore is not to Christ as maintained by Augustine, Hilary and others. The Present ἀγαπᾷ by the side of ὁ ἀγαπῶν denotes the interconnection of brotherly love and the love of God [i. e. our love of our brother and of God—M.], the simultaneousness and duration of the relation of both. The Apostle lays it down as a fact, not as something which he requires; he shall love.

VER. 2. In this we know, that we love the children of God, when we love God and keep His commandments.—It is clear that the reference here is to something which every one may and must know from his own experience and not from that of others. Again it is clear that this something is brotherly love, even the love to our brethren, who are τέκνα θεοῦ. Lastly it is clear that the token and sign of it is our love to God and our keeping His commandments. For ὅταν followed by the Indicative ἀγαπῶμεν (Winer, p. 325), is a conditional particle, although it is qualified by the idea of time, =whenever; there may be fluctuations, disturbances, pauses, or ebbs in our love to God; but when it is in us, brotherly love surely is also in us. Hence John annexes to ἀγαπῶμεν τὸν θεόν, τὰς ἐντολάς αὐτοῦ τηρῶμεν in order to designate the living love to God by an obedience rooted in the love of God, so that brotherly love should be considered as one of the commandments of God, and, at the same time, as the necessary consequence of our love to God, as of the necessary ground. [Huther: He that loves God, has in this his love a testimony that he also loves his brethren, even as τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ—because brotherly love is the necessary consequence of the love of God; but the converse is also true, that he who loves the brethren, has in this his love a testimony that he also loves God, because his love to God is the necessary ground of his love to the brethren. Alford: And indeed so inseparable are the two, that as before iv. 20, our love to our brethren was made a sign and necessary condition of our love to God, so conversely, our love to God, ascertained by our keeping His commandments, is itself the measure of our love to the children of God. Either of the two being found to be present, the presence of the other follows.—M.]. While John elsewhere (ch. ii. 3; iv. 20, 21) makes the knowledge of God and love to God to be ascertained from our keeping His commandments and loving our brethren, i. e. the ground from the consequence, so he conversely makes us ascertain the consequence from the ground, which, considering the unity of the Divine life, is the less surprising, since the former references point to the truth and purity of our disposition, while here the concluding reference is to the consolation which we need in the discharge of an important and difficult duty. Hence it is wrong and unnecessary, to assume here, with Grotius following Oecumenius, a trajection, or to construe, with de Wette, the sentence τὸν θεόν ἀγαπῶμεν as simply accompanying the sentence immediately following, so that obedience is to be considered only as emanating from the love to God, or still worse, to alter the text, as some of the ancient versions (the Ethiopic and Arabic), and several unimportant expositors, have dared to do. [Calvin also gives a wrong turn to the thought in the remark: "Nunc docet, recte et ordine amari homines, quum Deus priores obtinet; vult sic mutuam colli inter nos caritatem, ut Deus, praeferatur."—M.].

VER. 3. For this is the love of God, that we keep His commandments.—The connection of our love to God with our keeping His commandments doubtless occasioned this saying, in order to take in its unity that which had been treated as simply coördinate [viz. the ideas expressed in the two preceding clauses.—M.]. Huther.—Αὐτῇ—iva, as in ch. i. 9; iv. 17, denotes the requirement and tendency of love; ἐστὶν describes its nature, not—it implies, it includes the effort (de Wette). The context (v. 2) shows that the love of God here is our love to God.

And His commandments are not grievous; this clause is added by John "encouragingly in the full and joyous consciousness of his Divine sonship," (Düsterdieck). Cf. Matth. xi. 30: φορτὴν λαβόν; Luke xi. 46; φορτία δυσβά-

τακτα. The connection requires us to apply this only to regenerate Christians, to whom is given the ability to keep the commandments of God. So most Commentators. Cf. Doctrinal and Ethical on this section below. [Oxford Catena: ἐν τῇ προσελθόντων αὐταῖς μὴ ὅν δεῖ τρέπον λέγει αὐτὰς βαρβαρίας, τὴν αὐτοῦ δοθέντων ἡντιάσατο. Φίλον γὰρ τοῖς ἀγὰν ἀποβάλλοντον ἰσχύον βαρεὰ νομίζεσθαι καὶ τὰ πανὶ ἐλαφρὰ καὶ κοῦφα.—Spener: "The reference is to the difficulty of a burden so oppressive as to be insupportable and painful."—Calov: "Dicit ea non esse gravia, quia non aggravant, aut instar molis onerosae premunt renatum."—Huther: "The commandments of God as the requirements of man created after His Image, cannot be difficult to man; but if they are, the reason is, that man has left his original relation to God; they are not difficult to the believer, because, as the child of God, he has returned to the original relation of love to God."—Alford: "This declaration, that His commandments are not grievous, has, as did ch. iii. 9, furnished some of the Roman Catholic Commentators with an opportunity of characterizing very severely the Protestant position that none can keep God's commandments. But here as there the reply is obvious and easy. The course of the Apostle's argument here, as introduced in the next verse by ὅτι, substantiates this βαρεῖαι οὐκ εἰσὶν by showing that all who are born of God are standing in and upon the victory which their faith has obtained over the world. In this victorious state, and in as far as they have advanced into it, in other words in proportion as the Divine life is developed and dominant in them, do they find those commandments not grievous. If this state, in its ideality, were realized in them, there would be no difficulty for them in God's commandments; it is because, and in so far as sin is still reigning in their mortal bodies and their wills are unsubdued to God's will, that any βάρος remains in keeping those commandments." The reader is also reminded of Augustine's saying, "Da quod jubes et jube quod vis" (Confess. 10, 29), and referred to Augustinus (ad. Theodos. 13), "Juvat qui Jubet," and Bp. Sanderson, Sermon 3. p. 316.—M.]

VER. 4. Because all that is born of God overcometh the world.—Now follows (ὅτι) the reason why the commandments of God are not grievous. Hence πάν τὸ γεγεννημένον as in Jno. iii. 6, 37, 39; xvii. 2 (πάν—αὐτοῖς, like here πάν—ἡμῶν), denotes universality. See notes on ch. i. 1, Winer, p. 191, ὅ—πάντες οἱ γεγεννημένοι. The reference is to persons, not to disposition, virtutes and charismata (Oecumenius, Paulus), or to the dignity of the Divine sonship (Baumgarten-Crusius).—Κόσμος is here taken collectively, as the opposite of the kingdom of God, as whatever opposes its progress, estranged from and hostile to God and the Divine, within and without men (Calvin [quicquid adversum est Dei spiritui. Ita naturæ nostræ pravitas pars mundi est, omnes concupiscentiæ, omnes Satanæ actus, quicquid denique nos a Deo abstrahit.—M.], Beza, Spener, Lücke, Düsterdieck, Huther, and al.); hence not merely inwardly the love of the world and of self (de Wette), or outwardly homines virtute et pietate adversantes, their machinations, even to the persecutions (Grotius), nor merely ecclesia judaica et judaismus (Schöttgen). [Alford: "The argument then is this: The commandments of God are not grievous: for, although in keeping them there is ever a conflict, yet that conflict issues in universal victory: the whole mass of the born of God conquer the world: therefore none of us need contemplate failure, or faint under his struggle as a hard one."—M.]—The Present νικᾷ denotes the constant victory in the conflict to be endured; "the children of God fight with the world only as conquerors" (Düsterdieck), cf. ch. ii. 13, 14; iv. 4. But νικᾷν must not be diluted into "keeping oneself, unseduced" (Baumgarten-Crusius).

And this is the victory which hath overcome the world: our faith.—Αἴτιν νίκην refers to πίστις, ἡμῶν is not explained here but in the next verse. Νίκην, being further qualified by νικήσασα, does not denote the action which conquers the world (Ebrard), but victoria parsa, the fact of the victory, the faith, not the cause of, but the participation in the victory and the reception of the power of continuing, maintaining and consummating the victory. Lorinus: "Victoria proprie non vincit, sed comparatur vincendo, sed energiam continet ea formula, denotans in quo sita sit vincendi ratio, unde victoria parsa." Huther: "Faith is here intended to be extolled not as the result of a conflict, but as the combatant who has gained the victory." Hence faith itself is not yet the victory (Baumgarten-Crusius, Neander), nor must the Aorist be explained to former, departed Christians (Socinus). Cf. ch. ii. 13, 14, 23; iv. 4; v. 12.

VER. 5. But who is it that overcometh the world, if not he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God.—While v. 4 brought in ἡμῶν πίστις, this verse gives emphatic prominence to the contents of the faith qualified by ἡμῶν in a triumphant question well suited to this section of the victory over the world. Bengel: "Credens omnis et solus vincit. Episcopus: Lustrate universum mundum et ostendite mihi vel unum, de quo vere affirmari possit, quod mundum vincat, qui christianus et fide hac præditus non sit. The Apostle, in this question, appeals to the experience of his Church. The Present ὁ νικῶν, which, with respect to the fact: ἡ νίκη νικήσασα (v. 4), denotes the person conquering in the conflict, indicates the existing and present attitude and relation of the believer. But by the variation: ὅτι—ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ instead of ὁ χριστός v. 1, the Apostle refers to the essential glory of Jesus, and also to the fact that believers, as partakers of His glory and as the children of God, of course conquer with Him and participate in His victory. The believer, who is Christ's and whose is Christ the Son of God, is a conqueror in his character of being a child of God. If only faith is true, and the believer born again, born of God, which may be ascertained from love to the brethren and love to God and a hearty obedience to the commandments of God,—the victory over the world also is indubitable. And with this the Apostle is here particularly concerned.

Jesus is really confirmed as the Son of God. vv. 6-9.

VER. 6. This is He that came by water and blood, Jesus Christ.—Οὗτος refers to the Person Jesus, whose dignity is proved and confirmed. Ὁ ἐλθὼν must be taken substantively as at ch. i.

5; Jno. i. 15, 33; iii. 18, 31; the Article requires this and forbids the connection of the Participle with the preceding ἔστιν, as if it were—this one came; for we read not ἔστιν ἐλθὼν, but ἔστιν ὁ ἐλθὼν. But we must here hold fast the usual form of the Partic. Aoristi, which simply narrates that which has happened, and does not denote present events or past events continuing in the present; this would require ἐρχόμενος or ἐλθῶν (ch. iv. 2). How He came is stated in the words ὁ ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος, viz. by means of, by water and blood; διὰ denotes the medium; immediately afterwards we have ἐν ὕδατι, which indicates surrounding or accompaniment. There must therefore be facts, and facts at once historical and external, by which He came, and which are important and efficacious to demonstrate Him, who He is. Moreover the connection of the two requires us to understand acts equal in kind and relation. Hence we must explain ὁ ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος of the baptism, which He received of John in Jordan and which by its immersion pointed to death, while the voice of the Father uttered over Him pointed out His filial dignity, and of His death upon the cross with its atoning sacrificial virtue; in both facts He proved His obedience to the will of the Father, while His obedience proved Him to be the Son of God, the Holy and Innocent One.—Now the apposition Ἰησοῦς—οὗτος, χριστός—ὁ ἐλθὼν ὁ ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος, comprises what is here said into one whole as the result. A similar turn may be seen in Rom. i. 3, 4. Consequently we must not, contrary to the grammar and the dialectics of the text, refer οὗτος to the Predicate ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ v. 5 (with Knapp, Luther 1st ed.), but to the Subject (Lücke), or to the Subject qualified by the Predicate (Luther 2d ed.); we must and cannot explain contrary to grammatical usage (Matth. xi. 3; Luke vii. 19 sq.; Jno. xi. 27), ὁ ἐλθὼν of the Messiah, like ὁ ἐρχόμενος, and connect ἔστιν with ὁ ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis ii. 1, p. 469), or take ἔστιν ἐλθὼν as a circumlocution of the verbum finitum the Article notwithstanding, and thus overlooking the force of the Aorist, explain it as a Present: He comes (Luther and al.), or as a Perfect: He has come and comes (de Wette, Sander and al.). There is no reference here to the water and blood which flowed from His side pierced on the cross (Jno. xix. 34, Augustine and al.), because the passage in John has αἶμα before ὕδατος, and because that does not constitute a phase of His life, but is something which, after death had set in, took place in His body, so that concerning it we cannot predicate ὁ ἐλθὼν διὰ. The symbolical reference of this passage to the two Sacraments, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, is inadmissible (Luther I, S. Schmid, Bengel, Sander, Besser and al.), since the term ἐλθῶν is not used here, and αἶμα is not used to describe the Lord's Supper; but since the two ideas are parallel, ὕδατος cannot be referred to the Sacrament of Baptism (ὕδατος moreover cannot be made to designate Baptism Jno. i. 26, 33), as instituted by Christ, nor αἶμα to the death He suffered (de Wette, Rickli, Düsterdieck, Ebrard and al.), nor both together to Baptism only (Luther I), since Baptism was administered into the death of Christ; the double reference is, by all means, to be held fast. It is either historically or grammatically unwarranted to explain ὕδατος of οὗτος purissima (Grotius), doctrina pura (Socinus), regeneratio et fides (Clemens Alex.), of tears, and αἶμα of the blood shed at the circumcision, expiatio (Cameron), redemptio (Bullinger), cognitio (Clemens Alex.). Compare particularly Luther on this passage. [Luther, who has changed his view expressed in the first ed. of his commentary, says in the 2d ed. p. 221. "There are two points in the life of Jesus which answer to the terms ὕδατος and αἶμα, to wit, His Baptism at the beginning of His Messianic career, and His bloody death at the end of the same; by Baptism Jesus entered upon His office, which is the office of reconciliation; it constitutes the initiatio (Erdmann, Myrberg) of it; this initiation, however, did not take place only by that which occurred during His Baptism, but by the act of the Baptism itself, since thereby Christ consecrated Himself to death, which was symbolized by the act of immersion; by His death He effected reconciliation in cancelling with His Blood the debt of the world of sinners, for χωρὶς αἱμάτων ἁγίων οὐ γίνεται ἀφεσις (Heb. ix. 22). The Apostle therefore rightly designates Christ as the Reconciler, as Him that came ὁ ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος. The view that ὕδατος and αἶμα are to be explained of the Sacraments instituted by Christ is confuted not only by the circumstance that they are only the means of appropriating the reconciliation effected by Him, whereas we are here concerned with the accomplishment of the reconciliation itself, but also by the use of the Aorist ἐλθὼν, instead of which in the former case we ought to have the Present, and by the fact that the term αἶμα, used alone, is in the New Testament not once applied to the Lord's Supper; in 1 Cor. xii. 13 also ἐκτορισθῆναι does not allude to the Lord's Supper, but to the communication of the Spirit in Baptism.—The opinion that though αἶμα denotes the death which Christ suffered, ὕδατος does not signify the Baptism He received is opposed by the following considerations: 1. The close connection of the two words (διὰ not being repeated before αἵματος) is only fitting if the ideas correspond the one to the other, which they do not if ὁ ὕδατος is referred to an institution of Christ, and αἵματος to the blood shed by Christ. 2. The simple term ὕδατος is ill-suited to designate Christian baptism (for Christian Baptism is distinguished from John's Baptism in that the former is essentially not ὕδατος like the latter; even as John the Baptist distinguishing himself from Christ said: ἐγὼ βαπτίζω ἐν ὕδατι Jno. i. 26, while Jesus had been indicated to him as ὁ βαπτίζων ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ, Jno. i. 33. 3. Since the institution of Baptism took place after the death of Christ and necessarily presupposed that death, John, had he understood by ὕδατος Christian Baptism, would surely have put ὕδατος not before but after αἵματος. Hilgenfeld and Neander have justly maintained that if ἐρχομαι ὁ ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος denotes something relating to the Messiah personally, ἐρχομαι ὁ ὕδατος must do so likewise. The relation must be the same in both terms. If αἶμα signifies the death to which Christ submitted, ὕδατος also can only signify the Baptism to which He in like manner submitted."—Passing to that class of commentators who substantially admit the views expressed by Luther, but superadd a secondary or implied sacramental reference, we give the language of Alford who says that "ὕδωρ represents the Baptism of water which the Lord Himself underwent and instituted for His followers, αἷμα, the Baptism of blood which He Himself underwent and instituted for His followers. It is equally impossible to sever . . . from these words the historical accompaniments and associations which arise on their mention. The Lord's Baptism, of itself, was indeed rather a result than a proof of His Messiahship: but in it, taking St. John's account only, a testimony to His Divine Sonship is given, by which the Baptist knew Him to be the Son of God: ἐγὼ ἑώρακα κ. μεμπτρίσκηκα ὅτι οὗτος ἐστὶν ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, are his words, Jno. i. 34; and when that blood was poured from His "riven side," he that saw it again uses the same formula ὁ ἑώρακός μεμπτρίσκηκε. It cannot be that the word μπτρία being thus referred to two definite points of our Lord's life, should not apply to these two, connected as they are with ὕδωρ and αἷμα here mentioned, and associated by St. John Himself with the remarkable preterite μεμπτρίσκηκεν, of an abiding μπτρία in both cases. But these past facts in the Lord's life are this abiding testimony to us, by virtue of the permanent application to us of their cleansing and atoning power."—Wordsworth, as usual, adopts the Patristic and symbolical interpretation, and as the views of other classes of commentators have been given at considerable length, we add as a curiosum his exposition of this passage in a condensed form. "Jesus Christ came, as the Messiah and Son of God, in various ways.

1. 'He came in all the purifications that were made by water and blood under the Old Law, which was dedicated with blood and water. Heb. ix. 22; because all those purifications were typical of, and preparatory to, His sacrifice on the Cross, and derived all their efficacy from it. . . . .

2. 'He came by water in His Baptism; and by blood in His circumcision, and especially in His agony and bloody sweat in Gethsemane, and by the blood shed in His scourging before His passion, and in the crown of thorns, and the piercing of His hands at the crucifixion. . . . .

3. 'He came both by water and blood at once, in a special manner, on Calvary after His death. . . .

Thus St. John in his Gospel prepares us to understand the words of this Epistle; and in his Epistle also he elucidates what had been recorded in his Gospel. His words therefore may be thus paraphrased: 'This is He who came—that is, proved Himself to be what He was pre-announced to be by the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, and what He proclaimed Himself to be in the New—the "Coming One," "The Comer" (ὁ ἐρχόμενος), the Messiah, the true Paschal Lamb, and Very Man, a true Sacrifice for Sin; and yet Very God, the Everlasting Jehovah, of whom the prophet Zechariah spoke (Zech. xii. 10), when he prophesied of His being pierced at His death.

'He came by blood and water. He proved thereby the reality of His humanity and of His death; and thus He has given a practical refutation—which St. John saw with his own eyes—to the heretical notions of those in the Apostolical age, such as Simon Magnus and the Docetae, who alleged that Christ had not a real human body, but was merely a spectral phantasm, crucified in show; and therefore Irenæus in the next age after St. John, infers this fact of the piercing of the side and the flowing out of the blood and water, recorded by St. John, as conclusive against their heresy. . . .

'In the words, "not by water only," there seems also to be a reference to another heresy of the Apostolic age, that of Cerinthus, who said that Christ came in the water of baptism, and descended into the Man Jesus; and afterwards departed from Him, when He shed His blood on the cross. In opposition to this notion St. John says, "This is He who came by water and blood; not by water only, but by water and blood."

4. 'Further it is to be observed that in this passage of his Epistle St. John is speaking of Christ's generation, and of our regeneration.—Every one who believeth that Jesus is the Christ, hath been born, and is born, of God; i. e., is regenerate; and every one who loveth Him that begat, loveth Him also that is begotten of Him; i. e., who-soever loveth God the Father, loveth Him who by generation is the only-begotten Son of God; and every thing that is born of God (i. e., is regenerate) overcometh the world; and who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus—the Very Man Jesus—is also the Son of God?

'St. John then proceeds to describe the means by which our regeneration, or New Birth, is communicated to us from God, through His Son Christ Jesus, Very Man and Very God, and how the new life, so communicated, is sustained in us. He does this by saying, This is He who came—came to us—by water and blood, Jesus Christ; not by water only, but by water and blood.

'The natural life which was imparted to Eve—the Mother of all living, the type of the Church, the Spouse of the Second Adam, Jesus Christ—was derived from the first Adam's side, opened when he was asleep in Paradise. In like manner, the spiritual life is given to the spiritual Eve, the Church, and to all her faithful members, from the side of the second Adam, Jesus Christ, sleeping in death on the cross; and it is communicated through His death by means of the water and blood of the two sacraments, which derive their quickening, cleansing and invigorating virtue from the Divinity, Incarnation and Death of our crucified Lord and Saviour, and by which the benefit of that death is applied to our regeneration and revivification; and which were visibly exhibited in the water and blood flowing from His precious side, pierced on the cross. . . . [See Augustine, Sermon. V.—M.]

'He came by water, which is our λουτρὸν, and by blood, which is our αἷμα. His Baptism of blood is our λουτρὸν, or ransom from death; and His Baptism by water is our λουτρὸν, or laver of birth. And the water of the λουτρὸν derives its efficacy from the blood of the λουτρὸν, shed on the cross, which works in and by the water of baptism. He has washed us from our sins in His own blood (Rev. i. 15). His blood cleanseth us from all sin (1 Jno. i. 7). In baptism we pass through the Red Sea of His blood, and are delivered from our enemies thereby."—For further particulars connected with the symbolical interpretation, the reader is referred to Wordsworth himself, and for a good account of all the interpretations, to Luther's Commentary, 2d edition, pp. 217-219.—M.]

Not in the water only, but in the water and in the blood.—The preposition ἐν should be connected with ἐν ὕδατι, and, as compared with διὰ, signifying the medium through which, introduces a new shade of thought, viz., the surrounding, accompaniment and sphere [or "element in which"—M.]; a similar change occurs at Heb. ix. 12, 25 (Delitzsch, pp. 390, 431). Articulus habet vim relativam (Bengel) to what has just been specified, which must be taken in the same sense as before. Μόνον after ὕδατι renders the latter very emphatic, and is not followed by ἀλλὰ καὶ because it is not connected with οὐ. Consequently not only in the Baptism received at the hands of John the Baptist has Jesus been proved to be the Christ, the Son of God, but in both. This refutes the opinion of those heretics who alleged that the Son of God was with Jesus at His Baptism, but not at His death upon the cross, that He left Him before His death (Luther [i. e., the heresy of Cerinthus.—M.]). The distinction of Jesus from the Baptist, who baptized with water only, is out of the question, the reference being not to Jesus' baptizing, but to His being baptized (against Lücke, Düsterdieck, Ebrard and others).

And it is the Spirit that testifieth.—Kαὶ superadds a further and third particular, an additional witness (ἐστὶν τὸ μαρτυροῦν ὁ ὁ ἐν ἡμῶν). The Article before the Participle compels us to understand τὸ πνεῦμα as the absolute, objective Spirit, as the Holy Spirit, and the Present denotes the continuance of the office of witnessing (Jno. xv. 26) wherein He leads into all truth, mediates fellowship with Christ, and secures eternal life. Τὸ πνεῦμα must not be explained of the spirit of believers, of the spiritual life wrought in believers by the Holy Spirit (Episcopus, Sander and others); this is forbidden by the context, and the grammatical usage of the New Testament disallows such a construction without any further qualification. Nor is it ὁ πνευματικός, i. e., the Apostle John himself (Ziegler, Stroth), nor a third sacrament of absolution (Augustine), nor the word, the ministry of the word (Luther, Piscator, al.). [In order to complete the catalogue of curious and fantastic views begun in the text, we mention those of Oecumenius and Knapp, who regard τὸ πνεῦμα—ὁ θεός—διὰ δὲ τοῦ πνεύματος, ὃς ὡς θεός ἀνέστη ἐκ νεκρῶν· θεοῦ γὰρ τοῦτο μόνον λοιπόν, τὸ ἀνιστῆν ἐαυτὸν. τῇ δὲ τοῦ πνεύματος φωνῇ σημαινεται ὁ θεός: thus making the threefold witness to the υποθεσία of Jesus, τὸ βάπτισμα, ὁ σταυρός, ἡ ἀνάστασις; of Socinus, Schlichting, Grotius, Whithy and al. who understand the Divine power by which Christ wrought His miracles: 'id est,' says Grotius, 'per miracula, admiranda ejus opera, a virtute divina manifeste procedentia,' of Bede, who understands the Spirit which descended on the Lord at His Baptism, and of Wetstein, who considers τὸ πνεῦμα to signify the psychical element which, along with ὕδαρ and αἷμα the physical elements, constituted the human nature of Christ.—The interpretation given by Braune is that of Scholiast I., Estius, Corn. a-Lapide, Tirinus, Calvin, Calov, Lücke, Rickli, de Wette, Huther, Neander, Düsterdieck, Alford and Wordsworth. It is the Holy Spirit, whom Christ in fulfilment of His promise, sent to His Church on the Day of Pentecost, and who is a permanent witness of the Divine Sonship of Jesus.—M.]

Because the Spirit is the truth.—This clause does not contain the substance of the testimony, which is determined by the context (viz., that Jesus, the Son of God, is the Christ), but the reason of the testimony, as being a reliable one; ὅτι is—because, not—that (Luther, Besser, al.). 'Ἡ ἀλήθεια designates the Truth revealed in the word of God, and received in faith, in its perfect fullness, which Truth is the nature of the Spirit who is the Spirit of the Truth into which He leadeth (Jno. xiv. 17; xv. 26; xvi. 13). Christ, who has the Spirit without measure (Jno. iii. 34 sq.), and who with the Father sends Him (Jno. xv. 26; xvi. 7), is of course in the same sense the Truth according to His nature (Jno. iv. 6). We must not construe ἡ ἀλήθεια—ἀληθής, as Grotius does. [Estius: "Testimonium ejus haudquaquam rejici potest, quoniam Spiritus est veritas, quam sit Deus, ideoque nec falli potest, nec fallere."—M.]

Vv. 7, 8. For three are the witnesses, Spirit, water and blood.—[Grotius: "Johannes hic causam reddit, cur locutus fuerit non de Spiritu tantum, cujus præcipua in hoc negotio est auctoritas, verum etiam de aqua et sanguine, quia in illis etiam non exigua est testimonii fides, et ternarius numerus in testibus est perfectissimus."—M.]. This formula is precisely like that of the preceding verse (v. 6). Οἱ μαρτυροῦντες of course must be construed substantively and in the same sense as v. 6, nor must be supplied another object of the testimony; in like manner τὸ πνεῦμα καὶ τὸ ὕδαρ καὶ τὸ αἷμα bear exactly the same meaning here as in v. 6. The historical facts, previously specified merely as evidencing the Divine Sonship of Jesus, are now introduced in the Masculine Gender, in order to designate them as concrete witnesses, like persons (Lücke and al.); but of course so, that they are subordinated to the Spirit, who is the principal, and alone absolute Witness, employing and making use of the facts in the life of Jesus. The verb denotes the activity of the testifying, with reference to the condition of being μάρτυρ, and the Present signifies the permanent character of that activity, wherefore it is not necessary to think here of objects at present existing, e. g., the sacraments, but we have only to hold fast that these facts in the history of the life of Jesus, like that history itself, are fixed in the Gospels, and that these facts, even without such written fixedness, continue to be permanently operative during the years of salvation [i. e., the dispensation of grace.—M.] with world-historical import [i. e., exerting a permanent influence on the world's history during the dispensation of grace.—M.].—Τεῖς, with reference to Deut. xvii. 6; xix. 15; Matth. xviii. 16; 2 Cor. xiii. 1; Heb. x. 28, 29, denotes the assurance of the perfectness of the testimony. This sentence is annexed with ὅτι—for, in order to represent now in a compressed form the testimony, particularized in v. 6, as a weighty confirmation and substantiation of the truth, that Jesus, the Son of God, is the Christ.

And the three are one.—The Article of τεῖς denotes here, as also previously, the witnesses already designated and well known, and likewise in εἰς τὸ θεῖον the one Truth in question, the object of the testimony (ch. v. 1, 5). Εἰς, like εἰς in Jno. xi. 52; xvii. 23, denotes in unum consentire.—Hence we need neither assume with de Wette, an ellipsis between vv. 6 and 7, 8, nor take ὅτι in the sense of jam vero (Grotius), consequently, therefore (Baumgarten-Crusius, Meyer), nor understand τρεῖς οἱ μαρτυροῦντες, with Bengel, of three different classes of men (prophetas, baptistas, apostolos), or of symbols of the Trinity. Lastly we must not interpret the being one, with Luther, as a being together, a being joined together. [Alford renders “and the three concur in one” and explains, that they contribute to one and the same result: viz., the truth that Jesus is the Christ, and that we have life in Him. Wordsworth explains the passage of the Trinity and the sacraments and paraphrases: these three (Persons) who are bearing witness are joined into one (ἐν one substance, neuter). He collects, as usual, many Patristic and Anglican notices and gives in his exegesis the following:—“The Spirit, who begins the work of regeneration by applying all quickening grace to man.—The Water: the symbol and instrument of the new birth derived from God the Father, who is the original Well-spring and Fountain of all life and grace to man. The natural heavens and the earth were formed out of the Water. There was their origin (2 Pet. iii. 5). So it is with the spiritual life; it is formed from out of water. Water therefore is a proper symbol of the Paternity of God.—The Blood, symbolizing the Incarnation and Passion of God, the Son through whom all grace descends from the Father, by the Holy Spirit. 2 Cor. xiii. 13.—These three Persons are joined consubstantially into one Godhead; and their Witness is the witness of God. (Andrews: “Water notes Creation; Blood notes Redemption by Christ; the Spirit notes Union, to complete all”).—There is an image of the Trinity in the Christian sacraments. There is baptismus FLUMINIS, the baptism of water, the work of Creation by the Father; there is baptismus SANGUINIS, the baptism of blood, the work of Redemption by the Son; but these are not enough, unless there be also the baptismus FLAMINIS, the Baptism of the Spirit. Thus the work of the Ever-Blessed Trinity is done in the soul.’ In addition to the notes on the spurious passage given above, the reader is referred to a sketch on this subject in Horne’s Introduction, vol. IV. pp. 355–388.—M.]

V. 9. If we receive the testimony of men.—Εἰ denotes an undoubted fact; hence the Indicative, but the fact is put down as the premise of a conclusion. [It is an argumentum a minori ad majus.—M.]. Winer p. 307 sq. [also ibid, p. 642.—M.]. In τὴν μαρτυρίαν τῶν ἀνθρώπων, the Article opposes the human testimony to the Divine, without in any way specifying one qualified by its substance (Brückner). The reference therefore is neither to the prophecy of Christ (Bede), nor to John the Baptist, to eye- and ear-witnesses (Wetstein, Stier), nor to prophets, baptists and Apostles (Bengel). Grotius takes λαμβάνειν=judicio approbare, and Düsterdieck understands any human testimony, provided that it possess the necessary requirements.

The testimony of God is greater.—Here ἡ μαρτυρία τοῦ θεοῦ is not particular, but quite general [The particular is specified in the sequel. Supply in the argument: much more must we receive the testimony of God (Winer).—M.]. As the testimony of God it is greater than that of men and requires so much the more its reception and validity.

Because this is the testimony of God. Now follows the definite testimony of God, which must be received as the testimony of God. Here is evidently an ellipsis, viz.: but a Divine testimony is really extant, namely this . . . (Düsterdieck).

That He hath testified of His Son.—The clause beginning with ὅτι depends on αὐτῇ, and notes the testimony as a historical fact, μαρτυρήσκει, which has been given, but must be understood to be continuous and permanent in its operation, namely the threefold testimony specified in vv. 7, 8. Hence ὅτι cannot be rendered “because,” which would especially designate the author of the testimony, in which case αὐτὸς could hardly be wanting before μαρτυρήσκει; nor is here any reference to internal testimony (Düsterdieck) introduced afterwards, and still less to the testimony vouchsafed to John the Baptist (Jno. i. 33), as maintained by Ebrard.

The possession of eternal life in the faith on Jesus the Son of God, is the inward confirmation of the Divine testimony vv. 10–12.

V. 10. He that believeth in the Son of God, hath the testimony in himself.—The result as well as the purport of the Divine testimony is faith in Jesus as the Son of God; hence we now have ὁ πιστεύων εἰς τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ. Such an one ἔχει τὴν μαρτυρίαν ἐν ἑαυτῷ. The addition τοῦ θεοῦ is unnecessary; the context precludes any other testimony than that of God; the Article designates that which has been specified and is known. “The outward has become to him something inward” (Huther). [“The object of the Divine testimony being, to produce faith in Christ, the Apostle takes him in whom it has wrought this its effect, one who habitually believes in the Son of God, and says of such an one, that he possesses the testimony in himself. What it is, he does not plainly say till below, v. 11. But easily enough here we can synthetically put together and conjecture of what testimony it is that he is speaking: the Spirit by whom we are born again to eternal Life, the water of baptism by which the new birth is brought to pass in us by the power of the Holy Ghost (Jno. iii. 5; Tit. iii. 5), the Blood of Jesus, by which we have reconciliation with God, and purification from our sins (ch. i. 7; ii. 2), and eternal life (Jno. vi. 53 sqq.),—these three all contribute to and make up our faith in Christ, and so compose that testimony, which the Apostle designates in v. 11 by the shorter term which comprehends them all.” Alford following Düsterdieck.—M.].—ἔχειν bears the same sense here as in v. 12; ch. iii. 8; ii. 28. “Ἐν ἑαυτῷ might be wanting, but John specifies besides the having, the possession of the sphere, the believer’s own inward testimony for it. It is wrong to render, to have with him (Luther), more wrong, recipit in se (Grotius), nor is it=τῇ (Baumgarten-Crusius), nor=he not only receives it, but is also firmly convinced of it (Lücke), nor=he has received it in and with himself (de Wette).—As usual, the Apostle continues in the negative.

He that believeth not God, hath made Him a liar.—The Dative refers not to the object of faith, but to the witness; hence the reading τῷ υἱῷ is not in agreement with the text, as is τῷ θεῷ τῷ μαρτυρηκότι (Huther); this is confirmed by αὐτὸν, which must be referred to God, but would have to be connected with υἱῷ, if that were the reading. The Perfect πεποιήκεν indicates the still continuing and operating animus of the disbeliever: he has told and ever tells God to the face: thou liest (Luther). The reason follows:

Because he hath not believed in the testimony, which God hath given concerning His Son.—Οὐ πεπίστευκεν and not μὴ, because John refers to him, whom he had supposed not to believe (ὁ μὴ πιστεύων), as a definite individual, who in point of fact, objectively, has not become believing. Jno. iii. 18: ὁ δὲ μὴ πιστεῦν ἡδὴ κέκριται, ὅτι μὴ πεπίστευκεν, because there the reference is to the judgement of the judge, and not simply to a fact per se. See Winer, p. 495 sq. The Perfects denote continuing and permanent facts.

VER. 11. And the testimony is this, that God hath given us [better gave us—M.] eternal life.—John now annexes by καὶ what follows, and this is the substance, the testimony consists in this (αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ μαρτυρία); the reference is not to intentio, finis of the same (Lyra), nor to its use, fruit and blessing (Calov, Spener), nor to its exhibition, test, experience (Lücke, Neander, Huther). The testimony of God is in himself eternal life, which at the Baptism of Jesus, at His death, in the Holy Spirit, makes itself felt and perceptible, and testifies for the Son of God. Hence δὲ—that, and ἔδωκεν, like μαρτυρήσκειν points to a giving, with a present continuing of that past giving; it cannot be dare decrevit, promissit (Socinus, Carpov), any more than ζωὴ αἰώνιος is vita eterna in spe (Bede), to be given only in heaven in re. Ἡμῖν designates the οἱ πεπιστευκότες. To the principal idea, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, placed first, the Apostle now adds

And that is the life in His Son, (or: and this life is in His Son).—This clause is co-ordinate with the one preceding and not dependent on δὲ. Αὐτὴ ἡ ζωὴ ἡ αἰώνιος, and this is in Jesus the Son of God; ἐν is not per (Grotius), or in communion with Him, nor ἐστιν—contingit. The eternal life is οὐσυνδώς (Jno. i. 4; xi. 25; xiv. 6), σωματικῶς (Col. ii. 9), ἐνεργητικῶς (2 Tim. i. 10) in Christ. It became manifest in Him, because it really was in Him, and the believer participates in the eternal life, because he has part in the Son of God. Hence the conclusion.

VER. 12. He that hath the Son hath the life; he that hath not the Son of God, hath not the life (or: the life he hath not).—Very fine and pointed is Bengel's note: "Habet versus duo cola; in priore non additur Dei, nam fideles norunt Filium; in altero additur, ut demum sciant infideles, quanti sit, non habere. Priore hemistichio cum emphasi pronunciandum est habet; in altero vitam." This is also indicated by the arrangement of the words (Düsterdieck). Ἐχει τὴν ζωὴν is not=habet vis certum ad vitam eternam (Grotius). Cf. i. 3: ii. 23; Jno. xvii. 3. [Alford: "The having the Son is the possession of Christ by faith testified by the Spirit, the water and the blood: and the having the life is the actually possessing it, not indeed in its most glorious development, but in all its reality and vitality."—M.]. Ὁ μὴ ἔχων points to a supposition: if one has not; which implies that he might have, but only through faith vv. 10, 11. [Düsterdieck has remarked that the use of ὁ μὴ ἔχων, not ὁ οὐκ ἔχων (cf. οἱ οὐκ ἠλπιμέντοι, 1 Pet. ii. 10) shows that the Apostle is contemplating, at all events primarily, rather a possible contingency than an actual fact: and thus is, primarily again, confirming his saying to those to whom the Divine testimony has come. To them, according as they receive or do not receive it, according as they are οἱ ἔχοντες or οἱ μὴ ἔχοντες τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ, it is a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death."—M.].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

I. CONCERNING THE PERSON OF CHRIST.

1. In Christ, as the Son of God is the life eternal, so that it is as well said: God has given us the eternal life (v. 11), as: He gave His only begotten Son (Jno. iii. 16); and he that hath the Son, hath the life, the eternal (v. 11). Beside Him there is no salvation (Acts iv. 12).

2. The essential nature of the Son was unmistakably exhibited in His obedience to the will of the Father, both at the commencement of His ministry by the baptism in Jordan, and at the close of it in His death upon the cross (v. 6).

3. The testimony of the Holy Spirit for the Divine Sonship of Christ must not be separated from the historical facts of His life, even as these cannot become witnesses without the Holy Spirit, who has the office of testifying (vv. 6-8); the history on earth must not be severed from the Spirit of God. One might almost find here the principle of the Lutheran Church that the finitum may become infinitum capax, in opposition to the [German] Reformed principle: finitum infiniti non capax.

4. The Father hath so definitely appointed all things, that He who does not believe in the Divine Sonship of Jesus, refuses to believe God (v. 10), as in Jno. xiv. 1.

II. CONCERNING THE ACQUISITION OF SALVATION.

1. The origin of faith: Regeneratio præcedit fidem (v. 1).

2. The nature of faith: it is essentially an ethical act laying hold of the merit of Christ, of the love of the Father in the Son, so that it has (ἔχει) that on which it believes (vv. 12, 10, 11): it includes therefore love, and is not to be joined only to it, as set forth in the Roman Catholic representation of the fides formata. Nor does John allow faith to be described as the second condition, nor even as the first condition by the side of love and morality (v. 1), as de Wette holds and expresses it.

3. The virtues of faith: a. with reference to men—it makes all believers brethren, because it makes them the children of God (v. 2); b. with reference to the commandments of God—it makes us strong and cheerful in obedience (v. 3), so that Bengel rightly observes: in se sunt suavia; sed id non gravia contradicit et occurrit iis, qui gravia esse putant; c. with reference to the world—it imparts courage for the conflict and power for the victory (vv. 4, 5). This it works with reference to men, at the same time changing them, transforming children of men into children of God, and causing such change to be perceived and received; with reference to the law of God and the world, it only changes believers by first giving to them the powers of the eternal life, and afterwards clear perception and a deeper understanding of the justice and blessing of the law and the transitoriness of the world.

4. The necessity of faith: without it one has neither Christ, nor God the Father, nor the Holy Spirit, nor the eternal life; consequently, without it and beside it there is no justification, no forgiveness of sins, no sanctification, no salvation (v. 12).

5. The liberty of faith: all men are to believe according to the will of God, but coercion of faith is not ordained; every man has the power of resistance (ὁ μὴ ἔχων τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ—ὁ μὴ πιστεύων, vv. 10, 12).

6. The immorality of unbelief follows from v. 1, and especially v. 10: not to believe God, to consider Him a liar, is like misbelief and despair, a shameful thing, and, as Luther says in the Catechism, a vice.

III. CONCERNING THE LAW.

1. It should be considered as a fact of the revelation of love, of paternal discipline.

2. It answers to the originally God-ordained human nature, which sin has corrupted and grace has healed; the burden and grievousness of it to men proves their state of sin, joy in it and obedience to it, their state of grace.

3. Of his own strength man cannot fulfil a single commandment; in this the Evangelical Church is right.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Do not separate faith and love! This is forbidden, 1. by the origin of faith in the regeneration from God who is Love, and 2. by its object, Jesus the Christ, in whom the love of God was manifested, and 3. by its task, to conquer the world through love.—Do not fail to distinguish between faith and love in the work of regeneration which is secured by the former, not by the latter, but do not sever them in the sphere of sanctification, where faith is the root of love, and love the many-branched crown of faith.—You may ascertain whether you have faith and are born again from 1. your love to God the Father, 2. from your love of the brethren, 3. from your obedience to the Divine commandments, 4. from your fight with the world in and around you.—Dr. Christian Friedrich Richter, physician at the Orphan House of Halle, in Franke's time, was the author of the Christian song: Es kostet viel ein Christ zu sein, etc. 'It costeth much to be a Christian and to live conformably to the mind of the pure Spirit, for nature finds it very hard, ever to be reconciled to the death of Christ,' and the companion verse: 'It is not difficult to be a Christian and to live conformably to the mind of the pure Spirit, for though nature finds it very hard, etc.' Both are true and good. For the law is only a burden to man enfeebled by sin, but not to the Christian strengthened by grace, the one, indeed, is only enjoined to be good, but the other is enabled to be good.—Obedience to the Divine commandments notes the recovery of the Spirit, disobedience notes its decay. Nothing is more natural, nothing more adapted to human nature created by God after His own Image, than the Will of God, consistent with His Nature and expressed in the lovingly ordained Law for the benefit of His Kingdom, which was given, not against man, but for man, not against man, but against sin.—Learn from John how to contend with error! With all his resoluteness and decision, he is so objective and calm, and reasons so joyfully on the foundation of truth, that we are not even induced to make a personal application of his reasoning to others, but rather influenced to make it the test of our own standing.

AUGUSTINE:—Qui habet in memoria et servat in vita, qui habet in sermonibus et servat in moribus, qui habet audiendo et servat faciendo, aut qui habet faciendo, et servat perseverando, ipse est, qui diligit Deum. Opere est demonstranda dilectio ne sit infructuosa nominis appellatio.—You adore the Head, and offend the members. He loves His Body. Just as if somebody would desire to kiss your head, and at the same time trample with nailed shoes on your feet. Would you not decline the proffered demonstration of honour and exclaim: What are you about? You tread on my feet? The head would cry more for the trodden members than make account of being honoured.

SPENCER:—The meaning is not, that the keeping of the Divine commandments does not require considerable pains, labour and diligence, for that would contradict Luke xiii. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 7.—The difficulty applies to a burden so oppressive and painful as to be unbearable.—Spiritual life is, as to its nature, an eternal life, and consists as well in the grace of God which forgives sin and imparts new Divine strength, as also in the enjoyment of eternal felicity and glory.

STARKE:—Christianity is not a sham, but a true and honest thing which has its foundation, its coat of arms and tokens, its works and fruits, its profit and happiness.—If thou hast a sense of shame and honour, thou wilt surely not hurt the saintly children of a saintly father; look, believers are the children of thy heavenly Father; if instead of loving, thou hate them, thou art truly an enemy of God, their Father, and He, in His turn, thy enemy.—If thoughtful preachers stop long at one matter, and perhaps repeat it several times, and with changed phraseology make it more clear, be not impatient of it, but take note of their zeal and of the importance and necessity of the matter treated of.—O, how much pain, burden, difficulty and anxiety attend the children of the world in their sins and iniquities, of which the children of God are free and delivered! Thus many a child of Satan has more trouble to find hell, than a child of God to find heaven.—O man, do not persuade thyself and do not suffer thyself to be persuaded, that the world cannot be overcome. This is the infallible sign of true and false faith: viz., whether thou conquerest the world, or sufferest the world to conquer thee.—The children of God are soldiers and knights. The crown must be fought for; faith is victorious. Wretched man, if conquest and the crowning do not attend thy course! World, begone beneath my feet. We will trample under foot lions and vipers. Come hither, sword of the Lord! The blessed state of a righteous man in Christ, his Head! He does not fortify the walls of houses and cities, but the empire of Satan and the walls of Jericho in his heart.—The stronger thy faith, the greater thy victory over sin, the world, death, the devil and hell.—The Bible surpasses, and should be preferred to, all books; all other good books are conducted like rivulets from this river.—Christ is not only the foundation, but also the true centre and chief work of our faith, at which alone the believer under the practice of self-denial, is ever aiming, and into which he dees, as it were, ground himself.—As there is nothing more excellent than faith, so is nothing more dishonourable than unbelief. Faith honours God, and is the mother of all virtues; unbelief dishonours God, and is the mother of all vices.—Man must not seek the true life any where except in Christ; nor cherish any hope of life beside Him. As long as he is without Christ, he has no life; whereas the degree to which he is in Christ and partaker of His Being, is also the measure of his life.—A true Christian is a veritable Christophorus, who carries Christ in his heart, and leads his life in Him.—

BESSER:—If thou art a conqueror, thou must have thy spoils to show.—The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life are the chief trophies, of which the soldiers of Christ divest the conquered world, and which they suspend from the victorious banner of the cross.—

HEUBNER:—Without prejudice to the general love of man, a Christian must be especially attracted to those who are of one mind with him; he must value the true children of God infinitely more than the unconverted.—The genuineness and holiness of human love betokened by its religious character.—All love is worthless without religion, a mere natural impulse, or masked selfishness.—True love is allied to strict conscientiousness; love must not render us languid or indulgent in respect of duty.—If the love to God requires obedience, the true love of man also must consist in obedience, fidelity and conscientiousness.—Struggle for this strength (v. 8); to be ever complaining is a bad sign.—1. The light of faith conquers the errors, illusions and delusions of false wisdom, it sees through them, perceives their nothingness and masters them; the word of Christ is the eternal, unchangeable truth; faith the pole-star, that we do not swerve from the truth. 2. Faith conquers the allurings and fascinations of the world which we encounter in its lusts, its riches and honours; it conquers them by the love of Christ, by the heavenly riches and the eternal glory, which it discloses. 3. It conquers the threatenings of the world, the obstacles which it raises, its persecutions; the call of Christ to us is too mighty, and the crown of honour offered to us causes us to despise the contempt of the world.—This (viz. the conquest of the world) is an idea peculiar to Christianity, because it only teaches the contrast of the kingdom of God and the world.—A lofty thought, to face the whole world and to conquer it! This is a greater task than that of the world-conquerors; they are servants of the world.—Unbelief is an offence against the Majesty of God, a denial of the holy miracles in the moral world, which God has wrought.—

V. 1. L. in Gesets und Zeugnisse, 1859:—When does the feast of the Nativity become to us the birth-day of a new life? When its glad tidings excite in us anew 1. the undoubting faith that Jesus is the Christ; but also 2. grateful love to God, and to all those who are our brethren in Christ.

On v. 4. SPURGEON:—A great victory, a great birth, a great grace.

DANNEIL:—The Christian's warfare. 1. The warrior (born of God); 2. The enemy (the world); 3. The victory (faith).

GENTHE, on the tercentenary Anniversary, 1860, Baptismal Address. How Melancthon conquered the world in the strength of faith; 1. The temptation of the world; 2. The opposition of the world; 3. The fear of the world.

V. 6. SCHLEIERMACHER:—Our Christmas-joy is closely connected with the fact that the faith, that Jesus is the Son of God, is the victory which conquers the world. 1. The object of the festal joy, that in Jesus is born the Son of God, surpasses all similar events in our family and social life, for through Him we are made well-pleasing to God. 2. The world is destined to be conquered, judged, and destroyed as to its transitory and corruptible side, but to become more and more blessed as to its Divine side, and this has been done in Christ and through Christ in believers, so that it is one and the same thing to say: the Son of God conquers the world through our faith, and our faith conquers the world through Him.

Vv. 9-12. F. A. WOLF:—Christ the Author and Giver of a living religion. 1. Explain and prove that this is true of Christ as a Witness, an Example, and a Surety. 2. The inferences: a. Christianity has nothing to fear from all-changing time, from false love of novelty, and from true zeal for improvement; b. test the genuineness of your own Christianity by the vitality of the faith that is in you.

Vv. 1-18. PETRI:—The Easter-faith, that Jesus is the Christ. 1. That we become anew conscious of the wholesome virtues of this faith; 2. and edify ourselves on this our most holy faith.

On the Epistle for Dom. Quasimodogeniti [First Sunday after Easter—M.] vv. 4-10.

HEUBNER:—The great value of faith in Jesus Christ. 1. How it manifests itself: a. in its power: it makes us the children of God and conquers the world (vv. 4, 5); b. in its certainty: it is supported by the testimony of God (vv. 6-8); 2. The duties it enjoins upon us: a. it warns us against contempt of faith (v. 9), and b. it lays us under the obligation to receive the testimony of God (v. 10).

Faith in Christ the good part of younger Christians (Candidates for Confirmation). 1. Proof: this faith makes them the children of God; preserves them from the world. 2. How do they acquire this faith? By diligent consideration of the testimonies for Jesus, and by ready obedience.

Continued provision for grown-up children, 1. In what it consists; 2. What makes it our bounden duty.—

R. STIER:—What John means by conquering the world? Our faith must conquer 1. The unbelief of the world; 2. The sin and seduction of the world; 3. The enmity of the world.—

What sort of faith does conquer the world?

1. Faith in Him, who also was not of the world, but the eternal brightness of the glory of the Father, and the express image of His Person; 2. Faith in Jesus, the Conqueror of the world.—

KAPFF:—The Confirmation of regeneration.

1. How the regeneration of mankind is confirmed in Christ; 2. How it is confirmed in individual hearts; 3. What influence in that direction outward confirmation has.

GENEKEN:—Build yourselves up on faith by the Holy Ghost. 1. This is needful for the regenerate, as feeble newly-born persons (v. 4); 2. But the foundation, which is laid, stands firm like a rock (v. 5); and the Prince of life evermore joins us in the Holy Communion (v. 6); 3. The Holy Spirit bears testimony concerning the truth of His word, and the power of His life (vv. 6, 8-11).

F. W. KRAUMACHER:—The threefold testimony for Jesus the Messiah and Saviour of the world 1. in the water; 2. in the blood; 3. in the Holy Spirit.

BEYER (in Gesetz und Zeugnis for 1862):—A test of Faith! 1. Dost thou know the victory, whereby faith verifies itself? 2. The fountain, whence it daily draws fresh nourishment? 3. The testimony which gives it assurance?—

The testimony of God concerning His Son, 1. to us; 2. in us; 3. by us.

The victorious power of faith, 1. against the sin of the world, 2. against the lie of the world.

Our faith is the victory which conquers the world. 1. What sort of faith is it? 2. How is it obtained? 3. How does it conquer the world?—

[VER. 2. MACKNIGHT:—The intention of the Apostle was to show, how we may know when we love the children of God in a right manner. New this was necessary to be shown, since men may love the children of God because they are their relations, or because they are engaged in the same pursuits with themselves, or because they are mutually united by some common bond of friendship. But love proceeding from these considerations is not the love of the children of God which He requires. By what mark then can we know, that our love to the children of God is of the right sort? "By this," saith the Apostle, "we may know that we love the children of God" in a right manner, "when we love God and" from that excellent principle, "keep His commandments," especially His commandment to love His children, because they bear His Image. True Christian love therefore is that which proceeds from love to God, from a regard to His will, and which leadeth us to obey all His commandments.—M.]

[VER. 3. PUSEY:—"For nothing is grievous or burdensome to him who loves. They are not grievous, because love makes them light; they are not grievous, because Christ gives strength to bear them. Wings are no weight to the bird, which they lift up in the air until it is lost in the sky above us, and we see it no more, and hear only its note of thanks. God's commands are no weight to the soul, which, through His Spirit, He upbears to Himself; nay, rather, the soul, through them, the more soars aloft and loses itself in the love of God."]

VER. 4. "'They are not grievous, because every thing which is born of God overcometh the world.' He saith not only whosoever, but 'every thing which,' showing the largeness of the gifts. 'Every thing,' of every sex or age time or clime, 'which is born of God, overcometh the world,' and that not of themselves, but of the gift of God; not they, but the power, through their new birth, in-born in them, faith, love, grace, from God, unto God, and they, as wielding in them a power not their own, overcome the world.—'The commandments of God are not grievous,' because we have a power implanted in us mightier than all which would dispute the sway of God's commandments and God's love, a power which would lift us above all hindrances, carry us over all temptations, impel our listlessness, sweep with it whatever opposes it, sweep with it even the dulness or sluggishness of our own wills, the Almighty power of the grace of God."

"This is the victory, by which the martyrs overcame, by which the weak became strong, and, in Divine strength, mastered the strong; the strength of endurance wearied out the brutal might of affliction; children overcame their oppressor; the ignorant took captive the learning of the world; fishermen and the tent-maker subdued the world; the dying conquered the living; the blood of martyrs became the harvest-seed of the church. By faith, St. Paul says, 'they subdued kingdoms;' by faith St. Peter bids us resist the evil one. For faith knits us to Christ; faith obtains for us the power of Christ; faith prevails with Him who is Almighty, and overcomes the world, for it has power with Him who has power over the world."

"Faith binds us to Him, who is Almighty; but faith, too, opens our own eyes to things invisible. It imparts to us of the power of the All-Powerful, of the wisdom of the All-Wise. It gives us to see the nothingness of all things which are but for a time. It opens our eyes to the majesty and beauty of things eternal. What to us are things which perish in the grasp? What to us are things of time and sense, save as they speak of that which lives when time shall cease to be, or as they shall themselves live on, purified but indestructible? One only is above us, He who made us. All we see is below us. His friends we may be, His we have been made, who is Lord of the world. The world itself, and all which is in the world, is for our use, subject to us, as we to God. All things beautiful to sight, sweet to taste, transporting in sound, pleasant to smell, and thrilling to touch, all things are ours and for us, if used in obedience to their Maker. But we are above them. They were made for us, not we for them; they are made to serve us, not we to be slaves to them. Faith shows us Him who is above all things, but in all things; immortal, invisible, incomprehensible, in light unapproachable, yet who willeth to come unto us, and make His abode in us. God made us, because He willed to impart Himself to us. He made us, not that He needed us, but to show us His love. He has made us for Himself, He willed not to make us apart from Himself. He willed to join us to Himself. He who hath and is all things, of which we have the shadow here below, 'the true riches of wisdom, and spiritual delight, royal glory, eternal peace, a kingdom incorruptible, eternal joy, overflowing peace, true bliss, certain knowledge' (Laurentius), pleasure for evermore, He willeth to give thee all which is His, and much more, He willeth to give thee Himself. Why shall we not trust Him with the things of time, or with ourselves, who must trust Him with our eternity? Why not trust that, for these few days and years, He will provide for us, whom He has made for His love, if He will not have it, in those countless ages which time measures not?"—M.]

[SECKER:—Presumption in our strength is destructive to our virtue; confidence of our own merit is injurious to our Maker; but a deep sense of human unworthiness and of Divine grace will inspire us with that lowliness of heart, which God will accept, and that vigilance of conduct, which He will bless. [VER. 6. PYLE:—"Nor are the effects and influences of this great truth more excellent and noble than is the ground and foundation of it strong and certain. The testimonies given Him at His baptism, when God by a voice from heaven declared Him to be His beloved Son, the Saviour of mankind: the miracles at His crucifixion, when at the shedding of His innocent blood, we saw both water and blood come out of His side; the sun was darkened; the earth trembled, and the veil of the temple was rent; the signs and wonders done by Him, and by others in His name; these three, respectively denoted by 'the water,' 'the blood,' and 'the Spirit,' are all testimonies of the authority of His Person and mission, most unexceptionable, as being evidences of that Holy Spirit that cannot deceive us."—M.]

[VER. 12. SHERLOCK:—"If we reflect upon the holiness of God, and His hatred of sin and iniquity, and begin to fear that He can never be reconciled to sinners; let us take courage; the work is difficult, but the Son of God has undertaken it; and how great soever the distance between God and us is, yet through the Son we have access to Him. If we still fear for ourselves, that all may again be lost through our own weakness and inability to do good; even here help is at hand, the Spirit of God is our support, He is the pledge and earnest of our redemption. These being the necessary means of salvation it was necessary to reveal to the world the doctrines concerning the Son and the Holy Spirit: and the belief of these doctrines is necessary to every Christian, as far as the right use of the means depends on the right faith and belief of the doctrines. 'He that hath the Son,' saith St. John, 'hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life;' and again: 'who-soever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father.' For since we can only come to the Father through the Son, to deny the Son is to cut off all communication between us and the Father. The same may be said of the blessed Spirit, through whom we are in Christ: 'If any man,' says St. Paul, 'have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His.' Our blessed Lord has Himself told us, that 'this is life eternal, that we may know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent.'—M.]

IV. THE CONCLUSION.

CHAPTER V. 18-21.

13 These things have I written<sup>1</sup> unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe<sup>2</sup> on the name of 14 the Son of God. And this is the confidence that we have in him<sup>3</sup>, that, if we ask any 15 thing<sup>4</sup> according to his will, he heareth us: And if we know that he hear<sup>5</sup> us, what- 16 soever we ask<sup>6</sup>, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of<sup>7</sup> him. If any man see his brother sin a sin<sup>8</sup> which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say 17 that he shall pray for it<sup>9</sup>. All unrighteousness is sin: and there is a sin not<sup>10</sup> unto 18 death. We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not; but he that is begot- 19 ten<sup>11</sup> of God keepeth himself, and that<sup>12</sup> wicked one toucheth him not. And we know 20 that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness<sup>13</sup>. And<sup>14</sup> we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding<sup>15</sup>, that we may know<sup>16</sup> him that is true<sup>17</sup>; and we are in him that is true<sup>17</sup>, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is 21 the true God, and eternal life<sup>18</sup>. Little children, keep yourselves<sup>19</sup> from idols. Amen<sup>20</sup>.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Conclusion. v. 18. These things wrote I.—Ταῖρα ἔγραψα, like ταῖρα ἔγραψα ch. ii. 26, might be referred to the verses immediately preceding, if the words annexed permitted such a construction:

That ye may know, that ye have eternal life, ye that believe in the name of the Son of God.—Quite similar to the closing verse of the Gospel, ch. xx. 81. The purpose of the writing ἵνα εἰδῆτε ὅτι ζῶντες ἔχετε αἰώνιον corresponds with the χαρά at the beginning of the Epistle, which χαρά was to be filled by the testimony of the eye- and ear-witnesses of the λόγος τῆς ζωῆς; hence ταῖρα ἔγραψα answers to ταῖρα γράφομεν ch. i. 4 (Bengel), the certainty of the possession of eternal life being the ground and strength of the joy, which John has, and to which he adverts. The words τοῖς πιστεύουσιν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ, annexed to ὑμῖν, primarily refer back to ch. iii. 23, but find their last resting-place in the κοινωνία ἡ ἡμετέρα μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ μετὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ, ch. i. 8. Hence ταῖρα must be referred neither to vv. 6-12 (Huther), nor to vv. 1-12 (S. Schmid), but to the whole Epistle (Luther, Bengel, Lücke, Düsterdieck and al.), though the inducement to the choice of this expression lies in verses immediately preceding.

and preparing the concluding portion of the Epistle, and there still follow several verses which constitute that concluding portion. Noteworthy is the difference between the closing verse of the Gospel, ch. xx. 31, which adverts to the future believing and obtaining eternal life of the readers, while our passage asserts their present belief and possession of eternal life. [Alford sees here with Düsterdieck something like an anticipatory close of the Epistle. Huther maintains, that this verse still belongs to the second main part of the Epistle beginning with ch. iii. 23, on the ground that ζῶν αἰώνιον goes back to the verses immediately preceding, and that πιστεῦεν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ, refers back to ch. iii. 23.—M.]

The confidence that prayer is heard. vv. 14, 15.

V. 14. And this is the confidence which we have towards Him.—Καὶ connects with what goes before, i. e., it connects παρρησία ἣν ἔχομεν with ζῶν ἔχετε αἰώνιον. This confidence consists in this:—

That if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us.—It is consequently the confidence in God, which has the intercourse of prayer with Him; this confidence rests on the ζῶν αἰώνιος, springs from it, points back to it, and reacts also on it, strengthening and confirming it. Cf. ch. iii. 21, 22.—Πρὸς αὐτὸν and τὸ θέλημα αὐτοῦ must be referred to God the Father, because the idea of possessing the ζῶν αἰώνιος involves the idea of the Divine Sonship, and the παρρησία is connected with both. While εἰς τι leaves the object of the prayer quite general and indefinite, κατὰ τὸ θέλημα limits it, so that it is a conditio exquisita, latissime patens (Bengel), as we may see from the fourth and seventh petitions of the Lord's Prayer, in connection with the others. (Cf. Doctrinal and Ethical No. 1.).—Ἀκούει ἡμῶν denotes an attentive, sympathetic hearing, while ἡμᾶς would signify a mere hearing.—This is an undoubted fact:

V. 15. And if we know that He heareth us whatsoever we may ask.—Hence εἰς with the Indicative οἶδαμεν. Winer, p. 310, sq.—Ὁ εἰς αἰρώμεθα denotes the general character of the object of prayer. It follows that:

We know that we have the petitions which we have asked from Him.—ἔχομεν, emphatic, placed first. By the side of ἀκούει ἡμῶν, we must distinguish ἔχομεν τὰ αἰτήματα (Lorinus: res petite), although the two belong together; God hearing our prayers and our having go hand-in-hand. The additional clause: ἡ ἡγάκαμεν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ indicates that the having is the consequence of prayer preceding it, so that the having in point of time does not coincide with the prayer, as does the believer's prayer with God's hearing; but our having is secured; ἔχομεν is not=λαμβάνομεν (Lachmann and al.), nor must it be construed like a Future (Grotius: statim exaudiat, at non statim dat).—Ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, as in Matth. xx. 20, belongs to ἡγάκαμεν, not to ἔχομεν; παρ' αὐτοῦ, as in Acts iii. 2, (see Appar. Crit., No. 7.), could not, at any rate, denote prayers as deposits made with God, as Ebrard maintains.

Intercession for a brother sinning not unto death. vv. 16, 17.

mit a sin, not unto death.—Here is supposed a specific case, in which the confident petition becomes an intercession for the purpose of keeping an erring brother,—after the example of Christ (ch. ii. 1; cf. Luke xxii. 31, 32; Jno. xvii. 9; Heb. vii. 25),—with his Saviour and salvation, in fellowship with the Redeemer and in the participation of eternal life. Additur causæ omnium maximus; ut possit orare etiam pro altero in re gravissima (Bengel). 'Εάν τις ἴδῃ supposes an objective possibility; it is not said that some one does see, but it may be, the event will show it; consequently: If any one should see it. Winer, p. 306, sq. The reference is to an event which may be seen, to a fact susceptible of observation, as in ch. iii. 17.—Τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ, denotes a member of the Christian Church, and τις requires to be taken in the same sense. The reference is consequently to intimate converse, and to what happens and becomes manifest there. This the Apostle brings out emphatically in the participial form: ἀμαρτάνοντα ἀμαρτίαν: the sinning brother stands, as it were, before our eyes. Here we have μὴ πρὸς θάνατον, not as in v. 17: οὐ πρὸς θάνατον, because the reference is to the subjective judgment of the observer, not to an objectively valid principle, not to the establishment of a dogmatically real idea. Winer, p. 496.—Ἀδελφός is therefore not=proximus quicumque (Calov); non-christians are excluded (against Ebrard), although the reference may not be exactly to "a regenerate person" (Düsterdieck).

He shall ask and give him life.—The Future αἰτήσῃ denotes that the intercession may be confidently expected, since καὶ δώσει neither warrants us to construe the Future, in the decisive language of the legislation of the Old and New Testament (Matth. v. 21, 27, etc.), as an Imperative, nor gives an occasion to assume a purely ethical possibility, as Luke xxiii. 49: κύριε, εἰ παράξωμεν; Rom. x. 14: πῶς οὖν ἐκκαλέσονται; shall we smite? how shall they, how can they call? See Winer, pp. 294, 295, 331. Hence it is not=licebit petere (S. Schmidt). The subject is the intercession, τις, not the Church (Neander), or the saints (Meyer). The same subject, αἰρώ, belongs also to δώσει; it is neither=adhibetur (variation of the Vulgate, approved by Bede and others), nor to be derived from the idea of prayer, αἰρούμενος, rogatus Deus (Beza, Bengel, Lücke, Winer, p. 553, and al.). [The Æthiopic version brings out the right meaning: rogans vivificabit; i. e. the asker shall be instrumental in bestowing life on the erring brother for whom he intercedes.—M.] The grammatical requirements of our passage are fully borne out by the cycle of thoughts current in the New Testament (Acts iii. 6; Jas. v. 15, 20). John here simply contemplates the result as a fact, without adverting to the instrumentality, its ways and stages within the brother's heart, which was the object of intercession; repentance and faith, moreover, are not excluded, and the interceding brother is not viewed as the Saviour, or the representative of the Redeemer. Neither may we think of an admonitio et correptio fraterna (Matth. xviii. 15; S. Schmid), nor of the proper demeanour of the asker towards his erring brother, as the result of his intercessory prayer (Rickli). The final effect of intercession is ζῶν (αἰώνιος), which is weakened and disturbed by every sin [Alford; This bestowal of life by intercessory prayer, is not to be minutely inquired into, whether it is to be accompanied with "corruptio fraterna,"—whether it consists in the giving to the sinner a repentant heart (Grotius, al.), but taken, as put by the Apostle, in all its simplicity and breadth. Life, viz.: the restoration of that Divine life from which by any act of sin he was indeed in peril, and indeed in process of falling, but this sin was not an actual fall.—M.].

To them that sin not unto death.—The Plural τοῖς ἀμαρτάνουσι belongs to αὐτῶ, which generaliter positum est (Erasmus); the Plural takes the supposed case from the sphere of singularity; τις has collective force. See Winer, p. 553. It is forced and ungrammatical to refer αὐτῶ to him that asks, understanding θεός as the subject, and taking τοῖς ἀμαρτάνουσι as Dativ. commodi: "God will give him life for the persons sinning," as Bornemann (Biblische Studien der Sächs. Geistlichen I. p. 71.) does.—Μὴ πρὸς θάνατον qualifies ἀμαρτάνουσι ἀμαρτίαν, or ἀμαρτάνειν, and has consequently adverbial force. θάνατος, only, if taken in the sense of spiritual death, corresponds with the context, viz., with the παρρησία of prayer being heard on the ground of our possession of the ζωὴ αἰώνιος, for ζωή in the intercession on behalf of the erring brother, and the preposition πρὸς, as denoting the aim towards which something is directed (Winer, p. 428), require us to think of a sinning, which in the conviction of the person interceding, must not terminate in θάνατος, the emptying of all ζωὴ αἰώνιος, and accordingly must not absolutely annul fellowship with Christ, faith in Him. This is brought out more clearly in the next clause.

There is a sin unto death.—Thus the Apostle circumscribes the domain of sinning not unto death: it is not infinite. This is directed against any possible laxity in the judgment of the Church on the sins of believers. Πρὸς θάνατον has the same meaning here, as in the preceding clause. The reference is accordingly to a specific sin, to a simple act perceptible (ἰδόν) in the brother, within the limits of Christian fellowship (τὸν ἀδελφόν αὐτοῦ), not to a particular, outwardly marked category of sins, but to a sinning, and committing of sin, which renders it clear to the careful observer, that the fellowship of faith with Christ, the fountain of eternal life, has been cut off, that consequently the ethioal life-form appears to be inwardly decayed and dying, that the moral status of that brother shows itself to be in a state of hopeless dissolution, so that it is of no avail to pray for such an one, and that therefore intercession is not proper. Hence it is wrong to transfer to this passage the Old Testament idea of למָת, ἀμαρτία θανάτῳ (Numb. xviii. 22), and to refer to capital crimes, e. g. idolatry, adultery, murder, incest, which are punishable with death under the secular or Mosais law (Morus, al.), or to the sins ecclesiastically punishable with excommunication, as if intercession had to conform to the secular code of punishment; nor is the reference to sinning unto the end of man's earthly existence (Bede and al.), in which connection de Lyra rightly observes: "Qui sit peccator non ad mortem, sciri non potest nisi per divinam revelationem;" πρὸς θάνατον cannot be rendered "usque ad mortem." Nor is the reference to the physically sick, Jas. v. 14 (Steinhofer); nor to definite, gross crimes, peccatum gravissimum, quod vix remittitur (Ambrose), moechia post baptismum commissa (Tertullian), peccatum invidentiæ (Bede). Nor is here any description of a condition, "Talis animæ status, in quo fides et amor et spes, in summa, vix nova exstincta est; si quis sciens volensque mortem amplectitur, non ex illecebris carnis, sed ex amore peccati, sub ratione peccati; repudium gratiæ proseretivum." (Bengel). Augustine thought first of invidentiæ facies post agnitionem Dei, and added afterwards: si in hac perversitate finierit vitam, and then: fidem deserere usque ad mortem. Lastly the reference is neither to a purely inward act, like obduracy (Ebrard), apostasy (de Wette, Lücke), nor to sin, perceptible in the walk of men, like the anti-christian denial expressed in words (Düsterdieck), nor to the sin against the Holy Ghost (Calvin, Sander and al.). The reference is simply to sinning, from which it may be perceived either, that no inward absolute severance from the faith and denial of Christ may or can be assumed, or that the latter is either recognizable or highly probable. To the latter case apply the words:

Concerning that I do not say that he shall pray.—The simple negation is, that the Apostle says (οὐ—λέγω), that prayer should be made for him who sins unto death. He only makes prominent the circumstance that he confines himself to saying that intercession should be made for the person not sinning unto death. Hence those commentators are right, who do not see here a prohibition (Socinus, Grotius, Neander, Lücke, Huther and al.). But it is certainly not said that we ought, or only are permitted, to pray for him (Neander). It is important to note the difference of the words employed by the Apostle, for whereas before he made use of the word αἰτῆσαι, he now uses ἐρωτᾶν: ἐρωτᾶν is rogare, and implies equality on the part of the asker with him from whom the favour is sought; Jesus designates His praying by that term (Jno. xiv. 16; xvi. 28; xvii. 9, 15, 20); on the other hand αἰτεῖν is petere, and implies inferiority (Düsterdieck), while Bengel regards αἰτεῖν as species humilior under the genus ἐρωτᾶν. This word ἐρωτᾶν denotes the confident petition of the child, praying inquiringly and expecting the gift. Hence, due regard being had to the force of the term employed, we may discover here the sanction of intercession for a brother sinning unto death, yet without any assurance of success or that the intercession will prevail. But since the Apostle advocates this very παρρησία and Deus non vult, ut pū frustra orent (Bengel), it is probably locutio morata et attica for a prohibition. Deut. iii. 26. This is also suggested by iva; in the present instance he does not wish to excite and promote the purpose of praying. (Cf. Doctrinal and Ethical No. 4).

Vers. 17. All unrighteousness is sin.—The subject πᾶσα ἀδικία reminds us of the predicate ἡ ἀνομία ch. iii. 4. Ἀνομία is in contradiction with the objectively given law of God, ἀδικία is the contradiction and negation of the δικαιοσύνη and is concerned with the subjective disposition, though it be wrought from above and subject to the law. And this harmonizes with the fact that we are concerned with the moral status of the sinner in this sinning unto death, and sinning not unto death. John manifestly desires to guard against any ἀδύνα being too lightly dealt with, being not considered as ἀμαρτία, though it be μὴ πρὸς τὸν θάνατον. The Roman Catholics, therefore, have no warrant for determining from the sin itself, whether it is peccatum mortale or veniale.

And there is a sin not unto death.—Kal simply connects the sequel; it is not—et quidem, and the sense: quodlibet nefas est peccatum non ad mortem (Bengel); Bengel's clause: 'sed ne quicumque id levius interpretetur, præmittit: est peccatum' is only a moral reaction against the perversion of the Johannine thought: all unrighteousness is sin. The sequel, because of the intercession recommended, is added by way of emphasis. Οὐ πρὸς θάνατον implies the objectively real fact, the actual occurrence of such sin; it defines ἀμαρτία, not ἐστίν, as Luther supposes.

[There are one or two questions, in connection with this section, which require to be treated somewhat more fully. First, v. 17, involves a prohibition, or what is equivalent to it. But this has been denied by many commentators. "Ora si velis, sed sub dubio impetrandi" (Corn. a Lapide); Neander supposes that the offering of prayer is permitted, though the obtaining of it will be difficult, and arbitrarily imagines the prayer in question to be the collective prayer of the Church, and that one who sins πρὸς θάνατον should not be included in the common prayer of the Church, lest he might be confirmed in his sin; Huther finds in οὐ λέγω not more than a denial of the Apostle that the case of one sinning unto death came within the purview of his command. Lyra qualifies the prohibition, though "non est orandum pro damnatis," yet we may pray, "ut minus peccaret, et per consequens minus damnaretur in inferno."—Calvin recognizes the prohibition, but limits it to extreme cases, adding: "Sed quia rarissime hoc accidit, et Deus, immensas gratias suas divitiis commendans, nos suo exemplo misericordies esse jubet: non temere in quemquam ferendum est mortis æternæ judicium, potius nos caritas ad bene sperandum flectat. Quod si desperata quorundam impietas non secus nobis apparet, ac sic Dominus eam digito monstraret, non est quod certemus cum justo Dei judicio, vel clementiores eo esse appellamus."—Alford sums up: "Certainly this seems, reserving the question as to the nature of the sin, the right view of the οὐ λέγω. By an express command in the other case, and then as express an exclusion of this case from that command, nothing short of an implied prohibition can be conveyed."

Secondly, the question: What is the sin unto death?—The canons of interpretation for its solution, and some of the principal divergences, chiefly from Düsterdieck, collected by Alford, are here produced.

"The FIRST canon of interpretation of the ἀμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον and οὐ πρὸς θάνατον is this: that the θάνατος and ζωή of the passage must correspond. The former cannot be bodily death, while the latter is eternal and spiritual life. This clears away at once all those commentators who understand the sin unto death to be one for which bodily death is the punishment, either by human law generally, as Morus and G. Lange, or by the Mosaic law (Schöttgen),—or by sickness inflicted by God, as Whitby and Benson; or of which there will be no end till the death of the sinner (thought possible by Bede, and adopted by Lyra). This last is evidently absurd, for how is a man to know, whether this will be so or not?

"The SECOND canon will be, that this sin unto death being thus a sin leading to eternal death, being no further explained to the readers here, must be presumed as meant to be understood by what the Evangelist has elsewhere laid down, concerning the possession of life and death. Now we have from him a definition immediately preceding this, in v. 12, ὁ ἔχων τὸν υἱὸν ἔχει τὴν ζωὴν (ὁ μὴ ἔχων τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ τὴν ζωὴν οὐκ ἔχει). And we may safely say that the words πρὸς θάνατον here are to be understood as meaning, "involving the loss of this life which men have only by the union with the Son of God." And this meaning they must have, not by implication only, which would be the case, if any obstinate and determined sin were meant, which would be a sign of the fact of severance from the life which is in Christ (see ch. iii. 14, 15, where the inference is of this kind), but directly and essentially, i. e. in respect of that very sin which is pointed at by them. Now against this canon are all those interpretations, far too numerous to mention, which make any atrocious and obstinate sin to be that intended. It is obvious that our limits are thus confined to abnegation of Christ, not as inferred by its fruits otherwise shown, but as the act of sin itself. And so, with various shades of difference, as to the putting forth in detail, most of the best commentators, both ancient and modern: e. g., Aretius, Luther, Calvin, Beza, Piscator, Corn. a Lapide, Tirinus, Baumgarten-Crusius, Lücke, Huther, Düsterdieck.

"The THIRD canon will help us to decide, within the above limits, what especial sin is intended. And it is, that by the very analogy of the context, it must be not a state of sin, but an appreciable act of sin, seeing that which is opposed to it in the same kind, as being not unto death, is described by ἐὰν τις λέγῃ ἀμαρτάνομαι. So that all interpretations which make it to be a state of apostasy, all such as, e. g., Bengel's (see above), do not reach the matter of detail which is before the Apostle's mind.

"In enquiring what this is, we must be guided by the analogy of what St. John says elsewhere. Our state being that of life in Jesus Christ, there are those who have gone out from us, not being of us, ch. ii. 19, who are called ἀντίχριστοι, who not only "have not" Christ, but are Christ's enemies, denying the Father and the Son (ch. ii. 22), whom we are not even to receive into our houses nor to greet (2 John 10, 11). These seem to be the persons pointed at here, and this is the sin: viz. the denial that Jesus is the Christ, the incarnate Son of God. This alone of all sins bears upon it the stamp of severance from Him who is the Life itself. As the confession of Christ, with the mouth and in the heart, is salvation unto life (Rom. x. 9), so the denial of Christ, with the mouth and in the heart, is sin unto death. This alone of all the proposed solutions seems to satisfy all the canons above laid down. For in it the life cast away and the death incurred strictly correspond: it strictly corresponds to what St. John has elsewhere said concerning life and death, and derives its explanation from those other passages, especially from the foregoing v. 12: and it is an appreciable act of sin, one against which the readers have been before repeatedly cautioned (ch. ii. 18 sqq.; iv. i. sqq.; v. 6, 11, 12). And further, it is in exact accordance with other passages of Scripture which seem to point at a sin similarly distinguished above others: Matth. xii. 31 sqq., and so far as the circumstances there dealt with allow common ground, with the more ethical passages, Heb. vi. 4 sqq., x. 25 sqq. In the former case, the Scribes and Pharisees were resisting the Holy Ghost (Acts vii. 51), who was manifesting God in the flesh in the person and work of Christ. For them the Lord Himself does not pray (Luke xxiii. 34): they knew what they did: they went out from God's people and were not of them: receiving and repudiating the testimony of the Holy Ghost to the Messiahship of Jesus."—M.]

Assurance of redemption. vv. 18, 20.

V. 18. We know that every one who is born (out) of God, sinneth not.—Each of these three concluding verses begins with οἰδαμεν; Bengel: anaphora. The Evangelist refers to εἰδότες v. 18, and thus describes the proper consciousness of the Christian in his attitude to sin (v. 18), the world (v. 19), and the Redeemer (v. 20). Πᾶς γεννημένος ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ signifies every one who is, and abides, born of God; the power of regeneration, of the life given and received in regeneration, operates from the past into the present; as such οὐχ ἀμαρτάνει, as such sin is foreign to him, Rom. vii. 20; cf. ch. iii. 9.—It is unnecessary to supply πρὸς θάνατον (Bede, Beza and al.), and arbitrary to understand an abiding in sin, or a falling from grace (Calvin), or the not frequent occurrence of the sin unto death and sin in general (de Wette).

But he that hath been born of God, keepeth himself, and the wicked one doth not touch him.—The opposite (ἀλλά), refers not only to the predicate, but, since the subject is particularly specified, to the whole clause, and the two clauses (οἰδαμεν ὅτι—and ὁ γεννηθείς κ. τ. λ.) are independently coördinated. The Aorist indicates the historical fact; that hath been born again (in opposition to Sander who discovers this in the Perfect, and Bengel, "præteritum grandius quiddam sonat, quam aoristus; non modo qui magnum in regeneratione gradum assecutus, sed quilibet, qui regnitus est, servat se.") ἑαυτὸν indicates moral effort and self-exertion; ὅν φέροι εἰς ἀμαρτανίαν προσβαλεῖ (Occumenius); sin occurs, approaches, but he sustains the conflict, guarding himself in his peculiar nature and the Divine gift of eternal life, which hinders, spoils and drives away sin. Thus sin destroys man himself; it is in virtue of his self-guarding that the σπέρμα τοῦ Θεοῦ abides in him (ch. iii. 9); we must neither supply δυνόν (1 Tim. v. 22), nor ἀποκλιν (Jas. i. 27. Carpov, Lücke, al.), nor take ῥησιθαι in the sense of being on one's guard (Ebrard). Cf. ch. iii. 8. [Alford justly objects to this and similar expositions, and retaining the reading αὐτόν A. B. Vulg. Jer., renders "it keepeth him," viz. the Divine birth, adding, "it is this, and not the fact of his own watchfulness, which preserves him from the touch of the wicked one, as in ch. iii. 9, where the same is imported by ὅτι τὸ σπέρμα αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ μένει, καὶ οὐ δύναται ἀμαρτάνειν, ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ γεγέννηται. The rationalistic commentators insist on ῥησι ἐαυτόν, as showing, as Socinus, "aliquid præstare eum aique efficere, qui per Christum regeneratus fuerit;" and the orthodox commentators have but a lame apology to offer. Düsterdieck compares ἀντίζει ἑαυτόν, ch. iii. 3. But the reference there is wholly different—viz. to a gradual and earnest striving after an ideal model; whereas here the ῥησιθαι must be, by the very nature of the case, so far complete that the wicked one cannot approach: and whose self-guarding can ensure this even for a day? Cf. Jno. xvii. 15, ἵνα ῥησιθῇ αὐτοὺς ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ, which is decisive."—M.] The clause annexed by καὶ notes the difficult but successful conflict. The enemy, ὁ πονηρὸς, ch. iii. 12, is Satan, οὐχ ἀπτεται αὐτοῦ, though he would fain do it, hostile attacks, Satanic assaults, temptations are not wanting (1 Pet. v. 8); but the point of complication between Satan and the regenerate is not reached, the wrestling is wanting; the regenerate keeps Satan at a distance, wards him off; Bengel: malignus appropinquat, ut musca ad lychnum, sed non nocet, ne tangit quidem. "In the πανοπλία τοῦ Θεοῦ he is guarded against all the μεθοδεῖαι τοῦ διαβόλου Eph. vi. 11 sqq." (Huther). Luther and Calvin also refer to the armour of God, so that, as in John xvii. 11, 12, 15; Rev. iii. 10, God is the Preserver [Calvin: "Utut malignus renatum ad peccatum sollicitet, tela tamen illius irrita cadunt, quoniam renatus scuto fidei munitus ea repellit et diabolo per fidem resistit."—M.]. But here the Apostle contemplates only the result, and not the way to it. Additions such as letaliter (Calvin), finaliter (E. Schmid), are unnecessary. But ὁ πονηρὸς οὐχ ἀπτεται αὐτοῦ depends of course on the careful ῥησιθαι ἑαυτόν (Düsterdieck, Huther). [Alford: "As the Prince of this world had nothing in our blessed Lord, even so on His faithful ones who live by His life, the Tempter has no point d'appui, by virtue of that their γέννησις by which they are as He is."—M.].

V. 19. We know that we are (out) of God.—The second οἰδαμεν repeats by way of introduction and in pregnant abbreviation (ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐσμεν), and with application to himself and his church, the believer's consciousness of his Divine sonship. There is no occasion whatever to understand here the peculiar revelation vouchsafed to the Apostles, or to explain εἶναι ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ—a Deo pendere illique adherere (Socinus). The principal sentence is the independent clause, annexed like vv. 18, 20, by καὶ, viz.:

And the whole world lieth in the wicked one.—For the world is the territory and domain of Satan, on which account, and because ὁ πονηρὸς occurs in v. 18, and we have here an antithesis to ὁ Θεός, τῷ πονηρῷ is masculine, and not neuter (Lyra, Socinus, Grotius, who however allows an allusion to Satan, Spener, Rickli and al.). Ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ κεῖται denotes like ἐν τῇ συγκλήτῳ κεῖται (Polyb. VI. 14, 6), both the competency of Satan and dependence on him as the controlling power; in (ἐν) him lies the world, [it is circumscribed by him and in his power—M.]; κεῖται denotes the passiveness of the state, of the situation; ἡ ἀπτεται τοῦ κόσμου continually in the most powerful and destructive manner.

The ethical medium of sin is not expressed here, only the result is indicated. Referring here, with Spener and Steinhöfer, to Is. xlv. 8, and explaining it in analogy with regeneration, as if the world were lying in the wicked one like a child in its mother's womb, is false per se and not warranted by that passage wrongly rendered by Luther.—Ο κόσμος ὅλος refers to all the unregenerate; God's children do not belong to the world, though ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, yet are they not ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου (Jno. xvii. 11, 16), not ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου (ch. iii. 8). Bengel well observes: "Totus mundus, isque universus, eruditus, honestos, aliove complectens omnes, exceptis duntaxat, qui Deo se et Christo vindicarunt, non modo non tangitur, sed plane jacet (remains lying), per idololatriam, cecitatem, fraudem, vim, lasciviam, impietatem, malitiam omnem, in malo, expers et vitæ ex Deo et diavoliæ (1 Cor. v. 10; xi. 32). Brevi hac summa vividissime denotatur horribilis status mundi. Commentarij loco est ipse mundus et mundanorum hominum actiones, sermones, contractus, lites, sodalitia." Hence our passage does not contradict ch. ii. 2; iv. 14. God aims at the redemption of the whole world through Christ and He is enough for the whole world; but Satan also, as the antagonist of God, aims at the whole world. The world is to be taken as the territory which embraces all, not as the sum-total produced by the adding together of all individuals. [Alford: "Had not Christ become a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, were He not the Saviour of the whole world, none could ever come out of the world and believe on Him; but as it is, they who believe on Him, come out and are separated from the world; so that our proposition here remains strictly true: the κόσμος is the negation of faith in Him, and as such lies in the wicked one, His adversary."—M.]

VER. 20. But we know, that the Son of God is come.—The third ἵδμεν whose object: ὅτι ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ ἦκει, i. e., has come; he conditions the εἶναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ which continues in εἶναι ἐν τῷ θεῷ; had He not come, we should still lie like ὁ κόσμος ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ. Hence it is—ἐφανερῶς ch. iii. 8 and not adest (Bengel referring to Mark viii. 3).—"δὲ closes off and sums up all: cf. 1 Thess. v. 23; 2 Thess. iii. 16; Hebr. xiii. 22 al. This not being seen, it has been altered to καί, as there appeared to be no contrast with the preceding." Alford.—M.]

And hath given us a sense that we know the true One.—The subject of δέδωκεν is ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, not as Bengel Deus, as the Sender, ordaining the coming of Jesus. For Jesus is also the Mediator of the truth and of knowledge [i. e., He bestows to us the truth and this knowledge—M.], (Düsterdieck). Δάνοια is the faculty or sense of knowing, not insight or knowledge (Lücke, de Wette), nor the activity of thinking out all the points in contrast with a faith void of thought (Paulus), 2 Pet. iii. 1; Eph. iv. 18; i. 18 (ὁφθαλμοὶ τῆς καρδίας or τῆς διανοίας), or mind (Matth. xxii. 37; Luke i. 51; Eph. ii. 8; Col. i. 21; 1 Pet. i. 18; Hebr. viii. 10; x. 16), sensus cognoscendi (Lyra), sensus et gustus rerum divinarum (a Lapide), the spiritual sense (1 Cor. ii. 12, 14), whose aim (ἵνα), but not whose substance is γινώσκειν τὸν ἀληθινόν. Cf. ch. ii. 8, 4; Jno. xvii. 8. The object of this cognition is evidently God, qui re vera Deus est, ut cum ab ido- lis omnibus discernat (Calvin), in contrast with every Deus fictitious. Bengel refers to the Son without any warrant for doing so.

And we are in the true One, in His Son Jesus Christ.—Another independent proposition annexed by καί, as in v. 19. Ἐομεν ἐν τῷ ἀληθινῷ, designates, as before, God, which is also evident from the pronoun in ἐν τῷ υἱῷ αὐτοῦ. This is the extreme antithesis of κεῖται ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ, the climax of εἶναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ. The words ἐν τῷ υἱῷ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ fully denotes the Mediator, the ground and stay both of the knowledge and of the position of the believing child of God, and it denotes this by ἐν, not by διὰ, in, not per, in order to mark the permanent character of this life-fellowship; inestimar is Christum et unum efficimur cum Deo. Cf. ch. ii. 3-6; iii. 2. It is therefore no opposition, as seems to be assumed by the Vulgate (which connects by et simus with the clause beginning with ἵνα), Lyra, Erasmus and al.

This is the true God and eternal life.—Οὗτος like ἐκεῖνος, does not refer, as it were, in a merely mechanical manner, to the literally or locally nearest or more remote noun, but also to the noun, psychologically nearer or more remote. Winer, p. 175. Thus in v. 16, ἐκείνη did not refer to the grammatically and locally distant ἀμαρτία μὴ πρὸς θάνατον, but to the immediately preceding ἀμαρτία πρὸς τὸν θάνατον. So here the mediating Son is not in point of sense the nearest, but ὁ ἀληθινός. Under the influence of the christological conflicts it may have been natural, with reference to the Arian heresy which was joined by the more modern antitrinitarians, to refer οὗτος to the Son; but the discipline of grammar and language requires us to refer it to the Father (this has been done by most commentators, also by Hofmann, Schriftbeweis I. 146, down to Sander, Erbrard, Besser, Stier [ad Jno. xvii. 8. Vol. 5, p. 392] of our time), though the arrangement, the reference taken locally, might induce us to think of Christ, yet this is not the case, if the internal structure of the thought,—in which God the Father is the chief, and the Son simply the Mediator,—is attentively considered. But what does οὗτος refer to? Το ἐν τῷ ἀληθινῷ. That would make: οὗτος (ὁ ἀληθινός) = ὁ ἀληθινός θεός, but that would be weak and shallow. But if we take οὗτος, deiktikós, of Christ, it is a terse and strong conclusion of the Epistle, and a powerful motive for the concluding exhortation.—The words: καὶ ζῶν αἰῶνος belong to οὗτος. Grammatically it is not singular (Winer, p. 144), still less in point of thought: for God is essentially ζῶν, and so is Christ (Jno. xiv. 6), even ζῶν αἰῶνος. In like manner He is called φῶς (ch. i. 5), ἀγάπη (ch. iv. 8, 16), πνεῦμα (Jno. iv. 24). Bengel, on vita eterna, has the subtle note: "initium epistolæ et fines conveniunt." It is therefore wrong to contend, that οὗτος ἐστὶν ὁ ἀληθινός θεός καὶ ζῶν αἰῶνος ought to be referred to the Son, as if His Divinity rested on this passage, and at the same time to overlook, that ἐν τῷ ἀληθινῷ denotes primarily God the Father, nor is it right to overlook here the tautology (this One, the true One, is the true God), and to apprehend an identification of the Father and the Son, which would be un-johannean, if the clause were referred to the Son. Now John distinguishes between the Father and the Son, but not between God and not-God. In the Son from the Father we have the Father, eternal life, and all that which is the Father's, and only in Him; hence this turn to the Son and the warning against all idols; the Son is the living Image, the Christian is in no point idolatrous! [Alford: "The grounds on which the application to Christ is rested are mainly the following: 1. that ὁ υἱός, most naturally refers to the last mentioned substantive: 2. that ζωὴ αἰώνιος, as a predicate, more naturally belongs to the Son than to the Father: 3. that the sentence, if understood of God the Father, would be aimless, and tautological. But to these it has been well and decisively answered by Lücke and Düsterdieck: 1. that ὁ υἱός more than once in St. John belongs not to the nearest substantive, but to the principal one in the foregoing sentence, e. g., in ch. ii. 22 and in 2 Jno. 7: and that the subject of the whole here has been the Father, who is the ἀληθινός of the last verse, and the Son is referred back to Him as ὁ υἱός αὐτοῦ, thereby keeping Him, as the primary subject, before the mind; 2. that as little can ζωὴ αἰώνιος be an actual predicate of Christ, as of the Father. He is indeed ἡ ζωὴ ch. i. 2, but not ἡ ζωὴ αἰώνιος. Such an expression, used predicatively, leads us to look for some expression of our Lord's, or for some meaning which does not appear on the surface to guide us. And such an expression leading to such a meaning we have in Jno. xvii. 3, αὐτὴ δὲ ἐστὶν ἡ αἰώνιος ζωὴ, ἵνα γνώσκουσιν σὲ τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν, καὶ δι' ἀπόσταλας Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν. He is eternal life in Himself, as being the fount and origin of it: He is it to us, seeing that to know Him is to possess it. I own I cannot see, after this saying of our Lord with σὲ τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν, how any one can imagine that the same Apostle can have had in these words any other reference than that which is given in those; 3. this charge is altogether inaccurate. As referred to the Father, there is in it no tautology and no aimlessness. It seems to identify the ἀληθινός mentioned before, in a solemn manner, and leads on to the concluding warning against false gods. As in another place the Apostle intensifies the non-possession of the Son by including in it the alienation from the Father also, so here at the close of all, the ἀληθινός θεός, the fount of ζωὴ αἰώνιος, is put before us as the ultimate aim and end, to be approached ἐν τῷ ὕμῳ αὐτοῦ, but Himself the One Father both of Him and of us who live through Him."—M.]

Final request. v. 21: Little children, keep yourselves from idols.—Τεκνία indicates the affectionate warmth and depth of the Apostle. The exhortation φυλάξτε ἑαυτοὺς reminds them of great danger, against which they must be courageously on the alert; they themselves are exposed to great corruption. Bengel: "Elegantia activi verbi cum pronomine reciproco plus dicit, quam: custodimini. Custodite vos ipsos, me absente, neque solum ab eorum cultu, sed etiam ab omni eorum communione et communionis specie." Ἀπο τῶν εἰδώλων denotes, that believers must withdraw from the idols, surrounding and in immediate proximity to them, in order to be guarded against them. The εἰδῶλα are figures of imaginary deities, and as contrasted with the true God, who is Eternal Life, denote the manufacture of the creature; the decisive point, or the thing decided here is not whether they are made with hands for the grossest forms of heathenism, or in imagination and thought for its more subtle forms; the real point is that they are self-made, untrue, unliving, and strictly speaking, nothing. 1 Thessa. i. 9; 1 Cor. x. 19; xii. 2. Düsterdieck, therefore, is wrong in following here an Etymologicum ineditum in Biel, sub voce (τὸ μὲν εἰδῶλον οὐδεμίαν ὑπόστασιν ἔχει, τὸ δὲ ὁμοίωμα τινῶν ἐστὶν ἐνδάλμα), and making εἰδῶλον tritons or centaurs, and ὁμοίωμα, constellations, men and beasts; the Diana of the Ephesians, forsooth, was also an εἰδῶλον. Cf. Rom. i. 23, 25.—We are fully warranted to refer here, with Tertullian, Oecumenius, Düsterdieck and others, to idols proper, but equally warranted to refer also (with Bede, Rickli, Sander and others) to the self-made representations and ideas of the false teachers and their dupes, which, like the truth, they require to be received and submitted to. We may even see, with Ebrard, a reference to images of God or gods or saints in reality, or in imagination, for whom heathenish worship is required. The εἰδῶλα are so dangerous because they are the objects of εἰδωλολατρεία. As this applied then to the church-frontier in contact with heathenism, so it applies at this time to the Mariolatry in the Church of Christ, and to the worship of genius, to Schiller-worship, etc., in His Church. [The literal and figurative reference in this closing charge, seems to be required by the context, and, in fact, by the whole tenor of the Epistle; the reference being both to literal idols, and to spiritual idolatry.—M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The assurance that our prayers will be heard rests upon the life-fellowship with God the Father through faith in Christ, and forbids its being circumscribed, as to the substance of our prayers, within limits narrower than those given by the Lord Himself (Matth. vi. 9-18), but neither pursues any other course than that indicated in Matth. vi. 33, sq., viz., it expresses in the way of ethical effort what life really stands in need of. So St. Paul in Rom. viii. 14-17. Absolutely exaudible* is the prayer for the Holy Spirit and spiritual gifts (Luke xi. 13), relatively exaudible are our prayers for temporal gifts quantum non est impedimento ad salutem (Matth. xxvi. 39).

2. Intercession is very potent (v. 16); it is a work of love, an act of kindness.

3. Every sin is, properly speaking, unto death, which is the wages of sin; there is no sin, which is not per se unto death, unto condemnation. In this respect, the maxim of the Stoics and Jovianus holds good, that omnia peccata paria, no matter how different they may be; and there is only one way towards the forgiveness and cancelling of sin, viz., Christ and His high-priestly work, and the fellowship of faith with the Sinless One. Consequently it is not the species or greatness of sin, per se, which constitutes it a sin unto death, but rather the effect of sin on the sinner's relation to the Redeemer, or the nature of the disturbance of this relation, as evidenced by sin.

* [I coin this word, which signifies "that which may be heard or granted," for want of a better term.—M.]

The sin which indicates a permanent falling away from Christ, is sin unto death. The Romish distinction of peccatum mortale and peccatum veniale and the restriction of the former to seven, is wrong; for there is always the danger that the sin assumed to be peccatum veniale, and received in excuse of it, may turn into peccatum mortale, and that that which from a lower standpoint appears as peccatum veniale, is afterwards in its further progress peccatum mortale.

4. Intercession for those who sin unto death is improper, because such intercession is inexecutable, because such sin cannot be forgiven. Cf. Riehm, Lehrbegriff des Hebräerbriefs, II., pp. 768-776. The words ἀδυνατον—πάλιν ἀνακαλῖψεν εἰς μετάνοιαν (Heb. vi. 4-6), as well as οὐκ ἀποθῆσεται αὐτῷ ὅτι ἐν τοῖσι τῷ αἵματι ὅτι ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι (Matth. xii. 82) distinctly indicate the reason why the Apostle neither requires, nor advises us to make intercession for those sinning unto death. Cf. Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, II., p. 840, sqq. Intercession for suicides must, at all events, be judged from this stand-point.—[Jeremy Taylor: "Every Christian is in some degree in the state of grace, so long as he is invited to repentance, and so long as he is capable of the prayers of the Church. This we learn from those words of St. John: 'All unrighteousness is sin, and there is a sin not unto death,' that is, some sorts of sin are so incident to the condition of men, and their state of imperfection, that the man who hath committed them is still within the method of pardon, and hath not forfeited his title to the promises and covenant of repentance; but 'there is a sin unto death'; that is, some men proceed beyond the measures and economy of the Gospel, and the usual methods and probabilities of repentance, by obstinacy, and preserving a sin, by a wilful, spiteful resisting, or despising the offers of grace and the means of pardon; for such a man St. John does not encourage us to pray; if he be such a person as St. John described, our prayers will do him no good; but because no man can tell the last minute or period of pardon, nor just when a man is gone beyond the limit, and because the limit itself can be enlarged, and God's mercies stay for some longer than for others, therefore St. John left us under the indefinite restraint and caution; which was derogatory enough to represent that sad state of things in which the refractory and impenitent have immersed themselves, and yet so indefinite and cautious, that we may not be too forward in applying it to particulars, nor in prescribing measures to the Divine mercy, nor in passing final sentences upon our brother, before we have heard our Judge Himself speak. 'Sinning a sin not unto death,' is an expression fully signifying that there are some sins which though they be committed and displeased God, and must be repented of, and need many and mighty prayers for their pardon, yet the man is in the state of grace and pardon, that is, he is within the covenant of mercy; he may be admitted, if he will return to his duty: so that being in a state of grace is having a title to God's loving-kindness, a not being rejected of God, but a being beloved of Him to certain purposes of mercy, and that hath these measures and degrees."—M.]

5. The regenerate, as such, according to the spirit, does not sin, though the flesh ever and anon causes him to fall.

6. The sins of the regenerate are not unto death, because forgiveness and atonement are sought and found in Christ.

7. None but believing Christians, born of God, are not subject to the world-power of Satan; those who are subject to it, are least sensible of it; the Christian, who has become free, perceives and feels it in its hostility to him and his resistance to it.

8. Vital piety finds rest only in God, from whom it comes.

9. Although the absolute and immovably fixed assurance (certitudo) of salvation, such as the Methodists and Baptists suppose to possess, is neither possible nor biblically established, yet we may attain unto a sure confidence (fidelicia), and maintain it in opposition to the Romish decrees, which not only reject the impossibility of final apostasy, but also deny this confidence of the Christian (Conc. Trid. Sess. vi. 9, 15, sq.).

10. The Reformed are fully justified in their rejection of altars, images and similar instrumenta superstitionum with respect to the abuses of the Roman Catholics, and even down to the present time with their extreme Mariolatry, but they err in confounding the abuse of the several objects with the objects themselves and in changing the one into the other, in lodging complaints against the natural sphere of art instead of pressing it into the higher service [of religion—]. The liberty of the Lutheran Church cannot be over-estimated.—Images of God will always remain hazardous, not only in the Zwinglian or Puritan sense.—

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Care for thy friends, that they may be and remain assured of the possession of eternal life, despite the temptations and troubles on earth.—Thou hast confidence in the purity of mind of some loved man, how much more shouldst thou confide in the true God?—If distrust is disgraceful and fraught with much unhappiness in our intercourse with men, how much more disgraceful and productive of unhappiness is distrust of the glorious God?—Seeing the light of the world in regeneration is no warrant that this Sun will always smile in His brightest light, unclouded and without stormy days, on the firmament of the soul; but we know, without the gift of prophecy, as the children of God, as Christians, that it is day.—Pray for everything, but be urgent unto intercession for thy erring brother. Prefer to speak of an erring brother to God than to other men.—Dismal is the high-mindedness which fancies that it can never fail with God, but equally dismal is the pusillanimity, which afraid that all is to no purpose, conducts to despair.—As a Christian be not a minor, but volunteer also to act as guardian.—Sin violates not only the Divine command before us, and the Majesty of God above us, but also the Image of God in us!—Every sin may become a sin unto death, as long as it remains unforgiven.—Every sin checks and disturbs the eternal life in thee; the greatest danger, however, is not the commission of, but consenting unto sin, and this is the more dangerous, as your sensibility has become more acute and your will more resolute under the growth of sanctification.—Beware of genius-worship!

LUTHER:—Thou must learn to cry and not sit down by thyself, or lie on a bench, with drooping head, or shaking it, and lacerate or consume thyself with thy anxious thoughts, caring and fretting how to get free, and regarding nothing except thy own misery and ill-fortune, and wretchedness. But come, idler that thou art, fall down on thy knees, lift up thy hands and eyes to heaven, sing a psalm or say the Lord's prayer, and lay thy trouble before God, and with streaming eyes pour forth thy supplications and make known thy wants.—Prayer, the opening of our grief, the lifting up of our hands, are the sacrifices which are most acceptable to God.—He Himself desires thee to acquaint Him with thy distress, instead of burdening and oppressing, of torturing and lacerating thyself with it, and thus multiplying one calamity into ten or a hundred. He wants thee to be too weak to carry and overcome such a load, that thou mayest learn to grow strong in Him, and that He may be glorified in thee through His strength. Behold the opposite course makes people who are called Christians, but nothing else than vain babblers and praters, who see much of faith and the Spirit, but know not what it is, or what they see.

STARK:—Holy Scripture is our Epistle of God to us, in which He reveals to us His gracious will, as it were, in His own handwriting, and His purpose to give us eternal life.—Faith is never too strong, it may and must grow stronger. Where is confidence of faith, there is joyfulness. The more faith gets filled with the riches of God, the more jubilant is its rejoicing in the abundance of its satisfaction: it is heaven on earth!—The prayer of the lip must be joined to the desire of the heart.—Wouldst thou pray so that thy prayers shall be heard, thou must be full of faith, holy, and a child of God, otherwise thou art abominable.—Prayer is not only a Christian duty, but a glorious benefit. Simplicity is not ignorance. The former befits the Christian, but not the latter. Christians must know. Ignorant Christians are unchristian.—Learned but ungodly men are unlearned; the regenerate are truly learned, as those who through the knowledge of Christ have been made apt for the kingdom of heaven and eternal salvation.—Subtle idolatry is not better than gross idolatry.

BENGL:—The lamentable state of the world is most aptly described in the brief summary: "The whole world lieth in the wicked one," and the world itself, the doings and workings of the children of the world, their sayings, their dealings, their society, etc., are the best exposition of this passage. It is not so much matter of surprise that they are so wicked, as that they are not more wicked.—

HEUBNER:—A sin is not excusable, because it is not yet a sin unto death. A pardonable sin may become a sin unto death; therefore we should abhor every sin.—The wicked one will not touch him: 1. The power of Satan is not irresistible; 2. The Christian, while he continues in a state of regeneration, is proof against all the assaults of Satan.—Fine threads are often more dangerous than coarse chains.—Faith in the Son of God. I. A holy, blissful, assured faith:—a. as to its substance: in the Image of God, in the Saviour of love; b. as to its ground: in the testimony of God; c. as to its effects: eternal life. II. It is a faith possible unto all: a. provided they diligently read and lay to heart what is written, in order to attain unto faith; b. provided they pray God with child-like trust, to give unto them the true faith.—

BESSER:—A singular saying! They believe, and he writes that they may believe. What need is there of an exhortation to believe, if we believe already? (Luther). It is not possible to have to-day's life through yesterday's faith. Here no stand-still is allowed; he that believes, let him go on believing.—After every prayer of a child of God, the Father hears the expressed or unexpressed petition: Thy will be done.—I have read of a pious Christian who was in the habit of keeping a record of his daily prayers and intercessions that he invariably concluded his daily record with the passage 1 Jno. v. 15.—Sin is to the children of God like a robber, against whom they defend themselves all their life long. As a sentry stands before a king's palace, so there stands a sentry with shield and sword before the habitation of God in the heart of His children.—The Epistle of St. John itself is such a preservative.

[ESKRIEL HOPKINS:]—God's will, in bestowing a desired mercy upon us, is best known by the promises that He hath made to us. Which promises are of two kinds: some refer to temporal blessings, and others refer to grace and glory.

1. Grace and glory are promised absolutely. It is that, which we are commanded, all of us, to seek after: and, therefore, here we cannot mistake, while we beg these; for there is no doubt while we pray for grace and glory, but that we do it according to the will of God. Here, we may be earnest and importunate, that God would sanctify and save our souls: and, while we ask this, and make this the matter of our requests, we are under an impossibility of asking amiss; yea, and the more violent we are, and the more resolute to take no denial at the hands of God, the more pleasing is this holy force, since it shows a perfect conformity and concurrence in our wills to His will, who hath told us, It is His will, "even," our "sanctification:" 1 Thess. iv. 3. This was one part of that violence which our Saviour saith the kingdom of heaven suffered in the days of John the Baptist. It is an invasion that is acceptable to God, when we storm heaven by prayers and supplications, with strong cries and tears: when we plant against it unutterable sighs and groans, this is such a battery, that those eternal ramparts cannot hold out long against it.

2. Though we may pray thus absolutely and with a holy boldness, for grace and glory, saying to God as Jacob to the angel that wrestled with him, I will not let thee go, until thou hast blessed me with spiritual blessings, in heavenly things, in Jesus Christ: yet, secondly, for the degrees of grace and for the comforts of the Holy Ghost, we must pray conditionally: if the Lord will. For:

these things are not absolutely necessary, neither are they absolutely promised to us by God. Neither any degree of grace, nor any consolation of the Spirit is absolutely promised to us. But, however, our prayers ought to be so much the more fervent and importunate for these things, than for outward, temporal things; by how much more these are of far greater concern than the other.

8. To pray for outward and worldly blessings is not contrary to the will of God, for He hath promised to bestow them.—But then, as His promise is conditional, if it is consistent with our good: so, truly, must our prayers be conditional, that God would give them to us, if it is consistent with His will and with our good. Whatsoever we thus ask, we do it according to the will of God; and we are sure of speeding in our request, either by obtaining our desires, or by being blessed with a denial. For, alas, we are blind and ignorant creatures, and cannot look into the designs and drift of Providence, and see how God hath laid in order good and evil in His own purpose: oftentimes, we mistake evil for good, because of the present appearance of good that it hath; yea, so short-sighted are we, that we can look no farther than outward and present appearance. But God, who sees the whole series and connection of his own counsels, knows, many times, that those things, which we account and desire as good, are really evil: and therefore it is our wisdom, to resign all our desires to His disposal, and to say, “Lord, though such temporal enjoyments may seem good and desirable to me at present, yet Thou art infinitely wise, and Thou knowest what the consequence and issue of them will be: I beg them, if they may stand with Thy will; and if Thou seest they will be as really good to me, as I suppose them now to be. If they be not so, I beg the favour of a denial.” This is the right frame, in which a Christian’s heart should be when he comes to beg temporal mercies of God; and, whilst he thus asks any worldly comforts, he cannot ask amiss. It was an excellent saying of the Satirist, “We ask those things of God which please our present humors and desires: but God gives those things which are best and fittest for us: for we are dearer to Him,” saith the heathen, “than we are to ourselves.” “And,” says another, very well, “It is mercy in God, not to hear us, when we ask things that are evil:” and when He refuseth us in such requests, it is that He might not circumvent us in our own prayers; for, indeed, whilst we ask rashly and intemperately, whatever we foolishly set our hearts upon, God need take no other course to plague and punish us, than by hearing and answering us.”—M.]

[BY HALL: v. 16:—“If any man see his brother fall into and continue in such a sin as may be capable of forgiveness, let him earnestly sue unto God for pardon of that offender: and God, who is great and infinite in mercy, shall graciously incline His ear unto his prayers, and give remission and life to such an one. There is indeed a sin unto death, for which there is no forgiveness with God, because there is no capacity of repentance for it in the committer of it; I mean the Sin against the Holy Ghost; when a man having received the knowledge of the Gospel by the illumination of the Holy Spirit, and professed the belief thereof, shall in a devilish malice wilfully blaspheme and persecute that known truth.”—M.]

[JOBTIN:—“What makes sin exceedingly sinful and most provoking, is a determined insolence and an obstinate impenitency, a guilt without remorse, and without relenting, without shame and without fear. This is what appears most odious and offensive in the sight of God, as also in the sight of man; and to this incorrigible temper, and abandoned behaviour, indignation and wrath are denounced by Him, who will by no means acquit those that are guilty in this way. “There is a sin unto death,” saith St. John, “and there is a sin not unto death.” The sin unto death, of which the Apostle speaks, was in some manner peculiar to those times. It was an apostasy from Christianity, and these apostates were persons who had seen the miraculous proofs of its truth, and had themselves been partakers of some extraordinary gifts. When such persons renounced Christ, and fell away from the Church, it was plain that nothing more could be done to amend and reclaim them. And even now it is possible, that sinners may offend so long and so heinously as at last to provoke God, either to take them out of the world by a secret judgment, and so it is a sin unto temporal death; or to give them up to their own hard hearts, and so it becomes a sin unto spiritual death. But let an observation be added, which may be necessary to quiet melancholy and desponding minds; and it is this: If any one be afraid that he is in such a condition, this very fear shows that in all probability he is not in such a condition; because it is usual for such sinners to have no consideration, no shame, no remorse, and no fear at all.”—M.]

[ELMER HOPKINS:—“Beware therefore, then, that you do not entertain any slight thought of sin: nor think, with the Papists, that there are some sorts of sins, that do not deserve death; which they call venial sins, in opposition to other more gross and heinous sins, which they allow to be mortal. Believe it, the least prick at the heart is deadly; and so is the least sin to the soul. And, indeed, it is a contradiction, to call any sin venial in their sense, who hold it is not worthy of damnation, for the wages of sin is death; if it be not, how is it venial?”—M.]

[RIGGS: on v. 21:—“Those who were called to the light of God, readily knew that an idol is nothing in the world, and that idolatry and idol-worship are abominable. But there were at that time temptations which did not render superfluous this concluding admonition. They might be invited to idol-sacrifices and thus be drawn into a sort of communion with idols, Rev. ii. 20; 2 Cor. vi. 16. Sometimes, in order to escape bitter persecution, Christians might venture to go too far. Yea, notwithstanding idols have at this present time sunk into still greater contempt, there yet arises always something which injuriously affects the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, or the worship of God in spirit and in truth, which tries to find out some other way to God than by Christ, and to seek acceptance with God in another service than in His Son. It becomes therefore every one who is of the truth to sigh, O God, keep me in the mind, which Thou hast given me of Thy Son, and in which thou hast strengthened me by this testimony of St. John! Amen."—M].

THE

---

§ 1. CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLES.

1. THE Second Epistle, after the Address and Salutation (vv. 1-3), expresses the Apostle's joy on finding the children of the κνρία walk in the truth of the Gospel (v. 4), a monition of the commandment of brotherly love (vv. 5, 6), not without a solemn warning against the doctrine of the false teachers, who confess not the coming of Jesus Christ in the flesh (vv. 7-9), and against fellowship with them (vv. 10, 11). Disinclined to write, and in the hope of early oral intercourse, the Epistle concludes with greetings of the sister's children (vv. 12, 13).

2. The Third Epistle, addressed to Caius (v. 1), after a salutation, importing his wish for the prosperity of Caius, expresses the Apostle's joy over his walking in the truth (vv. 2-4), commends his hospitality to missionary brethren (vv. 5-8), deploras the opposition they have to encounter at the hands of the ambitious Diotrephes, notwithstanding his Epistle of commendation, and the readiness of the Church to comply therewith, with an intimation of his intention to take a personal stand against him (vv. 9, 10), warns against his example and commends Demetrius, the probable bearer of the Epistle (vv. 11, 12). Disinclined to write, and in the hope of a speedy meeting, the Epistle concludes with greetings from the Apostle and friends to friends (vv. 13-15).

§ 2. CHARACTER OF THE EPISTLES.

1. These two brief Epistles, besides which reference is made to a similar Epistle, which has been lost (3 Jno. 9), are two instructive monuments of the Apostle's mode of dealing with individuals. Ewald justly observes that these Epistles lack the rich flow and fusion of language found in a similar Epistle addressed by Paul to Philemon, but unmistakably evince a loftier assurance, and with all their gentleness and affability, a brevity and earnestness which point to an Apostle little disposed to write much, and greatly preferring oral dealings and instruction.

2. While the Second Epistle exhibits in forcible energy the most lively joy in his converts' walking in the truth coupled with the most tender solicitude for them with respect to the false teachers, and warns them in the most decided terms against intimate intercourse with them, the Third Epistle exhibits the same joy, coupled with a reference to the aiding sympathy with missionary brethren as the inviolable duty of individuals and the Church, and censures, threatens and entreats with great power.

3. The two Epistles exhibit a remarkable similarity. The beginning of 2 Jno. 1 is precisely like that of 3 Jno. 1 (ὁ πρεσβύτερος—ἀγαπῶ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ); 2 Jno. 4 and 3 John 3 (ἐχάρην λίαν); particularly the conclusion 2 Jno. 12 (πολλὰ ἔχων—οὐκ ἐβουλήθη διὰ χάριτος καὶ μέλανος—ἀλλὰ ἐπέμψεν—στόμα πρὸς στόμα λαλῆσαι), and 3 Jno. 13, 14 (πολλὰ εἶχον—οὐ θέλω διὰ μέλανος καὶ καλῶν—ἐπέμψεν δὲ—στόμα πρὸς στόμα λαλῆσμεν).—These Epistles, which resemble each other like twin sisters (Düsterdieck after Hieronymus, Ep. 85), must have been written by one and the same author. This is the opinion of those who ascribe their authorship to the Apostle St. John, of Ebrard, who ascribes them to the Presbyter John, and of Baur, who regards them as writings of Montanistic origin.

§ 3. OCCASION AND SCOPE OF THE EPISTLES.

1. Although similar in plan and form, they are different as to their objects and tendency.—From his acquaintance with some of the children of the κνρία, who were stanch Christians, the author of the Second Epistle took occasion to express his joy to their mother, who, as Düsterdieck, and probably correctly, supposes, had been known and endeared to him for some time, and to make known to her his paternal sympathy and encouragement, coupled, in particular, with a warning against false teachers and fellowship with them, who might prove especially dangerous to a Christian lady, for the purpose that her joy might be full (v. 12) and remain undisturbed; the announcement of his visit does not seem to belong to the real scope of the Epistle, (Düsterdieck).—The Author of the Third Epistle has been informed by missionary brethren that owing to the ambitious and domineering attitude of Diotrephes, who had also maligned the author of the Epistle for his interest on behalf of said missionaries, these had not been permanently received in the Church, with which Caius was connected, and had been compelled to move on, notwithstanding the hospitality of Caius and several other church-members similarly disposed. On this account the author of the Epistle gives notice of his coming in a short time, with a view to removing such disunion and disorder and to encouraging Caius to fearless care of the brethren.

2. In view of these simple, unequivocal relations, Baur, the head of the Tübingen School, describes the situation in a truly marvellous manner, with shocking arbitrariness. On the ground of the passage from Clement of Alexandria, cited below in § 5, Baur maintains that ἐκλεκτή is the Church, which is holy, and that the Montanists portray the ecclesia or Sponsa Christi vera, pudica, sancta; that the allegorical term Babylonia refers to Rome, as in 1 Peter v. 13; that opinions were divided in respect of Montanism; that one party led by Diotrephes, had denied church-fellowship to the Church with which the author of the Epistle was connected, but that the other party was on terms of amity and union with said Church, that this second Epistle was addressed to the Montanistic party of the Church at Rome; that Diotrephes is not a real name, but a symbolical designation of the Roman bishop, yet not of Victor (193-202), as assumed by Schwegler (Montanism p. 284), because Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria were already acquainted with these Epistles, but perhaps of Anicetus (157-168), Soter or Eleutherus (to 193); that due consideration should be given to the partisan spirit of the author of the Epistle, which made him designate the followers of Diotrephes as heathens (3 Jno. 7); that the Second Epistle was addressed to the Church to which Caius belonged, and that the Epistle, alluded to at 3 Jno. 9, was written to Caius.—Baur bases all this on the notice of Clement of Alexandria that the Second Epistle was written by the Apostle St. John, and Diotrephes (Διοτρεφῆς), one nourished and brought up by Jews, is said to be the symbolical designation of an orthodox bishop at Rome. A Montanist is named as the author of these Epistles, which contain no Montanistic views and are not even referred to by Tertullian, the Montanist!—Hilgenfeld regards the Second Epistle as an excommunicatory writing, designed to be the official expression of an Apostolical sentence of repudiation directed against fellowship with the Gnostic false teachers, and the Third Epistle as an ἐπιστολή συστατική emanating from the Church of John, for the purpose of vindicating the right of that Church to issue such Epistles of commendation, which the Jewish Christians considered to be the prerogative of their venerated James, the author of the Epistle having recognized the utility of such an ordered passport-system during the Gnostic storms and commotions; cf. Huther, p. 253, sqq.

§ 4. READERS OF THE EPISTLES.

On the κνρία see notes on 2 Jno. 1, and on Caius, notes on 3 Jno. 1 in Exegetical and Critical.—Very curious is the view of Ewald, who supposes that the two Epistles were sent to one Church, namely, the Second Epistle addressed to the elect glorious one, to the Church; but because it might be feared that Diotrophes the elder, through whose hands the Epistle had to pass, would prevent its being publicly read at Church, the Third Epistle was on that account addressed to another well-disposed elder, viz., Caius, of the same Church. The poor support which this view derives from 3 Jno. 9 is evident and shown in the Exegesis on that passage. He further alleges that the great stress of the times induced John to omit the name of the Church, which must have been one of considerable importance, because three of its elders, viz., Diotrophes, Caius, Demetrius, are mentioned. Pure conjectures!

§ 5. THE AUTHOR OF THE EPISTLES.

1. History answers the question, 'Who is the author of these Epistles?' in the following particulars: The oldest testimony for these Epistles is that of the Muratorian Canon of the New Testament which was composed until about A. D. 170 (as stated in the Introduction to the first Epistle § 3, 1. p. 4.), and makes mention of the First and Second Epistles. From the excellent essay of Wieseler, referred to there, we have still to supply an observation on the Pauline Epistles to Philemon, Titus and Timothy. In said Canon we read (p. 828): Verum ad Philemonem una, et ad Timotheum due pro affectu et dilectione, in honorem tamen ecclesie catholice, in ordinatione ecclesiastica disciplina sanctificatae sunt.—"The Epistle to Philemon probably followed immediately after the Epistles addressed to Churches, because it was addressed not only to Philemon, but also to Apphia and Archippus and to the Church in Philemon's house (v. 2), and because the Apostolical salutation and benediction had also reference to them (vv. 3, 25). It constituted, therefore, a sort of transition to the Epistles addressed to individuals only, viz., to those to Titus and Timothy. Yet the circumstance, that such a distinction was really drawn in the Christian Church between Epistles addressed to individuals, and Epistles addressed to whole Churches, and that our author deemed it necessary, in the words beginning with pro affectu et dilectione, to justify the grounds on which the Epistles to Titus and Timothy were notwithstanding received into the Ecclesiastical Canon,—has a most important bearing on the history of the Canon." (Wieseler, l. c. p. 839). Hence it can neither be thought singular, nor subject to doubt, that, while the Second Epistle, because of its more instructive character and because the term κνρία was supposed to refer to a Church and not to an individual person, was received along with the First Epistle into the Canon, the Third Epistle, addressed to an unknown personage and without the intrinsic weight of the Pauline Pastoral Epistles, was not received into the Canon; but this of course does not deny its Johannean origin, still this is the way how it came to be reckoned among the Antilegomena. The additional clause: "ut sapientia ab amicis Salomonis in honorem ipsius scripta," does not belong to the words preceding them which refer to the Epistle of John, but to those following: "apocalypsis etiam Johannis." The latter, therefore, is said to have been composed by the friend of John, not by himself, but this is not asserted concerning the Epistles, as many, because of the false connection with the words preceding said clause, would like to maintain (Wieseler, l. c. p. 846 sq.). Hence Düsterdieck's use of the Muratorian Canon (II. p. 464 sq.), and also Huther's (p. 248 sq.), require to be rectified in this respect.—Clement of Alexandria, the successor of Pantænus A. D. 190–220: "Secunda Johannis epistola, quæ ad virgines scripta est, simplicissima est; scripta vero est ad quandam Babyloniam Electam nomine, significat autem electionem ecclesie sanctæ." (Opp. ed. Potter p. 1011). Origen, who says in his eighth homily on Joshua: "addit et Joannes tuba canere per EPISTOLAS suas," knew several Epistles; but he says according to Euseb. Hist. Eccl. VI. 25: οὐ πάντες φασι γνησίους εἶναι ταύτας.—Dionysius of Alexander, the disciple and successor of Origen A. D. 233, from A. D. 248 bishop, for the purpose of illustrating the Johannean diction makes use also of the Second and Third Epistles, takes accordingly no offence in the appellation: ὁ πρεσβύτερος, and calling the Second and Third Epistles πεποιητὴν Ἰωάννου, designated them as generally received as Johannean, by tradition.—Irenæus, the disciple of Polycarp and Papias, † A. D. 202, cites 2 Jno. 7 mistakenly, as Guericke says (p. 478), owing to an error of memory, as forming part of the First Epistle (adv. Hær. III. 16. 8), but still as from the Epistles of John; he cites, however, correctly 2 Jno. 11 (adv. Hær. I. 163), as from the Epistle of John (Ἰωάννης δὲ, ὁ τοῦ Κυρίου μαθητής.)—It is of course natural, that these two private Epistles were not translated in the earliest age of the Church, and consequently not inserted in the Peschito, which contains only three Catholic Epistles (James, 1 Peter, 1 John), although Ephrem the Syrian knew both Epistles,—and that citations from them are more rare occurrences, so that Tertullian and Cyprian do not make mention of them. Although Cyprian did not cite them in his own writings, he still says in relating (De Hær. bapt.) the opinions of the various bishops in the council of Carthage: "Aurelius a Chullabi dixit: Joannes Apostolus in epistola sua posuit dicens, si quis ad vos venit," etc. 2 Jno. 10; [thus clearly showing that this Epistle was received as Apostolical and Canonical in the North African Church.—M.]. On that account Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. III. 25) reckons the two Epistles among the antilegomena of the first class [still Eusebius's own opinion may be gathered from his Demonstratio Evangelica, III. 5, where he says of St. John ἐν μὲν ταῖς ἐπιστολαῖς αὐτοῦ οὐδὲ μῆνιν τῆς οἰκίας προσγορίας ποιεῖται, ἢ πρεσβύτερον ἑαυτὸν ὀνομάζει, οὐδαμοῦ δὲ ἀποστόλον οὐδὲ εὐαγγελιστὴν, whence it would appear that he received the two smaller Epistles as genuine." Alford.—M.]. Jerome (de vir. illustr. c. 9): "Scriptum autem Johannes et unam epistolam—quam ab universis ecclesiasticis et eruditis Viris probatur: reliquæ autem duæ quarum principium SENIOR Johannis Presbyteri asseruntur." But he calls (cap. 18) this view "opinio, quam a plerisque retulimus traditam," and Oecumenius and Bede decidedly reject this view.—The Epistles, after having been regarded without any doubt as Johannean in the Middle Ages, were first referred to the authorship of John the Presbyter by Erasmus, who was followed by Grotius, J. D. Beck (observ. crit. exeget. specim. I.), Fritzsche (Observations on the Epistles of John in Henke's Museum, vol. 3, 1), Ammon (Life of Jesus I. p. 45 sq.), and especially Ebrard. Almost all the modern commentators (Lücke, de Wette, Brückner, Düsterdieck, Huther) receive them as Johannean Epistles. The Tübingen school disputes their Apostolical origin and considers them, according to the opinion of its leader, as writings of Montanistic origin; but Hilgenfeld, at least, makes them originate in the subapostolic age (cf. § 3).

2. The result of the examination of the most ancient documents respecting the author of these two Epistles, which requires us to regard them as the writings of the Apostle St. John, is confirmed by the writings themselves.—The first point to be considered here is the term ὁ πρεσβύτερος. Here the author observes an incognito to all persons except those to whom he wrote, and who knew, of course, who this presbyter was. It surely was not his intention to write anonymously, because he addresses private individuals in clear and definite terms, and apprizes them of his coming to see them. The expression in question describes a superior position in general terms and in language reflecting a friendly and affectionate disposition. This is precisely St. John's manner both in the First Epistle and in the Gospel; he thus describes himself, that only those whom it concerns, may recognize him. Bede and Oecumenius leave it undecided whether the Apostle called himself ὁ πρεσβύτερος on account of his age or on account of his office; had he used said appellation on account of his advanced years, he ought to have put either ὁ πρεσβύτερος, or ὁ γέρον. Hence Piscator, Er., Schmidt, Wolf, Carpzov, Sander and al., [who take this view—M.], are mistaken. The official sense of that appellation is advocated by N. de Lyra, Bartholomæus Petrus (= Episcopus, totius Asia primus), a Lapide, Beza, Lücke, Huther, Düsterdieck and others. Cf. 1 Pet. v. 1: συμπρεσβύτερος, and Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. III., 39, where the Apostles are called πρεσβύτεροι. John might have called himself ἀπόστολος, ἐπίσκοπος; but he prefers thus to moderate his privileged position. Ewald assumes that it was also on account of the stress of the times that he omitted to give his own name, as well as that of the Church to which he sent the second Epistle (see above in § 4). Düsterdieck combines the official reference of this appellation with a reference to age, the then advanced years of the Apostle presupposing the years during which he had held converse with the Lord Himself; so also Aretius, Guericke, (Gesamtgeschichte des Neuen Testaments, 1854, p. 485, sq.), Benson and others. But seeing that there did exist, according to the testimony of Papias in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. III., 39, a person different from the Apostle, called John the Presbyter, who was called ὁ μαθητὴς τοῦ κυρίου, it has been thought, especially on the above-cited testimony of Irenæus, that this latter was the author of these Epistles. This opinion is strenuously advocated by Ebrard. But in that case the name ought not to be wanting, as Lücke, Düsterdieck and Huther, rightly and emphatically contend; for it cannot be proved that said personage bore that name κατ' ἔξοχον, especially since the diction of the Epistles clearly points to the Apostle.—The second point relates to the impress of Johannean diction and thought left on our Epistles. Compare only the following expressions: 2 Jno. 1: ἐγνωότες τὴν ἀλήθειαν, v. 2: μένειν ἐν, v. 3: ἐν ἀληθείᾳ καὶ ἀγάπῃ, v. 4: περιπατεῖν ἐν, v. 5: ἐντολὴν—καὶνὴν, ἣν εἶχομεν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς (1 Jno. ii. 7), v. 6: σὺν—ἵνα (1 Jno. iii. 11, 23; v. 8), καθὼς ἠκούσατε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, v. 7: πλάνοι ἐξῆλθον (1 Jno. ii. 18, sq.), οἱ μὴ ὁμολογοῦντες Ἰησοῦν χριστὸν ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί (1 Jno. iv. 1, 2), ὁ ἀντίχριστος, v. 9: μένων ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ, θεὸν οὐκ ἔχει (1 Jno. ii. 28), καὶ τὸν υἱὸν καὶ τὸν πατέρα ἔχει, v. 12: ἵνα ἡ χαρὰ ἡμῶν ᾗ πεπληρωμένη (1 Jno. i. 4), 3 Jno. 1: ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, vv. 3, 4, ἐν ἀληθείᾳ περιπατεῖς, v. 11: ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστίν, οὐχ ἑώρακεν τὸν θεόν (1 Jno. iii. 6, 10; iv. 8). The connection of thesis and antithesis, without simple antithesis, leading to a progression in the thought, occurs at 2 Jno. 9; 3 Jno. 11. How freely is carried out the theme of 2 Jno. 3: ἐν ἀληθείᾳ καὶ ἀγάπῃ, and then vv. 4–11. Do we not identify the independent position of the author by the ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί (2 Jno. 7), as compared with the Perfect (1 Jno. iv. 2), and the Aorist (1 Jno. v. 6), and his free, easy handling of his subject. This independence is recognizable in the salutation, perfectly analogous to that in the pastoral Epistles of Paul, by the ἔσται μετ' ὑμῶν being placed first, and then by the παρὰ following, instead of which Paul uses ἀπὸ (see note on the passage), and the omission of ἡμῶν, supplied by Paul. On this, as well as on the severity, alleged to be bordering on lovelessness in 2 Jno. 10, compare the notes below, in Exegetical and Critical.—After what has been said, we can neither refer, with de Wette, to εἰ τις (2 Jno. 10) instead of ἐάν τις, διδαχὴν φέρειν (ibid.), περιπατεῖν κατὰ (v. 6), κοινωνεῖν (v. 11), μειζότερος (3 Jno. 4), τὸ κακόν, τὸ ἀγαθόν, as proofs against the Johannean origin of the Epistle, nor characterize, with the same intent, with Fritzsche, as Pauline the following expressions: ἐγχαίρειν, εὐδοχεῖσθαι (3 Jno. 2), προσέμκειν ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ (v. 6), φιλοκροτεῖν (v. 9), φθαρεῖν (v. 10), especially since the expressions used in 3 Jno. 6, 9, 10, are not found either in the writings of Paul. It is moreover rather hazardous to prove such things from single and isolated words, especially here, since the matters introduced in the Third Epistle are altogether specific, and do not bear the faintest resemblance to the circumstances, relations and subjects discussed in the First Epistle; such a disparity, of course, involves the use of different expressions. Ebrard's attempt also, to prove that the Third Epistle, as being most unlike the First, and the Second Epistle nearly related to the Third, were not written by the Apostle St. John, but by John the Presbyter, is a failure. He discovers in the passages used, allusions, intentional reminiscences, and actually citations, and acknowledges the Author's independence neither in the passages given above, nor "in the striking circumstance" that he uses at 2 Jno. 10, εἰ τις instead of ἐάν τις, and that "at 3 Jno. 11 he reproduces Johannean forms of thought, in wholly unjohannean language." Even Ebrard is compelled to admit the similarity of the Second Epistle to the First, both as to the identity of the doctrine taught, and the form of its expression.—Under these circumstances it seems impossible to deny the Apostolic and Johannean origin of these Epistles. They were both written by one and the same author, by an independent man, and the Second Epistle necessitates us to go back to the author of the First, while there is at least nothing in the Third to prevent such a mode of procedure.

§ 6. DATE OF THE EPISTLES.

One thing is clear: the two Epistles were written at about the same time. It cannot be inferred from the affinity of the Second Epistle with the First, that the former was composed after the latter, as Ebrard alleges, since only the identity of the Authors is established, but not the use of the First in the Second. Nor can any inferences be drawn from the First Epistle not being mentioned (S. G. Lange), from the more vigorous spirit of the Second Epistle (Eichhorn), from the youthful fire in the rigoristic saying at 2 Jno. 10, 11. (Knauer).—But they were probably written about the same time as the First, since the circumstances of the times are probably identical in all three Epistles.

§ 7. PLACE WHERE THEY WERE WRITTEN.

Probability points to Ephesus, as the place where they were written, before a tour of visitation (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., III., 23; Lücke, Huther, Düsterdieck).

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF JOHN THE APOSTLE.

(Ἰωάννου β. B. Cod. Sin. Several codices add ἐπιστολή, and others ἐπιστολή καθολική. Several have after Ἰωάννου: τοῦ ἐπὶ στηθοῦς, G: τοῦ ἁγίου ἀποστόλου—τοῦ θεολόγου).

I. THE ADDRESS (vv. 1-8).

The elder unto the elect lady and her children, whom I love in the truth;<sup>1</sup> and<sup>2</sup> not I only, but also all they that have known the truth; for the truth's sake, which dwelleth in us,<sup>3</sup> and shall be with us for ever. Grace be<sup>4</sup> with you,<sup>5</sup> mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from<sup>6</sup> the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, in truth and love.

Verse 1. [<sup>1</sup> German: "Whom I love in truth." So Alford, Lillie.—M.]

<sup>2</sup> B. Cod. Sin.: καὶ οὐκ ἔγὼ δὲ; A: οὐκ ἔγὼ δὲ; G: καὶ οὐκ ἔγὼ δὲ. [The reading of A. may have arisen from a desire to mark the antithesis more strongly.—M.]

Verse 2. <sup>3</sup> μὲνευσα is the reading of B. Sin. and most and the best codd. A. reads ἐνεκενέσται, but is evidently an interpretation. [German: "which abideth in us."—M.]

Verse 3. [<sup>4</sup> German: "There shall be with you."—M.]

read ἰσχυρὰ which is also occasioned by v. 2.

<sup>6</sup> G. K. Sin. insert before Ἰησοῦ the word κυρίου; this addition, as well as the exchange of the preposition παρὰ for ἀπὸ are probably transcribed from the beginnings of the Pauline Epistles.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The address proper. V. 1. The elder, ὁ πρεσβύτερος; the definite Article notes a person, the word without the Article would give prominence to his official position. That John the Apostle is meant we have endeavoured to prove in the Introduction § 5. Thus Peter also calls himself, in an exhortation addressed to presbyters, συμπρεσβύτερος. (1 Pet. v. 1).

To the elect lady, ἐκλεκτὴ κυρία; these words have been very differently explained. Grammatically they present a perfect analogy to 1
Pet. i. 1: ἐκλεκτοῖς παρεπιδήμοις, to elect strangers; κυρία therefore cannot well be taken as a proper name, which would require as at v. 13, and 3 Jno. 1: Γαίῳ τῷ ἀγαπητῷ, —κυρία τῇ ἐκλεκτῇ Cf. Phil. i. 2. Rom. xvi. 5, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13 etc.
To what purpose is it that κυρία was a female proper name, as may be seen in Gruteri inscript.
p. 1127. N. xi., and that this was maintained by Athanasius, and later by Benson, Heumann, Bengel, Krigele (de κυρία Joannis, Lips. 1758).
S. G. Lange, Carpovius, Paulus, de Wette, Brückner, Lücke, Düsterdieck and others? Düsterdieck and Lücke notice a certain irregularity and inconsequence, which is not explained by but consists in the adjective preceding the noun, as long as κυρία is treated as a nomen proprium.

But the difficulty is even greater in treating ἐκλεκτή as a proper name, as is done by de Lyra, Cappellus, Wetstein, Grotius and al. For the sister, v. 13, is also called ἐκλεκτή.—But how are we to take the elect lady? The context requires us to think of an individual: the ἐγὼ of the writer answers to the σὺ of the person addressed (vv. 1, 4 sq.); she as a mother with her children is mentioned (vv. 3, 6, 8, 10, 12); her sister and her sister's children salute her (v. 13). Epictetus
(cap. 62) observes that: αἱ γυναῖκες εἰσὶν ἀπὸ τεσσαρεσκαίδεκα ἐτῶν ὑπὸ τῶν ἀνδρῶν κυρία καλοῦνται. Huther is wrong in saying that the term κυρία does not answer to the German Frau [=the English Mistress, the word used to address married ladies—M.], but to the German Herrin [=
the English Mistress or lady of the house—M.];
for Frau is the feminine of fro, the Master, (Frohdienst, Frohnveste, Fronleichenam), and Frau = Herrin (see Jütting, Biblisches Wörterbuch 1864,
s. v. Frauenszimmer p. 61 and s. v. Frohsvogt p.
65); nor need that author designate κυρία only as a polite form of address, nor Düsterdieck pronounce it a title only suited to worldly politeness.
It may just as well be taken as the standing designation of an esteemed woman, and it is neither unworthy of a Christian, nor of an Apostle to call a church-member, according to a prevailing usage, "Frau" (lady or mistress) = κυρία, so Luther, Piscator, Beza, Heidegger, Rittmeier, de electa domina, Helmat. 1706), Wolf, Baumgarten-Crusius, Sander and al.; a Lapide reports her to have been called Drusia or Drusiana. Carpsovius supposes that Martha, the sister of Lazarus, is the person addressed; Knauer (Studien und Kritiken, 1838, pp. 452-458), suggests Mary, the mother of the Lord—but all these views are wholly untenable. It is true, that unfortunately the name of the person addressed is not given in the address, so that one might almost feel inclined to take κυρία as a proper name. But the name of the person addressed might be wanting just as well as that of the writer; the messenger may and probably did make up for such omission.—But the circumstance that this “note” (Handbillet-Augusti) found its way among the Catholic Epistles, should not occasion any difficulty. Just as well as the third Epistle to Caius; it is no more unworthy of the Canon than St. Paul’s Epistle to Philemon; the individual, also a woman, is worthy of due regard and consideration; I confine myself to making mention of Priscilla (Acts xviii. 2, sq.; 26, sq.; Rom. xvi. 3, sq.).—It is far more hazardous to understand κυρία to signify the Christian Church in general, or some particular congregation; the former is recommended by Jerome, the latter by the Scholiast I.; they are followed by Calov, Hofmann (Weissagung und Erfüllung II., p. 321; Schriftbeweis, I., p. 226, sq.), Hilgenfeld, Huther and al. Serrarius guessed Corinth, Whiston argued for Philadelphia, Whitby for Jerusalem, the mother of all Churches, and Augusti for Jerusalem, because founded by the Lord Himself, though such a “note” would certainly be less suited to a Church than to an individual church-member. Hammond has the curious notion that κυρία is=curia, ecclesia, and Michælis, that it designates the Church assembled on the Lord’s day. But wholly unfounded, and devoid of all possibility of proof is the hypothesis of Besser and al., that κυρία is the ἐκκλησία to which 3 Jno. 9, was written, and that the 2d Epistle of John is the one there referred to. Hofmann adverts to the Church being called νύμφη and γυνή in the Apocalypse, to συνεκλήτῃ (1 Pet. v. 18). Huther also rightly observes in opposition to Ebrard, that the Church, which in respect of Christ is an obedient handmaid, may be considered both in her subordinate relation to Christ and in her superior relation to individual members, and as such be described as κυρία by the side of κύριος; but that v. 12 requires us to understand a single congregation and not “all orthodox Christendom” (Hilgenfeld), and that our Epistle is not an Encyclical. But in that case the address ought to have given the name of that congregation. Nor would ἐκκλητή exactly suit κυρία=ἐκκλησία; for ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλήτῃ is somewhat different, and, in juxtaposition with and as distinguished from ὁ Μάρκος, can hardly designate the Church in that place (see Fronmüller on 1 Pet. v. 18, in this Commentary). The relation indicated at Gal. iv. 26: ἡτις ἐστὶν μήτηρ ἡμῶν, can hardly have been applied here to a single congregation, so that it might be called κυρία. After all that has been said, the choice lies between κυρία as a nomen proprium, or κυρία=lady. [Among recent English commentators, Alford takes the former view, while Wordsworth elaborates the interpretation, according to which κυρία is a Church.—M.]

שְׁלֵמָה and שְׁלֵמִית, and to ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι

And her children (τοῖς τέκνοις) should be taken literally; a family is always an important circle of men! But if κυρία is construed as a Church, the children designate Church-members.

Further particulars. vv. 1, 2.

Whom I love in truth.—Ὅδς after τέκνα imports sons, but does not exclude daughters, the κυρία had sons and daughters, but more sons than daughters; hence it would have been improper to say τοῖς υἱοῖς, as Huther maintains, who, if κυρία designates a Church, refers to Gal. iv. 9 (τεκνία μου—ὁδς), Matth. xxviii. 19 (τὰ τέκνα—αὐτοῖς), passages which fully justify the given explanation, and prove that τέκνα need not be sons only (de Wette and al.); nor does ὁδς refer to κυρία and her children (Beza, Bengel, Sander [al.]). Ewald emphatically asserts the Apostle’s personal relations to that family-congregation; that which makes that family-congregation the object of the Apostle’s love and of that of all believers, implies the reason of this Epistle and its importance. Though ἐν ἀλήθειᾳ along with ἀγαπῶ should be construed adverbially, yet it signifies more than: “in sincerity,” for it denotes also Christian love. Bengel: “Amor non modo verus amor, sed veritate evangelica nititur.” Lücke: “It designates genuine Christian love.” Ebrard: “I love thee with that love which is love in truth,” cf. 1 Jno. iii. 18, 19. The additional clause has respect to objective truth (Düsterdieck, Huther 2d ed.).

And not I only, but also all who have known the truth.—Bengel pointedly observes: “communio sanctorum.” He assumes in his own case, as well as in the ἀγαπῶν ἐν ἀλήθειᾳ, the ἐγκαινέει τὴν ἀλήθειαν. The term πάντες must not be restricted to Ephesus and its environs, the supposed place of writing (Grotius, de Wette and al.), but only to those who were acquainted with the κυρία and her children (Lücke), yet so that those, who afterwards might get acquainted with her, are included. The restriction lies not in the word itself, but in the situation (Ebrard). It is not necessary to think here of only one Church (Huther).—The reason of this love is stated in

VER. 2. For the truth’s sake, which abideth in us.—Ἡμῖν designates the persons loving and beloved, (Huther); it must not be altogether construed in a general sense or applied, as if by implication, to the persons specified in v. 1 (Bede, Düsterdieck and al.). This is also the ground of the definition of ἀγαπῶν ἐν ἀλήθειᾳ and of believers as οἱ ἐγκαινέει τὴν ἀλήθειαν (v. 1), not as Huther maintains, in πλάνῳ (v. 7). The common life-sphere is just ἡ ἀλήθεια, and moreover not only that which is objectively sure, but also that which subjectively is securely kept. In order to note the former point, the Apostle adds:

And shall be with us forever.—The reason why the Participle, instead of being followed by a further participial sentence, is here followed by the Verb. finit., is the writer's intention to give greater prominence to this thought. Winer, p. 600. The Future is not the expression of a wish, as Grotius, Lücke, Ebrard and others suppose, but the confident assertion of certain duration. Hence eis tōn aiōna must not be restricted to the duration of the life of the persons interested (Benson and others). Meθ' hēmōn denotes the objectivity of Divine truth as well as our subjectively developed activity. Cf. Jno. xiv. 16; 1 Jno. ii. 20, 27; especially Matth. xxviii. 20. Hence en and meta must not be taken as substantially equivalent (Winer, p. 480), since en notes the subjective side, and meta also the objective side.

The greeting. v. 8. There shall be with you.—Singular, and proof that we have not to deal here with the imitation of a forger; who would have adhered to usual and current forms of expression, like the addition en alētheia kai agapē, here Future; it is qualified by the preceding words with which it is connected. It is not estote, but votum cum affirmatione (Bengel); the certainty of the expectation excels the wish of the greeting.

Grace, mercy, peace.—1. Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 21 have also χάρις, ἔλεος, εἰρήνη.—Χάρις is free grace, which, without any merit on the part of man, lovingly condescends to men and denotes the thoughts of peace in the paternal heart of God, the mind of Him who is Love (Rom. iii. 24; Eph. ii. 4-10); ἔλεος describes the mercy which energetically lays hold of, and enters into the misery of man (Luke x. 80-87), and denotes the act of love; εἰρήνη is the gift of love, the effect of χάρις and ἔλεος. [Trench, Synonyms of the New Testament, p. 225: "Χάρις has reference to the sins of men, ἔλεος to their misery. God's χάρις, His free grace and gift, is extended to men, as they are guilty, His ἔλεος is extended to them, as they are miserable. The lower creation may be, and is, the object of God's ἔλεος, inasmuch as the burden of man's curse has redounded also upon it (Job. xxxviii. 41; Ps. cxlvii. 9; Jonah iv. 11), but of His χάρις man alone; he only needs, he only is capable of receiving it. In the Divine mind, and in the order of our salvation as conceived therein, the ἔλεος precedes the χάρις. God so loved the world with a pitying love (herein was the ἔλεος) that He gave His only-begotten Son (herein the χάρις) that the world through Him might be saved: cf. Eph. ii. 14; Luke i. 78, 79. But in the order of the manifestation of God's purposes of salvation the grace must go before the mercy, the χάρις must make way for the ἔλεος. It is true, that the same persons are the subjects of both, being at once the guilty and the miserable, yet the righteousness of God, which it is just as necessary should be maintained as His Love, demands that the guilt should be done away, before the misery can be assuaged; only the forgiven can, or indeed may, be made happy; whom He has pardoned, He heals; men are justified before they are sanctified. Thus in each of the Apostolic salutations it is first χάρις and then ἔλεος, which the Apostle desires for the faithful (Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 8; 2 Cor. i. 2; Gal. i. 3; Eph. i. 2; Phil. i. 2, etc.); nor could the order of the words be reversed."—M.]—This might be wanting soonest, since the χάρις of the Almighty, of course, cannot remain idle; see Tit.

i. 4; Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 8; 2 Cor. i. 2; Gal. i. 3; Eph. i. 2; Phil. i. 2; Col. i. 2; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 2. But it is just χάρις which is omitted in Jude 2 (ἔλεος ὑμῶν καὶ εἰρήνη καὶ ἀγάπη πληθυνθείη), since these two, with respect to εἰρήνη, belong together. But the order is established. Bengel observes very well: "GRATIA tollit culpam, MISERICORDIA miseriā, PAX dicit permansione in gratia est misericordia." [Alford: "Εἰρήνη is the whole sum and substance of the possession and enjoyment of God's grace and mercy; cf. Luke ii. 14; Rom. v. 1; x. 15; Jno. xiv. 27; xvi. 33."—M.]

From God the Father, and from Jesus Christ the Son of the Father.—The employment of παρὰ instead of the ἀπὸ commonly used in the Pauline writings, points to the independence of our author; and so does the circumstance that the pronoun ἡμῶν is omitted after πατρός. Thus, in this connection, God is to be taken primarily as the Father of Jesus Christ, especially since the words τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ πατρὸς are annexed, and the Sonship is rendered peculiarly prominent, also since the preposition παρὰ is repeated, as denoting the Divine nature and character of the object desired by the Apostle, whereas ἀπὸ denotes only their procession from God; παρὰ designates them as the gifts of God, ἀπὸ as Divine gifts. Cf. Winer, 882 sq. Note should also be taken here of the independence of the Son by the side of the Father, as importing their equality.

In truth and love.—Also a peculiar addition; it belongs to ἔσται μεθ' ὑμῶν, the preposition en denoting the two life-elements (Huther) of believers, in which the Divine exhibitions of grace, mercy and peace have to be received and enjoyed (Düsterdieck); these words contain also a reference to the contents of the Epistle (Bengel, Ebrard). Hence it is wrong to join en alētheia kai agapē with τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ πατρὸς, as if it were—filio verissimo et dilectissimo (Barth. Petrus), or to explain ut perseveretis vel ut crescatis (a Lapid), or like Grotius: per cognitionem veri et dilectionem mutuum, nam per hæc in nos Dei beneficia provocamus, conservamus, augemus; for en is not per, and our conduct is not the reason of the χάρις, etc. (Huther).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. God is primarily the Father of Jesus Christ, and Christ the Son of God, and it is not until we are in Christ, that he is our Father, and we are His children.

2. By the side of the Personality of the Father the Personality of the Son is a fundamental view.

3. The grace of God is the ground of our peace.

4. Our peace is the end and aim of the Divine grace and mercy.

5. All true love rests upon the truth of revelation.

6. Love with its all-embracing power is co-extensive with truth.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Love is truth, and truth is love!—Truth and love are the fundamental elements of the Christian life. Peace is really nothing but the health of the soul.

STARKE: In Christ there is neither male nor female.—Caution is needed, not to call any man elect, of whose true and firm faith we are not sufficiently convinced.—The abuse of titles should be abolished; but their right use should be preserved; honour to whom honour is due!—What! each and every person are not to be allowed to read the Holy Scriptures? and yet the Holy Spirit caused a special Epistle to be written to a pious matron and her children!—Preachers ought to pasture sheep and lambs, to teach great and small, in various ways, the ways of the Lord.—It is a rare example to meet a whole family of pious people.—A hireling loves the sheep for the sake of their fleece; but a true shepherd only for the truth's sake, because of God and with self-denial.—Truth is beautiful as such; but it is unprofitable, if it is not, and does not remain, in us.—Truth holds out longest.—Truth is founded on God, it has consequently an eternal root and will never perish. The greeting of Christians is a part of prayer.—None does truly receive peace, unless he have received the grace of God; hence that peace, which is not the daughter of grace, is the offspring of corrupt nature, and a carnal security.—God deems none worthy of peace or grace, who do not deem themselves unworthy of either or both, well knowing, that in virtue of his greatest misery he does not merit any thing, but that he stands in need of mercy.—The grace of God is not with us, unless it be also in us, and be worthily received by us.

HEUBNER: Love towards a Christian presupposes the knowledge of the truth, and the love of it. But Christ is the truth. For the truth's sake the shepherd should love his flock.—All greetings ought to have a Christian foundation.

BESSER: Every pastor is a successor to the office of the Apostles, and according to the Divine right, there is no difference between bishops, and pastors, and parsons. [On this point I beg leave to differ with the Author, although this is not the place to discuss so important a question.—M.]. Grace, which removes our guilt, mercy, which delivers us from misery, peace, into which grace and mercy translate us.

2. Exhortation to walk in truth and love.

vv. 4-11.

4 I rejoiced greatly that I found<sup>1</sup> of thy children walking in truth, as we have received a commandment from the Father.<sup>2</sup> And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote<sup>3</sup> a new commandment unto thee, but that which<sup>4</sup> we had from the beginning, that we love one another. And this is love, that we walk after his commandments. This is the commandment,<sup>5</sup> That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it.<sup>6</sup> For many deceivers are entered<sup>7</sup> into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh.<sup>8</sup> This is a deceiver and an antichrist.<sup>9</sup> Look to yourselves, that we lose<sup>10</sup> not those things which we have wrought,<sup>10</sup> but that we receive a full reward.<sup>10</sup> Whosoever transgresseth,<sup>11</sup> and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine<sup>12</sup> of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son.<sup>13</sup> If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed:<sup>14</sup> For<sup>15</sup> he that biddeth him<sup>16</sup> God speed is partaker of his evil deeds.<sup>17</sup>

Verse 4. <sup>1</sup> German: "That I have found." So Alford, Lillie.—M.]

Verse 5. <sup>3</sup> A. B. G. K. Sin. γράφω; elsewhere γράφω. The arrangement of A. Sin. is: ἐντολὴν καὶ τὴν γράφω; that of B. al.: ἐντολὴν γράφω; σοὶ καὶ τὴν. Might the former have been corrected from 1 Jno. ii. 7? [German: "Not as if I write," better "not as writing," Alford, Lillie.—M.]

<sup>6</sup> German: "As ye heard from the beginning, that ye should walk in it." So Lillie and Alford, who supplies however "even" before "as ye heard, etc."—M.]

Verse 7. <sup>7</sup> B. Sin. ἐξῆλθεν; A. ἐξῆλθεν; G. K. εἰσῆλθεν. [German: "went out," Alford: "went forth."—M.]

<sup>8</sup> German: "who did not confess Jesus Christ, who cometh in the flesh;" "who confess not Jesus Christ coming in (the) flesh" (Alford), so Lillie, who omits the definite Article before flesh.—M.]

<sup>9</sup> German: "This is the deceiver and the antichrist." So Alford, Lillie.—M.]

Verse 8. <sup>10</sup> G. K.: ἀπολίσσωμεν—εἰργασάμεθα—ἀπολάβωμεν; Cod. Sin.: ἀπολίσθητε (with the correction: ἀπολίσσητε)—εἰργασάσθε (αὖ)—ἀπολάβητε; thus also A.; but B.: ἀπολίσσητε—εἰργασάμεθα—ἀπολάβητε; this is decidedly preferable as the lectio difficilior and mater lectionis. Bengel, on very slender grounds, recommends: ἀπολίσσητε, εἰργασάσθε—ἀπολάβωμεν.

[German: "Look to yourselves, that ye do not lose, what things we have wrought, but that ye receive full reward."—Alford: " . . . that ye lose not the things which we wrought but receive reward in full."—Lillie: " . . . but receive a full reward."—M.]

- Verse 9. <sup>11</sup> A. B. Cod. Sin.: προάγων; G. K.: παραβαίνων. The former reading is supported by the versions with the variations: procedit, procedit.
 [German: "Every one that progresseth;" Alford: "goeth before you." . . .—M.]
<sup>12</sup> A. B. Cod. Sin. omitt τὸν Χριστοῦ, which are perhaps repeated from the former half of the verse [German: "He that abideth in the doctrine;" so Alford.—M.]
<sup>13</sup> B. Cod. Sin.: καὶ τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱόν; A: καὶ τὸν υἱὸν καὶ τὸν πατέρα.
 Verse 10. <sup>14</sup> German: "And do not bid him welcome;" Alford: "Do not bid him good speed;" Lillie: "neither bid him hall." The introduction of the Divine name both in this verse and the next, is avoided by almost all the versions.—M.]
 Verse 11. <sup>15</sup> A. B. Cod. Sin.: ὁ λέγων γάρ; G. K.: ὁ γὰρ λέγων. The former reading is preferable because of the weight of authority by which it is supported, and also because of its singularity.
<sup>16</sup> A. B. G. Cod. Sin.: αὐτῶ; αὐτὸν is probably an error; there is not sufficient reason for its omission.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 4. Joy in [the lady's children—M.] walking in the truth. I rejoiced greatly.—The Aorist ἐχάρην answers to the Perfect εἶρηκα and notes the time, when he did make the discovery, hence it is not—I rejoice (Luther). The Pauline Epistles begin with similar expressions of joy in the Christian standing of Churches; we have here, however, not an imitation but only the expression of the same Christian mode of viewing things. Cf. Rom. i. 8 sqq.; 1 Cor. i. 4 sqq.; 2 Cor. i. 8 sqq.; Eph. i. 8 sqq.; Phil. i. 8 sqq.; Col. i. 8 sqq.—

That I have found of thy children walking in truth.—The first reference here is to ἐν ἀληθείᾳ v. 3. [Alford: "not only in honesty and uprightness, but in that truth which is derived from and is part of the truth of God in Christ."—M.]—Ἐκ τῶν τέκνων σου is not—τὰ τέκνα σου, but should be taken in a partitive sense, though there is no need of supplying τίνας (Beza), as in 1 Jno. iv. 18; Jno. xvi. 17; Matth. xxiii. 34. The omission of the Article before περιπαροῦντας does not import that her other children did not walk ἐν ἀληθείᾳ. Ebrard's remark—"It is a delicate way, how the presbyter conceals the censure he has to express in a mere limitation of praise"—is overfine, for it cannot be maintained that the same praise of walking in truth could not be accorded to all. Εὔρηκα simply states that the Apostle had found them, but there is here no intimation how he found them, whether accidentally, or in consequence of inquiries to that effect. But περιπαροῦντας denotes sons, whom the Apostle was more likely to encounter on his missionary journeys than daughters; hence the reference seems to be rather to an accidental meeting. Lücke, not without some ground (v. 12), thinks that he met the children without their mother, elsewhere than in the family. Bengel: Hos liberos in domo matertera eorum inveniit Johannes, v. 18. But this uncertainty does not favour, as Huther thinks, the hypothesis of a Church, but [rather] that of a lady.—On περιπατεῖν ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, denoting not only the Christian state, but true, vital Christianity, see 1 Jno. i. 6, 7; ii. 6; cf. 3 Jno. 8, 4; Jno. viii. 12.—

According as we received commandment from the Father.—The clause introduced by καθὼς expressly refers to objective Divine truth, as the ground of Christian walking. Ebrard falsely understands καθὼς in the sense of "even as we," and turns the thought "even as we have (indeed) a command from the Father

(that we should walk in the truth)." But the clause in question should not be taken argumentatively, but as an apposition and explanation. Ἐντολήν does not refer to the commandment of brotherly love (Lücke), but denotes the περὶ περὶ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ taken as ἐντολή (de Wette, Huther, Düsterdieck).—On παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς see v. 3. The interpretation of Oecumenius that Christ is here referred to as the Father of believers cannot be upheld by Is. viii. 18; Hebr. ii. 13. But the mediation of Christ is to be supplied [Huther—M.].

Reference to ἐν ἀγάπῃ (v. 3). vv. 5, 6.

VER. 5. *And now I beseech thee, lady.—*Kαὶ νῦν as in 1 Jno. ii. 28. The connection is not temporal but logical, and moreover with the whole of v. 4, not with the subordinate clause beginning with καθὼς only (as Düsterdieck thinks); nor does it belong to ἐρωτῶ in order to mark the point of time. On ἐρωτῶ Schlichting says: "blandior quædam admonendi ratio;" Düsterdieck calls it an entreaty with a reference to the inviolable authority of the Divine law of love. Hence the Apostle adds:

Not as writing to thee a new commandment, but that which we had from the beginning.—Cf. 1 Jno. ii. 7: that we should love one another.—ἵνα ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους, as the object of ἐρωτῶ, indicates its end and aim. Hence it does not describe or specify the substance of ἐντολή (Baumgarten-Crusius).

VER. 6. And this is love, that we should walk according to His commandments.—Ἀγάπη is left undefined and nothing is said beyond its being exhibited in our walking according to the commandments of God; so that the reference is neither to love to the brethren (Benson), nor to love to God (Grotius, Carpov., and al.), but to love in general, as in 1 Jno. iv. 7, 16 sqq.—This is the view of most and the best commentators. The end of all the commandments of God regulating the conduct of men, is love; hence ἵνα, as at 1 Jno. v. 3. Hence also κατὰ τὰς ἐντολάς αὐτοῦ, is here followed by ἐντολή in the Singular, as denoting their unity.

The commandment is this,—cf. 1 Jno. iii. 22, 23; it is further described as to its contents.

As ye heard from the beginning, as in v. 5. It is not a secondary aim of the commandment, as such (de Wette, Lücke).

That ye should walk in it.—ἵνα denotes the aim and scope; ἐν αὐτῇ refers to ἀγάπη which should be supplied; for ἐν ἐντολῇ περιπατεῖν does not occur, and would be an intolerable tautology (against Sander). Thus the Apostle describes the identity of love, especially of brotherly love, and of obedience to God; both stand and fall together.

Description of the false teachers: v. 7.

Formany deceivers.—Οἱ grounds the reason of this exhortation to brotherly love on the Apostle's fear of its being marred by the influence of false teachers (Huther). But οἱ is not governed by ἐρωτᾷ σε (Lücke, Ewald), nor should there be mentally repeated ἐρωτᾷ σε (de Wette), nor should any thought be supplied, e. g. "seeing that ye have the true Christianity, I have to warn you, for" (Heumann), or "hoc non temere dixi, nam" (Beza); nor does δι introduce a protasis, followed by v. 8 as apodosis (Grotius, Carpsov), wholly unlike the Johannean diction. Bengel's remark also is wrong: "ratio cur jubeat retinere audita a principio." The love required (vv. 5, 6) rests on the truth (v. 7), and the ἐντολή (v. 6) embraces also the truth (v. 7, Düsterdieck). Cf. vv. 1-3, and 1 Jno. iii. 23, 16. The false teachers are called πλάνοι on account of their influence and effect on believers. 1 Jno. ii. 26; 1 Tim. iv. 1.

Went out into the world.—1 Jno. ii. 19; iv. 1; Who do not confess Jesus Christ coming in flesh.—Οἱ μὴ ὁμολογούντες denotes that whereby, or how these are πλάνοι. Winer, p. 146. But Winer (p. 405) errs in assuming a genus on account of μή: all those who do not confess, quicunque non profitentur. If we had οὐχ it would be equal to: οἱ ἀρνούμενοι. But the reference here is not to simple, open denial, but to a contradicting, which by various turnings and twistings, evades and endangers the definite confession. Cf. 1 Jno. iv. 2, 3. "Ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί is different both from ἐληλυθότα (1 Jno. iv. 2), and from ὁ ἐλθών (1 Jno. v. 6). The Present denotes the thought per se "without any reference to time" 1 Cor. xv. 85 (Düsterdieck), "separate from all consideration of time" (Huther); so also Lücke, de Wette, Sander and al.—This may intimate that the false teachers denied the possibility of the Incarnation (Lücke). Bengel (qui veniebat) is beside the mark, for 8 Jno. 3, where the Participle Imperfect is clearly indicated by ἐχάρην, is not apposite here; and so is Oecumenius, who per enallagen temporis suggests the second advent of Christ.

This is the deceiver and the antichrist.—Οὗτος refers to οἱ μὴ ὁμολογούντες, and expresses plurality (πολλοὶ πλάνοι) in unity: ἔστιν ὁ πλάνος; it is a transition from the Plural to the distributive Singular; Winer, pp. 186, 654. The words καὶ ὁ ἀντὶχριστός give prominence to a further characteristic of πλάνος (Huther); we must not say, however, that the πλάνος is in reality only in the many that have the πνεῦμα πλάνης (Lücke, Huther); but he is personally behind the many, who are his forerunners. Cf. 1 Jno. ii. 18, 22.

Warning against the false teachers. vv. 8, 9.

Vers. 8. Look to yourselves, βλέπετε ἑαυτοὺς. They are to consider what would be the loss entailed upon themselves by being deceived, viz., the loss of fellowship with the Father and the Son, the loss of truth and love. Bengel's explanatory clauses "me absente" would be in point, if we had here: βλέπετε ὑμεῖς ἑαυτοὺς, as in Mark xiii. 9. Moreover they themselves had to look to themselves, even though the Apostles were present.

That ye do not lose.—Ἥνα μή denotes the end and aim of their precaution. Matth. xii. 16; xxvi.

5; Luke xviii. 5; John vii. 28; 1 Cor. xvi. 10. The object is to avoid a loss, even a loss on the part of the readers. But of what?

What things we have wrought.—The Apostles of Jesus Christ had done, wrought and accomplished something by their labours and preaching, even a possession of truth and love with their fruits (ἀεὶρωσάμεθα), which possession will be lost, if they give ear to false teachers (Düsterdieck, Huther). This a bold self-testimony (1 Jno. i. 3; iv. 6). It is unnecessary to add ἐν ὑμῖν, as Lücke thinks, for the context supplies it. The first person does not require us to understand that the Apostle must have converted the children of the κυρία; he only includes himself in the number of the Apostles and genuine witnesses of Christ, whom he opposes to the recipients of their preaching, without determining through whose instrumentality the children of the κυρία were converted; but the teachers and their hearers are not taken together.

But that ye receive full reward.—Μισθός denotes the blessing of truth and love in one's own heart, in life with its joys and sorrows, and in eternity; μισθὸν πλήρη is the full reward, uncurtailed, as it falls to the lot of perfect fidelity (Huther, Düsterdieck); it is not=πολὺν (Carpsov), nor is it said that they had only received it in part, and that they were to receive it fully in eternity (Grotius, Ebrard), for this fullness is relative; there is even here on earth a full reward, a full peace, a full παρρησία, etc., in conformity to the relations of this present time. But Bengel rightly observes: "nulla merces dimidia est, aut tota amittitur, aut plena accipitur," but his next remark is irrelevant, viz., "consideranda diversitas graduum in gloria;" for the blessed have their full reward on the lowest grade. But ἀπολάβετε designates the receiving as a gift, a present (Col. iii. 24; Gal. iv. 2; Luke xvi. 25). Taking all the verbs in the first person, weakens the thought as much as taking them all in the second person (see Apparatus Crit. Note 10); in the former case the teachers and hearers are taken together, in the latter the teachers are wholly excluded, and the delicate touches, the Apostle's right of warning them, and the weight of the Apostolical warning are all lost.

Vers. 9. Every one that progresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ.—This describes him who does not receive the full reward, of whom they are warned, whereby they lose the reward. Ὁ πρόγειν and μὴ μένιν designate the same persons, positively and negatively. Πρόγειν denotes a progression, a going before, which in the opinion of the πρόγειν is the reaching of a higher degree of knowledge, a decided progress, but in reality is a departure from the truth, ἐν διδαχῇ τοῦ χριστοῦ, a going beyond the limits of Christian doctrine. Huther errs in seeing here an ironical allusion (Düsterdieck); it is a bitter truth of the actual fact. On πρόγειν cf. Matth. xxi. 9; 1 Tim. i. 18; v. 24. On the characteristics of those who know and learn without knowledge, see 2 Tim. iii. 7. The lectio rec. παραβαίνων, passing by, τὴν διδαχὴν (according to Matth. xv. 3), or ἐκ τῆς διδαχῆς (Acts i. 25), and the exposition: "ἀπάγων ἑαυτὸν" (Oecumenius), are clearly untenable; and in the variation of the Vulgate recedit instead of procedit, it is more probable that the former arose from the latter, than that the latter arose from the former. St. Paul also insists upon the μενεν, 2 Tim. iii. 14; i. 13; Tit. i. 9.—Ἡ διδασχὴ τοῦ χριστοῦ signifies that Paul calls the ὑπαίνοντες λόγους (2 Tim. i. 13); the Genitive is subjective (Düsterdieck, Huther al.). Agreeably to constant usage (Matth. vii. 28; xvi. 12; xxii. 33; Mark i. 22; iv. 2; xii. 38; Acts ii. 42; v. 28), it cannot be the Genitive of the object (Bengel, Lücke, Sander, al.). Cf. Jno. viii. 31: μενῆγε ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τῷ ἐμῷ. It is the doctrine which Christ Himself brought and taught and caused to be propagated by His Apostles. But, of course, the principal part of its contents, is Christology.

Hath not God.—cf. 1 Jno. ii. 23; v. 12.—Truth, life and God are inseparable.

He that abideth in the doctrine hath both the Father and the Son.—The same thought, not only repeated positively, but completed by the addition of καὶ τὸν υἱόν, as in 1 Jno. ii. 23. [Alford: "The order in the text is the theological one, the Father being mentioned first, then the Son. That in A. etc. is the logical and contextual one, seeing that the test is, abiding in the doctrine of Christ. Thus he has Christ, and through Him, the Father: which of the two is original, it is impossible to decide."—M.].

Warning against fellowship with the false teachers. vv. 10, 11.

V. 10. If any cometh to you.—Εἰ τις ἐρχεται shows that the case supposed actually existed. Winer, p. 307. Ἐάν with the subjunctive denotes a possibility. There is hence no occasion for surprise, as if this were unjohannean (de Wette, Ebrard), since it cannot be unjohannean to suppose a case as actually existing. Πρὸς ἑμᾶς, as in 2 Tim. iii. 6, refers to the forwardness of the false teachers and their calculating on the greater receptivity and mouldableness of women.

And bringeth not this doctrine.—Καὶ adds the capacity and character in which such persons come, not as soliciting aid, as necessitous persons, but as false teachers (Bengel: quasi doctor aut frater). The use of οὐ φέρει, instead of μὴ, also shows that the case mentioned is actually true, and imports the simple denial of φέρειν. Similar is φέρειν κατηγορεῖν, Jno. xviii. 29 (Acts xxv. 7). It is unnecessary to supply here that the contrary doctrine is brought (de Lyra), and that the true doctrine is disputed (Tirinus); this is self-evident from 1 John iv. 2, 3. Τὰς τὴν διδασχὴν ἐστὶν τὴν διδασχὴν τοῦ χριστοῦ. Non de iis, qui alieni semper fuerunt ab ecclesia (1 Cor. v. 10), sed de iis qui volunt fratres haberi et doctrinam evertunt (Grotius).

Receive him not into (your) house.—On the above supposition the point in question is not an act of φιλοξενία (Heb. xiii. 2; Rom. xii. 13); for the reference is not to the necessitous. The injunction simply bears upon the false teachers not being received into the house (αὐτὸν εἰς οἰκίαν λαμβάνειν), on account of the danger per se.

And do not bid him welcome, which was unavoidable if they were received into the house; the two circumstances should be taken together; for while the former would be dangerous, the latter would be untrue; χαίρειν, joy, good speed, prosperity, cannot be said to the false teacher; only to δομωρόπους and δομωρίστους is due the Christian, fraternal greeting, in its deeper import (Oecumenius, Calov, Bengel, Lücke, de Wette, Huther, Düsterdieck and al.). This χαίρειν μὴ λέγετε must therefore not be limited to the salutatio as a conventional form of politeness (Clemens Alex.), or as an expression of friendship (Grotius), or be taken quite generally: velut hic Joannes omne colloquium, omne consortium, omne commercium cum hæreticis (a Lapide), or applied to excommunication (Vitringa, de syn. vet. p. 759); nor must it be referred to the xplous which was necessary only at that time (Lücke), nor must it be construed, according to the now prevailing loftier view that man, all his errors notwithstanding, remains man and an object of esteem and love, as an act of intolerance which may have been justifiable at that time (de Wette), or be charged to the fiery temperament of the Apostle, according to the notices contained in Luke ix. 54 and Euseb. Hist. Eccl. III. 28; IV. 14. The reference is simply to the cultivation of personal acquaintance and fraternal intercourse with the false teachers; this is, and continues to be, forbidden; brotherly love in its depth, truth and blessedness has its limits. Hofmann, Schriftbeweis II. 2, p. 339.

V. 11. For he that biddeth him welcome, partaketh in his deeds, the evil ones.—Ἰὰρ gives the reason of the injunction; in the words ὁ λέγων αὐτῷ χαίρειν the Apostle gives prominence to the one point which is closely connected with the other: αὐτὸν εἰς οἰκίαν λαμβάνειν. The clause κοινωνεῖ τοῖς ἔργοις αὐτοῦ shows that we have here not simply an outward conventional form of politeness, but an "inward relation of communion" (Huther), which is fostered. The ἔργα τὰ τρωπρά are primarily acts of communicating false doctrine, but secondarily also the whole ethical conduct connected with it, which injures God, Christ, the Church, the truth, individual communities, believers and their souls.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The knowledge of the truth from God is acquired in the way of obedience to the will of God (v. 4).

2. The law of God should only be viewed as the revelation of His love, and as it originates in love, so it impels to love (vv. 5, 6).

3. The acme and ground of all error is the denial of the Incarnation of Christ (v. 7). He that breaks with Christ comes in the flesh and as the Son of man ever the Coming One, breaks brotherhood with believers and forces them to break brotherhood with him. Besser truly says: "The doctrine of Christ is through and through from Christ. 'It is I,' is the fundamental theme of the Gospel, preached by Himself and the holy Apostles, from beginning to end." Believing Catholics, Lutherans, Reformed, United, are brethren and remain brethren, because they are living Christians, the children of God and co-heirs with Christ. But he ought hardly to have used this passage for the purpose of warning against the union nor to have said: "Yes, people reverse the meaning of John and are perchance afraid to hold private intercourse with manifest blasphemers and revilers of the Divine truth, perhaps to take coffee with them, but—" alas! our table has become more holy to us than God's table." For these things occur, inside the same communion, every where and at all times, if instead of putting blasphemers, he had said: hypocrites or adulterers.

4. False teachers corrupt not only the christological truth, but also the work of the Church and the salvation of individual church-members (vv. 7, 8).

5. The promised reward is not a merit of good works, but a consequence of Divine appointment, and a communicated gift (v. 8).

6. True progress is only possible in the maintenance and on the foundation of Christian truth (v. 9). For men come short not so much in the desire to be furthered, as in the judgment as to what constitutes true progress, and what is the true mode of progressing. A striving forward with a good conscience will always be a diligent and faithful road-maker bridging over the chasm between himself and signal successes, by the most faithful and scrupulous discharge of duty.

7. In the converse among Christians love must not be practised at the expense of truth and truthfulness (vv. 10, 11), nor must the truth be spoken at the expense of love!

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Compare Doctrinal and Ethical.

STARK:—Preachers should rejoice most when they see that young children are well trained, grow in grace and make the beginning of their wisdom in the fear of the Lord.—Christians have also their joy in the world, though not of the world.—Godly children are their parents' joy, the ornament of the Church and the joy of all godly people. Young plants of righteousness look more beautiful in the garden of the Lord, than old trees on the point of decaying.—Truth is not only to be investigated and meditated upon, but it must be practised, and men should walk in it.—A preacher should not always use severity and earnestness, but also lenity and gentleness, not command but entreat his people to become godly.—Whenever thou lackest the mind to follow, thou art wont to cry: it is a novelty! Thou utterest a falsehood! Hear what St. John says: To love, which contains all the commandments, has been from the beginning.—Christianity needs no new commandments, but it requires the constantly renewed inculcation of the old commandments.—It is not enough that the truth be preached, falsehood must also be denounced. The heresies, persecutions and abuses in the Church of God must not cause us to waver, and doubt the truth of the Christian religion, but rather strengthen and confirm us while we are exposed to their danger.—Alas, by nature we all have an antichristian mind and antichrist in our hearts; he who does not know and expel him, will nevermore know or avoid the outward antichrist.—Ye that are wise overmuch and are anxious about unnecessary things, ye that judge and censure every thing, hear what St. John says: "Look to yourselves."—Delightful reward of faithful ministers, if they see in their hearers the fruit of their labour arranged according to the mind of Christ.—The less regard a minister pays to the temporal reward in his office, the more is he faithful, and the greater will be the reward which he shall receive from Christ, the Great Shepherd.—What can a man lack who has God, and what can a man possess who has not God? If none may receive into their houses wicked and false teachers, how much the more ought they not to be introduced into the sheepfold of Christ, which would be like taking wolves among sheep! It is injurious to have fellowship with false people, but still more injurious to open to them the door of our heart; where the first is done, the latter is wont not to be wanting.—Who enters into a pest-house? Do we not flee a bedfellow affected with a venomous disease? Why not likewise a deceiver, a servant of Satan? The opposite takes place in the world: be friendly to everybody except to Christ in His members!—The greetings of Christians should not be merely conventional, but spring from the ground of truth and love.—A Christian should be on his guard not only against his own sins, but also against those of others, of which he may easily and in various ways become partaker.

HUBNER:—The children of the same family are not always of one mind; a godly mother may have unbelieving children.—Christian mothers, Christian families are a blessing to the world.—Those also who run already in the Christian course need stirring up.—A Christian's treasure is liable to be lost as long as he continues to live among deceivers and enemies; hence the necessity of foresight, courage and fidelity of vigilance over himself and in respect of temptation: the more precious the treasure, the more carefully should it be guarded. It is slowly acquired, but may be lost at once. The number of those who once had grace and then lost it, will one day appear very great.—John teaches us what we should ask of every one that comes to us, to wit: do you bring Christ with you or not? Reception was denied to a false teacher, because it would have been a token of brotherly acknowledgment; but this was so much the more to be denied, because such reception took place in the name of the Church, and hence would have been a declaration that the whole Church did receive him as a brother. But on that account we need not in a case of emergency deny to such an one our bounden private love.—Love should never be prejudicial to the confession of our faith. Love at the expense of faith, to its injury or with its denial is no love. This commandment was falsely applied in the case of John a Lasco, who having been expelled from England in the reign of Mary, A. D. 1558, was denied reception in Denmark, both he and his congregation (Salig, Hist. Conf. Aug. II., 1090).

BESSER:—It is an idle speech that Christians and antichristians have one and the same God. "We are believers in one God" is sung in truth by those only who continue: "We also believe in Jesus Christ, His Son and our Lord."

THE CONCLUSION.

vv. 12, 13.

12 Having many things to write unto you, I would not write<sup>1</sup> with paper and ink; but<sup>2</sup> I 13 trust to come<sup>3</sup> unto you, and speak face to face,<sup>4</sup> that our<sup>5</sup> joy may be full. The children of thy elect sister greet thee.<sup>6</sup> Amen.<sup>7</sup>

Verse 12. [<sup>1</sup> German omits "write" supplied in E. V.—M.]

<sup>2</sup> ἄλλα ἡλπίς is the reading of the best and of most Codices, also of Cod. Sin. A. al. read ἡλπίς γάρ.

<sup>3</sup> πρὸς ὑμᾶς γενέσθαι is the most authentic reading; ἰδεῖν lect. rec. supported by G. K.; Coptic version has ἰδεῖν ὑμᾶς; according to 3 Jno. 14.

<sup>5</sup> Cod. Sin. G. K.: Κατὰ ὑμῶν; A. B. ὑμῶν. The former, on account of 1 Jno. i. 4 is lectio difficilior.

Verse 13. [<sup>6</sup> German: "There greet thee the children of thy sister, the elect one." Alford: "These greet thee the children of thine elect sister."—M.]

<sup>7</sup> Ἀμήν, at the conclusion, is wanting. Cod. Sin. A. B.; Ἰωάννης β'. Others add εὐσεβεῖς, others τοὺ θεολόγους, and still others καθελάκη.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Breaking off. v. 12.

V. 12. Having many things to write to you.—His heart is full; he had only written very little of what he had in his heart. Hence it is unwarrantable to see, with Ebrard, in most of these verses, simply citations from the First Epistle.

I would not [write them] with paper and ink.—The infinitive from the preceding clause: πολλὰ ἔχον ὑμῖν γράφειν should, of course, be supplied here. διὰ χάριτος καὶ μέλανος denotes the written character of his communication; the more common phrase is: διὰ μέλανος—καὶ καλῶν, 3 Jno. 18.—Ὁ χάρις is the Egyptian papyrus, probably the so-called Augustan or Claudian, for letters; τὸ μέλαν, also 2 Cor. iii. 8, ink made of soot, water and gum; ὁ κάλαμος, the writing reed, probably split (μεσοσχιδής, μερότοιμος). Cf. Lücke on this passage. The Aorist οὐκ ἐβούληθη, from the standpoint of the readers on receiving the Epistle, because he wished to communicate it personally, orally.

But I hope to come to you and to speak [say it] mouth to mouth.—The antithesis of γράφειν διὰ χάριτος καὶ μέλανος is πρὸς ὑμᾶς γενέσθαι καὶ στόμα πρὸς στόμα λαλῆσαι; because he hopes for the latter, he has broken off the former; but this does not import that he did reserve part of the doctrine necessary to salvation for oral tradition (Barth. Petrus); for he surely spoke only what he had written in the first Epistle. On γενέσθαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς see Jno. vi. 21, 25; Acts xx. 16; xxi. 17; xxv. 15; 1 Cor. xvi. 10; Jno. x. 35; Acts x. 18—to turn towards a person or place. On στόμα πρὸς στόμα λαλῆσαι, cf. 1 Cor. xiii. 12; Xenoph. Mem. II., 6, 32; and פה אל פה. Numb. xii. 8.

That our joy may be fulfilled [filled full].—The aim (ἵνα) is to fill up his own and the readers' joy, and then that of the hearers. Cf. notes on 1 Jno. i. 4. The object of joy is not the personal presence of the Apostle (Bengel), but the full communication of the truth in oral intercourse.

The greetings, v. 13.

V. 13. There greet thee the children of thy sister, the elect one.—To explain τῆς ἀδελφῆς of a Church, and τέκνα of church-members is not warranted by any thing found here; the reason why the sister herself does not send greetings, may be death, or absence, but "can neither be ascertained, nor is it a proper question" (Düsterdieck versus Huther). Bengel: "Suarissima communitas! Comitatus apostoli, minorum verbis salutem nunciantis."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKS:—Both what the Apostles wrote and what they spoke is the word of God, and we do well to bear this in mind.—A true reader is he, who not satisfied with the written Epistle or the printer's work on paper, suffers the Holy Spirit to write in his heart and thus becomes himself an Epistle of the living God.—It is a blessing of God if we have the opportunity given to us of conferring with friends on matters of importance and of enjoying the benefit of their counsel.—The children of the world imagine that the life of the godly consists in nothing but dejected looks and constant sorrowing; but here applies that saying: as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing.—He is the servant of his belly, but not the servant of Christ, who seeks in his office other joy than the salvation of his hearers.—It is and ever will be a beautiful custom to interchange cordial greetings with friends in Epistles and in other ways, and thus to desire for them all temporal and spiritual prosperity.—Happy are those sisters and brothers who besides being united by the ties of nature, are also firmly united by the tie of Divine grace. For it is eternal grace only, which works alliances of eternal friendship.

HEUBNER:—With us it is often the opposite; we have much to write and little to speak, when we do meet.—When those who are one in faith, meet and converse together of the grace of God, of which they have made experience, they have a foretaste of heavenly joy.

THE # THIRD EPISTLE GENERAL OF JOHN THE APOSTLE.

(Ιωάννου γ in B. and Cod. Sinait. C. adds ἐπιστολῇ, G. τοῦ ἀγίου ἀποστόλου.)

I. The Address.

v. 1.

The elder unto the well beloved Gaius, whom I love in the truth<sup>1</sup>.

Verse 1. [German: The presbyter to the beloved Gaius, whom I love in truth.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. On ὁ πρεσβύτερος see Introduction § 1. It can hardly be determined whether this Gaius is one of the two or three persons of that name, who are mentioned as friends and companions of Paul in Acts xix. 29; xx. 4; Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 14. Lücke thinks that our Gaius is identical with Gaius of Derbe mentioned Acts xx. 4. Wolf, in his Curis ad. h. l., that the Gaius mentioned 1 Cor. i. 14 is meant here. Others suppose that the Gaius, mentioned Constit. Ap. 7, 46, and appointed by John Bishop of Pergamus, is the one referred to here (Whiston); but this is also purely hypothetical. Nor can it be inferred from v. 8 of this Epistle that Gaius was a presbyter. As John adds to the address the term τῷ ἀγαπητῷ, so he also addresses him as ἀγαπητέ in vv. 8, 6, 11, and superadds as in 2 John 1, the words: διὰ τὸ ἀγαπᾶν ἐν ἀληθείᾳ (Oecumenius: ὁ κατὰ κύριον ἀγαπῶν ἐνδιαιτῶν ἀγάπῃ).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKS: Those who wish to be loved of men, must be lovable and worthy of love; this is done, if they give up the love of the world, and love God only.—Truth and love are precious jewels of Christians, which must be linked together and are more ornamental than golden chains. The one cannot exist without the other; truth without love is dead, and love without truth is blind.

The Apostle's joys and sorrows.

vv. 2-11.

2 Beloved, I wish above all things<sup>1</sup> that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even
3 as thy soul prospereth. For<sup>2</sup> I rejoiced greatly when the<sup>3</sup> brethren came and testified
4 of the truth that is in thee,<sup>4</sup> even as thou<sup>5</sup> walkest in the truth.<sup>6</sup> I have no greater
5 joy than<sup>7</sup> to hear that my children walk in truth.<sup>8</sup> Beloved, thou doest faithfully<sup>9</sup>
6 whatsoever thou doest<sup>10</sup> to the brethren, and<sup>11</sup> to strangers; Which have borne witness
7 after a godly sort, thou shalt do well:<sup>12</sup> Because that for his name's sake<sup>14</sup> they 8 went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles.<sup>15</sup> We therefore ought to receive<sup>16</sup> such,
9 that we might be fellow helpers to the truth<sup>17</sup>. I wrote unto the church<sup>18</sup>: but Dio-

- 10 trephes, who loveth to have the preeminence among them,<sup>10</sup> receiveth us not. Wherefore, if I come, I will remember<sup>20</sup> his deeds which he doeth, prating against us with malicious words<sup>21</sup>: and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and<sup>22</sup> forbiddeth them that would, and casteth them out of the church.
- 11 Beloved, follow<sup>23</sup> not that which is evil, but that which is good. He that doeth good
- 12 is of God: but<sup>24</sup> he that doeth evil hath not seen God. Demetrius hath good report of all men, and of the truth itself<sup>25</sup>: yea, and we also bear record; and ye know<sup>26</sup> that our record<sup>27</sup> is true.

Verse 2. [German: "In all things." So Lillie. "Concerning all things." Alford.—M.]

Verse 3. <sup>1</sup> Cod. Sin. and several minusc. omit γὰρ after ἰχέρην.

[German: "When brethren came." Lillie.—M.]

[German: "And testified to thy truth;" so Alford, Lillie.—M.]

<sup>2</sup> σὺ is emphatic, omitted in A., but inserted in B. C. G. K. Cod. Sin.

[German: "In truth," without the Article; so Alford, Lillie.—M.]

Verse 4. <sup>1</sup> The best authorities read τοῦτον; ταύτης found only in minusc. and versions, is doubtless a correction.—Some read χαρὰν instead of χαρὰν. [German: "Greater than this I have no joy, that;" Lillie: "Greater joy than this I have none, to hear;" Alford: "I have no greater joy than this, that."—M.]

Verse 5. [German: "Beloved, thou actest faithfully." So Lillie.—M.]

<sup>3</sup> B. C. G. K. Cod. Sin. al. read ἐργάζεσθ, so that the ἐργάζεσθ of A cannot stand.

<sup>4</sup> A. B. C. Cod. Sin. al. have καὶ τοῦτο, instead of καὶ εἰς τοῦτο, of G. K. [German: "And that strangers." So Alford.—M.]

Verse 6. [German: "Who have testified to thy love before the Church;" so Lillie and Alford, who renders however: "in the presence of the Church."—M.]

[German: "Whom thou shalt do well to conduct (forward) worthily of God." Alford: "Whom thou wilt do well if thou forward on their way, worthily of God;" Lillie: "Whom thou shalt do well to forward their way, in a manner worthy of God."—M.]

Verse 7. [German: "For they went out on behalf of the name;" Lillie: "For in behalf of the name they went forth." Alford: "On behalf of."—M.]

Verse 8. <sup>1</sup> A. B. C. Cod. Sin. al.: ὁρῶ λαμβάνειν; G. K.: ἀπολαμβάνειν.

<sup>2</sup> τῆ ἀληθείας; Cod. Sin.: τῆ ἐκκλησίας, with the emendation τῆ ἀληθείας. [The latter reading, without the emendation, occurs also in A.—M.]

Verse 9. <sup>1</sup> A. B. C. Cod. Sin. read εἰ; a hand has added ἐν in Cod. Sin. [German: "I wrote somewhat to the Church;" so Alford.—M.]

[German: "But he who loveth to be the first of them, Diotrephes, does not receive us;" Lillie: "But he who loveth to be foremost among them, Diotrephes, doth not admit us;" Alford: "Howbeit, Diotrephes, who loveth preeminence over them, receiveth us not."—M.]

Verse 10. [German: "Therefore, if I come, I will bring to remembrance;" so Lillie; Alford: "Bring to mind."—M.]

[German: "And not contented with this, neither does he himself receive the brethren, but also, those who would do it, he hindereth, and casteth out of the Church."—M.]

Verse 11. [German: "Imitate not evil, but good;" so Alford.—M.]

<sup>2</sup> δὲ κακῶς ὧν is best authenticated [A. B. C. K.—M.]; δὲ δὲ κακῶν, test. rec., is only feebly supported. [German: "He that doeth evil," omits the "but" of B. V., so Alford.—M.]

Verse 12. <sup>1</sup> C. inserts τῆς ἐκκλησίας καὶ before τῆς ἀληθείας. Instead of ἀληθείας A. probably reads ἐκκλησίας. [A. corrected, B. G. K. read ἀληθείας. German: "Unto Demetrius testimony hath been borne by all, and by the truth itself."—M.]

<sup>2</sup> German: "And thou knowest; A. B. C. al. Vulg.: εἰδὲς; εἰδὲς i. r. according to the G. K. al. several versions, etc.—M.]

[German: "That our testimony is true."—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Wish for the prosperity of Gaius. vv. 2-4.

V. 2. Beloved:—Joy in and care for Gaius account for the accumulation of terms of endearment.

In all things I wish that thou mayest prosper.—Ἐπεὶ πάντων is simply idiomatic: with respect to all things: περὶ, with the idea of including, encircling, shutting in, both in connection with substantives and absolutely, is found at the head of whole sentences in the sense of adinet ad; 1 Cor. xvi. 1. Cf. Winer, p. 390, sq. Connected with ἐλχομαι, which signifies "to wish," but carries here also the force of intercession (cf. Jas. v. 15), the most natural sense is "praying for, concerning all things," without any necessity for recurring to the Homeric usage of the preposition, viz. prae—above all things, as alleged by Schott, Düsterdieck and others. Rather than giving it that construction, we may connect περὶ πάντων with εὐδοκῶν (Bengel, Huther, al.), which connection is affected neither by the rhetorical emphasis of the position of περὶ πάντων (Lücke), nor by the circumstance that it cannot belong to ὑγιαίνειν.—The prosperity referred to (εὐδοκῶν) is general, in re familiari (Bengel), in all outward relations of life. Εὐδοκῶν, to make, lead a good way (εὐδία) is transitive, while εὐδοκῶν to have a good way, is intransitive; hence the Passive, which carries the same force as the intransitive verb. Cf. Rom. i. 10; 1 Cor. xvi. 2; Lücke, Düsterdieck and al.—Καὶ ὑγιαίνειν singles out a particular point. Possibly Gaius had been sick (Düsterdieck), or was in delicate health; but this cannot be inferred with certainty as a fact, for health per se is important enough, if outward prosperity is the matter referred to.

Even as thy soul prospereth.—Oecumenius: ἐν τῇ κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον πολιτείᾳ, consequently in that it has the truth, and that he walks in it (v. 8); the words καθὼς εὐδοκῶνται σου ἡ ψυχὴ contain a high encomium on Gaius and the object of the Apostle's particular rejoicing.

VER. 3. For I rejoiced greatly.—On ἐχάρην γὰρ λίαν see 2 Jno. 4. These words give the reason of the encomium, as of a well authenticated fact.

When brethren came and testified to thy truth.—The connection with the Aorist ἐχάρην requires us to continue the Participles ἐρχομένων καὶ μαρτυρούντων as Imperfects, as in Luke xvii. 12 (Lücke, Huther, Düsterdieck al.); the Dative σου τῇ ἀληθείᾳ governed by μαρτυρεῖν (as in vv. 6, 12; Jno. v. 38; xviii. 37; iii. 26) denotes the truth become subjective in Gaius; hence not sinceritas (a Lapidé, Beza and al.), but inward, Christian life, born of the truth, and itself truth (Lücke, Huther, Düsterdieck and al.); the restriction to liberalitas (Lorinus), is inadmissible.

As thou walkest in truth.—This clause contains the testimony of the brethren, hence it is an indirect clause recording the Christianity of Gaius as evidenced by his walk; on that account we have also ἀκούω in v. 4, so that it is not the testimony of the Apostle added to that of the brethren (Besser). So Brückner, Huther, Düsterdieck, and al. The express and emphatic οὐ denotes that the testimony of the brethren had been different with reference to others, for instance in the case of Diotrephes vv. 9, 10.

VER. 4. I have no greater joy than this.—Here the Apostle expresses his mind in general. On μεϊζοτέρων, a double comparative, like Eph. iii. 8, see Winer, p. 81. Grotius: "Est ad intendendam significationem comparativus e comparativo factus." The Genitive τούτων is not ταύτης, the neuter Plural, carrying a general reference, is restricted by the following ἵνα to one idea. Winer, p. 175 compares ἐφ' οἷς and ἀνθ' ὧν, also μετὰ ταῦτα and καὶ ταῦτα ἰδού, Heb. x. 12, and cites Jno. i. 51.

That I hear my children are walking in the truth.—On ἵνα see Jno. xv. 13. It signifies the Apostle's desire to hear this; this is his whole aim. Τὰ ἐμὰ τέκνα are the Christians committed to John; the members of the Churches confided to his care and placed under his paternal direction (Huther).

Praise and necessity of hospitality. vv. 5-8.

VER. 5. Beloved, as in v. 2.

Thou actest faithfully.—πιστὸν ποιεῖς; Oecumenius: ἀξίον πιστοῦ ἀνδρός. Bengel: "Facis quiddam quod facile a te pollicebar mihi et fidelibus;" this explanation is too narrow, the reference to the πιστός which lays hold of the ἀλθεία and carries out in love being too definite. But it is not on that account—πιστὸν ποιεῖσθαι (Ebrard).

Whatsoever thou doest for the brethren.—Ὅ ἐάν (ἀν)—quodcunque denotes that this activity had various modes of expression and made itself felt in different directions. On ἐργάζεσθαι εἰς, cf. Matth. xxvi. 10.

And that strangers.—Καὶ τοῦτο, as in 1 Cor. vi. 4; Eph. ii. 8; Phil. i. 28, is not different in point of sense from καὶ εἰς τοὺς ξένους: and that—this too for (towards) strangers. This additional particular shows that the brethren were unknown and strangers, and acknowledges and praises the hospitality of Gaius as more liberal and not confined merely to brethren personally known to him. On the importance of φιλοξενία, cf. Heb. xiii. 2; Rom. xii. 13; 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8; 1 Pet. iv. 9.

VER. 6. Who have testified to thy love before the Church.—Οἱ ἐμαρτύρησαν are the strange brethren; not only some of their number singled out (de Wette). Ἐνώπιον τῆς ἐκκλησίας denotes the Church where the Apostle was at the time of writing (Grotius, Huther, Düsterdieck al.), before which they gave an account of their experience [on their missionary journey—M.], like in Acts xiv. 27, and made mention of the love of Gaius. Bengel's "publice commemorabantur exempla ad hortandum" goes too far.

Whom thou shalt do well to conduct (forward) worthily of God.—The reading: οὐς καλῶς ποιήσεις προτέμψας is established; the Future with the part. aor. is difficult. The Future is simple and clear; Gaius will do well; we must not construe it, with Huther, as Futur. exactum. For at Mark xiii. 13, the being saved (σωθήσεται) does not take place until after the enduring is accomplished (ὁ ὑπομείνας εἰς τέλος). Cf. Winer, p. 306, where only the part. aor. carries the force of the futur. exact. But the action of Gaius is not finished until he has accomplished the providing and speeding forward of the brethren; this is the sense of the part. aor. In such a connection the Future indicates a certain expectation, not without the direction softened by the Future, even as the δεδεικμέν. v. 8, is morata formula hortandi (Bengel). It is more allowable to see here with Luther, a vagueness of expression than to venture with Ebrard on the correction ἐποίησας. As καλῶς qualifies ποιεῖν (Acts x. 33; Phil. iv. 14), so ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ qualifies προτέμπειν, to fit out for a journey (Tit. iii. 13; 1 Cor. xvi. 11); in a manner worthy of God [whose messengers they are—M.], with all care and love (Lücke); the viaticum (Grotius), commeatus (Bengel), will not be wanting; but this is not all. Cf. 1 Thess. ii. 12; Col. i. 10.

VER. 7. For they went forth on behalf of the name.—Ἐξῆλθαν; the reason why they went forth is intimated by ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος, as in Acts v. 41, on behalf of the name of Christ, cf. Jas. ii. 7, even for the purpose of preaching it, as in Rom. i. 6, so that they went forth as missionaries, as in Acts xv. 40 (Lücke, Huther, Düsterdieck and others). Hence the reference is neither to the name of God, which would require αὐτοῦ, and then to be referred back to τοῦ θεοῦ, v. 6, nor only to the Christian religion, and least of all to the name of the brethren who were called missionaries (Paulus). The connection of ἐξῆλθαν with ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνικῶν is untenable (Beza, Bengel, al.), which belongs to λαμβάνοντες.

Receiving nothing from the heathens.—The Part. Pres. with μὴδὲν denotes the maxim of the missionaries not to receive any support from the heathens (Huther, Düsterdieck), agreeably to Matth. x. 8. The Mathematical astrologers and thaumaturgs did, on the contrary, make a business of religious affairs. But compare also the practice of St. Paul (1 Cor. ix. 18; 2 Cor. xi. 7, sqq.; xii. 16, sqq., 1 Thess. ii. 9, sqq.), although he might not take any thing from the younger Churches. On the construction of λαμβάνειν ἀπὸ, cf. Matth. xvii. 25, and Winer, p. 388, note 1.

VER. 8. We therefore ought to receive such persons.—In contrast to τὸν ἰδνικὸν the Apostle begins with: ἡμεῖς οὖν [οὖν because they receive nothing from the heathens, therefore we, etc.—M.]. The communicative Plural denotes the general Christian duty to take part in missions; hence δεῖλομεν. There is a fine play on the word ὑπολαμβάνειν after μηδὲν λαμβάνοντες; elegans antiphrasis (Carpzov). According to Strabo's definition: οἱ εὐποροὶ τοῖς ἐνδεεῖς ὑπολαμβάνουσι, this word implies both the προέμπευν (v. 6), and the λαμβάνειν εἰς οἰκίαν (2 Jno. 10).

That we may become fellow-workers (for) the truth.—The purpose (ἵνα) is a noble one, viz. to serve the truth and work for it. The Dative τῇ ἀληθείᾳ denotes the object to which the work of the missionaries is devoted; we should become the assistants and fellow-workers of the missionaries; οὖν also refers back to τοιοῦτους, not to τῇ ἀληθείᾳ as Luther, Bengel and Besser allege. Our view is also held by Brückner, Huther, Düsterdieck. Cf. Col. iv. 11: συνεργοὶ εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ; 1 Thess. iii. 2; συνεργὸν ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ; 2 Cor. vii. 28: εἰς ὑμᾶς.

Complaint of a hostile person. vv. 9; 10.

VER. 9. I wrote somewhat to the Church.—Ἐγραψα designates a lost Epistle; τι does not imply that the writing was specially important, but brief, he wrote somewhat (Lücke, Huther, Düsterdieck), the writing was not particularly valuable [nothing is said one way or another, τι leaves the matter quite indefinite and merely imports that he had written somewhat—M.]. The reference here cannot be to the first Epistle (Wolf, Stier al.), or to the second, for they contain not the remotest allusion to the relations here specified. Diotrephes might have withheld it from the Church (Huther).—The Church to which he had written (τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ), is that of which Gaius was a member, who was to correct and repair the injuries done by Diotrephes (vv. 6-8, 11). Hence it is wrong to hold with Bengel ("illius loci, ex quo exierunt. Occupatio: ne Gaius dicat, cur itur ad nos?"), with whom Besser agrees, that the reference here is to the Church from which the missionaries went forth.

But he who loveth to be foremost among them, Diotrephes, doth not receive us.—We have no particulars concerning Diotrephes; it neither may be affirmed nor denied that he was a presbyter or deacon of the Church. But φιλοπρωτεῖων renders it more improbable than probable. It is a pure conjecture to describe him as an opponent of the Jewish Christians (Grotius), or as a gnostic or judaistic false teacher; he was ambitious; this is known. Schol. I. defines φιλοπρωτεῖων thus: ὁ ὑφαρπάζων τὰ πρωτεία.—Αὐτῶν is taken from ἐκκλησία, [the collective noun—M.], and designates the members of the Church who, as Huther supposes, were wont to meet at his house. Ἐπιδέχεσθαι ἡμᾶς signifies to receive us; hence not: to acknowledge our Epistles and exhortations (de Lyra, Grotius, Lücke, de Wette and al.).—Huther 1st ed. [corrected in the 2d—M.]. In not complying with the directions given in the Apostle's Epistle, Diotrephes virtually declined to receive the Apostle himself (v. 10).

VER. 10. Therefore, if I come, I will bring to remembrance the works which he doeth.—With διὰ τοῦτο the Apostle bases his coming and censure on the refractory conduct of Diotrephes. On ἐὰν ἔλθω see 1 Jno. ii. 28. That it would take place soon is indicated by εὐθέως, v. 14. It is not necessary to supply αὐτὸν (Huther), or ἐκκλησίαν (Paulus) after ὑπομνήσκω; the Accusative of the person which is added in Jno. xiv. 26; Tit. iii. 1 is also wanting in 2 Tim. ii. 14.—It was the Apostle's intention to censure not only Diotrephes, who was not singular in his reprehensible conduct, but had a friendly party backing him. Bede: "In omnium notitiam manifestius arguendo producam." Although the connection requires us to understand the feature of censure (de Lyra: puniam, Bengel: notabo, et sentiat, animadvertam), the idea of an instructive calling to mind is by all means to be retained; the censure lies in the matter being mentioned and that publicly. Αὐτοῦ τὰ ἔργα, ἃ ποιεῖ are the object of ὑπομνήσκω, and these consist in the sequel, viz.:

Prating against us with wicked words.—On λόγους πονηροὺς see 2 Jno. 11; 1 Jno. iii. 12. They were slanderous words calculated to lower and detract from the Apostle's influence, but idle, worthless tattle, untenable falsehoods; hence φλυαρίων, "apposito calumnias Diotrophis vocat garritum" (Lapide); the intransitive verb has a transitive reference to ἡμᾶς taken from the λόγους πονηροὺς; a similar construction may be seen in μαθητεῖα, Matth. xviii. 19; θριαμβεῖα, Col. ii. 15 (properly nugari, cf. i. Tim. v. 18).

And not contented with this.—Ἀρσενόδοι with the Dative only, occurs at Luke iii. 14; Heb. xiii. 5 instead of ἐπὶ τοῦτο; μὴ ἀρσενόμενος with φλυαρεῖν against the Apostles, he wrongs the missionary brethren in two ways, viz.:

Neither doth he himself receive the brethren.—Οὐτε followed by καὶ is of frequent occurrence, see Winer p. 516, 7. Αὐτὸς answers to βουλομένοις. Ἐπιδέχεσθαι signifies literally to receive, to entertain hospitably, 2 Jno. 10. The reference is to the ἀδελφοὶ mentioned v. 7.

But also, those who would do it, he hindereth.—There was consequently no lack of well-disposed Church-members; but he κωλύει by force, imperiousness, cunning tricks and speeches.

And casteth out of the Church.—Ἐξβάλλειν ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας may signify: to excommunicate, but according to the context also to turn out of the local congregation. In the latter case κωλύει and ἐκβάλλει would have the same object; but in the former ἀδελφοὶ would be the object with αὐτὸς understood. The former, adopted by Düsterdieck on account of the meaning of the word and the construction, seems to be improbable, because excommunication in a case which had no reference to false doctrine or immorality of life, would be immoderate and unheard of, and hardly conceivable at that time. But it might be possible that Diotrephes was wont to hold, or caused to be held, the meetings of the Church in his own house, and refused admittance to those who were opposed to him; but that would not be an excommunication. Huther, who maintains the other view, seems to enter more fully into the circumstances hinted at, and to avoid untenable conjectures.

Exhortation and Commendation. vv. 11, 12.

V. 11. Beloved; peculiarly emphatic as following what goes before. 1 Jno. iv. 1, 7, 11.

Imitate not evil but good.—On μὴ μίμοι see Hebr. xiii. 7; 2 Thess. iii. 7, 9; Eph. v. 1. Τὸ κακὸν in Diotrephes, τὸ ἀγαθὸν in Demetrio (Bengel). De Wette erroneously asserts that the diction here is “un-johannean,” for we have τὰ ἔργα κωνηρὰ and δικαία in 1 Jno. iii. 12; τὸ κακὸν in Jno. xviii. 28; τὰ ἀγαθὰ and τὰ φαύλα in Jno. v. 29: the diction is generally biblical, 1 Pet. iii. 10, 11.

He that doeth good, is (out) of God.—Cf. 1 Jno. iii. 10. ‘Ὁ ἀγαθοποιῶν’ is general, as before (1 Pet. ii. 14; xv. 20; iii. 6, 17); a Lapide, Grotius, Paulus and al. erroneously apply and restrict this expression to benevolence and hospitality.

He that doeth evil, hath not seen God.—It is inconceivable how Lücke and de Wette can call this expression “un-johannean,” considering that ἐκ θεοῦ ἔστιν with the constantly recurring ἐκ θεοῦ εἶναι (1 Jno. iv. 2, 8, 4, 6; iii. 10; v. 19) is manifestly “johannean,” and that we read at 1 Jno. iii. 6: οὐχ ἔρακεν αὐτὸν notwithstanding the addition there of οὐδὲ ἔργακεν αὐτὸν, and at 1 Jno. iv. 8: οὐκ ἔργα τὸν θεόν, 1 Jno. ii. 8: ἐργάσαμεν αὐτὸν.

V. 12. Unto Demetrius testimony hath been borne by all, and by the truth itself.—Demetrius was probably the bearer of this Epistle (Lücke, Düsterdieck, Huther), and John commends him to Gaius. Hence he cannot be one of the βουλομένοι, whom Diotrephes is said to have hindered and excommunicated (Ebrard); in that case he would have been a member of the congregation to which Gaius belonged, and known to him. The Perfect μεμαρτυρηται denotes a testimony which has been given and continues to be valid; used absolutely, without any further qualification, it always denotes a good testimony (Acts vi. 8; x. 22; xvi. 2, etc.). In ὑπὸ πάντων the reference is to Christians; for the matter in question bears on the Christian excellence of Demetrius (Lücke); the restriction to those who knew him, is self-evident, and hence otherwise than in 2 Jno. 1. Limiting it to the brethren vv. 5, 7, 10 (Ebrard), or extending it to Jews and Gentiles (Oecumenius), cannot be done; there is nothing to warrant either construction; the former would require a further qualification, the latter is limited to his congregation by the context.—Καὶ ὑπ’ αὐτῆς τῆς ἀληθείας imports a personified and independent testimony running parallel with that of the πάντες, equal to it, real, and the truth itself giving that testimony. Hence we cannot agree with the explanation of Huther who thinks that the Apostle wanted to give prominence to the circumstance that the good testimony of all was not founded on their human judgment, in the testimony of the ἀλήθεια dwelling in them, and refers to Jno. xv. 26, 27. There the truth does not bear testimony concurrent with, and outside of the πάντες, but in them and out of themselves. We ought rather to think with Düsterdieck of the walk and conversation of Demetrius, in which the ἀλήθεια dwelling in him, shows itself as vital and bearing testimony to him; he is an image of the truth, which is personified in him, in his walk and nature. It is not sufficient to think here only of the res ipsa, or res ipse, the reality (a Lapide, Grotius, Beausobre); the Divine Truth is the witness here. [Alford reproducing, and, as so often, improving on Düsterdieck: “The objective Truth of God, which is the Divine rule of the walk of all believers, gives a good testimony to him, who really walks in the truth. This witness lies in the accordance of his walk with the requirement of God’s Truth. It was the mirror in which the walk of Demetrius was reflected; and his form, thus seen in the mirror of God’s Truth, in which the perfect form of Christ is held up to us (1 Jno. ii. 6; iii. 8, 16), appeared in the likeness of Christ: so that the mirror itself seemed to place in a clear light his Christian virtue and uprightness, and thus to bear witness to him.”—M. J.]

But we also bear testimony.—John adds now his own testimony, as a third [and independent testimony.—M.]; καὶ ἡμεῖς δὲ makes this testimony of the Apostle very emphatic. Cf. notes on 1 Jno. i. 8.

And thou knowest that our testimony is true.—The reference is only to the personal testimony of the Apostle; Grotius explains erroneously: “alii, qui Ephesi sunt.” Cf. Jno. xix. 35; xxi. 24. Gaius knows and values it as a true and reliable testimony; not however because of the episcopal, apostolical and canonical dignity of John (a Lapide), but because of his personal truthfulness.

ETHICAL.

1. Outward prosperity, and more especially physical health, are of sufficient value to become the objects of a Christian wish in the form of intercession, but must always be subordinated to the health, or rather by Divine grace to the recovery of the soul walking in the truth of God. A parallel passage is 2 Cor. xii. 7 (σκόλοψ τῇ σαρκί) cf. v. 9—(ἀρκί σοι ἡ χάρις μου, ἡ γὰρ δύναμις ἐν ἀσθενείᾳ τελείται).

2. The greatest joy of the servants of Christ is, not to labour in vain in their congregations, though they labour for nothing (v. 4).

3. Participation in the work of missions is the sacred duty of individuals (vv. 5–8) as well as of Churches (v. 10), and a life-token of the truth in them (vv. 8, 11). Missionaries are objects of Christian love.

4. Ambition destroys the efficiency and position of men, so that they not only work evil themselves, but also hinder good.

5. Church-visitation is an official work, derived from the Apostolical Church.

6. We should look to and imitate in our walk and conversation those who have a good testimony in truth, not those who err and commit sin.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Compare Ethical.—Health is the foundation of all human activity. A sickly man cannot even think healthily. Men would be surprised, if they were able to take such a survey, to find how many of the things which have filled the world with feuds and laden with errors, may be traced back to a disordered stomach. Who would go to sea in a leaky vessel?

STARKE:—Christians should bless and greet one another, wish one another good, pray for one another, so that all of us may be benefited.—There is none so weak but that he may be of use to others; though it be done only by wishing and praying, yet it is a great service.—A faithful teacher may be known by this token, that he rejoices over the spiritual growth of his hearers and others, and thanks God for it.—The evangelical truth is not still, it walks and causes those to walk who have it.—The natural life is not concluded with one step; sure, the spiritual life is a constant progression unto death.—Preachers have anxiety and toil in their ministry, they meet with hatred and envy, opposition and persecution, mockery and derision, but their joy in the fruits of their labour overcomes all the rest.—Would that all evangelical ministers might become zealous and imitators of the holy men of God, who have faithfully performed the work of the Lord. Let every one be of good cheer and courage in the discharge of his duty and he will be exalted to their society in heaven.—He who seeks only temporal and transitory things in the ministry is an antichrist and brings shame on the name of Christ.—It is very injurious to the course of the Gospel, if its servants seek only their own advantage; this makes more atheists than Christians.—Those who while exhorting others to the practice of godliness, include themselves, not only set a higher value on their exhortation, but also render it more telling and efficacious.—Those who receive the servants of Christ, receive Himself. Should we then not eagerly long to receive Him in His members? He will richly pay for His entertainment.—He that is of the truth and loves the truth must seek to further it in every possible way; this is the mark of a true one.—Be not surprised if thou findest no room with the clear truth among false teachers and prophets; for Christ Himself and His Apostles did not find it.—When loose talkers have exhausted words and proofs, they forthwith have recourse to detraction, slander and abuse.—Devilish malice—not to do good yourself and actually to hinder others who would do good.—False teachers are opposed to the children of God and avoid their company; but this very course shows plainly that they are not the children of God.—Heretics and false teachers foster not only errors of the understanding, but these are also allied to perversity and a malicious will.—The knowledge of the letter [of the Scriptures], is vastly remote from illumination.—He who does not see God by faith here, will not see Him in glory hereafter.—Benefits which have been shown to us, should be publicly acknowledged.

HEUBNER:—Here we are reminded of the double health. How rarely do we ask after the health of the soul: it is thought unbecoming, and yet it is the most important matter.—Let the sick in body be specially anxious for the health of the soul (2 Cor. iv. 16).—Spiritual paternal joys may compensate us for the want of bodily ones (2 Cor. i. 14; 1 Thess. ii. 19).—Where do we now find a congregation interested in the spiritual condition of another congregation?—The exhibition of love to the messengers of the Gospel, is a duty we owe to the Gospel itself. Such love exalts the praise of Christianity and of the Church.—Diotrephes probably turned them away as vagabonds. There were of course those who went begging in the name of the Gospel, idle begging brothers [Grussbrüder], like the μαρτυροί among the heathen went begging in the name of Mother Cybele.—The hatred of strange, calling and visiting Christians which is also found among clergymen, proceeds from a secret, wicked malice; they do not want strangers to become acquainted with the condition of their congregation, or to bring the Gospel which they themselves do lack; they are afraid of being eclipsed and of having their credit impaired (1 Thess. ii. 16).—Demetrius is so faithful and simple that the truth itself commends him in speaking forth from him. This is the best commendation, which we can have through ourselves and through faith (2 Cor. i. 12).—You cannot give a testimonial to others, unless you have out of yourselves [i. e., from their life and conversation.—M.] a testimony of the truth.

BESSE:—Hospitality was a conspicuous virtue of the first Christians, and St. Paul enumerates it among the qualities of an unblamable bishop (1 Tim. iii. 8; Tit. i. 8). Every parsonage, yea, every Christian house was a home to travellers, where expelled brethren, or brethren travelling as evangelists met with hospitable welcome.—Instead of causing his name (Diotrephes, one nursed by Jupiter, the great mythological god of the heathen) to be mistaken and of becoming a Theotrophes, one nursed by God, he continued in the captivity of the love of the world.—The elder would not have admonished a confirmed obdurate man.—When a Diotrephes desired to be highly esteemed, a John had to be little esteemed. Where it is impossible to obey the law of God, there we ought not to be possible.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Close of the Epistle. vv. 13, 14.

VER. 13. I should have much to write to thee.—Πολλὰ, emphatic, placed first. The Imperfect εἶχον without ἄν, is idiomatic Greek and must be rendered in the Subjunctive in German. See Winer p. 283 sqq.; [The objection to the rendering of E. V. "I had many things to write" is that the Apostle does not advert to the past but to the present. So Huther 2d ed. "I should have much to write" brings out this shade of thought in English.—M.]

But I will not write unto thee with ink and pen.—Cf. 2 Jno. 12.

VER. 14. But I hope, soon to see thee.—The contrast to writing, for which the Apostle has no further inclination (Düsterdieck), is oral intercourse which he hopes soon to realize.

And we shall speak mouth to mouth.—The Future λαλήσομεν denotes the assurance of hope. The object is πολλὰ v. 13, and the particulars indicated in the Epistle.

Greetings v. 14.

VER. 14. Peace be to thee.—The greeting of the Apostle to the beloved Gaius. As at the beginning of the Epistle the simple χαίρειν is not sufficient for the fullness of the Christian greeting, so at the close the common ἐπὶ ἁσιν (Acts xxiii. 30; xv. 29) is displaced by richer and deeper forms. There the wish of peace is most appropriate (Gal. vi. 16; Eph. vi. 23; 1 Pet. v. 14; 2 Thess. iii. 16; Rom. xv. 33 and al.), because peace may be regarded as the sum-total of the Divine gifts of grace in Christ (Luke. ii. 4; Jno. xiv. 27) as N. de Lyra correctly explains it: "Pax interna conscientie, pax fraterna amicitie, pax superna glorie" (Düsterdieck). [Alford: "Remember our Lord's legacy, Jno. xiv. 27; and His greeting after the resurrection, εἰρήνη ὑμῖν, Jno. xx. 19, 26."].—Joy moreover is health of the soul.

The friends salute thee.—Bengel: "Rara in N. T. appellatio, absorpta majori fraternitatis. Errant philosophi, qui putant amicitiam non intrinseca fide." Jno. xv. 16. The expression suits a purely private Epistle, written on purely personal relations (Lücke). Bede: "Amicis gratiam pacis mandat et salutis et per hæc Diotrephen ceterosque veritatis inimicos a salute et pace vestra monstrat extraneos." Among the ἀδελφοί, which are generally saluted (Phil. iv. 21; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; Eph. vi. 23), John, according to 2 Jno. 9–11, probably included Diotrephes, because he acted only as an ambitious, but does not seem to have been wrong and erred in the doctrine of Christ's incarnation; but he and his party were not φίλοι to the Apostle, like Gaius and Demetrius. Cf. Jno. xi. 11; Acts xxvii. 3.

Greet the friends by name.—Κατ' ὄνομα=ὀνομαστί (Jno. x. 8); Bengel: "Non secus ac si nomina eorum præscripta essent." The greetings, and especially those by name, have so deep an import and so great a value, that Paul fills a whole chapter of his Epistle to the Romans (ch. xvi. 1–24) with them, and often adds a series.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKES:—It is not advisable to confide every thing to the pen; many things may be better and more effectively stated orally than in writing.—It is not a small benefit, if the children of God may visit each other and delight in friendly conversation.—We are in the company of the holy men of God whenever we hear or read their writings.

HEUBNER:—We see, how even letters of friendship are hallowed by faith. Everything should have the impress of our evangelical frame of mind. A mind wholly penetrated by the spirit of Christianity will not deny itself even in unimportant letters of friendship. Examples may be seen in Sailer's Christian letters of every century, in the letters of Luther, Tersteegen and John Newton.—The children of peace receive peace (Luke x. 5, 6).

BESSER:—John greets the friends by name; he carries them all in his heart, and every one in particular. This is presbyter-fidelity.—

[WORDSWORTH:—The good pastor imitates that Good Shepherd, who "callest His sheep by name." Jno. x. 8.—M.]

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. CONTENTS AND ARRANGEMENT.

THE salutation and prayer of blessing in vv. 1. 2 is followed by a statement of the occasion and design of the Epistle, v. 3. The author's object is to exhort his readers to contend for the faith delivered unto them, against the daring perversions of deceivers, v. 4.—PART I., v. 5-16. The first section calls to mind the punitive justice of God, as illustrated by three leading examples, the first in the judgment on Israel (v. 5), the second in that on fallen angels (v. 6), and the third in that on the Gentiles in Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 7). The second section (v. 8-16) gives a more particular account of the deceivers and evil-doers referred to in general terms in v. 4; they exhibit the following characteristics: a. they defile the flesh; b. despise dominions; c. and blaspheme the majesties with fearful daring and blindness, vv. 8-10; they are compared to Cain, Balaam and Korah, and a woe is uttered on them, v. 11; their traits, one ever exceeding the other in detestableness, are then enumerated, vv. 12. 16. 19, with a parenthetical application to them of Enoch's ancient prophecy of the judgment, vv. 14. 15. Their voluptuousness, sensuality, selfishness, discontent, flattery, their spirit of murmuring and pride, their separating from the faith of the Church, and their gross carnality are described in the next place.—PART II., from v. 17, contains exhortations: a. to mindfulness of the words of the Apostles foretelling the appearance of such deceivers and scoffers, vv. 17. 18; b. to a firm foundation and continuance in the love of God, with constant prayer, and confident hope of the coming of Christ, vv. 20. 21; c. to loving compassion on the deceived, yet with hatred of evil, vv. 22. 23; and concludes with a doxology to God, which includes a strong consolation.

§ 2. THE AUTHOR OF THE EPISTLE.

1. As to ancient testimony, we find that the Epistle had been received into the Canon of Scripture in the fourth century. Jerome acknowledges its genuineness, but observes that in consequence of a quotation from the apocryphal book of Enoch, it was rejected by most—their rejection of it was consequently not on objective, historical grounds. [The words of Jerome in Catal., s. v. Judas are: "Judas, frater Jacobi, parvam quidam, quæ se septem catholicis est, epistolam reliquit. Et quia de Enocho, qui apocryphus est, in ea assumit testimonium, a plerisque rejicitur; tamen auctoritatem vetustate et jam usu meruit, et inter sanctas scripturas computatur."—M.] Eusebius classes it with the Antilegomena, and adds that although many of the ancients did not mention it, it was nevertheless publicly used in most Churches. Origen refers to it in respectful terms [Comm. in Matt. xiii. 55. 56, t. x., § 17, "Jude wrote an Epistle of but few verses, yet fitted with vigorous words of heavenly grace"—M.], quotes it repeatedly, and only in one place implies doubts as to its genuineness. [Comm. in Matt. xxii. 23. t. xiii., § 30, "if indeed the Epistle of Jude be received."—M.] It is mentioned in the old Muratorian fragment [circa A. D. 170, which reads: "Epistola sane Jude et superscripti Johannis duce in Catholica (Bunsen, Anal. Ante-Nic., I., 152, reads "Catholicis") habentur."—M.]. Clement of Alexandria commented on it, and expressly ascribed it to Jude. Tertullian says: "Enoch possesses a testimony in Jude the Apostle;" and Origen also calls him an Apostle in two places. Guerike, Neuest. Isagogik, p. 454. It is wanting in the old Syriac Peshito (but not in the MS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford), Huther, p. 189. The testimony of the Fathers does not go further back. ["It is also quoted by Ephrem Syrus as Apostolic (Opp. Syr., I., p. 136); by Malchian, a presbyter of Antioch, in a letter to the bishops of Alexandria and Rome (Eus., H. E., vii. 30), and by Palladius, the friend of Chrysostom (Chrys., Opp., xiii., Dial., cc. 18. 20), and is contained in the Laodicene (A. D. 363), Carthaginian (397), and so-called Apostolic Catalogues, as well as in those emanating from the Churches of the East and West, with the exception of the synopsis of Chrysostom, and those of Cassiodorus and Ebed Jesu." Venables, in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, article, Ep. of Jude.—M.] The reason may lie in the shortness of the Epistle, in its affinity with 2 Peter, and as we shall convince ourselves, in its non-Apostolic origin. [To this must be added the quotation from an apocryphal book, which it contains.—M.] Summing up the testimony, we find that it preponderates in favour of the genuineness of the Epistle.

2. As to the internal grounds, the critics have been unable to establish any tenable objections. De Wette remarks that the authorship of Jude is neither affected by the use of the book of Enoch, nor by his probable acquaintance with the Epistle to the Romans, nor by his harsh diction, which, nevertheless, betrays familiarity with the Greek language. Huther justly meets Schwegler's superficial assumption that vv. 17. 18 assign to the Epistle a post-Apostolic date, by saying that those verses by no means point to post-Apostolic times, for they rather suppose the readers of the Epistle to have heard the preaching of the Apostles, and that if, as Schwegler farther assumes, the Epistle was designed to serve the interests of Judaism against Paulinism, it ought certainly to appear somehow in the Epistle; a forger, moreover, would hardly have ascribed his writing to a man of such little prominence as this Jude. Although we must not attach undue importance to the arguments drawn from the silence of the Epistle, the circumstance, brought forward by Bertholdt, Guerike, Stier and al., that the author of the Epistle does not refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, is certainly worthy of great consideration; "if," says Stier, "the Epistle had not been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, this last, and next to the flood (which is only alluded to) most terrible of all the judgments and punitive examples of God, could not have been passed over in silence." The objections of Hofmann and Huther to this inference do not amount to much; more important would be the objection that a forger who did make mention of the judgment passed on Jerusalem, would not have been an adept at his trade. The former reason, in conjunction with other reasons, is at all events of considerable weight. The Epistle breathes forth a strictly moral spirit, it glows with zeal against error and vice, with loving care for the salvation of souls, and a profound reverence of God and His word. It is, therefore, every way worthy to have originated with a primitive Christian man, who stood so nearly related to the Lord. Cf. Herzog's Real Encycl., art. Judas.—[Alford, Greek Test., IV., 447, well characterizes the main body of the Epistle as an impassioned invective, in the impetuous whirlwind of which, the writer is hurried along, collecting example after example of Divine vengeance on the ungodly, heaping epithet upon epithet, and piling image upon image, and, as it were, labouring for words and images strong enough to depict the polluted character of the licentious apostates against whom he is warning the Church; returning again and again to the subject, as though all language were insufficient to give an adequate idea of their profligacy, and to express his burning hatred of their perversion of the doctrines of the Gospel.—M.]—We must not suffer our judgment to be affected by the use of the apocryphal book of Enoch, of the tradition of Enoch and the ascensio Moysis, seeing that Paul also names the Egyptian magicians Jannes and Jambres, although nothing is said of them in the historical books of the Old Testament, 2 Tim. iii. 8; but rather admire the reserve with which the author of our Epistle uses the book of Enoch, which contains so much that is fantastic, and recognize in that reserve a leading of the Divine Spirit. Besides its decided dependence on the Second Epistle of Peter, the Epistle of Jude contains many original traits, striking comparisons, e. g., vv. 12. 13, characteristic delineation in few words, v. 19, wise and thoughtful exhortations, vv. 20-23. In proof of the author's originality, it must be mentioned that the twenty-five verses of this Epistle contain not less than eighteen ἀπαξ λεγόμενα, vv. 3. 4. 7. 10. 11. 12. 13. 15. 17. 19. 23. The author calls himself, v. 1, the servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James.—Jude, as was shown in the Introduction to the Second Epistle of Peter, makes use of Peter's Epistle and acknowledges his entire dependence on him, cf. Jude 18. While Peter describes himself twice as an Apostle of Jesus Christ, and strengthens the weight of his exhortations by his Apostolic authority, Jude confines himself to the simple expression, "a servant of Jesus Christ." While Peter writes, "be mindful of the commandment of us, the Apostles of the Lord and Saviour" (2 Pet. iii. 2), Jude says: "remember the words which were spoken before of the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ," Jude 17. This affords striking proof that we must not look among the Apostles for the author of our Epistle.* He is, therefore, not Judas Lebbæus or Thaddæus, who is mentioned Jno. xiv. 22; Matt. x. 3; Mk. iii. 18, and is called twice Judas Jacobi, Lke. vi. 16; Acts i. 13; Lebbæus, from לֵבְי, and Thaddæus, תָּדִי=breast, are identical in meaning, and a comparison of the lists of the Apostles shows that Judas Jacobi is identical with Judas Lebbæus or Thaddæus. Although grammatically Judas Jacobi may also signify Judas, brother of James (Winer, pp. 218, 667), that construction is inadmissible in this connection, because in the Genitives used in the lists of the Apostles, we have invariably to supply son, not brother. Jude, the Apostle, was consequently a son of James, while our Jude was not an Apostle, and calls himself the brother of James. Ἀδελφός cannot well be taken here in another sense, there being no occasion whatever to render it cousin. But who are these two brothers Jude and James? James, the Apostle, the brother of John, cannot be meant here, for he was early martyred (Acts xii. 2), and probably had no brother besides John (Matt. iv. 21; xx. 20; xxvi. 37; xxvii. 56; Mk. i. xix. 20); nor can it be James the son of Alphæus, called the Little, of whose person and work we have no certain data, cf. Mk. xv. 40. He must be a well-known individual, doubtless the much revered head of the Church at Jerusalem, besides whom history knows no other distinguished man of that name. According to Hegesippus (2d century), in Eusebius (H. E., 3, 19. 20), the emperor Domitian persecuted two grandsons of Jude, who was called a brother of Jesus according to the flesh, and had a brother named James. The same author mentions (Euseb., 2, 23) a James, a brother of the Lord, who along with the Apostles was the head of the Church at Jerusalem, and bore the surname "the Just," cf. ch. i. 12; ii. 1. The passage ch. iv. 22 is exegetically difficult, and perhaps to be interpreted by ch. ii. 23. Josephus informs us that the high-priest Ananus caused James, a brother of the so-called Christ, to be stoned (A. D. 62) and describes him as an altogether just man. The Fathers call him straightway bishop of Jerusalem; so Eusebius, Jerome, Nicephorus. See Winer, p. 525. The ancient Church, therefore, considered the Jude and the James here referred to, to have been the brothers of the Lord according to the flesh. How does this agree with the New Testament? Paul, in Gal. i. 19, introduces James, the Lord's brother, and evidently distinguishes him by that designation from the Apostle James the Less, and describes him as an Apostle in a wider sense, cf. 2 Cor. viii. 23; Rom. xvi. 7; Phil. ii. 25; Acts xiv. 14. Hence we need not be surprised that some of the Fathers, e. g., Jerome, Epiphanius and Augustine, call him also an Apostle. But may not ἀδελφός here bear the sense of cousin, and relate to James, the * Note of Dr. Lange:—Having presented the opposite view in Comm. on Matthew, p. 255 (American edition), in the article, Jacobus, in Herzog's Real-Encyclopædie, and in the work Apostol. Zeitalter, I., p. 189, we take here occasion to observe that we consider differences of this kind in historical questions unavoidable in a Protestant Commentary on the Bible, and quite compatible with the unity in spirit and the unity on essential questions of faith, which is assumed to belong to the respective contributors to this work. Without giving rise to dogmatical scruples, such differences have the tendency of more strongly confirming even the more practical theologian in his opinion. We rejoice that the highly esteemed author of this section of the Commentary, besides the general blessed vocation of a beloved co-labourer, has throughout exhibited a desirable exegetical tact on many questions of this kind, e. g., on Christ's preaching among the dead, in the First Epistle of Peter, on the fall of angels in the Second Epistle of Peter, ch. ii., and in this Epistle; and we are aware that he has recently found powerful support of his views in Riggenbach's Leben Jesu, and in our dear friend Van Oosterzee's Comm. on Luke, without shaking the firmness with which we hold a conviction, for which the reasons are given on the respective passages.

son of Alphæus? Winer justly remarks that he could not, without confusion, have been called ἀδελφός, because Jesus had a brother according to the flesh of the same name. For the brothers and sisters of the Lord are introduced in Matt. xiii. 55; Mk. vi. 3. The names of the former were James, Joses, Simon and Jude, cf. 1 Cor. ix. 5; Matt. xii. 48; Jno. ii. 12; Acts i. 14. They are mentioned in connection with the mother of Jesus and Joseph, and are doubtless His actual brothers. For ἀδελφός in forty-nine passages of the New Testament signifies actual brother, while the sense cousin cannot be proved in a single passage. At first they did not believe in Him as the Messiah, Jno. vii. 5, but after the resurrection of Jesus, 1 Cor. xv. 7, and after the ascension, we find them forming part of the circle of believers, Acts i. 14. Among the brothers of the Lord, after they had become believers, James soon occupied a prominent position. He is introduced as the representative of the Jewish Christian tendency in the Mother Church, Acts xii. 17. His near bodily relation to the Lord, his pious life and austere habits soon raised him to Apostolical dignity. At the Apostolical Council on the obligatoriness of the law, his judgment proved decisive, Acts xv. 13. The council of elders gathered round him, ch. xxi. 18. Among the pillars of the Church, he is mentioned first (Gal. ii. 9), while otherwise Peter is the Prince of the Apostles. He is probably the author of the Epistle of James in the Canon; for the principles contained therein are in exact keeping with the notices of his life, reported by the Fathers, and he, like Jude, describes himself, not as an Apostle, but only as a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ (Jas. i. 1). If it be objected that Luke does not clearly distinguish the non-Apostolic James from the Apostle James, who is mentioned in Acts i. 13, we may answer with Huther that the then familiarity with all the circumstances of the case did not require such a distinction to be specially marked, and that the same holds good in the case of the two Philips, Acts i. 13; viii. 5. Wieseler's assertion that the Church at Jerusalem would not have recognized as its head any other than an Apostle, cannot be substantiated by any reasons. Our Jude was then the brother of that revered head at Jerusalem, and with him sustained the same family relation to the Lord. His not describing himself as the Lord's brother, like James in his Epistle, may have been the effect of modesty, or his sense of the spiritual relation in which he stood to Christ may have predominated over that of his physical relation, even as it was the case with our Lord Himself, Matt. xii. 48-50. Winer, Stier, Neander and al. hold that Jesus had actual brothers; for the opposite view, see Lange, in Herzog's Real-Encyclopædie, Article Jacobus.—We have no reliable data concerning the life and work of Jude. He has generally been confounded with Judas Lebbaeus, as James the Just with James, the son of Alphæus, cf. Cave, Lives, Acts and Martyrdoms of the Holy Apostles, p. 600, etc. [See note in Introduction to the Epistle of James, at the close of § 1, the Introduction to James and Jude in Alford's Greek Testament, Prolegomena, pp. 87, 188, and on the whole subject, my article, "Are James, the Son of Alphæus, and James, the Brother of the Lord, identical?" in the Princeton Review for January, 1865.—M.]

§ 3. READERS AND DATE OF THE EPISTLE.

It is singular that the readers are referred to only in very general terms, as the called who are sanctified in God the Father and preserved for Jesus Christ. No residence, no country, no particular account of the readers is given. Considering the dependence of this Epistle on the Second of Peter (see Introd. to 2d Ep. of Peter), it is probable that it was addressed to the same readers in Asia Minor, with a view to support and strengthen the exhortations and warnings of Peter. Others suppose that it was addressed to readers in Palestine, on account of the examples, comparisons and allusions used by our author; so Credner, Augusti, Arnaud. The adversaries whom Jude opposes are identical with those mentioned in 2 Peter; they are daring intruders, who abused the liberty of the Gospel to a fearful extent, and indulged in enormous excesses. De Wette supposes them to have been, not false teachers, but practical unbelievers, vv. 4. 8, scoffers, threatening to destroy the Church, on the one hand, by sensuality and dissoluteness, vv. 8. 10. 12, and on the other, by discontent, opposition and separatism, vv. 11. 16. 19. But the Epistle contains certain intimations of false doctrines by which they sought to excuse their false, immoral principles (vv. 4. 12), which rendered them so much the more dangerous. Dörner rightly observes that "the adversaries of Jude are not only practical perverts, but also false teachers." This is also the view of Huther, who says that vv. 4. 8. 18. 19 intimate that they held Gnostico-antinomian views. Thiersch:—"Peter warns his readers against deceivers that should come; Jude, writing not long after Peter, warns his readers against the same deceivers, after they had come, with a distinct reference to the warnings and predictions of the Apostles." It must not be overlooked that Clement of Alexandria (Strom., 3, p. 431) supposes Jude in his Epistle to have prophetically referred to the Carpoetratians and similar sects; see Guerike, p. 455.—The beginnings of such a demoniac Gnosis, which sanctioned pagan licentiousness, stirred during the second half of the first century in the Churches of Ephesus, Pergamos and Thyatira. See Thiersch, p. 239.

As to the date of this Epistle, it must have been written during the interval between the death of Peter, who wrote his second Epistle, which was used by Jude, shortly before his death, and the destruction of Jerusalem, because it contains no reference to that event (see above). Jude saw the impudent libertinism, the appearance of which had been foretold by Peter, in its full development. "It is not credible," says Huther, "that Jude should have referred to the preaching of the Apostles, as past, if these were still in the prime of their Apostolical activity." The place where the Epistle was written cannot be determined.

The closer we draw to the last times of the Church, the more we ought to lay to heart this Epistle, which, as Meyer says, is a key-stone and an admonition of the most dangerous sins of the Church, and which, like the 2d Ep. of Peter, furnishes us with important disclosures relating to judgment and eternity. Capital applications of it to our own time are contained in Stier's Exposition.

[§ 6. THE BOOK OF ENOCH.]

As this book is generally supposed to be referred to in v. 14, a brief account of it, compiled from Westcott's article in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, and notices of Volkmar's article in the "Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft" for 1860, will be found useful to the readers of this Commentary.

1. The history of the Book of Enoch.—The Book was known to Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Anatolius, Clement of Alexandria and Origen; numerous references to it are found in the "Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs."—Tertullian quotes it as "not received by some, nor admitted into the Jewish canon ("in armarium Judaicum"), but defends it on account of its reference to Christ ("legimus omnem scripturam ædificationi habilem divinitus inspirari"). Augustine and an anonymous writer, whose work is printed with Jerome's, were acquainted with it; but from their time until the revival of letters, it was known in the Western Church only by the quotations in Jude, in the Eastern Church, some centuries later; considerable fragments of it are preserved in the Chronographia of Georgius Syncellus (circa, 792 A. D.); meanwhile, a report was current that the entire book was preserved in Abyssinia; in 1773, the traveller Bruce, on his return from Egypt, brought with him the complete Æthiopic translation of the entire book, the first detailed notice of which was not given until 1800, by Silvestre de Sacy, and the book itself was not published until 1821 in English, and in 1838 in Æthiopic, by Archbishop Lawrence, whose translation formed the basis of the German editions of Hoffmann (1833-38), and Gfroerer (1840) gave a Latin translation constructed from those of Lawrence and Hoffmann; but all these editions have been superseded by those of Dillmann, who edited the Æthiopic text from five MSS. (Liber Henoch, Æthiopice, Lipsiæ, 1851), and afterwards gave a German translation of the book, with a good introduction and commentary (Das Buch Henoch . . . von Dr. A. Dillmann, Leipzig, 1853), which has called forth a number of Essays, the most important of which are those of Ewald and Hilgenfeld.

2. The Æthiopic translation is supposed to have been made from the Greek, as, with the exception of one passage quoted by Syncellus, it agrees in the main with the patristic quotations. But it is doubtful whether the Greek text was original, or itself a translation from the Hebrew. A Hebrew book of Enoch was known and used by Jewish writers till the thirteenth century, and the names of angels and winds are derived from Aramaic roots.

3. The book, in its present shape, consists of a series of revelations, supposed to have been given to Enoch and Noah, which extended to the most varied aspects of nature and life, and are designed to offer a comprehensive vindication of the action of Providence.

4. "In doctrine the book of Enoch exhibits a great advance of thought within the limits of revelation in each of the great divisions of knowledge. The teaching on nature is a curious attempt to reduce the scattered images of the O. T. to a physical system. The view of society and man, of the temporary triumph and final discomfiture of the oppressors of God's people, carries out into elaborate detail the pregnant images of Daniel. The figure of the Messiah is invested with the majestic dignity as "the Son of God," "whose name was named before the sun was made," and "who existed aforetime in the presence of God." And at the same time His human attributes as "the Son of man," "the Son of woman," "the Elect One," "the Righteous One," "the Anointed," are brought into conspicuous notice. The mysteries of the spiritual world, the connection of angels and men, the classes and the ministries of the hosts of heaven, the power of Satan and the legions of darkness, the doctrines of resurrection, retribution and eternal punishment are dwelt upon with growing earnestness, as the horizon of speculation was extended by intercourse with Greece. But the message of the book is emphatically one of "faith and truth," and while the writer combines and repeats the thoughts of Scripture, he adds no new element to the teaching of the prophets. His errors spring from an undisciplined attempt to explain their words, and from a proud exultation in present success. For the great characteristic by which the book is distinguished from the later Apocalypse of Esdras (2d book), is the tone of triumphant expectation by which it is pervaded. It seems to repeat in every form, the great principle that the world, natural, moral and spiritual, is under the immediate government of God. Hence it follows that there is a terrible retribution reserved for sinners, and a glorious kingdom prepared for the righteous, and Messiah is regarded as the Divine Mediator of this double issue. Nor is it without a striking fitness that a patriarch, translated from earth, and admitted to look upon the Divine Majesty, is chosen as "the herald of wisdom, righteousness and judgment to a people who, even in suffering, saw in their tyrants only the victims of a coming vengeance." (Westcott, l. c.).

5. On the date of the Book the most conflicting views prevail. Lawrence, Hoffmann, Gfroerer, Wieseler and Gieseler suppose it to have been completed in the reign of Herod the Great; Lücke distinguishes two great parts, an older, written early in the time of the Maccabees, and a later, composed in the time of Herod the Great. Dillmann maintains the unity of the book, and assigns the chief part of it to an Aramaean writer of the time of John Hyrcanus (circa, 110 B. C.). Hilgenfeld places the original book about the beginning of the first century before Christ, which he supposes to have passed through the hands of a Christian writer, who lived between the times "of Saturninus and Marcion," who added the chief remaining portions, including the great Messianic section (cc. 37-71).—Volkmar (l. c.) tries to prove that the book is a production of the time of the sedition of Barchochebas (A. D. circa 132), and to have been written by one of the followers of Rabbi Akiba, the great upholder of that impostor. In that case, the book of Enoch was not only of Jewish, but of distinctly antichristian origin; which point, however, is not yet fully established. (See Alford, Prolegg., p. 196). Westcott (l. c.) reaches the conclusion that, as a whole, the book "may be regarded as describing an important phase of Jewish opinion shortly before the coming of Christ."

6. The apocryphal character of the Book has never been doubted in the Church; Tertullian alone maintains its authority; Origen (c. Cels., V. 54), Augustine (de Civitate Dei, XV., 23, 4), and Jerome (Catalog. Script. Eccl., 4) describe it as apocryphal, and it is reckoned among the apocryphal books in the Apostolical Constitutions (VI., 16).—M.]

Verse 4. [<sup>12</sup> Sin. inserts καὶ before πάλαι. προγράφω—to write before, to declare, describe beforehand; ordained adopted by E. Griech. and al., following the best authorities, omit ὁδῶν, which is doubtless a gloss, and found its way into the text because δεικνύς is used of the Father in all passages except 2 Pet. ii. 1; cf. Lka. ii. 29; Acts iv. 24; Rev. vi. 10. μόνος, moreover, did not seem to suit Christ.

[<sup>15</sup> A. B. C., Sin. omit ὁδῶν. Agreeing with this omission, translate: “For certain men have crept in privily, who have been long ago described beforehand (in the Holy Scriptures) for this condemnation, ungodly, perverting the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying our only Master, and Lord Jesus Christ.”—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. Jude (from יְהוֹדָה, יָדָה, the praised, the confessor), different from Judas Iscariot and Judas Lebbæus, or Thaddæus. See Introduction.

A servant of Jesus Christ.—δούλος; used in a restricted sense of persons intrusted with an office in the Church, cf. 2 Pet. i. 1. Paul calls himself so, Rom. i. 1; Tit. i. 1; Phil. i. 1; and James i. 1. Paul and Peter superadd their call to the Apostolate; Jude and James omit ἀπόστολος. The simple reason of this omission is that they were no Apostles. This omission is the more remarkable in the case of Jude, because, as has been shewn in the Introduction to 2 Peter, during the composition of this Epistle, he had before him the 2d Ep. of Peter, and especially also its introductory sentences. If the author of this Epistle and Judas Thaddæus, the Apostle, were identical, the silence he observes concerning his Apostleship would be unaccountable.

Brother of James.—Of that James, who was a brother of the Lord according to the flesh, and author of the Epistle that bears his name. See Introduction. Both are silent concerning their fraternal relation to the Lord. Why? Both may have remembered His words: “Who is my mother and who are my brethren?” Matt. xii. 49. A servant of Christ is really a nearer relation than a mere brother after the flesh, cf. 2 Cor. v. 16. It is commonly said that modesty prompted Jude to call himself a brother of James and not a brother of the Lord (Bengel, Stier); but we ought not to forget that the recollection of that fraternal relation must have been very humiliating to him, for, although so nearly related to the Lord, he did not believe in Him for a long time, Jno. vii. 8-5. According to Huther, the words “brother of James” are not only intended to designate the individuality of the author (cf. Jno. xiv. 22), but also to justify his writing; they possibly intimate that this Epistle was destined for the readers of that of James, seeing they are not described in more particular terms. See Introduction.

To the called—Jesus Christ.—To the called, sc., greeting; κλητοί which is the principal word of the whole clause, signifies not only persons invited or bidden, but those in whom the Divine calling out of the world has already become efficient, 1 Pet. i. 15; ii. 9. 21; iii. 9; v. 10; 2 Pet. i. 8-10; called saints, 1 Cor. i. 2. 24; Rom. i. 6. 7; Gal. i. 6.

Ἐκασμένους ἐν. To those who, in communion with God the Father, have been acquitted from the guilt and punishment of sins, and made a beginning in the sanctification of the Spirit, cf. 1 Pet. i. 2.

Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ τετηρημένοις. Huther:—“The Part. Perf. simply denotes that which had taken place up to the time when the Epistle was written, but this condition must be conceived continuing according to the force of the Perfect tense.” Cf. Winer, p. 286, sq.—So Stier:—“Jude conceives his readers as having been preserved until then.” They are preserved from seduction and apostasy for Jesus Christ so that they are His possession, the reward of His sufferings, His glory and crown, enabling Him to say of them, “Thine they were and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word,” Jno. xvii. 6. 12; 1 Pet. i. 5.

[Wordsworth;—“The evil angels are preserved or kept for judgment (2 Pet. ii. 4); the heavens are preserved or kept for fire; but ye are preserved or kept for Jesus Christ, as a peculiar people (1 Pet. ii. 9), and there is an everlasting inheritance preserved or kept in heaven for you.”—M.]

VER. 2. Mercy unto you—multiplied.—ἐλεος. Instead of it, 1 Pet. i. 2; 2 Pet. i. 2 have χάρις, while ἐλεος occurs in Gal. vi. 16; 2 Tim. i. 16, and in connection with χάρις 1 Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 2; 2 Jno. 8; cf. 1 Pet. i. 3. It is the grace of God and Christ condescending to the helpless and miserable. Stier:—“We learn from the conclusion, v. 21, that Jude refers here particularly to the mercy or grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, for he connects therewith the love of God, and appropriately assigns to the peace of the Holy Ghost the place of a living centre.” De Wette also explains ἀγάπη as the love of God to Christians, deeming the verb κληθῆναι to be better suited to such an interpretation. On κληθῆναι, cf. 1 Pet. i. 2. Bengel's note is: “a testimony of the Holy Trinity.”

VER. 8.—When I gave all diligence, etc.—πάσαν σπουδὴν ποιέσθαι. To use all diligence, to be earnest in something either inwardly in mind and purpose, or outwardly in the execution of an action. Peter has σπουδὴν πᾶσαν παραπορεύειν, 2 Peter i. 5, and σπουδάζειν, ch. i. 15. Here it denotes inward purpose. The Part. Pres., as de Wette observes, expresses the author's action at the time he had occasion to write (cf. Winer, p. 406), but he seems to be wrong in supposing his writing to be already an action on the point of being executed. His opinion is, that Jude had been engaged on the composition of a longer and more comprehensive Epistle, (the loss of which we have to lament), when he was for the time called away from that work in order to write this present Epistle. His reference to Sherlock is inaccurate, for he only adverts to Jude's intention of writing more fully.

Concerning our common salvation.—He had desired to write concerning its acquisition, enjoyment and preservation. This exhibits a contrast to the hortatory Epistle which circumstances (the appearance of antinomians or some other cause unknown to us) constrained him to indite.

I felt the necessity, etc.—Ἐσχον ἀνάγκην, I had with me, I felt within me the necessity, I saw myself inwardly constrained, cf. Luke xiv. 18; xxiii. 17; 1 Cor. vii. 37; Heb. vii. 27; παρὰ καλῶν denotes the character and tone, as well as the scope and matter of the Epistle.

Ἐπαγωνίζεσθαι, to fight concerning and for a thing [metaphorically in the sense of earnestly contending for a thing.—M.]. Bengel: "There is a twofold duty, strenuously to fight for the faith against enemies, and to edify oneself in faith, v. 20; cf. Neh. iv. 16, etc." [ἐπαγωνίζεσθαι, supercertare, is to fight, standing upon a thing which is assaulted and which the adversary desires to take away, and it is to fight so as to defend it, and to retain it.—M.]

For the faith, πιστεῖ, here the faith that is believed, objectively, the Gospel as v. 20; Gal. iii. 26; Rom. i. 5. We have here a reference to 2 Peter i. 1, whence it follows that πίστις there also must be taken objectively.

Once, not—at one time, formerly, but once for all, so that it continues thus forever, that it is liable to no changes, and that no new revelation is to be looked for. [Casaubon: "To contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints. Divine words, few in number, but rich in meaning. If rightly understood and duly obeyed, these words would put an end to all modern controversies, and restore peace to the Church. Do we desire to know what the true faith is? St. Jude here tells us—that which was once, and once for all delivered to the saints. Every doctrine which can be shown to be posterior to that faith, is new; and every doctrine that is new is false."—M.]. "No other faith will be given." Bengel.

Delivered (communicated) not immediately by God, as Bengel interprets, but by the Apostles, cf. 2 Pet. ii. 21; 1 Cor. xi. 2. 23; xv. 3; Luke i. 2.

To the saints.—Cf. 1 Peter ii. 9; iii. 5; 2 Peter i. 21; iii. 2; Col. i. 2. 12; iii. 12; Philem. 5. 7; Heb. iii. 1; vi. 10; Eph. i. 1. 15. 18; ii. 19; iii. 8. 18. [Bengel: Sanctis omnibus ex fide sanctissima, v. 20.—M.]

VER. 4. For certain men—condemnation.—This verse supplies the reason of that necessity and of the contest which the readers are bound to maintain.

παρεσθῆναι, to enter by the side of, to creep in stealthily by a side-door. Those deceivers passed the right door, John x. 7, and like thieves and robbers entered by some other way into the fold of the Church, John x. 1. De Wette says rightly, that "it is not said that these men did creep in from without, but only, that their sentiments and habits were foreign to those of the Christian community, and that they ought not to belong to it." Similar are the expressions παρεσφύρειν αἰρέτους, 2 Peter ii. 1, παρεστέρχεσθαι and παρεστακτος, Gal. ii. 4. Cf. 1 John ii. 19; 2 Tim. iii. 6.

["Le mot trahes à quelque chose de méprisant, comme dans Gal. ii. 12." Arnaud.—M.]

Ὁ προεγραμμένον. The Article is used emphatically with the Participle, if the participial character is to be made especially prominent, cf. Winer, p. 120. They are unknown, insignificant men, but they have long since been described in the word of God. προγράψαι, to write beforehand of one, to predict by the word and by types. Cf. Rom. xv. 4. The pregnant term denotes,

1. That they were described beforehand, e. g., Ps. xxxv. 16; x. 4; xxxvi. 2; lviii. 4; Prov. xiii. 25, and typified in the people who lived at the time of the flood, in the people of Sodom, in the wicked persecutors of David.

2. They were beforehand appointed for judgment, not by an absolute predestination, but because of their wickedness, which God foresaw in the light of His omniscience. Isa. iv. 8; rendered by the LXX. οἱ γραφέντες εἰς ζωὴν, might be compared with this passage and applied to the eternal purpose of God, compared with a book, as Calvin does, but Luther rightly observes that πάσαι, long since, from of old, forbids such an interpretation. It is this very word which renders all reference to the Epistles of Paul and Peter inadmissible, as Grotius sees here a particular allusion to 2 Peter ii.; it is doubtful whether, as Bengel maintains, there is here a reference to the Book of Enoch in the sense that Enoch predicted long before what afterwards became fixed in writing. [Alford thinks that the reference is to the Book of Enoch, cf. v. 17, but deems it probable that the warnings contained in the historical facts mentioned below, may also be meant.—M.]

For this condemnation, of which the Apostle [?] treats in the sequel, seeing it, as it were, already present. Κριμα, here a judgment of condemnation.—The corresponding passage in Peter is, "whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not," 2 Peter ii. 8. [Wordsworth: "The doom which they would incur, had been προεγραμμένον, written public beforehand in the prophecy of Enoch (v. 14), and visibly displayed in the punishment of the Israelites (v. 5), and in that of the rebel angels (v. 6), and had been graven indelibly in letters of fire on the soil of Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 7)."]

Since God is unchangeably just and holy, all who sin after the manner of those thus punished, must look for like punishment to theirs. They have been publicly designated beforehand for it, by the punishment of those whom they imitate in sin. Therefore, these false teachers cannot plead ignorance of the consequences of their sin.

and you will be without excuse, if you are deceived by them.

The false teachers here specially noted, were the Simonians, Nicolaitans and Ebionites."—M.]

Ungodly—lasciviousness, i. e., according to Stier's explanation, those who refuse to know any thing of fear, submission and adoration. Men who, having torn themselves loose from God, the root of our life, show this in their life, cf. 1 Peter iv. 18; 2 Peter ii. 5; iii. 7; Jude 16; Rom. iv. 5; v. 6; 1 Tim. i. 9. Their ungodliness is described by two exhibitions: a. They turn the grace of God into lasciviousness; χάρις, not—evangelical doctrine, Christian religion (Calov, al.), nor—acquired life of grace (de Wette, who compares Gal. v. 4; 1 Peter v. 12), for the description which follows renders it highly improbable, that these men had received (although only in part, as Stier thinks) the first-fruits of the Spirit in conscious regeneration. But it is the grace offered to them in baptism, in calling, in the preaching of the word, in Holy Scripture, acquired for them by Christ and now ready for their acceptance. They take hold of it, but put it in the wrong place, viz., there where the law ought to be, this is the force of μεταστῆναι; instead of using it as an incentive to holiness, they employ it as a cloak of maliciousness, 1 Peter ii. 16, as a passport of unrighteousness, Rom. vi. 1. 2; 2 Peter ii. 19; Gal. v. 13. They draw the daring conclusion: Because God is so merciful, because Christ has redeemed us from sin, because this and that sin have been passed unpunished, therefore we need not be so particular concerning sin, cf. Sir. v. 8, sq.; Heb. vii. 12. Of course they thereby do not change the nature of grace, but only deprive themselves of its salutary effects. [They change the state of grace and Christian liberty into a state of moral licence and wantonness; so Alford. Bede: "Hanc gratiam transferunt in luxuriam, qui nunc tanto licentius et liberius peccant, quanto minus se vident asperitatis legis de admittis facinoribus examinari."—M.]

Τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν. Huther: "An expression of the sense of adoption," not exactly, as Bengel maintains, in opposition to the ungodly.

Εἰς ἀσέλγειαν, cf. 1 Pet. iv. 8; 2 Pet. ii. 7. 18.

And deny the only Master, God and the Lord Jesus Christ.—μὴνόν θεοτόκον Θεόν. [See note 14 in App. Crit.—M.]. If Θεόν were a genuine reading, the most natural construction would be this: They deny the Father and the Son (although even in this case the sole reference to Christ would be possible), for the want of the Article would be no objection to it, because it might be omitted on account of ἡμῶν, cf. Winer, pp. 141. 142. Even without the probably false reading Θεόν, θεοτόκον may be applied to the Father, κύριος to the Son, like in Titus ii. 13, according to the doctrine of Paul, μὴνός θεός relates to the Father, σὺν ἡμῖν to the Son; but the comparison of 2 Peter ii. 1, which Jude had before him, shows that the two predicates are to be understood of Christ. While Peter declares Christ to be the Lord that bought even these deceivers with His own blood, Jude infers therefrom that He is their only legitimate Lord, not as contrasted with the other persons of the Godhead, but with foreign lords, who rule over and in them. Isa. xxvi. 18. This view of the passage is not affected by μὴνός, which is generally attributed to the Father, and κύριος retains its ordinary and usual meaning. Huther, on the other hand, understands θεοτόκον of the Father, and cites Enoch xlviii. 11: "They denied the Lord of the spirits and His Messiah," cf. 1 John ii. 22; but this quotation is fully counterbalanced by that of 2 Peter ii. 1.

[Alford applies θεοτόκον to the Father, and argues:

1. That in every other place θεοτόκον is used of God, cf. Luke ii. 29; Acts iv. 24; Rev. vi. 10; Jer. iv. 10.

2. That the addition μὴνός seems to bind this meaning to it here.

3. That the denial of God by disobeying His law is the exegetical resumption of the last clause.

4. θεοτόκον καὶ κύριον are hardly distinguishable if both applied to Christ. On these grounds he agrees with Huther in regarding the rejected Θεόν as having been, although a gloss, yet a true one; and would remind the reader, once for all, that the reference of any term in the parallel place of 2 Peter, is no guide for us here, seeing that it belongs to the extremely curious relation of the two passages to each other, that many common terms are used in different senses.—M.]

Deny, see 2 Pet. ii. 1. The reference here is according to the description of those deceivers, more especially to their practical denying (so de Wette and Huther). Even the book of Enoch (lxvii. 8. 10; xci. 7) connects in the case of the ungodly the denial of the Lord of the spirits with voluptuousness.

[DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.]

[VER. 8. "The faith is that system of truths revealed in the Holy Scriptures concerning the dispensations of the God, whom we adore, and into whose name we were baptized, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, three Persons, one God. These truths are proposed to us as the ground of our hope, our comfort, and our joy; as the principles on which the conduct of life is to be framed, accepted and rewarded. We receive the revelation, which contains the truths, upon that plenary and satisfactory evidence vouchsafed us of its authenticity, and we receive the truths, which it contains, on the authority of the Revealer. The different articles of our belief, dispersed in the Scriptures, were very early collected into summaries styled creeds, recited at baptism, and constituting thenceforward the badge and test of a man's profession. By a formulary of this kind the catechumen himself was instructed; "the faith once delivered" was transmitted down to posterity; the members of the spiritual society were kept together; the doctrines, by them believed and taught, were made known to the world, and distinguished from a multitude of heterogeneous and erroneous opinions, by them disavowed; a connection with the maintainers of which would justly have brought discredit on themselves and their cause. For these reasons the use of creeds appears to have at first been introduced and since continued." Horne.—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The calling of God the beginning of all His exhibitions of grace.—General and particular calling. Man's relation thereto.—Believers the possession, the spoil, the crown and reward of the Lord Jesus.—The Christian life a state of constant warfare.—The great danger of abusing grace.—The manifold denial of the Lord that bought us.

STARKE:—Every Christian should be an honest Judas; i. e., a confessor, confessing Christ before the world according to the belief of his heart in word and life, that Christ may confess him before His Father. Mt. x. 32.—Would that all Jews were such, or would soon become such. Rom. x. 1.—It is not enough for a man's salvation that he receive the call of grace, he must accept it, become holy and persevere in grace, Is. lv. 8; Rev. ii. 10; 1 Cor. xv. 1. 2.—Christianity is never at a stand-still, but ever growing and progressing, 1 Thess. iii. 12; iv. 1.—We must fight for our faith against our lusts, the world and Satan; otherwise we shall not receive the end of faith, the salvation of our souls, 1 Pet. i. 9.—God has prepared His grace for the penitent that are of a broken heart, Is. lxi. 1, and namely for their consolation and amendment. This truth ungodly men reverse in that they accord grace to the impenitent, not for their amendment, but for their security.—The more secret an enemy, the more dangerous, Ps. lxiv. 6. 7.—Sinning in reliance upon grace is the poison which corrupts and kills the greatest number of souls. The Gospel is to them a savour of death unto death.—Those who deny Christ that bought them with His blood, are the servants of the devil, 1 Jno. iii. 8.

K. H. RIEGER:—Even evil times should neither make us evil and harsh, nor cause us to fall from our first love. Whatever remains to be done, must be done by love, 1 Thess. ii. 7.—Contending without one's own edification would amount to quarrelling. Edification without contending is indifference which does not sufficiently consider what edifying is. Cf. v. 20.—The devil introduces his children of malice among the children of the kingdom, even as tares creep in among good wheat and at first cannot be distinguished from it. His lies always spring up under some borrowed rag of truth.

STRIB:—In the accredited, sealed word of the Scriptures we have the authentic deposit of the precious jewel of the first testimony of faith, which deposit is to be preserved and necessarily becomes the permanent rule of faith.—The faith delivered to Christendom is the treasure for the unimpaired possession and enjoyment of which we must fight against hostile powers.—God has a holy purpose of justice in that He gives up to the deception of powerful error all those who would not believe in the truth with all their heart, as they ought, 2 Thess. ii. 8-12.—Those who will not obey Christ, to the Christ whom they ought and must know as the Lord, have also no God in heaven, no gods (Ps. lxxxii.; Exod. xxii. 28) on earth, and become through and through rebels and insurrectionists.

[BARROW:—Some vehemency (some smartness and sharpness) of speech may sometimes be used in defence of truth, and impugning errors of bad consequence; especially when it concerneth the interests of truth that the reputation and authority of its adversaries should somewhat be abased or abated. If by a partial opinion or reverence toward them, however begotten in the minds of men, they strive to overbear or discountenance a good cause, their cause, so far as truth permiteth, and need requireth, may be detected and displayed. For this cause particularly may we presume our Lord (otherwise so meek in His temper, and mild in his carriage toward all men) did characterize the Jewish scribes in such terms, that their authority (being then so prevalent with the people) might not prejudice the truth, and hinder the efficacy of His doctrine. This is part of that ἐκτινάζεσθαι τῇ πίστει, the duty of contending earnestly for the faith, which is incumbent upon us.—M.]

VERSES 5-15.

COMMENTS:—Three examples of the punitive justice of God, typical of the judgment awaiting those deceivers, introduced as a warning, vv. 5-8; more particular description of their sins. An exclamation of woe, v. 11, followed by additional details of their character, and an application to them of a prophecy of Enoch.

5 I will<sup>2</sup> therefore<sup>1</sup> put you in remembrance, though ye<sup>2</sup> once knew this,<sup>4</sup> how that the Lord,<sup>5</sup> having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed<sup>6</sup> them that believed not. And the angels<sup>7</sup> which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved<sup>8</sup> in everlasting chains<sup>9</sup> under darkness unto the

7 judgment of the great day. Even as <sup>10</sup> Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them in like manner,<sup>11</sup> giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange<sup>12</sup> flesh, 8 are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. Likewise <sup>13</sup> also these filthy dreamers defile <sup>14</sup> the flesh, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities.<sup>15</sup> 9 Yet Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst <sup>17</sup> not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee. But these speak evil of those things<sup>18</sup> which they know not: but what they 10 know <sup>19</sup> naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves. Woe unto them! for they have gone in the way of Cain, and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward,<sup>20</sup> and perished in the gainsaying of Core. These are spots in your feasts of charity,<sup>21</sup> when they feast with you, feeding themselves without fear: clouds they are without water, carried about <sup>22</sup> of winds; trees whose fruit withereth,<sup>23</sup> without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for 13 ever. And Enoch, also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied <sup>24</sup> of these, saying, Behold 14 the Lord <sup>25</sup> cometh with ten thousand of his saints,<sup>26</sup> To execute judgment upon all, and to convince<sup>27</sup> all that are <sup>28</sup> ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.

Verse 5. [<sup>1</sup> δὲ, not—therefore, but—but.

Kühner: "δὲ most generally has an adversative force, and hence can express every kind of contrast. In respect to its signification, it ranks like the Latin autem, between the copulative connectives (et, καί) and the adversative (ἀλλὰ, etc.), since it contains both a copulative and adversative force, and hence either opposes one thought to another, (adversative), or merely contrasts it (copulative). Hence it is very frequently used in Greek, where the English uses and. The new thought being different from the preceding is placed in contrast with it."

Winer (pp. 472, 473): "δὲ καὶ means therefore, then; nor for, nor does it ever serve as a mere copula or particle of transition."—M.]

[<sup>2</sup> βούλομαι, to wish, to desire. Its force ought to be brought out in a stronger form than the ambiguous "I will."—M.]

[<sup>3</sup> ὑμᾶς. The force of the second ὑμᾶς is lost in E. V.; it is emphatic, and the emphasis ought to be brought out. "But I wish to remind you, you who . . ."—M.]

[<sup>4</sup> εἰδότες has a Present sense. They know it once for all, certainly, fully. This thorough knowledge of theirs is the motive of Jude's reminding them. They know it now; not that they knew it once and have now forgotten it.—M.]

[<sup>5</sup> Lachm., Tisch. read εἰδότες ἀναστάντες, δὲ ἐν Ἱεροσὺν. So Vulgate. Stier says, that this would be unexampled, unintelligible, remarkable; that the dark Epistle had been much corrected and glossed. De Wette agrees with Lachmann, following A. B. C. and other authorities, but not in respect of Ἱεροσὺν. [The reading ἀναστάντες is also sustained by Cod. Sin., several Cursives, Copt. Syriac. It is on many accounts preferable to τοῦτο.

Ἱεροσὺν instead of Κύπρος is the reading of A. B., several Cursives, Vulg., Copt., Sahidic, Ethiopic and Armenian versions; also of Didymus, Cyril, Jerome, Cassian, and received by Griesbach and Lachmann. In point of doctrine, it agrees with that of Paul. Cf. 1 Cor. x. 1-11; Heb. iii. 7-19; iv. 1, 2.—M.]

[<sup>6</sup> ἑξέτητος, the second time, again not afterwards, as in E. V. The first time was deliverance, the second destruction. So Engl. Annot., Stier, Pelle, Huther, Wordsw., Lillie.—M.]

[German:—"But I will remind you, you that have known this once, that the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, for the second time destroyed those who believed not."—M.]

[Translate:—"But I wish to remind you, you who know all things once for all, that the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, the next time destroyed those who believed not."—M.]

Verse 6. [<sup>7</sup> ἀγγέλους. The omission of the Article here contrasts angels with men, of whom Jude has spoken in the previous verse. τοὺς μὲν κ. τ. λ. specifies the particular class of angels in question.—M.]

[<sup>8</sup> δεσμοῖς ἀίδις, Abl. instr. "With everlasting bonds." E. V., 18 times out of 20 (the other exception being Mk. vii. 35, string) has bonds or bonds. Lillie. Calvin: "Quocumque perperat, eorum trahunt sua vincula et suis tenebris obvoluti manent. Interea in magnum diem extremum eorum supplicium differtur." Milton, Par. Lost. IV., 75: "Which way I fly is hell; myself am hell."—M.]

[<sup>9</sup> τετήρηκεν, says Huther, stands in sharp opposition to μὴ τηρήσαντες. Hence the same word ought to be used in order to bring out the opposition.

[German:—"And the angels that kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath kept for the judgment of the great day with everlasting bonds under darkness."—M.]

[Translate:—"And angels that kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath kept with everlasting bonds under darkness for the judgment of the great day."—M.]

Verse 7. [<sup>10</sup> ὅς connected with βούλομαι, viz.: "I wish to remind you . . . how Sodom and Gomorrah, etc."—M.]

[German:—"How Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities around them, having whored themselves out in like manner as these, and gone after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."—M.]

[Translate:—" . . . having given themselves over to fornication in like manner as these men, and gone after other flesh, are set forth, etc.—M.]

Verse 8. [<sup>13</sup> μὲν, omitted in E. V., has adversative force, and should be rendered by some such word as yet, how ever, etc.—M.]

[German:—"Now in like manner these dreamers also defile the flesh, and thus (dabei—therewith, at the same time) reject the dominion and revile the majesties."—M.]

[Translate:—"In like manner, however, these dreamers also on the one hand defile the flesh, on the other reject lordship and speak evil of dignities."—M.]

- Verse 9. <sup>10</sup> Lachm. reads: ὅτε Μιχαὴλ ὁ ἀρχάγγελος τότε τῷ διαβόλῳ; but we prefer, with Stier, the common reading:
<sup>11</sup> οὐκ ἐτόλμασε, did not dare, or dared not, better than durst not of E. V. The former is Lillie's rendering, the latter that of German version.—M.]
- Verse 10. <sup>12</sup> ὅσα has distributive force, and is variously rendered quicumque (Vulg.), quotquot (Laurm.), quæ et quanta (Wordsw.), omnis quæ (Bengel), whatsoever things (Kenr., Lillie).
- <sup>14</sup> ἐπίττανται is stronger than οἱ δασ of the first clause, cf. Mk. xiv. 68; the former is to understand, the latter, to know.
 [German:—"These, on the contrary, revile those things which they know not; but those things which they understand naturally, as the brute beasts, even therein do they ruin themselves."
 [Translate:—"These, however, on the one hand, speak evil of whatsoever things they know not, on the other, whatsoever things they understand naturally, as the brute beasts, in those they corrupt themselves."—M.]
- Verse 11. <sup>15</sup> καὶ τῇ πλάνῃ τοῦ Βαλαὰμ μισθοῦ; the construction of this difficult clause, which has the most weighty authorities, is that which takes τῇ πλάνῃ as a Dative of the direction in which (Dodd., Mack. Thom., Scott, Stier, Pelle, Wahl, Robins., Wordsw., Lillie), and μισθοῦ—inveca μισθοῦ, or Occ.'s κέρδους χάριν; (so Wic., Tynd., Cran., Beims, vs.; Grot., Beng., Bloomf., Stier, Winer, Robins., Wordsw., Lillie, al.). See Winer, p. 210, § 30, 10, e.—M.]
 [German:—"Woe unto them, for they have walked in the way of Cain, and the error of Balaam with his hire has drawn them along, and in the gainsaying of Korah they have perished."
 This can hardly be called a translation; it is a paraphrase, which takes considerable liberty with the grammar of the original. Translate:—"Woe unto them, for in the way of Cain they walked, and in the error of Balaam they rushed headlong (Beng.: effusi sunt, ut torrens sine aggeri; Green, Lillie as here), and in the gainsaying of Core they perished."—M.]
- Verse 12. <sup>16</sup> Lachm. reads αὐτῶν instead of ὑμῶν, and supplies οἱ before ἐν ταῖς. Stier also prefers on internal grounds the reading "in their love-feasts." ἐν ταῖς is less authentic here than in 2 Pet.
 Cod. Sin. has the reading εὐφροσύνης γογγύσαι: *μεμφίμυροι καὶ (*κατα)τὸς ἐπιθυμίας αὐτῶν πορεύμενοι*, which Tischendorf characterises thus: **improb. γογγ. usque wop.*—M.]
- <sup>18</sup> Tisch., al. read παράφρονας, driven fast. The sense is not essentially different [i. e., from παράφρονας, which is certainly an unauthentic reading. A. B. C., Sin., Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch., Words., Alford, Lillie are all in favour of the former. Cod. Sin. has παρὶ ἀνέμῳ παράφρονας.—M.]
- <sup>19</sup> Sin. φθονοῦσιν καὶ φόβον περιδ.—M.]
 [German:—"These are spots in your love-feasts, carousing together without fear, feeding themselves, clouds without water, driven fast by winds, late-autumnal trees, unfruitful, twice dead, uprooted."
 [Translate:—"These are rocks in your love-feasts, carousing together without fear, feeding themselves, clouds without water, borne along by winds, late-autumnal trees, unfruitful, twice dead, uprooted."
 For reasons see below in Exegetical and Critical.—M.]
- Verse 14. <sup>20</sup> προφύρεται δὲ καὶ οὗτοι (Sin., προεφύρεται). "But for these also prophesied Enoch," better than "But of these" (German), and E. V.—M.]
- <sup>21</sup> Sin., δὲ κύριος.—M.]
- <sup>22</sup> Sin., ἀνέμῳ ἀγγέλων. German inserts between brackets after myriads (of angels).—M.]
- Verse 15. <sup>23</sup> Lachm., Tisch. read simply: ἀλέγχα, following A. B., Cod. Sin., which latter has the variation: ἀλέγχα: ῥάσαν ψυχῶν; and omits afterwards ἀσβεστίας αὐτῶν.—M.]
- <sup>24</sup> αὐτῶν restored by Tischend. in his last edition, after A. B. G. K., while Lachmann omits it.
 [German:—"To give judgment against all, and to convict all ungodly ones of all their ungodly deeds, wherein they have shown themselves ungodly, and of all the hard speeches, which the ungodly sinners have spoken against Him."
 [Translate:—"To exercise judgment upon all, and to convict all the ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds, wherein they were ungodly (Lillie), and of all the hard speeches which sinners spoke against Him."—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 5. But I will remind you—believed not.—This connects with 2 Pet. i. 12, although there the reference is not to historical facts, but to doctrines. In like manner the words, "you who know all things once for all" revert to that passage as well as to προγινώσκοντες, 2 Pet. iii. 17.—ἀπαξ τοῦτο (cf. Appar. Crit., N. 5). It is inadmissible to connect ἀπαξ with ἐπομινησας, or to take it in the sense of once, formerly, from the beginning; it rather has here its usual meaning, you have heard it once for all and stamped it on your memory; you need not any new instruction on that head; but it is matter of urgent necessity for you to be reminded of it, earnestly to deliberate upon it, and to apply what has taken place to events as they occur. It is not related to the following τὸ δεύτερον. If we adopt the reading πάντα, all that is necessary is to connect it with the sequel, to the historical facts, and hence not to take it as at 1 Jno. ii. 20. [εἰδὼτας πάντα. Remembering that Jude wrote against the Gnostics (the men of knowledge), who laid claim to superior knowledge, and on that pretence beguiled their hearers into corrupt doctrines and licentious practices (2 Pet. i. 2, 3), the words εἰδὼτας πάντα seem to have an implied antithesis, and while affirming of his readers that they had all the knowledge necessary to their salvation (1 Jno. ii. 20), put them on their guard against the pretended superiority of knowledge of the Gnostics. See Wordsworth in loc.—M.] —Huther says on the reading ὁ Ἰησοῦς that it unfolds the same view as 1 Cor. x. 4, and that the name of Jesus in this connection may be accounted for by the popular character of a parenthetic Epistle.—τὸ δεύτερον neither—afterward, nor—on the contrary (Grotius). Forced is also the explanation of Winer, pp. 642, 648: "The Lord, after having delivered them, did, on a second occasion (when they were in need of His helping grace), refuse them His delivering grace and destroy them." Equally unnatural is that of Huther: "God did reveal Himself to His people in two ways, the first time as a Deliverer, the second time as Judge, that is in the latter instance as Judge of the unbelieving who did not trustfully and obediently rely upon His promise." Similarly Stier: "After God's deliverance and pardoning there is also a second time surely following in the case of the unworthy." No, it is said, He destroyed them the second time, and should be referred to two judgments of destruction, once, when the people, with the exception of a few, perished in the wilderness, and again to the Babylonish captivity, Numb. xiv. 23; 2

Chron. xxxvi. 16, etc. The corresponding passage in 2 Peter (ii. 2) specifies the example of the flood; Jude wished to select a still stronger example, exhibiting a two-fold destruction of the chosen people. Notwithstanding the former wonderful deliverance, the people were twice destroyed. Had this Epistle been written after the destruction of Jerusalem, Jude might have added a ῥὸ πῖπρον. [Notwithstanding Frommüller's emphatic assertion to the contrary, we feel constrained to advocate the view recommended in Appar. Crit., note 6. It is more telling in point of fact and more congruous in point of doctrine; it is perfectly sound in point of grammar, and the charge of its being forced and unnatural is arbitrary and unsupported by reasons.—M.]

V. 6. And the angels—darkness.—The allusion in 2 Pet. ii. 4 is here more fully explained. If it could be proved that Jude had before him the book of Enoch, which repeatedly adverts to the coming down of the angels in order to contaminate themselves with women, we should not be warranted to think here of the first fall in the world of spirits. But this presumption is not certain. See note on 2 Pet. ii. 4.

Their first estate.—Huther explains ἀρχή of the dominion, originally assigned to them; others (e.g., Calvin, Grotius) of their original condition, estate, cf. Jno. viii. 44. Both ideas may be combined as Stier [and others] do. [In that case we have primam dignitatem, Carpi. al.—M.]

Their own habitation, not heaven in general, but their own dwelling of light assigned to them by the Creator. Their fall and guilt seem to have been the consequence of their leaving that habitation and arbitrarily going beyond the sphere allotted to them. There is no explicit reference to Satan, but μὴ ἡμεῖς, which points to incitement from without, may allude to him. Delitzsch: "They made themselves at home on earth and exchanged the power belonging to their vocation in heaven with an earthly exhibition of power usurped for the sake of selfish sensual indulgence."

For the judgment of the great day, i. e., for the last judgment at the end of the world; an amplification of 2 Pet. ii. 4; cf. Acts ii. 20; Rev. vi. 17; xvi. 14.

With everlasting bonds.—Peter has only "chains (bands) of darkness," of v. 7. The book of Enoch has this variation: "Bind them for seventy generations under the earth until the day of judgment, then shall they be removed to the lowest depths of fire."

Under darkness.—De Wette: "In the depth of the under-world, in the abyss." Rev. xx. 2. 8. At the same time the reference to the inward, spiritual darkness of the love of evil, must not be overlooked. See 2 Pet. ii. 4. [Clement of Alex. says, "that the chains in which the evil angels are now confined, are the air near this earth of ours, ('vicinus terris locus, caliginosus aer'), and that they may well be said to be chained, because they are restrained from recovering the glory and happiness they have lost."

Wordsworth: "This passage is cited by Origen in Mt. tom., XV., p. 693, and in Rom. lib. 8., vol. IV., p. 510, where he calls this Epistle Scriptura divina," ibid. lib., V., p. 549.—M.]

V. 7. How Sodom and Gomorrah, etc.—

To the two examples taken from the past history of Israel and the invisible world, Jude, again agreeing with Peter, adds a new example, taken from the heathen world, of a punitive judgment the consequences of which still remain.

The cities around them, an addition to 2 Pet. ii. 6. Admah and Zeboim. Deut. xxix. 23; Hos. xi. 8.

In like manner as these men, τούτους may be connected with Sodom and Gomorrah, that is, the inhabitants of those cities; as the sin of those cities is generally known, it cannot be thought strange that it is indirectly adverted to. It is less known of the other two cities, hence the selection of this word. Bengel refers τούτους to the false teachers, v. 4, but he thereby anticipates the thought of v. 8. The majority of modern expositors believe the reference to be to the fallen angels, who, according to the book of Enoch, sinned in like manner. See on 2 Pet. ii. 6. We cannot believe that Jude or Peter considered fables of apocryphal books, like those contained in the book of Enoch and the Gospel of the Twelve Patriarchs, and which cannot be substantiated by Gen. vi. to be true, (see Evangel. Kirchengesellschaft, 1858, p. 35, sq.), although Jude refers to them and confirms some of their statements. [Bengel's construction, which is also that of Wordsworth and others, seems to be more natural and less artificial than that recommended by Frommüller. The anticipation of the thought of v. 8, is no valid objection. Jude first points out the analogy in general terms and then develops it. The very sins of Sodom and Gomorrah were those of some of the Gnostic sects. See the description of the Nicolaitans in Iren. i. 20; Theodoret haer. fab., 1. Epiphanius haer. 25.—M.]

ἐκπορεύεσθαι, although not used elsewhere in the New Testament, is of frequent occurrence in the LXX., where it is generally applied to spiritual whoredom, but also to physical in Gen. xxxviii.

24 for ἵψι. ἐκ is intensive, and denotes extravagant lust. The idea "transcending the limits of nature" belongs to what follows.

Gone after strange flesh, ἀπελθούσαι ὁπίσω σαρκὸς ἑτέρας;—ἀπέρχεσθαι ὁπίσω, to go after, literally, Mk. i. 20; then tropically. Peter uses the term πορεύεσθαι ὁπίσω, 2 Pet. ii. 10. See note there. It is evident that this term cannot apply to angels, who have no flesh.

Are set forth, etc.; πρόκεινται [literally: lie before the eyes, ante (oculos) jacent.—M.] The parallel passage, 2 Pet. ii. 6, has a different turn, "having made [set, instituted—M.] them an example." There we have ὑπόδειγμα, here δειγμα. The Dead Sea is to this day a testimony of that catastrophe; ruins of the sunken cities were perhaps still visible in the days of Jude at low-water; but this is not the case now, although such a myth of travellers is occasionally circulated. See Zeller Bibl. Wörterbuch, p. 510.

Ἰνυρὸς αἰώνιον should be construed with διάνη, (de Wette), not with δειγμα. Stier: "They suffer a punishment intended to serve as an example and type of eternal fire." Cf. Wisdom x. 7 [On the construction with διάνη, Wordsworth offers the following exposition: "As Sodom and Gomorrah suffer the vengeance of a fire that consumed them finally, so that they will never be restored, as long as the world lasts, so the bodies and souls of the wicked will suffer, as long as they are capable of suffering, which, since they are immortal, will, as Tertullian says: "be forever," "eternus idem, qui nunc, nec alii post resurrectionem: Dei quidem cultores, apud Deum SEMPER, profani vero in pœnam aquæ JUGIS IGNIS habentes est ipsâ naturâ ejus, divinâ scilicet, subministrationem INCORRUPTIBILITATIS." Apol. 48.—M.] De Wette says that "subterraneous fire is presumed to be beneath the sea that covers the cities." May this not be a false presumption?—ἐντέλειαν, 2 Mac. iv. 48; 2 Thess. i. 9. [On the Eternity of future punishment, see Bp. Taylor's Sermon on Christ's advent to judgment, part III., §. 6.—M.]

VER. 8. Now in like manner, etc.—ἐντροί has at once illative and adversative force. Now, in like manner, however—i. e., without taking warning from those Divine judgments.

These dreamers also, refers back to v. 4. ἐννύκιοι, on account of μὲν and δέ should be construed both with μαίνονται and ἀθετοῦσι. This sets aside various false interpretations, which make reference to voluptuous dreams, nocturnal pollutions, etc. As ἐννύκιοι differs from θεῖρος in that the former denotes a confused state of soul, an abnormal influence of the imagination on the bodily organs, whereas the latter designates a clear and sometimes most significant dream, so ἐννύκιοι is designed to portray that state of the soul in which the Ego is controlled and held captive by the power of ungodly, sensual impulses. Stier: "Their inner man is benumbed, blinded, absorbed by gloomy visions, dreamy and holden with sleep. Cf. Ia. xxix. 10.

Hornejus: "Tam insipientes sunt, ut quasi lethargo quodam sopiti non tantum impure vivant, sed etiam quæ non norunt tam audaciter vituperent."

Arnaud: "Cependant ceux-ci, comme des gens qui agissent sans savoir ce qu'ils font, comme s'ils rêvaient, pour ainsi dire . . . ."—M.]

Defile the flesh, i. e., their own and strange flesh. The idea has a turn somewhat different from 2 Peter ii. 10, to which Jude here alludes. Peter speaks of the lust, Jude of its gratification. In the sequel also Jude goes farther than Peter, a circumstance noteworthy with regard to their relation to each other. Ἀθετοῦν stronger than καταφρονεῖν; see on 2 Pet. ii. 10. 11. In like manner v. 9 contains an expansion of and deviation from 2 Pet. ii. 11. The attempt of interpreting that passage by the verse under notice leads to confusion and forced meanings.

VER. 9. But Michael, the archangel, etc.—A comparison showing the daring and criminality of their blaspheming. They dare to do something against the lordship and the glories (see on them note on 2 Peter ii. 11), which even Michael, the archangel, did not venture to do against Satan. The Hebrew Michael signifies,

"Who is like God," and denotes the humility and greatness of this Prince of angels, as well as the standard of all his actions, cf. Ex. xv. 11; Ps. lxxxix. 7. 8. He is called one of the chief Princes, Dan. x. 13; the great Prince standing up and fighting for the children of the people of God, ch. xii. 1; cf. Rev. xii. 7; 1 Thess. iv. 16. In the book of Enoch, where however the incident mentioned is not recorded, we read of him (as cited by Huther): "Who (set) over human virtue, governs the nations." Jude supposes his readers familiar with this incident. The Jews had from ancient times various traditions of the burial of Moses, of a contest about his soul. According to Oecumenius, the tradition ran that God had charged Michael the archangel with the burial of Moses; that Satan opposed him, bringing an accusation against him relating to the murder of the Egyptian; in consequence of which he was unworthy of such honourable burial. Jude, like Paul, 2 Tim. iii. 8, probably drew from this tradition, the Spirit of God directing him to extract the truth from those traditions. It is therefore not necessary to assume here a special revelation vouchsafed to Jude. Origen, Epiphanius and others refer to a book called "The Ascension or Removal of Moses," but that book is doubtless of a later origin, and it is more probable that Jude made use of oral tradition rather than of that book.

Contending with the devil.—διακρινόμενος διελέγγο; διακρίνεσθαι, to get into dispute, to separate and disagree, particularly to carry on a dispute in law. The words διελέγγο ὅτι τῷ διαβόλῳ show that it was a verbal altercation. Stier: "The powers of heaven and hell contended consequently for the body of the man of God after his death."

Dared not, etc.—Huther: "From fear of the original glory of the devil." Better, "from profound dread of the majesty of God." ἐπίστανται ἐντρέπειν, cf. Acts xiv. 18, to give a sentence of condemnation against one. βλασφημία=βλάσφημον, 2 Peter ii. 11, words of insult, anger, or words of satire and mockery. Stier remarks, that even Father Luther did occasionally transgress in this respect and speak far too defiantly against the enemy.

The Lord rebuke thee.—The Angel of the Covenant addresses these words to Satan in Zech. iii. 2; cf. Acts xxiii. 8; 2 Tim. iv. 14. The enemy himself has betrayed the secret that he may be overcome by the words, "The Most Merciful rebuke thee." Bengel: "Modesty is an angelic virtue."

VER. 10. These, however, etc.—Jude now passes from the particular expression of that daring disposition to the general. They speak evil, in general, of all things which they know not. For ἅα is not=α, but=quæcunque. The reference is to the whole sphere of things invisible and heavenly, including the δόξαι. They are held by the delusion of materialism, that only that is real which may be seen with the eyes and touched by the hands, cf. Col. ii. 18.

But those things which they understand.—ἐπίστανται, apparently stronger than οἶδαι, is an ironical expression. The things they thoroughly understand, viz., the objects and means of sensual enjoyment, they use for their destruction, and really understand nothing of their nature and effects.

Naturally, as the brute beasts; φρονέας δὲ τὰ ἄλογα ζῷα, go together. Their understanding does not go beyond that which the instincts of nature, the instinctive desire of food and procreation, teach brute beasts. But they sink even beneath them because of their own free will and deliberation, they prostitute in carnal indulgence those powers of the soul which ought to introduce them to God and heavenly things. The parallel passage, 2 Peter ii. 12, reads: "They speak evil of the things that they understand not," with this difference, however, that Peter not only states the additional particular of the destiny of the brute creation, but connects also φροναὶ with ζῷα, whereas here it goes with ἐντολαῖς. It is evident that Jude made free use of the passage in Peter.

Therein do they ruin themselves, cf. 2 Peter ii. 12; Pa. xlix. 18. 21.

VBB. 11. Woe unto them, etc.—An utterance of woe, of frequent occurrence in the speeches of our Lord, expressive of pain and indignation, and conveying the threat of punishment, cf. Matt. xi. 21; xviii. 7; xxiii. 18; xxiv. 19; xxvi. 24; Mark xiv. 21; xiii. 17; Luke vi. 24. 26; xi. 42; xvii. 1. Bengel: "The only passage where this Apostle alone utters a woe for three reasons." Paul says, 1 Cor. ix. 16: "Woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel." The expression occurs repeatedly in the book of Revelation, ch. viii. 13; ix. 12; xi. 14; xii. 12; xviii. 10. 16. 19. 2 Peter ii. 14, has "cursed children," lit. "children of malediction." Jude paraphrases it by, "woe unto them," which threatens them with the curse. Jude, in addition to the example of Balaam, which we have in 2 Peter, produces the examples of Cain and the company of Core as types of the mind and judgment of those persons. He adverts rather to the order of the matter than to the order of time.

They walked.—De Wette: "Their career is regarded as already completed, the author prophetically foreseeing their end." This contains a hint in favour of the genuineness of the Epistle.

The way of Cain; τῇ ὁδῷ, cf. Acts xiv. 16; ix. 31; the Dative of the direction in which [see above App. Crit., note 20.—M.], cf. 1 Sam. xv. 20; LXX, Tob. iv. 6. It is not difficult to find the point of comparison. It is acting upon mere natural instincts, on the selfish impulses of nature (cf. φρονέας, v. 10), in contempt of the warnings of God in the conscience and in His word. De Wette stops at the idea that Cain is here mentioned as the archetype of all bad men. Too general. Calov and others understand it of spiritual murder by deceiving the brethren, or of fiery persecution, so Lyra. Arbitrary. Schneckenburger refers to the moral skepticism of the deceivers, since in the later writings of the Jews, Cain is represented to have said: "There is no Judge, no other world, no reward for the righteous, no punishment for the wicked." Far-fetched. Stier: "Selfish, hateful envy of the pious brother, because his piety was pleasing to God, consequently to God and man at one and the same time, the resistance of an evil conscience which is defiant instead of humbling itself, the root of the Cainite sin from which full hatred develops with fearful velocity into the act of murder." Huther: "In comparing these false teachers with Cain, Jude intends to describe them as resisting God from envy of the grace shown to believers." But this is not the description of those deceivers.—[Wordsworth: "Specially applicable to some classes of the Gnostics, who dared impudently to affirm that 'Cain was made by a power superior to that of the Creator; and who acknowledged Esau, Korah and the Sodomites, and all such, as their own kindred.' See Iren. 1, 31. (Stieren), 1, 85, p. 113 (Grabe). Cf. Tertull., Præscr. c. 47; Clem. Alexandr., Strom. 7, p. 649; Hippolyt., Phil. p. 183; Epiph., Hæc. 38; Theodoret, Hæret. fab. c. 16; Philostr. c. 2; Tillemont, II., p. 21. These false teachers destroy like Cain; they love lucre and allure to sin like Balaam; they make divisions in the Church of Christ like Korah. Catena, p. 164, and cf. Bede on 1 John i. 6."—M.]

And in the error of Balaam, etc.—Peter has, "They went astray, following the way of Balaam, the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness." Jude gives this in a contracted form. See 2 Peter ii. 15. 16. πλάνη, cf. 2 Peter ii. 18; James v. 20; Ezek. xxxiii. 16, LXX. Huther: "Vicious life averted from the truth." Not—εἰς πλάνην, but the Dative of direction in which, like τῇ ὁδῷ and with ἐξακολουθεῖν, 2 Peter ii. 16; in the direction of error.

Has drawn them along [they rushed headlong, see Appar. Crit., note 20.—M.]; ἐκχέουσαι, Middle, to stream forth like a torrent without a dam (Bengel), to suffer oneself to be carried away like the Latin effundi in venerem, in libidines. At the same time we may think of the meaning of ῥῆψ, to slip and fall, Pa. lxxiii. 2. [The force of the Greek verb is rather "to pour oneself out in a torrent." See Loesner, p. 583.—M.] Ἐξεχέουσαν μυσθὸν The explanation, "They threw themselves into the error of Balaam for hire (= ἀντι or ἐνεκα)," is false; so is that of Schneckenburger: "They threw themselves into the error of Balaam in expectation of reward." De Wette's rendering also is very forced: "Through the seduction of Balaam's reward they poured themselves out in vice." In that case we ought to have τοῦ μισθοῦ Βαλαάμ.—μυσθὸν should rather be taken in apposition with Βαλαάμ, a brief allusion, which is easily explained on the supposition that Jude had before him 2 Peter ii. 15. The point of comparison lies first in selfishness and avarice, then in seduction to unchastity.

In the gainsaying of Core they perished.—ἀντιλέγειν, to contradict, to quarrel, to offer resistance, used in LXX. for מְרִיבָה, cf. Jno. xix. 12; Heb. vi. 16; vii. 7; xii. 8. Κορέ, cf. Numb. xvi. 32; xxvi. 10. It was an insurrection against the Lord and His representatives under the cover of right and religion. Huther: "They lost themselves in the gainsaying of Core." He thinks that both the parallelism of the three clauses and the Præterite of the verb favour such a construction. The last reason proves nothing (see above), and the first is counterbalanced by the circumstance that ἀπολλέσθαι is not used in the sense of losing oneself into a thing, of entangling oneself. Matt. x. 6 is not a parallel passage. Grammatical usage permits no other explanation than this: "they perished in the gainsaying of Core, by offering like resistance to God and His holy ordinances." Stier sees a gradation in the words way, error and gainsaying. "The end and the beginning of the whole way is illustrated at the very commencement of history in the case of Cain, the rushing progress in the way of error is especially exhibited in the case of Balaam, the final insurrection and provocation of judgment is typified in Korah." Huther calls to mind that opposition to God sprung, in the case of Cain, from envy, in that of Balaam, from covetousness, in that of Korah from pride; v. 12 gives a further delineation of these deceivers, similar to 2 Pet. ii. 13. 17. [Irenæus, IV., 43, ed. Græbe: "The doom of those who rise against the true faith, and excite others against the Church of God, is to be swallowed up by the earth, and to remain in the gulf below, with Korah, Dathan and Abiram."—M.]

VER. 12. These are spots in your love-feasts, etc.—ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις ὑμῶν, in your love-feasts, not, as Luther renders, in your alms, the exhibitions of love. The early degeneracy of the love-feasts connected with the Lord's Supper is evident from 1 Cor. xi. 20, etc. [Hippolytus, Ref. Hæres., p. 172, states that the Simonians said that their promiscuous μῖξεις were τελείαν ἀγάπην and μακαρίζοντας ἐαυτοῖς ἐπὶ τῇ μῖξει.—M.].—Σπιλάδες; σπιλάς or σπιλαξ really denotes a rock or a cliff, from στέος, while σπίλος, the word used by Peter, means both a cliff and a spot. De Wette and Huther favour the literal sense: "It is these who are cliffs in your love-feasts, i. e., on which these feasts split, or good morals suffer shipwreck (cf. 1 Tim. i. 19)." It is more simple to understand it of the seductive, dangerous power of these men. But we agree with Stier in preferring the sense of stain, spot, because, as he remarks, grammatical usage might easily change in words of such near affinity; these words having a common root might be used more or less loosely, and the parallel in 2 Peter favouring it. Possibly both (Peter and Jude) alluded to Deut. xxxii. 5. [Aretius:—"σπιλας non solum est glareæ, hoc est, ferræ species quæ maculas facile relinquit, sed est etiam concavum saxum in litore maris, seu lucum ac fluminum, in quâ concavitatem tanquam in commune receptaculum sordes aquarum conflunt." Mack. (Scott, Bloomf.): "The word σπιλάδες properly signifies rocks in the sea, which, when they rise above its surface, appear like spots." Oecumen., Theophyl. (ὑψαλοὶ πέτραι), Lightfoot, Wetstein, Whitby, Meyer, de Wette, Schleusner, Huther, Peile, Lillie, Alford, Wordsworth, al., all agree in rendering "rocks." It is the only sense in which it occurs in ancient authors; it is, moreover, in better unison with the other metaphors by which Jude describes the false teachers (clouds, trees, waves, wandering stars) than spots. On these grounds we prefer "rocks" to "spots."—Wordsworth:—"These σπιλάδες may be well said to be ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις, where the Church looks only for peace and safety, as in a deep and placid harbor. The words scopulus, φράγξ, Charvâdis, Euripus darathrum, etc., are thus applied frequently to persons. See Florus, 4, 9, where Antony is called a scopulus; and Aristoph. Equites, 248, φάραγγα, καὶ Χάρυβδιν ἀρπαγῆς, and Anthol., 2, 15. 1, εἰς δολίους, where treacherous persons are compared to ὑψαλοὶ πέτραι. Horat., Ep. I., 15. 31,—

Pernicies et tempestas darathrumque macelli, Quicquid quæsierat ventri donabat avaro.—M.]

συνευχαριζόμενοι. De Wette objects to supplying ὑμῖν, and translates "carousing together without fear;" so Stier. But since 2 Pet. ii. 13 has ὑμῖν, and ἀρόβως thus gets a better sense, moreover since otherwise σὶν would be superfluous, it is perhaps better to render: "They carouse with you, push themselves to your love-feasts." It is singular, however, that they not only would do so with impunity, but that Jude does not insist upon separation. The same objection, however, arises at 2 Peter ii. 13, and is not so very difficult to be met. [It is to be regretted that Frommüller has withheld the solution of the difficulty. The only one we are able to supply is that these false teachers abused the well-known liberal hospitality of the early Christians by clandestinely appearing at their love-feasts. The insertion of ὑμῖν is against the weight of MSS. evidence, and discountenanced by the majority of versions and reliable exegetes.—M.]

Without fear.—The most natural construction is to take ἀρόβως with συνευχαριζόμενοι, not with ποιμαίνοντες (Stier), which would isolate the former too much. They are so insolent as to dread neither correction nor expulsion, and still less the monitions of their own conscience. Bengel misses the sense by rendering, "To feast together is not wrong per se, therefore, ἀρόβως ought to be connected with this verb (ποιμαίν.)."

Feeding themselves.—Jude refers to Ezek. xxxiv. 2, 8, "Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves," cf. Is. lvi. 11. We learn from this circumstance that those deceivers set up as guides and leaders of the flock, and that they sought the wool of the sheep, not the sheep themselves, cf. 1 Pet. v. 2. [Alford:—"Using the ἀγάπαι not for their legitimate purpose, the realization of the unity of Christians by social union, but for their own purposes, the enjoyment of their lusts and the furtherance of their schemes."—M.]. The remark of Huther, that there is no other hint of said adversaries having filled the ecclesiastical office, is perfectly true, but that does not exclude their setting up as teachers and leaders. The true point of view is displaced if ποιμαίνοντες is restricted to the agapæ and expounded (as de Wette does), "They take their fill while they suffer the poor (the majority, the flock) to want." 1 Cor. xi. 21. ποιμαίνε, in that sense, would be an inappropriate term. The sequel also does not relate to the agapæ.

Clouds without water, driven fast by winds.—[Alford:—"Driven out of course by winds;" he reads παραφερόμενοι (with A. B. C. K., al.), borne out of their course, hither and thither.—M.]. In 2 Pet. ii. 17 another figure, viz.: "wells without water," precedes the parallel to this, while here one is added which is wanting there, viz.: "dead trees." De Wette, who applies the figure to the agapæ, is certainly wrong in saying that these men added largely to the agapæ, without sharing their contributions with the poor. No, the reference is rather to the promise and boasting of great and profound knowledge, but it is idle show and vapour, cf. Prov. xiv. 14. They are carried about by every wind of doctrine, and cannot satisfy the wants of those who thirst for the truth. Huther:—"The figure delineates the inward spiritual emptiness of those men, who on that account are unable to do good, but it seems also to intimate their deceptive ostentation, which has been pointed out by Calvin." The reference to doing good, however, belongs not to this, but to the next figure. ποιμαίνοντες and νεφέλαι point unmistakably to their arrogated teaching and leading.—Περφερόμεναι, driven about, fitfully driven to and fro. [See above Appar. Crit., note 22.—M.] Peter has ἐλαυνόμεναι.

Late autumnal trees, etc.—Φθινοπωρινός, from φθίω and ὥρα; ὥρα signifies the hottest season of the year; when that is over (φθίει), the φθινοπώρον, late autumn, the beginning of winter, sets in; the adjective denotes, therefore, "late-autumnal," not "fruit spoiling," as Stier renders, contrary to grammatical usage. [The best account of this word is that given by Lillie in loco, which is here transcribed: "According to Passow (as translated by Liddell and Scott), ὥρα is, 1, 'the part of the year between the rising of Sirius and of Arcturus . . . not so much . . . autumn as our dog days, or at most the end of summer;' and then, because this was the season of fruit, it stands, 2, for 'the fruit itself, esp. tree-fruit;'—and hence also the verb ὥριζω is to gather fruits. φθίω, again is used, 1, intransitively, to decay, wither, and, 2, transitively, to corrupt, destroy. Joining the two words, each in its first signification, we have φθινοπώρον, autumn, or more commonly, senescens autumnus et in hyemem vergens (Steph. Scap.), late autumn, the fall of the year (L. and S.); and φθινοπωρινός, belonging to that season—which are the only meanings of those compounds which the lexicons recognize as classical. In that sense, accordingly, is the Adjective taken here, in connection with ἀκαρπα, by Wicl. (harvest-trees without fruit), Tynd., Cranm., (without fr. at gathering time), Castal., (autumnales infructuosæ), Thom., (autumnal trees without fruit), Dav., (aut. trees stripped of their fruit); and apart from that connection, by Rhemish; Vulg., and its followers generally, Dutch, French, Swiss, margin; Engl., Ann., Ham., Coc., Beausobre and L'Enfant, margin; Bengel, Moldenh.; Hænslein (erroneously cited by Huther), Meyer, Gerlach, Barn.; de W.; Peile, (trees on the wane—"fallen into the sere and yellow leaf"), Huther;—Wahl, Robinson, Green, (autumnal, sere, bare), Schirl. The same interpretation is allowed also by Zeg., Wits., Gill, Laurm., Rosenm., Trol., ('without leaves,' [which is also Wesley's version], 'as trees are in autumn'), Bloomf.;—Schleusn. The second significations of φθίω and ὥρα, however, appear combined in the use, according to Phavor., of φθινοπώρον to denote νόσος φθίνουσα ὥρας (hence Clarke: galled or diseased trees; an etymology and sense allowed also by Wits., Laurm., Trol., cankered;—Schleusn.), and in Pindar's use of φθινοπωρίς. Liddell and Scott do, indeed, mark this last word as a 'pecul. fem.' of φθινο-πωρινός, which they explain to mean autumnal. But in the passage referred to—Pyth., 5, 161, 162, φθινοπωρίς ἀνέμων χειμερία καταπνοή—φθινοπωρίς evidently does not mean that, but rather the blighting influence of these wintry blasts, and so it is explained by the best commentators of Pindar. Heyne translates thus: 'FRUCTIBUS EXITIALIS ventorum HIBERNUS status;' and the most recent editor, Prof. Schneidewin, has the following note: 'ὥρα, ὥρα auctumnus, annus dicuntur pro iis quæ gignuntur iis temporibus. Jam sensus: Valeas viribus et consilio etiam in posterum, ne ventus BRUMALIS tibi PERDAT temporis FRUCTUS.' If it be said that the common version requires the noun to be taken in its second signification and the verb in its first, it may be replied, 1, that this acknowledged secondary meaning of the noun is its meaning in the only place where it is found in the New Testament, viz.: Rev. xviii. 14;—2, that the intransitive use of the verb is by far the more frequent;—and, 3, that the verb retains this intransitive sense in other analogous cases of composition; e. g., φθινώκατος, applied by Pindar, Pyth., 4, 471, to an oak from which the limbs had been lopped; and φθινώκυλος, with wasting limbs (L. and S.). While, therefore, our present form φθινοπωρινός may not, in the one or two instances where it is found elsewhere, bear the meaning here ascribed to it, I concur nevertheless in the remark of Grotius: 'Si usum vocis respicias, dicit arbores auctumnales. Sed magis respicitur ἐτυμολογία vocis, ut dicat eos similes esse arboribus, quarum fructus perit illico.' This sense, moreover, is more in harmony with the design of the writer, which is to describe the characteristic and inward spiritual desolation of these wicked men . . . , and it lays a firmer basis for the dreadful climax whereby he effects that object, cf. Matt. xiii. 22; Lke. viii. 14, etc."—M.] They stand there, like late-autumnal trees, which have no fruit but only dry leaves. They deceive our expectations, as the barren fig-tree, Matt. xxi. 19; Lke. xiii. 6, and are therefore ripe for the curse and woodman's axe. As we expect the clouds to yield water, so we expect the trees to yield fruit. The former relates to their teaching, the latter to their life. Bengel:—"Trees, as they appear at the end of autumn, without fruit and leaves," cf. Is. i. 30. Jude thinks of persons, who year after year are like late-autumnal trees. This is not a weak, but a very striking description, whereas, if we follow the etymology, the addition of ἀκαρπός would be superfluous.

Unfruitful.—Not "whose fruit has been taken off," as de Wette, but without fruit [or better, incapable of yielding fruit.—M.]

Twice dead, not=wholly dead, which is arbitrary, for the figure is taken from trees which have at different times suffered fatal injury by frost or from insects. Stier: "By nature we are through the fall altogether dead trees: now these persons, having received the grace of regeneration, have died a second time (2 Peter ii. 20). This is the second death in guilt and punishment." Others (like Grotius) erroneously interpret these words of the first (earthly) and the second (post-terrene) death, seeing death had not yet affected them in either respect. [Wordsworth: "So these men are trees, which died twice, because these men having been once dead in trespasses and sins, and raised to life in baptism, have relapsed and apostatized into the death of sin, and so have died twice; and because by their sins they have incurred the second death. See Rev. ii. 11; xx. 6. 14; xxi. 8, where it is said that the second death is the penalty of the unbelieving, abominable, and fornicators." Oecumenius: "τὰ φθινοπώρινα δένδρα δις ἀποθνήσκοντα, ἐν τῇ τοῦ καρποῦ αὐτῶν ἀποβολῇ, καὶ ἐν τῇ τῶν φύλλων ἀπορροῇ." De Wette illustrates by "bis dat qui cito dat," and Horace's "pro quo bis patior mori." Alford refers to the double death in a tree, which is not only as it seems to the eye in common with other trees, in the apparent death of winter, but really dead: dead to appearance and dead in reality.—M.]

Uprooted, not trees dug out and thus eradicated, but such as still remain in the earth, shaken loose by their roots, and thus incapable of shedding leaves and bearing fruit. Figurative description of men torn loose from this vital foundation and the communion of the Church, no longer moved by the Holy Spirit, having ceased to do good works, and doomed to the penalty of the obdurate, cf. John xv. 6; Matt. iii. 10. [Arnaud: "Tous ces mots sont des métaphores énergiques pour montrer le néant de ces impures, la légèreté de leur conduite, la stérilité de leur foi et l'absence de leurs bonnes mœurs."—M.]

VER. 13. Raging waves of the sea [German, "wild waves," better than raging, so Alford.—M.]. The Apostle probably thought of Isa. lvii. 20: "But the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt," cf. Wisd. xiv. 1. ἀγριος is elsewhere used of wild beasts. The figure describes their passionate conduct, their rushing against divinely-ordered barriers, their inward impurity and hurtfulness, cf. Ps. xlv. 4. The figurative expression of Isaiah has a literal application in the Epistle.

Ἐπαφρίζειν, properly to foam over, cover with foam, foam out. αἰσχύναι, an emphatic Plural, as 1 Peter iv. 3, all kinds of shame proceeding from the evil treasure of the heart. Huther: "Shameful lusts, which they exhibit in their wild, immoral life."

Wandering stars, etc.—ἀστέρες πλανῆσαι, wandering stars, from πλανῆν, πλανᾶσθαι, cf. v. 11; 2 Tim. iii. 13. [Alford: "Comets, which astonish the world for awhile and then pass away into darkness.—Those professing Christians, by their profession of being lights in the world, instead of letting that light shine on more and more into the perfect day, are drifting about in strange errors of doctrine and practice, until it will be utterly extinguished in eternal darkness."—M.]. It is difficult to see why the reference to comets, which were known to the people in ancient times, should be pronounced arbitrary (Huther). "That have no regular course, and depart from the sun (of righteousness)." Meyer. So also de Wette and Stier; the latter says: "If a star loses or deviates from its place or course, it either falls forthwith down dark, or, and that is the sense here, it roves awhile with deceitful light until it reaches the point and catastrophe, which God has appointed." The word ἀστέρες again contains a reference to men, that set up for lights of the Church, cf. Rev. i. 20; Dan. xii. 3; Phil. ii. 15. So Oecumenius. We must not think of authorized teachers, but remember that men, in order to gain distinction in those Churches, had to render themselves prominent by the light of knowledge; de Wette interprets the metaphor of the outward splendour of the luxury and perhaps also of the authority of those men; Huther applies the metaphor to unstable men, driven hither and thither by their carnal appetites, whose life presents the strongest contrast to the calm, well-ordered life of Christians. But this does not explain the term ἀστέρες.—Bengel observes: "It has recently been discovered that planets are opaque bodies that shine with borrowed light. Jude was enabled to intimate this in virtue of Divine illumination." But the reference is neither to planets nor their opacity.

To whom [better, for whom.—M.] the blackness of darkness is reserved forever.—Cf. the parallel passage, 2 Peter ii. 17, and the commentary on it. Stier: "The comets, as unstable, disrupted ruins, may be hastening forward to a final darkness among the slags of the last process of reconstruction."

VER. 14. But of [for.—M.] these also prophesied Enoch, the seventh from Adam.—Now follows a prophecy of Enoch of these people. τοῖς, with reference to them; see Winer, p. 244, cf. Luke xviii. 31.—καὶ should be connected with προφήτευσαι, not with τοῖς. As other prophets, so Enoch also, the most ancient of prophets.

The seventh from Adam, cf. Gen. v. 18. There are really only five patriarchs between Enoch and Adam, viz., Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel and Jared, but Adam is included as the first. This designation, although omitted by commentators, occurs repeatedly in the book of Enoch; e. g., we read, ch. xciii. 3: "I, as the seventh, am born in the first week, while judgment and justice were delayed;" cf. ch. ix. 8: "In the seventh week there shall arise an apostate generation;" ch. xxxvii. 1, traces back the genealogy of Enoch to Adam, not for the sake of embellishment, but in order to remove all doubt as to his personal identity." The epithet "the seventh" cannot be without meaning; Calvin thinks that it is intended to denote the great age of this prophecy; others see in it a secret, mystical meaning. Bengel: "Every seventh is the most esteemed." Stier: "The seventh from Adam is personally a type of the sanctified of the seventh age of the world (of the seventh millennium, of the great earth-sabbath), therefore he prophesies for this time." Menken: "The number seven was esteemed in the ancient world as an important signature pointing to the sacred and mystery. The fact that after sin and death had freely exerted their unhappy power during the first six generations, in the seventh generation mankind appeared in the person of one man (who had led a godly life, and was taken by God to God without seeing death) in a state of high completeness and blessed freedom from death, has a kind of prophetic-symbolical significance, and intimates that mankind in general, after having duly completed its course and fought its battle under the oppression of sin and death through six long world-periods, shall appear in the seventh world-period in a state of higher completeness, in a more Divine life and more blessed freedom from death. The seventh world-period is the Kingdom of God on earth. To Adam, the first, was revealed and promised the appearance and advent of the Lord, as a Helper and Saviour; to Enoch, the seventh from Adam, was revealed the last advent of the same Lord, Helper and Saviour, as a Judge and Avenger, and he was the first prophet, who spoke and taught this among men." ["The number seven is sacred above all; Enoch is seventh from Adam and walks with God; Moses is seventh from Abraham; Phineas is seventh from Jacob our father, as Enoch was seventh from Adam. And they correspond to the seventh day, which is the Sabbath, the day of rest. Every seventh age is in the highest esteem." Wetstein, citing Rabbinical writings, p. 737. Wordsworth deems it worthy of remark, that Enoch lived as many years as there are days in a solar year, viz., 365, and was then translated (Gen. v. 24.)—M.] The words which follow are found almost literally in the above-mentioned apocryphal book of Enoch, which was formerly known only by fragments and notices of the early fathers, but has recently been discovered in an Æthiopic translation and translated from the Æthiopic into German. It became known in Europe about the close of the last century. Winer, Dorner and others ascribe its authorship to a Jew of the first century of the Christian era; Ewald places its date at the end of the second century before Christ. A new edition and translation of this book was published by D. Dillmann in 1853, who pronounces it to have been written about B.C. 110. The book consists, according to the careful investigation of the last-named scholar, of three parts: 1. The proper and original book of Enoch, which constitutes the greatest part of this apocryphal work. 2. Of historical additions for the elucidation of several doctrines and ideas from the pen of another author, who wrote not long afterwards. 3. Of so-called Nonchian additions connected with other interpolations made by a third author, belonging at least to the end of the first century B.C. The passage in question is rendered by Dillmann thus: "And behold, He comes with myriads of saints to execute judgment on them, and He will destroy the ungodly and judge all flesh in all things which the sinners and the ungodly have committed and done against Him," ch. i. 9. Considering that the variations between the Epistle and the book of Enoch are not inconsiderable, and that the book of Enoch is not expressly cited, there is still room to doubt whether Jude knew that book. But the tradition of Enoch's prophecy he must at all events have known and considered true as to its kernel. [There is an English translation by Archbishop Lawrence, with an introduction and notes, which passed through three editions, 1821, 1833, 1838, but has been completely superseded by that of Dillmann, with an introduction and commentary, published at Leipzig in 1853. See Introduction § 7.—M.]

Behold the Lord came with His holy myriads.—Now follows the substance of the prophecy.—Ἦλθε, the Aorist, because Enoch speaks in a vision, in which the future appears to him as present [really a prophetic past.—M.], as in

Isa. ix. 6; liii. 4. The Æthiopic text of the book of Enoch seems to have the Present.

With His holy myriads; iv. In them, i. e., to be glorified in them, as 2 Thess. i. 10, and with them. Myriads, literally ten thousands, then absolutely, many thousands. The book of Enoch in other similar passages with reference to Dan. vii., uses the terms thousand times thousand, and ten thousand times ten thousand; so ch. xl. 1; lxxi. 10. In Deut. xxxiii. 2, Jehovah is represented as revealing Himself from Sinai, shining forth from among many thousands of saints. According to Zech. xiv. 5, He will come to judgment with all His saints, cf. Matt. xxv. 31; Rev. v. 11. The term denotes not only angels, but also the elect from among men; cf. Heb. xii. 22; 1 Cor. vi. 2.—With His, αὐτοῦ. They belong to Him, stand before His throne, and wait for His commands.

V. 15. To give judgment, etc.—κρίσειν ποιεῖν. John v. 27; cf. Gen. xviii. 25; to execute it in fact. [The term here and in the references seems rather to denote the functions of the Judge, than those of the executor.—M.]

To convict all the ungodly; ἐξελέγξει, the composite form intensifies the idea, which is their thorough and absolute conviction, not their punishment; the reference is to inward conviction in the conscience. [I doubt whether this interpretation is exhaustive; the conviction of course begins with the conscience, but the intensive nature of the composite seems to imply a conviction that shall bring the convicted to judgment, and entail the execution of the judicial sentence.—M.]

Wherein they were ungodly; ἀσεβειν used transitively, cf. 2 Peter ii. 6. Winer, p. 236. The guilt of ungodliness is here made very prominent, the same word being used four times, cf. Zeph. iii. 11.

Of all the hard speeches; σκληρός, hard, dry, rough, indigestible [?—M.], used figuratively of daring, impious blasphemy; cf. 1 Sam. ii. 3; Mal. iii. 13; Numb. xvi. 26. Differently, John vi. 60. This involves even greater guilt than the works which were the result of their ungodly disposition; hence they are named first. In the above-cited passage from the book of Enoch, nothing is said of such hard speeches; but soon after we read: "Ye have reviled His greatness with arrogant, blasphemous speeches of your unclean mouth; ye hard-hearted, ye shall find no peace," ch. v. 4; cf. ch. xlvi. 7.

Against Him.—"Although they did not believe that all their ungodly speeches were aimed at Him."

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Those who know the book of Enoch, with its absurd fancies and its coarse notions of the heavenly world, must revere more strongly than ever the chasteness and truth of our canonical writings, and be grateful to the Church for rejecting such clumsy fabrications. In that book we read, e. g., of the giants or tyrants mentioned in Gen. vi., that "the women with whom the angels had intercourse, conceived and brought forth great giants 6000 feet [German: 3000 Ellen.—M.] in height. These ate up all the produce of men, until men were unable to sustain them any longer. Then the giants turned upon the men to devour them," etc. The book is full of the coarsest materialism, stating as irrefragable facts that there are in heaven particular receptacles for the winds, for hail, snow and rain, for thunder and lightning, that there is a literal cornerstone of the earth, and that the sky is supported by columns. Here is something to learn for the modern friends of an extreme realism.

2. The guilt of the heavenly spirits that apostatized from God is the more aggravated, because in their case there was no temptation from without, as in that of men.

3. Those deceivers confirm the old, but in most instances not sufficiently acknowledged truth, that the decisions of the will are not so much the result of thinking and perceiving, as, on the contrary, thinking and perceiving the result of the decisions of the will. Demosthenes (Olynth., II., 32) already declared "that persons accustomed to do mean and bad acts cannot understand a great and powerful thought, and that the thoughts and intentions of men are the reflections of their manner of life."

4. In reading the account of corruption given in this Epistle, we have to apply the rule belonging to the prophecies of the Old Testament, that the events described in them take place at different times and stages of development before they meet their final and highest fulfilment.

5. "The whole development of evil, as well as of good, grows like a tree, the very beginnings of which contain the same kind in the germ, and foretell the end; but the Spirit of God has, with prophetic vision, described to us the events and delineated the persons for the future." Stier.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Our curiosity should not lead us to seek to penetrate the mysterious incidents of the apostasy of angels; we should rather take warning from so much of it as is clear.—The necessity of continuing in grace, lest somebody spoil us of our crown.—Whoso rejects the light here and does not walk in the light now, will hereafter dwell in eternal darkness.—Whatever is spoken or written against the servants of God, the Eternal Judge will consider as spoken or written against Himself.

H. RIEGER:—It is an old experience of constant and multiform repetition, that the most licentious men are generally also the most impatient of all checks emanating from human sources, that they decry all government and authority as an invention of the devil, and abuse the liberty of the Gospel as a cloak of maliciousness. [Sensuality and lawlessness go together.—M.]—Those who walk in the way of Cain hypocritically observe the externals of religion and its exercise, but are at mortal enmity with whatever aims at the spirit and the truth, and thus end with being driven away from the face of God.

STARKE:—It often happens that the more good God does to man, the more man wanders away from God, Deut. xxxii. 15. But if men resist the goodness of God, He has recourse to severity and justice, Rom. ii. 4; xi. 22.—Unbelief is certainly the greatest sin, and the source of all other vices.—Heaven is a many-mansioned house, Jno. xiv. 2. Thank God that through Christ we may once more return to our first home, whereas the devils have left their habitation forever, 2 Cor. v. 1. 2.—The life of heaven is a state of liberty, light and peace; the life of hell is a state of confinement, darkness and perpetual fear of more punishment.—Sins that cannot be named in decency, or on account of ignorance, are yet so common among Christians that a preacher does not know whether he ought to speak of them, or be silent, Ex. viii. 8. 9.—O! the mad blindness of men, that will not grow wise by other people's injury, but will persist in their daring even to the extent of being made examples of the Divine judgment, 2 Chron. xxx. 8; Lke. xiii. 4. 5.—Although some governments are not what they ought to be, men ought to honour in them the image of God, Ex. xxii. 38.—True zeal, be it never so great, is always humble and modest, whereas false zeal is defiant and passionate, Rom. x. 2.—Jesus uttered His woes on none more than on false teachers and hypocrites, Matt. xxiii. 13. They have the heart of a Cain, a Balaam and a Korah.—Gold and honours are two hooks with which the devil fishes and catches many thousand souls for his kingdom, Jno. xiii. 2; 1 Chron. xxii. 1.—All the feasts of Christians ought by rights to be love-feasts, Neh. viii. 10.—Can there be anything more unhappy than being rooted out and separated from the communion of the life of Christ? Col. ii. 7.—Think ye that the pagans were allowed to revile their gods, as God is, without let or punishment, blasphemed among Christians? But have patience, Jesus will summon those mighty blasphemers to His bar, and avenge the insult that has been heaped upon Him.

VERSES 16-23.

COMMENTS:—Further description of the persons who were the subjects of the Apostles' prophecies, v. 16-19; followed by an exhortation to edification on the foundation of faith, and to proper treatment of the deceived with a view to their salvation, vv. 20-23.

- 16 <sup>1</sup>These are murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts; and their mouth speaketh great swelling words, having men's persons in admiration <sup>2</sup> because of advantage. <sup>3</sup> But, <sup>4</sup> beloved, remember ye the words which were spoken <sup>5</sup> before of the apostles of <sup>6</sup> our Lord Jesus Christ; How <sup>7</sup> that they told you there should <sup>8</sup> be mockers in the last time, <sup>9</sup> who should walk after their own ungodly lusts. <sup>10</sup> These be they who separated themselves, sensual, <sup>11</sup> having not the Spirit. <sup>12</sup> But ye, beloved, building up yourselves on your <sup>13</sup> most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking <sup>14</sup> for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.
- 22 23 And of <sup>15</sup> some have compassion, making a difference: <sup>16</sup> And others save with <sup>17</sup> fear, pulling <sup>18</sup> them out of the fire; hating even the garment spotted by the flesh. <sup>19</sup>

Verse 16. [German:—"These are they, murmurers, discontented with God and the world." The italicized words are paraphrase and comment, rather than translation. γογγυσται, murmurers, describes their views of God, μωμψίμοιροι, complainers, denotes their discontent with their lot.—M.]

[German:—"Flatterers to the face" is too free, better, "admiring persons," which adheres more closely to the Greek θαυμάζοντες πρόσσωα.—M.]

[German:—"For profit's sake."—M.]

Verse 17. [German:—"But ye. So German, all the old English and foreign versions, except the Dutch.—M.]

[German:—"the words which were foretold you by the Apostles;" too free, better retain the rendering of E. V.: "which were spoken before," but substituting "by" ὑπὲρ, for "of"—M.]

[The German omits "Awe," which is superfluous; render, "that they told you, etc."—M.]

[German:—"shall be; so German, Vulgate, Reims, al.—M.]

[Lachm. and Tischend. read ἵνα ἵσχυρόν τοῦ χρ. ἐλεῶσιν. Sier considers this reading an imitation of 2 Pet. iii. 3. [It is the reading of A. B. C. and Sin.; but B. C. omit τοῦ before χρέον, so Meyer and Huther. ἐλεῶσιν is marked * in Cod. Sin. by Tischendorf.—M.]

[German:—"who walk after their own lusts in ungodliness." While it is better to retain the participial construction, with Vulg., Syr., it is also better to bring out the grammatical relation of ἐκθροῦναι and ἀσεβείων, and to translate the whole verse: "that they told you that in the last time there shall be scoffers, walking according to their own lusts in ungodliness."—M.]

Verse 19. [1. α. αὐτοῦ, B. C., Vulg., Griesb., al.; A., Sin., Tischend., Lachm., al. omit it. Lillie suggests "separate" without the Pronoun; the sense is hardly affected by the omission, for ἀποδομιζόντες may be taken with the reflexive force which transitive verbs sometimes do bear (Winer, p. 266), and signifies "separatists," both in doctrine and Church-fellowship.—M.]

[δ. ψυχικὸν, German:—"Seelische;" the English "animal" on account of its connection with the Latin anima, the French âme, respectively answering to the Greek ψυχή, has something to recommend it, but is not as expressive and correct as "psychical" or "soulful."—M.]

[πνεῦμα μὴ ἔχοντες. German:—"That have no spirit," or retaining the Participial construction: "having no spirit."—M.]

Verse 20. [C. reads ἡμῶν for ὑμῶν. [Sin. observes the following order: ἐποικοδομοῦντες αὐτοὺς τῇ ἀγιοτάτῃ ὑμῶν πίστει.—M.]

[German: "... build yourselves further up on your most holy faith in the Holy Ghost with prayer," better render with closer adherence to the Greek: "building up yourselves on your most holy faith praying in the Holy Ghost."—M.]

Verse 21. [14 προσδεχόμενοι, "waiting for" (German) better than "looking for."—M.]

Verse 22. [15 οὓς μὲν ἐλθεῖτε ἑαλέτε ἑκαστὸν ἐν φόβῳ. The opposition should be marked, and I adopt accordingly Lillie's rendering: "On some, indeed, have compassion."—M.]

[C. reads: οὓς μὲν ἐλέγχετε διακρινόμενοι; οὓς δὲ σώζετε ἐκ πυρὸς ἀρπάζοντες ἐν φόβῳ. A. B., followed by Lachmann and Tischendorf, have three members. 1. ἐλέγχετε (B. ἐλεᾶτε); 2. σώζετε. . . . ἐκ πυρὸς ἀρπάζοντες; 3. ἐλεᾶτε ἐν φόβῳ μισούντες. De Wette ascribes the last ἐλεᾶτε to a gloss, or the mistake of a transcriber. Vulgate: "hos quidem arguite judicatos."]

[Sin., ἐλεᾶτε διακρινόμενοι. On the different interpretations of this difficult verse see below in EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL, where the whole subject is discussed.—M.]

Verse 23. [17 ἐν φόβῳ, "in fear," not "with fear" as E. V.—Sin. reads: "... σώζετε ἐκ—πυρὸς ἀρπάζοντες οὓς δὲ ἐλεᾶτε ἐν φόβῳ." See more below in EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.—M.]

[18 "Snatch" or "pluck" better than "pull."—M.]

[19 The whole verse according to the Sinaitic reading would run thus: "But others save, plucking them out of the fire; and on others have compassion in fear." So substantially Lachmann, Tischendorf, Wordsworth, Alford.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 16. These are, etc.—Jude, as with up-lifted finger, points once more to these ungodly men, of whom Enoch prophesied.

Murmurers.—ἀπαξ λεγόμενον from γογγύζω, to murmur or mutter, as well as μωμψίμοιροι, to which the former is nearly related. The object of their murmuring is not mentioned. Ver. 15 seems to intimate that it was their discontent with the appointments and dispensations of Divine Providence, opposition to their superiors, especially in the Church, like the company of Korah murmured against Moses and Aaron, and like Diotrephes. 8 Jno. 9.

Complainers.—[German: Discontented with God and the world. Alford following the German versions: "Dissatisfied with their lot."—M.]. μωμψίμοιροι, properly, fault-finders with Providence, and the lot apportioned to them. From a passage in Theophrast, cited by de Wette, it would seem to be used of censoriousness and discontent in general. Bengel explains it of discontent with God. This word denotes the outward, the former the inward. [Cf. Theophrast, char. XVII. περί μεψμορίας and contrast this character with St. Paul's spirit and language in Phil. iv. 11. 12; 1 Tim. vi. 6-8; Heb. xiii. 6. Wordsw., Philo, Vit. Mos., p. 109, 29, says of the Jews, καὶ πάλιν ἤρξαντο μεψμορεῖν; Lucian, Sacrif., I., τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος μεψμορούσης, ὅτι μὴ παρείλφη πρὸς τὴν θυσίαν ἀπὸ τοῦ Οἰνέως. Hesychius explains μεψμορός thus: μεψόμενος τὸ ἀγαθόν· ἢ φιλεγκλήμων, ἢ φιλαίτιος.—M.]

Walking after their own lusts.—The same expression occurs 2 Pet. iii. 3; cf. ch. ii. 10; 1 Pet. iv. 3. Calvin gives the right connection with the preceding thus: "Those who yield themselves to their evil lusts, are also murmuring and discontented, so that one can never do things right for them."

And their mouth speaketh great swelling things.—Boastful, impudent words. Cf. notes on 2 Pet. ii. 18. The book of Enoch contains frequent references to such vaunting speeches directed against God and His appointments; it has the peculiar expression: "and these are they that control the stars and lift up their hands against the Most High." Jas. iii. 6; Dan. vii. 8. 20.

Admiring persons.—(German: "Flatterers to the face"); literally, "admiring the faces." The former is to be taken as a parenthesis. Cf. Gen. xix. 21; Lev. xix. 16; Deut. x. 17, rendered by LXX. θαυμάζειν πρόσωπον = נִשְׁחָזֵק נִשְׁחָזֵק, to favour one, to prefer, honour and highly esteem. So Stier, de Wette, Huther. The first and third parallel passages, however, are inapplicable, the reference in them being to God's dealings with man, and the second relates to partiality, as in Sir. vii. 29. But as it is not said here whose person they regard, while in other places we have always some qualification, such as the person of the great or poor, it seems more fitting to emphasize πρόσωπα and to explain it with reference to sensuality, the leading characteristics of those deceivers, thus: they flatter the objects of their lust, extol their beauty and thus lure them to themselves in order to use them for their own purposes, not excluding pecuniary advantage. Cf. 2 Pet. ii. 14, where sensuality and covetousness are intimately connected.—ὡφελείας χάριν should be closely connected with θαυμάζοντες. ["Calvin: "Magniloquentiam taxat, quod se ipsos fastuosos jactent: sed interea ostendit iliberali esse ingenio, quia serviliter se dimittant."—Fronmüller's interpretation of θαυμάζοντες πρόσωπα is very far-fetched. The phrase is a Hebraism and signifies to respect the person in a good or bad sense, to be partial, as a judge unjustly partial or corrupted by bribes; cf. Hebrew and LXX. of Lev. xix. 15; Job xxxii. 21; xxxiv. 19; Ps. lxxxii. 2; Prov. xviii. 6; Deut. x. 17; 2 Chron. xix. 7; Job xiii. 10; Mal. ii. 9; where it is used in a bad sense. There is no need for the reference to sensuality, for the meaning that they favoured the rich and influential by accommodating their teaching to their prejudices and vicious practices is in perfect keeping with the character of those false teachers in particular, and all time-servers in general.—M.]

VER. 17. But ye, beloved, remember the words which were spoken before by the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ.—As Peter thought it necessary to remind his readers of the Apostolical word in order to protect them from deceivers, 2 Pet. iii. 2. 15. 16, so Jude feels prompted to adopt the same course. Besides the second Epistle of Peter, Jude may here refer to passages like Acts xx. 29, 30; 2 Tim. iii. 1, etc. The primary reference is to their warnings against deceivers, the secondary to their exhortations to steadfastness and perseverance in the faith.

By the Apostles.—The unprejudiced reader of these words can hardly resist the conviction that this Epistle is not that of an Apostle, even as the author does not call himself an Apostle in v. 1. Sepp's opinion that he distinguishes himself from the other Apostles by the designation "the Lord's brother" is sophistical. [I fully concur with Alford that this text is not decisive as to whether St. Jude was, or was not, an Apostle. He might use the expression, being himself an Apostle, and he is certainly more likely to have used it, not being an Apostle. St. Peter, on the authority A. B. C. K. L., al., at 2 Pet. iii. 3 uses the same expression without the ἡμῶν—"and whichever view is taken as to the genuineness or otherwise of 2 Peter, there could be no intention by such an expression to exclude either the real or the pretended St. Peter from the number of the Apostles."—M.]—The contrast of Peter's language (2 Pet. iii. 2) is remarkable. Jude's using in the next verse ἡμῶν and not ἡμῶν does not prove anything. [For while it is not certain that he included himself among the Apostles, it is very uncertain whether he intended to exclude himself from their number. So Alford.—M.] The principal reason why the reference is not to the Lord's self-own words is stated by Stier, who says that we have the account of the words and works of Jesus from the lips of the Apostles, or on the testimony confirmed by the Apostles.

Spoken before.—The term includes both the priority of their testimony and its prophetic character. [This is the reason why the rendering of E. V. is preferable to the German translation. See above in Appar. Crit. v. 17. 4.—Wordsworth: "There seems also to be reference here to the description of the last days in St. Paul's last Epistle, 2 Tim. iii. 1-6, ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις ἔσονται ἄνθρωποι φιλαυτοὶ κ. τ. λ. There is a special propriety in this admonitory reference in this Epistle—one of the last of the Catholic Epistles—to the last warning in the Epistles, of the Apostles of the Circumcision and of the Gentiles, St. Peter and St. Paul. Cf. Occumen. on v. 1. Cf. the admonition in Hebrews xiii. 7: "Remember your rulers, who spoke to you the word of God," where St. Paul appears to be exhorting the Hebrews to remember especially St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem; and St. Jude, the brother of St. James, here appears to be exhorting his readers to remember St. Peter and St. Paul."—M.]

VER. 18. In the last time there shall be

scoffers, etc.—Jude here evidently has an express reference to the second Epistle of Peter: for the words which he cites, are almost literally found at 2 Pet. iii. 8, the only variation being, first: that Peter says, “there shall come”, while Jude has “there shall be.” [See above, Appar. Crit. v. 18, 9.—M.] But the latter expression occurs also in 2 Pet. ii. 1. The second variation is Jude’s addition of τῶν ἀσεβούντων, it being, as we have already seen, (v. 15), his aim to give special prominence to the ungodliness of those men. This verse supplies one of the chief proofs of the priority of the second Epistle of Peter. Even de Wette has to admit that such a prophecy cannot be found any where except in 2 Pet. iii. 8. Huther’s statement that these words need not be considered as a literally exact quotation, but that they may be a compression of the various predictions of the Apostles concerning this subject, is an untenable make-shift. Consider, e.g., the peculiar word ἐπαικάζει, which occurs only here and 2 Pet. iii. 8.

In the last time; ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ ᾠκνῳ. See notes on 2 Peter iii. 8, [cf. Appar. Crit., verse 18. 9.—M.]

In ungodliness.—Literally: “After their lusts turned to ungodliness;” so de Wette: “Lusts of ungodliness” (Stier), because the ground of every lust is nothing but some special ungodliness, denying, mocking and rejecting the divine opposed to that lust.

VER. 19. These are they who separate [themselves]. Final description of these men by a third, “These are.”

Who separate [themselves].—Ἀποδοιοῦσιν, to set off by drawing a boundary, to separate. Lachmann and Tischendorf omit ἐαυτοὺς; in that case we have to translate, “who cause separations, make factions.” So de Wette, Luther.—Huther, on the other hand, justly remarks, that had Jude intended to express that idea, he would hardly have satisfied himself with this one word. He considers ἐαυτοὺς genuine, and expounds: “They who separate themselves from the Church.” But this hardly suits the description of those men, v. 12, who boldly pressed forward to the love-feasts of the faithful. The correct explanation follows from the next verse: They tear loose from the faith of the Church, and separate themselves from the Church inwardly, although they cannot be separated outwardly by Church-discipline, and indeed all the circumstances of the case point to the impossibility of such discipline being at that time administered in those Churches. [The different readings have been considered in Appar. Crit., v. 19, note 11. The interpretation of Huther is based on an argument, by no means uncommon among commentators, but most objectionable wherever and whenever advanced. I refer to the supposed intention of the sacred writers, with which these commentators seem to be fully acquainted, although I am at a loss to conjecture how or whence they get that knowledge, and suspect, that an appeal to the intention of the sacred writers is a convenient way of enforcing a peculiar view, or of evading a difficulty. Moreover, every thing depends on the fitness of things, as it appears to each particular mind. Huther and Fronmüller think that if Jude had intended to express the general idea, he would not have confined himself to the use of one word; but others, with their idea of the fitness of things, will think that he selected this one word on account of its expressiveness. The fact is, that he did use only one word, of ἀποδοιοῦσιν, and since the Definite Article with the Participle Present denotes a habit and state, the Noun separatists, or the verbal form “they who separate,” seem to be in exact agreement with the Greek, while the omission of ἐαυτοὺς, supported by high authority, leaves us free to limit the meaning of ἀποδοιοῦσιν to the men themselves, to extend it to others, or to apply it to both. We incline to do the last, and are supported by Oecumen., Clement of Alexandr., Erasmus, Estius ( “Potest absolute sumi, SEPARANTES, id est, qui separationem faciunt tam in coetibus, quam in doctrina.”), Bloomf., Wordsw., Lillie and others. The ancient Catena expounds this word: “Making schisms and rending the members of the Church,” and Hooker (Serm. V. 11) specifies three kinds of separations: “Men do separate themselves either by heresy, schism, or apostasy. If they loose the bond of faith, which then they are justly supposed to do, when they frowardly expugn any principal point of Christian doctrine, this is to separate themselves by heresy. If they break the bond of unity, whereby the body of the Church is coupled and knit in one, as they do which wilfully forsake all external communion with saints in holy exercises purely and orderly established in the Church, this is to separate themselves by schism. If they willingly cast off and utterly forsake both profession of Christ and communion with Christians, taking their leave of all religion, this is to separate themselves by plain apostasy.”—M.]

Psychical (German “Seelische”); ψυχικοί, cf. 1 Cor. ii. 14. 15; xv. 44. 46. Persons in whom the earthly life of the soul rules, and the life of the Spirit with its higher powers is subjugated. Paul describes them as “fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind,” Eph. ii. 3. They either live in open sin, or content themselves with outward propriety, while inwardly they are the slaves of pride, avarice; sensuality or other vices. [Alford: “Sensual. We have no English word for ψυχικός; and our biblical psychology is, by this defect, entirely at fault. The ψυχή is the centre of the personal being, the ‘I’ of each individual. It is in each man bound to the spirit, man’s higher part, and to the body, man’s lower part; drawn upwards by the one, downwards by the other. He who gives himself up to the lower appetites, is σαρκικός: he who by communion of his πνεῦμα with God’s Spirit is employed in the higher aims of his being, is πνευματικός. He who rests midway, thinking only of self and self’s interests, whether animal or intellectual, is the ψυχικός, the selfish man in whom the spirit is sunk and degraded into subordination to the subordinate ψυχή. In the lack of any adequate word, I have retained the ‘sensual’ of the E. V., though the impression which it gives is a wrong one; ‘selfish’ would be as bad, for the ψυχικός may be an amiable and generous man: ‘animal’ would be worse: ‘intellectual,’ worse still. If the word were not so ill-looking in our language, ‘psychic’ would be a great gain.”—Animal has some merit on account of its connection with anima;

see Appar. Crit., v. 19, note 11 b. I have rendered "Seelische" ψυχικοί, by "psychical," which sounds and looks better than "psychic," or the Saxon "soulish."—Irenæus I., 6. 2-4, reports certain Gnostics of the sub-Apostolic age to have said, "that animal men (ψυχικοί) are conversant only with animal things (ψυχικά), and have not perfect Gnosis: and they describe us who are of the Church, as such; and they say that as we are only such, we must do good works, in order to be saved; but, they assert, that they themselves will be saved, not by practice, but because they are spiritual (πνευματικοί) by nature: and that as gold, though mingled with fire, does not lose its beauty, so they themselves, though wallowing in the mire of carnal works, do not lose their own spiritual essence, and therefore, though they eat things offered to idols, and are the first to resort to the banquets which the heathen celebrate in honour of their false gods, and abstain from nothing that is foul in the eyes of God or man, they say that they cannot contract any defilement from these impure abominations; and they scoff at us who fear God, as silly dotards (cf. v. 10), and hugely exalt themselves, calling themselves perfect, and the elect seed; and they even make lust a virtue, and call us mere animal men (ψυχικούς), and say that we stand in need of temperance, in order to come to the pleroma, but that they themselves, who are spiritual and perfect, have no need thereof."—M.]

Having no spirit.—De Wette says the reference lies to the Holy Spirit, although the Article is wanting. Huther understands the expression of higher soul-life wrought by the Spirit. But in either case we should have a most stale summing-up of the characteristics of those animal-minded men. Surely it is self-evident that persons like those here described, cannot have the Spirit of God and the new life and nature of regeneration. The negative μή, moreover, is decidedly opposed to such a supposition. Had Jude intended to convey that idea, he necessarily ought to have used οὐ; for the writers of the New Testament are more precise in this respect than is generally supposed. Winer, p. 494, sqq. μή means: I might say that they have no spirit at all. We might altogether deny their possessing a rational spirit. This is the meaning of πνεῦμα, which, besides body and soul, is one of the constituents of our nature. Hence we may not conclude from this passage, with Bengel, that "the spirit is no essential part of man." On the contrary, it is that which essentially distinguishes man from an animal, a breath from (out of) God, the noblest part of our nature; but as, in the case of all natural men, it lies concealed since the fall in carnal and animal life, it may be so effectually sunk and buried under the flesh by continual sins, as if it were no longer extant. "Conscience at last becomes blunted, almost to annihilation; the mind is dried up and killed, the higher consciousness lowered to a state of mere animal dreaming, the faculty of cognition ceases to exist." Stier. This state of induration was the condition of those animal men without spirit; they had almost reached the level of brutes, cf. v. 10. [Alford: These men have not indeed ceased to have πνεῦμα, as a part of their own tripartite nature: but they have ceased to possess it in any worthy sense: it is degraded beneath and under the power of the ψυχή, the personal life, so as to have no real vitality of its own. See Delitzsch, Biblische Psychologie, § 2, "Das neue Geistesleben;" and Beck, "Umriss der biblischen Seelenlehre, p. 85, sqq."—M.]

As contrasted with those men who had wandered so far from the true faith, Jude now exhorts the readers of his Epistle to give the more heed to building themselves up upon their most holy faith (v. 20). The principal exhortation, contained in v. 21, "Keep yourselves in the love of God," is surrounded by three participial sentences, two of which at all events are coördinated, viz., ἐποικοδομοῦντες and προσευχόμενοι. They indicate the manner how that keeping is to take place. The central Participle προσευχόμενοι may either be joined to the preceding ἐν πνεύματι ἀγάπῃ and subordinated to ἐποικοδομοῦντες, or be connected with the sequel. Against the former connection de Wette advances three reasons with which we agree: a. The propriety of the thought per se; b. The antithesis to the separatistic lusts of those men abandoned by the Holy Spirit (and their own rational spirit); c. The trinitarian arrangement of the language: to which we add, d. The infrequency of the expression "to pray in the Holy Spirit," which Huther explains as a praying in which the Holy Spirit is the moving and leading power, and in support of which Bengel cites Eph. vi. 18; Zech. xii. 10; John iv. 24. Should it be thought that this construction lessens the force of προσευχόμενοι, its central position admits of its being joined not only to the sequel, but also to the preceding words, provided it be not connected with ἐν πνεύματι ἀγάπῃ, which would be something different than praying in the Spirit.

VER. 20. Building up yourselves, etc.—(German: "Continus to build up yourselves with prayer on your most holy faith.")

πίστις here, as in v. 8 and 2 Pet. i. 1, denotes objective faith, the truths of faith considered as a whole. This follows from the predicate and the verb, by which faith is qualified. The primary reference in most holy faith is antithetical to those unholy scoffers and deceivers, the secondary reference is general, and points to its origin, object and end. "Jude thus addresses the saints just because it is a faith of the sanctified in the thrice Holy One, in whom they ~~are~~ and become holy." Stier.

ἐποικοδομοῦντες, to build upon it, and to build again, cf. οικοδομή, 1 Cor. iii. 9. Faith in God and Christ is the foundation on which we must build ourselves up, ever more firmly in all directions, and into which we must ever root ourselves deeper and deeper. The term implies both strengthening and growth, cf. Heb. xii. 28; Col. ii. 6, 7; 2 Pet. i. 6; iii. 18; 1 Pet. ii. 5.

ἐαυτοὺς not ἀλλήλους, although that is not excluded. Bengel:—"Who first defends himself, may also save others."

In the Holy Spirit.—In His communion and power, not in reliance on their own wisdom and strength. [We can hardly agree with the construction advocated in the text, and see really no valid objection to προσευχόμενοι being joined with ἐν πνεύματι ἀγάπῃ.—Fronmüller's artificial arrangement strikes us as unnecessary and a distinction without a difference. "To pray in the Holy Spirit" is a clear idea, fully borne out by Bengel's references, and in perfect keeping with the rest of the sentence. The three participles seem to be coördinated, building, praying and waiting being necessary to keeping ourselves in the love of God; the parallelism, moreover, is perfect, 1, τῇ ἀγαπᾷ πιστεῖ ἐποικοδομοῦντες, 2, ἐν πνεύματι ἀγῶν προσευχόμενοι, 3, προσδεχόμενοι τὸ ἔλεος κ. τ. λ. In this trinitarian arrangement, moreover, we have an express reference to the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, and faith, love and hope grouped round "prayer in the Holy Spirit."—M.]

VER. 21. Waiting for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.—The positive expression of the concluding caution of the second Epistle of Peter, "Beware lest ye fall from your own steadfastness." Compare here the repeated exhortations of our Lord to abiding in His love, Jno. xv. 4. 9. While it is true that nothing but the power of God can preserve us unto salvation, cf. 1 Pet. i. 5; 2 Thess. iii. 3; Jno. xvii. 6, it is equally true that we must do our part in this great work of God, and make faithful and good use of our gifts and graces for our sanctification. Hence John says (1 Jno. v. 18), "He that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not." "Man also, by exercising himself in the word of God, may strengthen his love to God, and thereby more richly enjoy the love which God has to us." John xiv. 21. Rieger.

In the love of God.—This is the genitive subjecti, in the love which God has to us, in which we are through faith. This explanation agrees best with the verb "keep," and the reference to the mercy of Christ which follows it. Our love to God is kindled by His love to us. Rieger and Richter connect the two ideas.

For the mercy of our Lord.—Cf. Tit. ii. 18. Since προσδεχόμενοι points to the future, the allusion is to the mercy by which Christ will glorify Himself in His saints in His great day, cf. 2 Pet. iii. 12–15; Heb. ix. 28; 1 Thess. i. 10; Jas. ii. 18. Its opposite is the fire (v. 23), into which we belong according to our natural state. Even the most advanced Christians confess: "We ask for time and for eternity nothing but mercy."

Unto eternal life.—This may be connected with ἔλεος, the saving mercy of Christ conducing to eternal life (de Wette), but the connection with "keep yourselves" seems more natural (Huther). [Hardly as natural as the connection with προσδεχόμενοι (Bengel).—M.]—The prominence given here to the Trinity, "Holy Spirit, God, Jesus Christ," should not be overlooked.

VER. 22. And on some, indeed, have compassion, etc.—Now follows a direction for the proper treatment of the weak and deceived among the body of believers. The textual criticism of this passage is difficult [see above Appar. Crit., v. 22. 16.—M.]. Adhering to the common reading, the first question relates to the meaning of διακρινόμενοι, which signifies in the Middle, to contend or dispute with one, Acts xi. 2; Jude 9, but also to be at variance with oneself, Mt. xxi. 21; Rom. iv. 20; xiv. 23; Jas. i. 6; in Active sometimes to prefer, distinguish, 1 Cor. iv. 7; then to cause to differ, to discern, Acts xv. 9; 1 Cor.

xi. 29; and lastly, to judge, 1 Cor. xi. 31. The passage under notice admits only the sense to distinguish, discern, or separate, which it also bears in classical Greek. The meaning would then be clear, as given in the translation, "Separating them from others," i. e., if you find in some only a spark of the love of Christ, have compassion on them and separate them in your judgment and conduct from others. Stier: "On some have compassion, making a difference, i. e., treating some mildly, others severely."—ἐκ μὲν and ἐκ δὲ are often used for ὁ μὲν and ὁ δὲ. Winer, p. 117. If we adopt, however, the more authentic reading: οὓς μὲν ἐλέγχετε διακρινόμενοι, διακρινέσθαι cannot be taken in the sense of the Vulgate, but either in that of separation (Oecumenius), or better in that of contention. Oecumenius paraphrases: "If they separate themselves from you, before all things reveal their ungodliness." But it is more correct to render: "when they contend with you, convict them, hold up to them their wrong and perverseness." De Wette and Bengel make διακρινόμενοι—to doubt, to hesitate between fidelity to ecclesiastical order and apostasy, and explain the word of the deceived, not the deceivers. Although this distinction is not indicated here, it is evident that the reference cannot be to false teachers, who were described as incorrigible in v. 12, but to weak, contentious and deceived members of the body of believers. Jude from v. 20 onwards, ceases to deal with the false teachers, and refers only to believers. [The New Testament use of the word διακρίνομαι in Middle seems to preponderate in favour of "to doubt," Acts x. 20; xi. 12; Rom. xiv. 23; Jas. i. 6; the note of Bengel on vv. 22. 23 is as follows: "Tria genera enumerat apostolus eorum, quorum saluti consulere sancti debeant, ac primum quidem genus intellectu laborat; secundum affectu, vehementer; tertium affectu, minus vehementer. Itaque I. ELENCHUS sive demonstratio boni et mali debet eis, qui eum dubitationibus conflictantur, et in medio antipitque hærent. II. Quos IGNIS jam prope corripuit, si rapida vi, quacumque parte prehensi, SERVARI debent. III. MISERICORDITER et leniter tractandi sunt ii, que metu solo, et benigna periculi demonstratione, in viam reduci possunt."—M.]

VER. 23. But others save in fear, etc.—ἐν φόβῳ is opposed to ἐλεειν; attack them strongly, influence them by motives of fear and terror; delineate heaven and hell to them. Huther thinks of the fear of the persons engaged in saving them: take heed, lest in the attempt to convert them, ye be drawn over to their side, and fall a prey to their ruin. This yields a good sense, but the former explanation is preferable, the same precaution being necessary in the case of the first class of the deceived. [Doubtful whether the explanation commended by Frommüller is tenable; the word fear seems hardly to describe the disposition of bold assailants, courage would be more apposite. Then the appeal to the fears of the deceived would require δῆλ rather than ἐν; we prefer, therefore, the interpretation of de Wette: "with conscientious solicitude for the Church's salvation and your own," and Lillie's briefer rendering: "In a spirit of fear."] Priæus in CRIT. SACRI: "Festinantes et trepidantes: eorum ritu qui aliquid ex flamma rapiunt, salvate eos: θάρρος, ut loquitur Artemidorus."—M.]

Plucking them out of the fire.—Huther understands πῦρ of the ruin in which they already find themselves. But this use of fire is not scriptural. Jude had spoken of eternal fire, v. 7, as had Peter in 2 Pet. iii. 7. To that he refers back. Cf. Is. i. 11. "Behold, all ye that kindle a fire, that compass yourselves about with sparks: walk in the light of your fire and in the sparks that ye have kindled." ἀπράζειν denotes, as Huther rightly observes, hasty, almost violent snatching away, and indicates that they were already in extreme peril of perdition. So Joshua, the high-priest, is called "a brand plucked out of the fire." Zech. iii. 2. Cf. Amos iv. 11: "Ye were as a firebrand, plucked out of the burning." Stier refers to wavering Lot, when the angels took him by the hand, and led him away, half by force, from the burning. [Terence, Andr. 1. 1. "Quis sese in ignem projicere voluit, prohibui, servavi."—M.].—The other reading is: ἐλεῖτε (for ἐλεῖτε, see Winer, p. 97) ἐν φόβῳ μωσίντες, where ἐλεῖτε is to be joined to ἐν φόβῳ, and the latter to be understood of the caution to be exerted by those engaged in saving. Bengel distinguishes the three classes as given above under v. 22, although, as Stier remarks, they cannot be well distinguished.

Hating even the garment spotted by the flesh.—Their compassion and saving activity must go hand in hand with sincere hatred of evil and every thing that is even outwardly connected with it. "Let not the saving love to the sinner do detriment to the hatred of sin." Stier. Is. lii. 11.

καί, here in the sense of even. Hence v. Meyer: "Hate, flee even every outward moral impurity and its infection, not only the inward, the flesh itself, but also the seemingly innocent trace of sin." Bengel: "Hate the contamination which may pass from the flesh of those unclean persons to your outward and consequently also to your inward conversation."

[Oecumenius: τῷ ἑλῶ τῷ πρὸς αὐτοὺς συνεπέσθω τὸ μῶσος τὸ πρὸς τὰ μαρὰ αὐτῶν ἔργα, μωσίντων ἡμῶν καὶ βεβλυσσομένων, καὶ τὸν ἀπὸ τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτῶν ἐκπιλωμένον, ἥτοι μεμιασμένον αὐτῶν χιτῶνα, ὡς τῇ πρὸς τὴν αὐτῶν σάρκα προσφάσσει, καὶ αὐτοῦ βδελυροῦ χρηματίζοντος.—M.]

Χιτῶν, the tunic or inner robe, worn next to the skin; sometimes, however, it denotes also the outer garb. Here the figure of whatever belongs to the outward appearance of men, their mode of life, habits and manner of speech. [But the inner robe, nearest to the person is soiled by the stains of the flesh, that, therefore, ye must hate (Wordsworth). "Animus videlicet tunica maculata est spiritus concupiscentiis pollutus carnalibus." Clem. Alex. The expression of Jude is rather hyperbolic than proverbial. Pricæus: "ITA APULIUS, FORMIDANS, AC PROCUŁ PERHORRESCENS ETIAM IPSAM DOMUM EJUS: ac si diceret, non tantum abhorrens convivium ad quod vocabatur, sed et aedes ipsas in quibus, illud convivium faciendum erat."—M.]

σπιδῶ; cf. Jas. iii. 6.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

[1. Flattery, pride and partiality mark the hireling; sincerity, humility and impartiality the true pastor (v. 16, cf. Jno. x. 1-17.) "Omnis qui adulatur, aut propter avaritiam vel gloriam adulatur."

2. The cure of souls, like the practice of medicine, requires a skilful diagnosis of every spiritual disease and judicious treatment. Medicine must be given with reference to the nature of the disease and the constitution of the patient, but the means used must in every case be adjusted to the end, viz.: the salvation of the patient. Seneca: "Aliiter cum alio agendum est." Cassiodorus: "Aegris non una causa salutis est: alter cibis reficitur, alter per abstinencia beneficia tenuatur; hic lavacra mollia, ille ferrum querit ad vulnera."—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The knowledge "that thus it must be" (Mt. xvi. 54; Jno. xvi. 1) is an admirable support of faith in affliction.—The spirit of scoffing is here represented as rooted not in the understanding, but in the heart sold to sin. The increase of scoffers belongs to the forerunners of the anti-christian time.—"By scoffing men completely break off the sting from God's truth, which may interfere with their life according to their own lusts." RIGGA:—"It is only by standing fast in the faith resting on Apostolical testimony that we are secure against the stormy flood of the unbelief, scoffing and ungodliness of the last times. The hard struggles of Christians at the close of the Apostolical age with the fearful power of unbelief and scoffing are typical of similar conflicts in the last days before the judgment.—Edifying oneself and others is one of the chief duties of Christianity; complaining and disclosing hurts a poor art.—[ "Qui sibi jam consuluit, consulat alii."—BENGEL.—M.].—The way of separation is displeasing to God, Prov. xviii. 1.—One of the seals of the truth of our religion is its insisting everywhere on holiness. The evangelical Church is built upon the immovable foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, and not on the quicksand of human tradition.—The edifice of Christianity must not only have a firm foundation, but ever be raised higher and firmer.—The only true progress—going to meet eternal life.—Those who want first to do good works and conduct themselves well, and afterwards to believe in God and put their trust in Him, turn the house upside down and put the roof on the floor.—If our building is to prosper, it must not be done in our own spirit and strength, but in the Holy Spirit with unceasing prayer.—Prayer the surest and most necessary means for the building of Christianity.—If we have had any experience of the sweetness of the love of God, the monition "Keep yourselves in the love of God" is addressed to us. This is done by opening our hearts to God, by musing on His great Love to us unworthy men, by carefully noting every thing that may hinder or further us in love, and by waiting for the mercy of Christ.—The beginning and the end of evangelical Christianity are alike; every thing from first to last is the result of mercy and grace.—Christianity is an unfathomable sea of the mercies of Jesus Christ. Those who trust themselves to it in penitence and faith will surely reach the haven of eternity.—Suffer yourselves not to be deprived of your part in this life, but wait for eternal life where the treasures of the mercy of God will be fully opened to you.—If we have found salvation in Christ, we are also seized by the desire of saving others; but we should take hold of every man according to his own peculiar wants.—Take heed lest in saving others thou burn thyself!—["But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a cast-away." 1 Cor. ix. 27.—M.]—Divide the word rightly, classify your hearers, although some may not like it.—Our life should be nothing but a constant waiting for and desire of the life to come.

STARKE:—O, the miserableness of the walk after one's own lusts! and yet many, alas!—perhaps thyself also, reader—walk after their own lusts, 1 Tim. vi. 9.—A teacher should deal with his hearers fairly, and, as far as possible, in love, for love often achieves more than the greatest punishment. But if the rod gentleness cannot effect any thing, then it is lawful to use the rod woe, Zech. xi. 7; 1 Cor. iv. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 24; iv. 2. Scoffing is a most fearful sin, for it makes of God and His word pastime and mockery; it will rarely be seen that such scoffers attain to conversion, but in most instances they will be seen to come to a fearful end.—Would that there were not so many, even of the clergy, of whom we are constrained to say that they are carnal and have no spirit, and cannot please God, Rom. viii. 8. 9.—[A sad reflection on the status of the German clergy in STARKE's time; thank God, things look much better there now, and it is one of the greatest blessings of this country that its clergy are conspicuous for godliness of living.—M.]—Living stones must move of their own accord to the building, 1 Pet. ii. 5. Their architect is God, their level His word, their task-master the Holy Ghost, who dwelleth in them. Fair building, proof against fire and war! Rom. xiv. 19.

HEDINGER:—Where faith is the foundation of the Christian edifice, prayer as the fruit of hope, raises it to heaven, and love is its pinnacle and perfection, 1 Cor. xiii. 13.—If the offering of incense is to waft a sweet and grateful odour to God, it must be kindled by heaven-descended fire, Acts ii. 2. 4; Lev. ix. 24; 2 Chron. vii. 1.—Time and people must be distinguished.—The same medicine, be it never so good, does not suit every disease. Would that all sick Christian souls were treated according to their several wants! Let every one in his vocation of love do what he is able to God's eternal praise and glory, 2 Tim. ii. 15.—In the conversion of the ungodly and erring we require special wisdom, that different minds may be treated according to their kind, 1 Cor. iii. 1.—Fire must be removed by fire; although man with all his denunciations is not likely to accomplish much unless God clothe His word with power to strike men with fear and terror, Jer. xxiii. 29.—Sparing and waiting will not do; he that saves a soul is like an angel that plucks it from the hell-fire of Sodom, Jas. v. 20.—Those who would convert others should hate and shun sin. Therefore always begin at home in thy efforts to reprove and improve others, 1 Cor. ix. 27.—How few are ashamed to walk in the eyes of God and His saints in the garb of the old Adam and of sin! Shame! Lord Jesus, clothe Thou me with the robe of Thy innocence and righteousness.

[HOOKER:—VER. 20. As in a chain, which is made of many links, if you pull the first, you draw the rest; and as in a ladder of many staves, if you take away the lowest, all hope of ascending to the highest will be removed; so because all the precepts and promises in the law and the Gospel do hang upon this, Believe; and because the last of the graces of God doth not follow the first, that He glorifieth none but whom He hath justified, nor justifieth any but whom He hath called to a true, effectual and lively faith in Christ Jesus, therefore St. Jude exhorting us to build ourselves, mentioneth here expressly only faith, as the thing wherein we must be edified; for that faith is the ground and the glory of all the welfare of this building.—The strength of every building which is of God, standeth not in any man's arms or legs; it is only in our faith, as the valour of Samson lay only in his hair. This is the reason why we are so earnestly called upon to edify ourselves in faith. Not as if this bare action of our minds, whereby we believe the Gospel of Christ, were able in itself, as of itself, to make us unconquerable and invincible, like stones, which abide in the building forever, and fall not out. No, it is not the worthiness of our believing, it is the virtue of Him in whom we believe, by which we stand sure, as houses that are built upon a rock. He is a wise man which hath builded his house upon a rock; for he hath chosen a good foundation, and no doubt his house will stand. But how will it stand? Verily, by the strength of the rock which beareth it, and by nothing else.—M.]

Sermon Themes:—

Vv. 17. 18. Reason, not railery, the proper test of religion. (SHOREY).—The extreme folly and impiety of mocking at religion. (WARREN).

Vv. 20. 21. The spiritual building. (J. TAYLOR).—The principles and prospects of a servant of Christ. (A. FULLER).

Vv. 20–23. Religious errors arising from the abuse of ordinances. (JOHN MILLER).

Vv. 22. 23. Growth in sin, or the several states and degrees of sinners, with the manner how they are to be treated. (JEREMY TAYLOR).

Very valuable are R. HOOKER's two sermons upon part of St. Jude's Epistle, vv. 17–21, an analysis of which may prove suggestive to the reader. He treats of the following subjects: Imperfection of Human Language; Respect of God's Word, the Test of Love to Him; Neutrality in Religion Intolerable; Ridicule of Holy things a Token of Unbelief; Three Ways by which Men separate from Christ; Our Conduct shows whether we are of the Body; The Papists Charge us with Apostasy; Comparison of Popery with the System of Jeroboam; How the Gospel Spiritualizes our Natural Instincts; Extravagant Building; Edification must begin from Faith; Case of Israel a Warning to the Gentiles; Foolishness of the Roman Doctrine of Merit; Edification depends much on Good Pastors; etc., etc.—M.]

VERSES 24, 25.

CONTENTS:—Conclusion and Doxology.

24 Now<sup>1</sup> unto him that is able to keep you<sup>2</sup> from falling, and to present<sup>3</sup> you faultless

Verse 24. [δὲ, but, better than now; δὲ here introduces an important thought, and is tantamount to: "False teachers may seek for glory elsewhere, but you will ascribe it all to God through Christ." Wordsworth.—M.]

<sup>2</sup> Tischendorf reads αὐτοὺς applying to the deceived. De Wette says that this difficult reading ought to be preferred. He thinks that the author, soaring in devotion, turns, as it were, away from the readers, and yet means them. Untenable. If αὐτοὺς is genuine, it would confirm the view that vv. 22, 23 refer to deceived believers. [μᾶς is the reading of C. G., Rec., Elz., Lachm., Vulg., Syr., Arab., Æthiopic, al.—M.]

[στήσαι, German: stellen, to set. "The only instance, out of 19, in which a transitive form of ἵστημι is translated present in E. V." Lillie.—M.]

Verse 25. <sup>4</sup> σοφῶ, omitted in A. B. C. Sin., and rejected by Griesb., Scholz., Lachm., Tischend., al.; it has probably crept in from 1 Tim. i. 17; Rom. xvi. 27. [German retains it.—M.]

[<sup>6</sup> καὶ after δοξά cancelled by Lachm., Tischend., Meyer, Peyle, Wordsworth, al. It is wanting in Cod. Sin.—M.]

<sup>7</sup> Griesbach and others add after ἔξουσία, πρὸ πάντων τοῦ αἰῶνος. Comprehensive description of eternity. Tischendorf pronounces the reading well-authenticated. [It is found in A. B. C. Cod. Sin., G., received by Scholz., Lachm., Tischend., Alford, Wordsworth, al., but not adopted by Frommüller; it is the most authentic reading.—M.]

[<sup>8</sup> εἰς πάντας τοὺς αἰῶνας, literally, "unto all the ages," Germ.: "unto all eternities." The Italian, tutti i secoli, and the French, 'tous les siècles' are the most literal versions.

[German of both verses:—"But to Him that is able to keep you inoffensively, and to set you before the face of His glorious majesty unblamable with exceeding joy, to the only wise God be glory and highness, strength and power both now and in all eternities. Amen."

[Translate:—"But to Him that is able to keep you from falling and to set you in the presence of His glory faultless with exceeding joy, to the only God our Saviour through Jesus Christ our Lord, be glory, majesty, strength and authority, before all eternity, and now and unto all the ages. Amen."—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 24. But to Him that is able, etc.—The praise of God blends with the comfortable assurance that God can and will keep them even to His throne.

τῷ δὲ δυναμένῳ; this conclusion greatly resembles that in Rom. xvi. 25. Verse 21 might suggest the doubt "Shall we succeed to keep ourselves in the love of God?" This doubt Jude solves by his reference to the power of God.

To keep you; ὑμᾶς φυλάξαι. Protect you from the perils of seduction, and preserve you in love, v. 21; cf. 2 Thess. iii. 3. [Alford: "The occurrence of αὐτοὺς (which is almost beyond doubt the true reading instead of ὑμᾶς of Rec. or ἡμᾶς of A), can only be accounted for by the supposition that St. Jude writes here, as of all to whom he has been addressing himself, in the third person, as if he was praying to God for them. His reason for not using ὑμᾶς may have been his desire to include also in the term those who might be convicted, rescued from the fire, and compassionate, as well as his more immediate reader. But it is hardly likely, in the solemn close of his Epistle, that he should mean by αὐτοὺς those only."—M.]

From falling; ἀπαστος, found only here, from παῖω, to stumble or strike against, cf. 2 Peter i. 10; James iii. 2; ii. 10. Stier: "Who does not make or has not made a false step in his walk."

In the presence of His glory; cf. 2 Peter i. 17. A special manifestation of it will take place at Christ's coming to judgment.

Set; in that decisive day He will set them on His right hand and own them as His own, 2 Thess. i. 7, 10; Matt. xxv. 33; 1 Cor. vi. 2, 8; Rev. i. 5, 6; iii. 21; v. 10.

Faultless; ἄμωμος, Eph. i. 4; v. 27; Col. i. 22; Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. i. 19; Rev. xiv. 5. Without the stains of sin, so that even the devil, the arch-blamer, cannot reproach them with any thing, after they have been cleansed and washed, cf. 2 Peter iii. 14; Phil. ii. 15.

With exceeding joy.—ἐν αγαλλιάσει, cf. 1 Peter iv. 13; i. 6-9; 2 Tim. ii. 10; Rev. xix. 7.

VER. 25. To the only (wise) God, etc.—Amen.

μόνῳ, cf. 1 Tim. i. 17; Rom. xvi. 27; applies to God the Father, cf. John xvii. 8; Rev. xv. 14.

Our Saviour.—A predicate of God the Father, as the above-mentioned clause δὲ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν is probably genuine, as in 1 Tim. ii. 8, and as the Father is called in the Old Testament Saviour and Redeemer, 1 Sam. xiv. 39; Ps. cvi. 21; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; 1 Chron. xvii. 35. He is our Saviour through the mediation of the Son, for δὲ belongs to σωτήρα, not to the sequel, cf. Tit. i. 8; ii. 10; iii. 4. [See Appar. Crit., v. 25, note 5.—M.]

Glory (and) majesty.—[See Appar. Crit., v. 25, 6.—M.], c. 2 Peter iii. 18; Rom. xi. 36; xvi. 27; Rev. i. 6. μεγαλῶσιν, cf. Deut. xxxii. 8, LXX. = לְהַמְּדָה Heb. i. 8; viii. 1. His wonderful greatness, as He is called in Scripture the Highest and Most High.

κράτος (German: power), strength. According to Roos, the essential, immovable strength of the Divine Being, which fainteth not, neither grows weary (Isa. xl. 28).

ἐξουσία [German: might], authority. His sovereignty, lordship and rule of all things. δόξα and κράτος are also found close together, 1 Peter iv. 11; v. 11; Rev. i. 6; v. 13. Each of these attributes occurs in connection with one related to it. Stier defines the sense as follows: "The glorious majesty and the greatness of the love of God is praised for the good out of His fulness given, restored and preserved to His own; His mighty power is praised for the conquest of evil unto the victory of salvation attending the former." We have probably to supply ἔστω, as 1 Peter iv. 11.

Amen, similar to the conclusion of other doxologies, Rom. i. 25; 2 Peter iii. 18; so it is; it is assuredly true.

[The clauses διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν and πρὸ παντὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος have an important bearing, the first being "directed against heretics who separated Jesus from Christ, and did not acknowledge Him as the Giver of all grace from God;" the second as "asserting the eternal pre-existence of Christ against the false teachers." (Wordsworth): from the latter, says Lillie, may be derived the liturgical formula: "As it was in the beginning."—M.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

RICKER:—"That which is impossible with men, is possible with God, who gladly uses His Divine power both in the first wakening of faith, Eph. i. 19, and in keeping us to the end, John x. 28." "For the good wrought in and by the accomplishment of His purpose of grace, honour and majesty are due to Him; for the evil conquered in and by the same power and might be ascribed to Him. Faith ascribes this doxology now, and hope is assured that there will be abundant cause for it throughout eternity."

STARKE:—"God can do all things by His grace; this is the consolation of His elect and servants, Phil. iv. 13.—O, eagerly-desired sight of the glory of Christ! Moses desired to see it in this life, and I cherish the same desire; but a sinful, guilty, mortal man may not see it, but in eternity I shall see it and not another, 1 John iii. 2; Ps. xlii. 8, [cf. Job xix. 27.—M.].—All the doings of men are evil, if they aim not at the spread of the honour and glory of God, 1 Cor. x. 31.

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE BY THE GENERAL EDITOR.

WITH this tenth volume the New Testament Division of the American edition of LANGE's Biblework is completed. The first volume (on Matthew) was published nearly ten years ago (October, 1864), seven years after the German original (1857). The remaining five volumes of the Old Testament Division have been distributed among competent American and English scholars, and will be published as soon as they are ready, without waiting for the German edition, which has been already anticipated in the recently published volume on the Minor Prophets. The completion of the whole series at no distant time, therefore, is placed beyond personal contingencies.

I have reason to be thankful to a kind Providence for life and strength, to my publishers for their energy, patience and perseverance, and to my forty-five contributors for their faithful and efficient co-operation in this laborious and complicated enterprise. I shall never forget the delightful associations with so many eminent Christian scholars, who, on my invitation, have made the treasures of foreign learning and the results of their own researches accessible to the English and American students of the Book of books. LANGE's Commentary, we trust, will long be resorted to as a thesaurus of Biblical learning and piety from all ages and sections of the Christian Church.

This volume is devoted to the last and most difficult book of the Bible, the divine seal of the whole, the cross of crosses of commentators. The Apocalypse will not be fully comprehended until we see it in the light of the millennium and the new heavens on the new earth; nevertheless, even in its partial and imperfect understanding, it is continually fulfilling its noble mission as a book of hope and comfort in the Christian Church. The Jewish Prophets, in spite of all the obscurities and conflicting interpretations, served the same purpose under the Old dispensation long before they were fulfilled in the New. "How many passages in the prophets," says the genial HERDER, "are obscure in their primary historical references, and yet these passages, containing divine truth, doctrine and consolation, are manna for all hearts and all ages. Should it not be so with the book, which is an abstract of almost all prophets and apostles?" It has been such a manna especially in ages of trial and persecution, and will continue to instruct, to warn, to cheer, and to assure the Church militant of the final triumph of Christ—the Alpha and Omega of history.

Dr. LANGE, in this Commentary, which appeared in 1871 (302 pages), boldly meets the difficulties, and marks a considerable advance in the deeper spiritual apprehension of the Apocalypse and its mysterious symbolism. (See his Preface.)

The American edition has fallen into able and faithful hands. The translation of Miss EVELINA MOORE is all that can be desired.

The additions of Rev. Dr. CRAVEN greatly enhance the value of the work. He has paid minute attention to the textual department, making use of the latest critical labors of TREGELLES and TISCHENDORF.* He has throughout embodied the results of English scholarship, and of his own long-continued, careful and devout study of this book. ## PREFACE BY THE AUTHOR.

THROUGH the gracious assistance of God, the New Testament division of our Bible-work is now entirely completed, with the present Theologico-Homiletical Commentary on the Revelation of John.

In the treatment of this Book, I have considered it expedient to give particular prominence to the theoretical, critical and exegetical section;—a foundation of more than ordinary solidity being necessary in order to an ampler doctrinal and homiletical utilization of this Scripture, which has sustained such manifold wrenchings from one extreme to another.

The first thing requisite was to give a more elaborate and definite form to the theology of Apocalypics; as it is possible to rectify the existent grand misapprehensions concerning the peculiar characteristics of Hebrew Art, in respect of its perfection in the forms of Eschatological Prophecy,—misapprehensions peculiar to the traditional Hellenistico-humanistic point of view,—only by bringing about a thorough understanding of the magnitude of the contrast between the summits of Hellenistic and Theocratic culture.

With this task was linked the necessity for fixing our gaze more intently upon the symbolical side of Apocalypics, and for tracing the Apocalyptic symbolism of the New Testament back to the more or less conventionally defined Old Testament elements of Apocalypics. Nothing save a system of Biblico-prophetic symbolism which shall be founded upon well-ascertained rules, can, on the one hand, terminate the endless hap-hazard conjecture in which exegesis is wont to indulge and which results in the attributing of significations the most motley to the allegorical figures of Scripture; and, on the other hand, insure the decided appreciation of the peculiar character of allegorical Scriptures.

If it be an unmistakable fact that a certain Book is of an allegorical character, it must appear simply inadmissible, in explaining it, to pitch upon interpretations ad libitum, without finding out the symbolical key to the work. But, again, to handle a prophetic-poetic Book, composed in allegories, as if it were a work of literal meaning, is, manifestly, an utterly unreasonable and mischievous procedure. If the interpreter be not aware of the heaven-wide distinction between an explanation of an allegorical matter and so-called allegorical explanation, his ignorance is an intellectual calamity. But if he do know very well that an allegorical composition should be explained as such, and if he, nevertheless, in order to illustrate certain school-opinions, torture that allegorical composition until its language seems to be that of the letter, his conduct is a moral scandal.

What though ten or twenty arbitrary and fanciful interpretations have attached themselves to an allegorical passage?—that circumstance does not in the least destroy its allegorical character; on the contrary, it serves but to recommend, in the most pressing manner, an inquiry after the symbolical analogies and the fundamental character of the prophecy. Despair as to exegesis as we find it, need not drive us to despair as to the text to which such exegesis has affixed itself. The so-called synchrono-historical interpretation of modern times, has shown, clearly enough, into what absurdities the latter despair may lead men. The allegorical character of the Apocalypse, in general, being established, the symbolical nature of its numbers, in particular, is at the same time proved; and the great lost labor of a chronological computation of the numbers,—that chronic malady of Apocalyptic exegesis,—is, so far at least as the principle is concerned, at an end.

Since the Apocalypses branch into a twofold genealogy, a canonical and an apocryphal, the further task of ascertaining, and eventually establishing, the canonical character of our Book, has presented itself to us. Presumptuous skirmishers in the field of criticism conceive that they can, without compromising themselves, rail at the bare supposition that there are canonical books,—reviling such an assumption as a lack of intellectual freedom. The term canonical was, however, originally applied to the Greek Classics. Now should any one essay to ridicule the idea of the Classics, he would hardly escape the charge of literary barbarism.

In respect of the construction of the Apocalypse, we adhere to the opinion that it is systematically arranged in cyclical collective pictures [pictures of the whole], which are always representative of the entire Course of the World down to the period of its End, and yet, in the succession which they are made to observe, are constantly advancing nearer to that End. The succession of these cycles, which are modified by the number Seven, is in exact correspondence with the movement, development and perfection of macrocosmical life,—from within, outwards. The Seven Churches, in their symbolical significance, constitute not simply an introduction to the Book; as the kernel and centre of the World's history, they form the determinative fundamental idea of the Book. The Seven Seals constitute the history of the World, in relation to the Seven Churches. The Seven Trumpets follow, as Divine judgments upon, or penitential [exhorting to repentance] trumpets over, seven specific corruptions or forms of sin in the Church. Then ensue the Seven Thunders, as sealed life-pictures of the times of awakening, and of reforms, in the Church. Only in face of these powers of the world to come, can the Seven Heads of the Antichristian Beast develop;—the seven world-monarchies ending in the consummation of Antichristianity in the Antichrist;—the demonic reaction of world-history against the Kingdom of God. On the other hand, Antichristian evil, on its side, calls forth the Seven Vials of Anger, the judgments of hardening, the last of which unfolds into the three special judgments upon the Harlot, the Beast, and Satan, being afterwards summed up again in the General Judgment of the World. That this General Judgment then ushers in the Seventh Day, the eternal Sabbath of God, is a conclusion which the Seer has scenically portrayed rather than expressly declared; his particular reason for withholding such a declaration is probably to be found in the fact that he has at the outset, in the Prologue, announced the complete revelation of God in Christ as a revelation of the Seven Spirits in Christ, or in the fact that the number Seven results from the number Six.

Within the development of the Septenary, we, with others, have retained the division of the Book into Two Parts: The World's Course to its End, and The End itself.

In perfect consistency with this division, an earlier view is carried out, agreeably with which heavenly scenes precede the earthly occurrences. From beginning to end we find the entire sequence of troublous earthly times to be over-swayed by heavenly actions, by festal presentations of the Divine Council;—the gloomy Earth-pictures being thus ever ruled by radiant Heaven-pictures. The distinctions resulting from this law of the construction alone are qualified to dissipate the unclear and confused views which subsist in regard to the composition of the Apocalypse.

May our labor, under the blessing of the Lord, contribute somewhat toward the furtherance of an understanding of eschatological affairs; in particular, may it promote the wholesome and lively expectation of the Coming of Christ,—an expectation whose vocation it is, on the one hand, to subdue that indifferentistic spiritualism which disdains all knowledge of a real, eschatological Theology; on the other hand, to paralyze that fanatical separatism and spiritism which, in manifold respects, pervert the glorious prospects of the Church into ridiculous caricatures; and at the same time to disenergize the endless labors of formal chiliaristic time-reckoners. * * * * *

In general, we may regard the accomplishment of the Bible-work as a matter that has become independent of personal eventualities,—as a tolerably assured fact; and for this, in the name of Editors and Publishers, we offer thanks and praise unto the LORD, who hath helped us hitherto.

J. P. LANGE.

INTRODUCTORY NOTE BY THE AMERICAN EDITOR.

IT is with devout gratitude to God that, after more than two years of labor, I find myself enabled to lay Lange's Commentary on the Apocalypse before the community. The publication has, much to my regret, been delayed far beyond the period originally contemplated. This delay was, in great measure, occasioned by a temporary indisposition, which, after the greater portion of the work had been placed in the hands of the printer, rendered expedient my absence for several months from the country.

Instead of presenting an extended Introduction, as originally designed, I confine myself to a brief statement of some of the difficulties, and one or two other matters, connected with the preparation of the work.

THE GREEK TEXT.

As is well known to scholars, the text of the Apocalypse is the most imperfect of the Recepta. Erasmus, for the preparation of this portion of his great and important work, had but one Manuscript, and that a cursive of (probably) the XII. Century. Not only was this MS. of but little, or rather no authority, but it was incomplete; gaps had to be supplied by re-translation from the Vulgate—the entire passage from the word Δαυείδ, ch. xxii. 16, to the close of the Book had to be thus prepared. The only copies of the Vulgate to which Erasmus had access were the corrupt printed editions then in common use. In addition to these sources of error, the work was so hurried through the press that several important mistakes of copyists found their way into the printed volume, where they have continued to the present day.

Even so late as 1844, Tregelles, when he first published his text of the Apocalypse, had access to but three uncial Codices, viz.: A., C., and the B. of the Apocalypse.* Of these, C. is probably the oldest, but, being a palimpsest, is defective in many parts—eight entire chapters of the Apocalypse are wanting.

It was not until the discovery by Tischendorf of the Sinaitic MS., generally known as ℵ., and the Porfirian, denominated P., both in 1862, that material was provided for a satisfactory emendation of the text. The recent great critical works of Tregelles and Tischendorf, based largely on these newly discovered Codices, did not appear until after the first part of this work was in the hands of the printer. Through the kindness of Prof. Tischendorf in furnishing advance sheets to Dr. Schaff, and of Prof. Abbott, of Harvard University, in allowing me the use of his copy of Tregelles' Apocalypse until I could obtain one from Europe, I was enabled not only to continue my labor with the aid of these all-important works, but also to correct that which I had already prepared.

An elaborate and valuable article on the "Greek Text of the Apocalypse," from the pen of the Rev. Thomas J. Conant, of Brooklyn, N. Y., may be found in The Baptist Quarterly, Vol. IV., pp. 129 sqq.

* This Cod. is not, as is supposed by many, the great Cod. Vaticanus. The Vaticanus, or B. proper, lacks the Apocalypse, which is supplied by an uncial of inferior value known as "the B. of the Apocalypse." In the following work this inferior Cod. is styled B<sup>2</sup>; the few instances in which B. simple occurs, are errors.

THE VERSION.

The emendation of the text made necessary, of course, to a considerable extent, a revision of the English Version. But beyond this, I felt it to be proper to extend the revision. As is well known, the original translators inclined to the free use of synonyms—rendering the same Greek word by several English terms, and again rendering several Greek terms by the same English expression. For instance, in the New Testament the word world is employed to translate αἶων, αἰώνιος, γῆ, κόσμος, οἰκουμένη; and each of these terms has at least one other rendering; δύναμις, δυνατός, ἐξουσία, ισχύς, κράτος are continually confounded, as are also θυμός, ὁργή, etc. It has been my effort to give to each Greek term its proper English equivalent, and, as far as possible, to employ that equivalent uniformly. Certain verbal and grammatical inaccuracies have also been corrected. It is also proper to remark that the first-class marginal readings (those marked with a †) have almost invariably been adopted.*

It is proper to state that in my revision I was greatly indebted to the Version of Alford, and the Translation for the American Bible Union, by the late learned and lamented Rev. John Lillie, D. D., of Kingston, N. Y.

ADDITIONS.

Another great difficulty encountered by me was the selection of additional comments. No Book of the Bible has been the subject of so many and variant interpretations, by evangelical men, as the Apocalypse. More than twenty-six pages of Darling's Cyclopædia Bibliographica are filled with the mere titles of Commentaries on the entire Book or portions thereof. It was desirable to present, as far as practicable, the views of all classes of interpreters. That this might be done, a selection of the following representative authors was made, and abstracts of their views prepared, viz., Moses Stuart, Elliott, Wordsworth, Lord, Alford, Barnes, and Glasgow. Additions also were made from the writings of Sir Isaac Newton, Bishop Newton, Bush, Auberlen, Trench (On the Seven Epistles), Brown (On the Second Advent); and in the Homiletical Department from those of Matthew Henry, Scott, Bonar, Vaughan, and others. The additions to the Homiletical Department were made, during my absence from the country, by the Translator; they meet with my entire approbation.

* MARGINAL REFERENCE MARKS IN THE ENGLISH VERSION.

Three distinct marginal reference marks were employed by King James' Translators, indicating three entirely distinct classes of marginal readings, viz.: the dagger (†), the parallel bars (||), and the asterisk (*). The dagger (†) was used when the literal rendering of the original term was placed in the margin and the opinion of the Translators as to its meaning was given in the text; the most conspicuous instance of this is in Ia. xxvi. 4, where the margin gives "rock of ages," the literal rendering of רֹקֶן עֲלָמִים, and the text reads "everlasting strength." Where this mark appears, the marginal reading is always preceded by the abbreviation Heb. (Hebrew), Chald. (Chaldee), or Gr. (Greek). The parallel bars (||) were employed when the margin presented an alternative translation of the original, as in John xvi. 8, where the text reads "reprove" and the margin "convince." Where this sign was used by the Translators, the marginal reading was preceded by the conjunction Or. The asterisk (*) was used to indicate a marginal comment or Scripture reference, as in the titles to the Books of Job and the Psalms. This mark has almost entirely disappeared from modern editions of the English Bible, the parallel bars having been substituted in the majority of instances where the reference is to a comment, as in 2 Chron. xx. 36, and letters where it is to another Scripture.

The knowledge of the significance of these marks has almost entirely disappeared from the Church. As illustrations of the truth of this remark, reference need only be made to the almost universal disuse of the asterisk in our modern editions of the Bible; and the further fact that almost all the private publishing houses of Great Britain and America have substituted letters for the dagger and the parallel bars. This lapse of knowledge is doubtless due to the fact that King James' Translators published no statement as to the significance of the marks employed by them. They adopted them from the Geneva Bible, the Version in common use in Great Britain, merely substituting the dagger (†) for the double dagger (‡). The "Address to the Christian Reader" in the Geneva Bible contains a full explanation, and consequently, at the time of the publication of the amended (King James') Version, the significance of these signs was as well understood as that of the letters of the alphabet. Doubtless the Translators regarded a statement as unnecessary, not contemplating the fact that, in the absence of a perpetual reminder, knowledge of the meaning of such arbitrary signs would in a few generations pass away.

In the year 1871, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, unanimously adopted a resolution requesting the Directors of the American Bible Society to publish, in their future editions of the Scriptures, a brief statement concerning the meaning of these marks, and also concerning the significance of words printed in capital and italic letters. The publication of such a statement would be of immense advantage to the students of the English Version.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

It will be evident to the reader that I must be classed with those who are generally known as pre-millenarians. My views have been frankly expressed and supported, but I trust not offensively, and I have endeavored fully to present the views of those from whom I differ. My own views, it is proper to remark, are considerably modified by my peculiar hypotheses in reference to the Basileia, and the twofold Future Advent of Christ. On both these subjects extended Notes will be found in the body of the work.

With these general remarks, and with the fervent prayer that God will use this publication for His glory and the increase of knowledge in the Church, I submit it to the Christian public.

INTRODUCTION TO THE APOCALYPSE.

---

FIRST DIVISION.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

§1. THE APOCALYPSE IN ITS UNIQUENESS AND ITS KINDRED BEARINGS.

The canonical Scripture which forms the close of the New Testament, and of the Biblical Books generally, the Revelation of St. John, is not only a peculiar, but also an entirely unique phenomenon; a unique phenomenon in the very series of Biblical Books themselves, so that it can be said: As the Bible stands alone amongst the writings of the world, so does the Apocalypse stand alone amongst the writings of the Bible. It is thus doubly a unique book and that—by virtue of its essence, mysterious even to enigmatical obscurity—in a three-fold relation: in respect of its origin, its form, and its operation.

As to its origin, it is one of the most strongly authenticated of the Books of the Bible; authenticated by its superscription, its historical statements (chap. i. 9), and the historical evidences accompanying it. And yet, among the New Testament Antilegomena, or Scriptures whose reception into the Canon has been protested against, this very Book is the greatest Antilegomenon; ecclesiastically questioned in ancient times and the subject of theological dispute in more modern days.

Its form, however, conjoins a fullness of antitheses, of which many can conceive only as contradictions. A claim to the ripest New-Testamentality, or Christian knowledge and freedom—united to the semblance of an Old Testament spirit of wrath, of a Judaizing tendency in general. Utterances of the highest ecstasy, of a contemplation the most direct, fully merged in the Divine revelation—framed in an expression apparently the result of an artistic culture and reflection the most exquisite. The richest fullness of Old Testament prophetic, evangelic and apostolic reminiscences,—and at the same time a prophetic originality which reminds us of the declaration, Behold I make all things new. An ideal peace which opens each new night-piece of earthly history with a pre-celebration of the heavenly, triumphant rule—conjoined to a feeling of human horror at the uncovered demonic abysses and the heavenly wrath-judgments. Finally, a work full of Greek elements of culture—in a form technically Hebrew, even in Hebraizing language.—All these antitheses announce a grandeur which, on a more cursory view, readily assumes the appearance of heterogeneity. If we consider yet further that in the Apocalypse, still more than in the Epistles and Gospel of St. John, the severe expression of sublimity (here like a ghostly trumpet of judgment) is united to the simplest, pleasantest heart-words,—words sometimes of sympathy, sometimes of consolation and promise, so that the Book spreads itself out before us like the mantle of dusky night, brodered over with brilliant stars like jewels,—we shall understand the third mysterious feature of the Book, its even enigmatically marvelous operation.

Concerning the immediate operation of Christ Himself, we know that it was of a uniquely attractive and repellent character: those who came under His influence were attracted or repelled, in proportion to their spiritual affinity to, or alienation from, Him. The same truth continually obtains in regard to Christianity and also in regard to the Holy Scriptures. This two-fold operation, however, is inherent in the Apocalypse in a two-fold degree, and is there of so peculiar a sort as to be no longer the standard of simple piety. On the contrary, many men of piety and mark have been unable to accommodate themselves to the spirit of this Book, whilst the charm of its obscurity, giving promise, oft-times, of other revelations than the Gospel, has attracted impure and visionary minds. Still, every cavilling depreciation, as well as every fanatical misinterpretation, of this Book has for the most part betrayed a decided want—a want of that self-denying modesty which Socrates displayed in his treatment of the obscure writings of Heraclitus, or a want of that purity and integrity which never seek to supplement Christian knowledge through curiosity, secret-mongery and fantastical pictures of sensuous hope.

Thus, therefore, stands the mysterious tree of the Revelation before our eyes, unique of its kind. And yet, notwithstanding its uniqueness, or by reason of it, its roots are connected with great and varied spheres of literature. The Revelation, in respect of its intrinsic, apostolic wealth of light and life, is, as the last of the Biblical Books, intimately connected with them all. In respect of its prophetic and literary form, however, it stands in the centre of an extensive group of eschatological prophecies and apocalyptic writings, having common characteristic traits.

We shall arrive later at the general biblical kindred bearings of the Apocalypse; be it our next task to inquire into the whole phenomenon of Apocalypics.

§ 2. ORIGIN OF APOCALYPTICS.

The origin of Apocalypics—i. e., by way of prefatory definition: the sum of those forms of revelation which have reference to an ethico-physical end of the world—is situate as high and as deep as the origin of religion itself.

The most general sphere of Apocalypics is the religious view of the world; their more definite home, the theocratico-Christian view of the world; the most peculiar region of their origin, however, is prophetic Eschatology.

The general religious view of the world, underlying all the religious systems of the human race, knows of a world-beginning, resting upon Divine power and wisdom; of a world-course, whose physical side is conditioned upon the moral conduct of mankind (or of the gods even), and placed, by Divine decree, under Divine guidance; hence also of a world-goal, whose attainment Divine retribution accomplishes in the form of the world's end, on the one hand, and, on the other, of the world's renewal.

The presageful expectation of the end of the world, within the general sphere of religion, rests, on the one side, upon definite signs of that most general Divine revelation which lies at the basis of all religion (Rom. i. 19, 20); especially upon the religious interpretation of the transiency of earthly things, of the catastrophes of development, of the types of consummation;—reposing, on the other side, upon the human longing after the realization of ideals.

But the more perfect a religious system is, the higher is its doctrine—in the form of prophecy—of the last things. This is true, for instance, of the Scandinavian Mythology.*

Purer in fashion, however, appears the expectation of a world-goal in that believing view of the world which is grounded upon the revelation of salvation; grounded first, in an imperfect shape, upon the basis of the Old Testamental, theocratic form of said revelation.

Yet in the Old Testament, the following premises are definitely declared:

1. The human world is, in respect of its plan [Anlage], a unitous humanity, and as it has a unitous foundation, so likewise it possesses a unitous destination to the Kingdom of God, and a unitous goal in a Congregation or City of God, which is to appear at the end of its development, being mediated by great moral conflicts and Divine judgments.

* Lücken, Die Traditionen des Menschengeschlechts. Münster, 1856, p. 376 sqq.

2. The whole physical sphere of humanity is engaged in a development unto perfection, which is entirely conditioned upon the ethical development of humanity.

3. This development is subject to the ideal plan of the Divine counsel and to the real supremacy of Divine guidance.

4. It is effectuated, however, not in accordance with laws of physical necessity, but in accordance with the ethical law of a reciprocity of action between the wisdom of God and the freedom of man; amid a preponderance of Divine governance, however, which makes even the contradictions of erring human wisdom minister to the eschatological world-plan.

5. The method of the Divine government of the world consists in its perfect ethical conditionality. Hence, the new periods of development are conditioned upon new epochs; instants of deliverance upon instants of judgment; the appearance of the world-goal upon the principle of the world-goal; the redemption upon the coming of the Messiah. Hence is evident the magnitude of the error of those who pretend to know of epochs without mediatory periods, or vice versa;—of judgments without deliverances, or, finally, of the first coming of Christ without His second coming, or, like all Chiliasts,* of His second coming without the full truth and reality of the first.

6. The Old Testament has indeed with justice been denominated the religion of the future. Nevertheless, its prophecy and its longing, repose, for the most part, only in the expectation of the principal† Messianic Kingdom and the Messianic personality; but the universal renewal of the world which is bound up with this principle, emerges but in rarer and obscurer forms, although in respect of the idea, it is present in sufficient plainness.

With Christianity, this view of the world is perfected. Here mankind appears entirely as a something that is in process of becoming, which, in its maturity, shall know but one division—that, namely, into kernel and husk, wheat and chaff,—to the end that in its kernel it may glorify God as a perfected Church of God. Earth itself, with all its life-forms, is in an eminent sense a star of becoming [i. e., growth, development], pointing off and up to stars of perfection and destined itself to become a star of perfection. Here [in Christianity] the human cosmos in its development is entirely conditioned upon the development of mankind; the development of mankind upon the development of the Kingdom of God; this latter upon the development of the sovereignty of Christ, from His first appearance in lowliness to His second appearing in glory. This entire movement, with its epochs and periods, ensues in accordance with the counsel, and under the guidance, of God. The first particular, therefore in which the New Testament is distinguished from the Old, is that the latter is pre-eminently the religion of the future, that the Theocracy gravitates outward toward the future point of the appearance of Christ and His Kingdom, whilst the New Testament is the religion of appeasement, in which believing humanity, in its glorified Redeemer, in its inner life, in the Holy Ghost, has already principally attained the goal of the world and thus already stands, internally, in the New Æon of perfection, existing meanwhile, in respect of its outward life, still in the Old Æon. Hence it is also that the Old Testament consists, in great measure, of prophetic books, while the New Testament has but one prophetic book. But even on New Testament ground, the religious yearning after perfection is not yet fully satisfied (Rom. viii. 19sq.). For to the perfect truth of life, the full reality of life appertains; this reality, however, must have passed beyond the painful contradiction between the internal and the external life, the internal and the external world, having become a reality in which the whole outward appearance is transluminated by the life of the spirit. Therefore, also, does the individual Christian, together with all believing Christendom, long for the consummation; and all the objective and subjective goals of longing are summed up in the one aspiration with which the Apocalypse closes: Come, Lord Jesus. To this longing and to it alone, is the Apocalyptic Revelation given.

The religious longing of humanity, awakened by the Spirit of God, has in general ever

* [It is difficult to conceive of the mode in which this imputation could be justified. Some Chiliasts may have held the opinion here attributed to them, but, most certainly, not all; nor is there any thing in the essential doctrines of Chiliasm to make this a necessary part of the system.—E. R. C.]

been the human instrumentality of Divine revelation, of the self-communication of God in the prophetic contemplation of chosen men of God. The faithful of the primitive time addressed themselves, with their longing, to the obscurity of their own origin and the origin of all things; therefore the Spirit of God gave them a sufficient explanation concerning the Creator, the creation, the production and destination of man. But when this destination, in consequence of the fall, seemed utterly obscured and lost, the longing of the friends of God addressed itself entirely to the coming of salvation, and the Spirit of God gave them the promise of salvation in ever clearer traits: Victory over the Foe; rest from toil; blessing lifting above the curse; redemption from bondage. So soon, however, as a religious people had been converted into the typical people of the expectation and mediation of salvation, the longing directed itself to the Divine clearing up of the dark paths of the present, destined to be trod by men. This longing, likewise, did the Spirit of God answer, by giving the Law unto Moses. But the Law of the Present, in its outward figurativeness, was designed to kindle into flame the longing after the Future [Zukunft=future and coming] of the internal, essential Kingdom of God; and thus the longing of the Prophets, in the narrower sense of the latter term, took form, and the precursory appeasement of that longing was the Spirit of prophecy of and concerning Christ. As the fulfillment of prophecy lingered, however, all expectation of salvation was transformed into prayer, until the longing after salvation embodied itself, so to speak, in womanly receptivity. But as the mother of Jesus longed, with those about her, for the first coming of the Saviour, so, toward the end of the apostolic age, amid increasing signs of the great warfare of Antichristian powers against the Church of Christ, John longs for the second coming of his Friend. The Apostles, for the most part, had long since gone home to the Lord; the old friend of the Lord must wait so long in this world—under the act of persecution, wait as an exile on the rocky island—until at last was concentrated in him all the longing of the New Testament Church after Christ's coming; his yearning blazed up on the Lord's day, and thus the great prophetic disclosure concerning the coming of the Lord was apportioned to him.

Upon the basis of the general revelation of God through the creation and the conscience, arises the theocratic Christian revelation of salvation. This, in general, prophetic revelation begets again a revelation in the narrower sense of the term, viz., the prophetic disclosures concerning the future—the future of the Old and the New Covenant. Yet once more, however, within the prophetic Eschatology, there appears an entirely new, conclusive form of the Divine disclosures, and this form, the acme of all revelation, we call simply: Revelation, Apocalypse, because it is the revelation in the most eminent sense.

An unveiling of the future so vivid, that to the distempered vision of the reader it oft-times became a new veiling.

§ 8. THE PECULIAR CONFORMATION OF APOCALYPTICS, IN THEIR DISTINCTION FROM THE GENERAL FORM OF PROPHECY.

The name Apocalypics, in its peculiar signification, first took its place in Theology with the perception that the New Testament Apocalypse belongs to an entire group of writings, partly canonical, partly uncanonical, all of which, by peculiar marks in respect of purport and form, are recognizable as a separate species of prophetic or pseudo-prophetic literature, being distinct from every other species of sacred writings, even though they do not all appear under the name of Apocalypses.*

The name Apokalypse (ἀποκάλυψις) disclosure, revelation, has primarily a more general meaning. The verb, like the noun, denotes in general every new revelation of God, coming from Heaven, through the Spirit of God, either to the individual man or to the human race,— and that in respect both of the purport and form of such revelation; pre-eminently, however, in respect of its purport.

* The newness of Apocalypics as a branch of exegetical theology is evidenced by the fact that there is no article under that head either in Herzog's Real-Encyclopædie or in Schenkel's Bibelllexikon. Hilgenfeld seems still to entertain the opinion that in the upbuilding of a system of Apocalypics it is necessary to confound the canonical with the uncanonical forms of that species of writing (Introduction, p. 5). He says, p. 8, in his note: "What an unreasonable requisition upon science, to insist at the outset upon this hair-splitting separation betwixt canonical and uncanonical matter!" A requisition upon science that she should not, with a radicalism void of all spiritual taste, make a literary Thoku Vabhoku of the whole mass of scientific acquisitions, is surely well-founded, however. We have to do here simply with a peculiar kind of religious theocratic composition.

But now a two-fold distinction comes into view. In regard to purport, we have to distinguish the Apocalypse, as the primary form of revelation, communicated by God to the beholding or believing human spirit, or appearing in and by it (Rom. ii. 5; viii. 19; Gal. i. 12), from its secondary form, the revealing or publishing of the revelation (φανερώσεις, John ii. 11; 1 Cor. xii. 7). This material distinction, again, is connected with the formal distinction, in accordance with which the Apocalypse, in its primary forms of ideal manifestation or vision, is consummated, supplemented, by real manifestations or miraculous facts, whilst the secondary form as, in the first place, a development of principal points of revelation, finds its continuation in prophetic inspirations.

Every Prophet is called to be a Prophet by a fundamental Apocalypse which "rends" the heavens above him, developing itself subsequently in most manifold inspirations. These inspirations are, in the Prophet's own bosom, already revelations, (φανερώσεις); it is his province in his preaching to convert them into prophetic announcements for his cotemporaries, for the world.

But, once more, we have to distinguish the Apocalypse as a Divine fact, from its product, the Apocalypse as a human composition. The apocalyptic writing bears its specific name—which distinguishes it from all writings which are prophetic in a more general sense only—in accordance with a distinction which might at first sight be designated as conventional but which, upon closer inspection, is found to rest upon very decided distinctive marks.

The first mark respects form. The prophetic writings, in a more general sense, are collections of single prophecies, disposed with more or less order in regard to subject-matter,—in a word, anthologies; and their symbolic expression is transrupted by didactical sermons and exhortations [Παράνομιαι, παρακλήσεις]. In them, moreover, the source-points of the vision and the moral applications of the same, together with historical elucidations even, branch out very distinctly. An Apocalypse, on the contrary, is, on the one hand, the presentation of an uninterrupted succession of visions, following one upon another in cyclical divisions; on the other hand, a thoroughly unitous composition, a sacred work of art, whose style is, accordingly, altogether figurative or typical, even though it be based upon historical data; these historical data themselves attain a symbolical significance. The typical forms cease, however, to be purely individual [proper only to the person employing them—E. R. C.]; they assume the character of an historically conventional fixedness, i. e., a theocratic science.

The second mark respects the purport. The prophetic anthologies proceed in the main, from the present onward, through a fragmentary series of Messianic pictures, to the Advent of the Messiah, and if they do advance beyond His simple appearance and sketch the fullness of the times in eschatological traits, those traits are nevertheless exceedingly few and far between. For the most part, the second coming of the Messiah coincides for them with His first coming, and the great gulf between the two becomes manifest only from particular features of the suffering Messiah, particular intimations of the "travail of the Messiah." On the other hand, the Apocalypses are eschatological from beginning to end. Not only the contrast between the suffering and glorified Christ, but also that between His first and second appearing, hence likewise that between Christ and Antichrist, nay, the contrast between the old and the new world, and consequently the end of the world itself, emerge boldly. In fact, the end of the world, or the course of the world, in its gravitation toward the end, forms the object upon which their gaze is concentrated—constitutes their peculiar point of view. This point of view they mediate, however, by a history of the world, eschatological in its modifications. The entire history of the world from the olden times, or from the first appearance of Christ, is in them unfolded in eschatological cycles, in which the entire course of the world is continually presented from different points of view—the cycles meantime progressing steadily toward the end. This type is, at all events, quite distinctly impressed upon the Apocalypse [of John]; and Hilgenfeld's denial of the fact is based upon a hampered rationalistic view of the narrow scope of this Scripture. It is, on the contrary, remarkable that the idea of a universal history—whose germ was contained in Genesis—here appears in full development, though in Hebrew theocratic form, whilst classical historiography was unable to attain to this universalism. We find later, in the Gnostics, a striving after a universal view of the world which should set at nought the barriers of history and of our earth—but which did not succeed in passing beyond fanciful and heretical forms.

With this latter mark, the third mark of the Apocalypses is connected. Originating, as they did, in the Divine pacification and consolation of elect prophetic hearts, whose ardent longing blazes brightly in times of great tribulation in the Kingdom of God, they are in like manner designed to instruct, to comfort, and to pacify, first the servants of God, and through them, the churches in times of future new and similar tribulations; nay, to transmute all signs of terror into signs of hope and promise: whilst the aim of ordinary Prophecies consists pre-eminently in the satisfaction of the needs of the present in regard to enlightenment, discipline, consolation, and exhortation. These latter are writings concerning the future, for the present; the others are writings which, passing over the present, are intended pre-eminently for the future. This fact is quite one-sidedly presented by Hilgenfeld: "They were meant to fill up the times when there was no revelation with substitutes of prophecy." The connecting link between Malachi and Christ was formed by the popular piety, longing, and hope of the true Israel, and not by pseudo-apocalyptic reveries.*

In proceeding to distinguish between genuine and spurious Apocalypses, we may put forth the general statement that the former contain a solution of the problem as to how the highest visions may be united to the highest forms of sacred art; the latter are at best poetic imitations, which, for visions, substitute compilations and extravagant fancies, and replace the theocratic-classical and mysterious artistic form with a manufactured and mystical chiar' oscuro.

§ 4. CLASSES OF APOCALYPTICAL WRITINGS.

Particulars concerning the development of Apocalyptics in general may be found in Lücke's work, the most prominent treatise on the subject: Versuch einer vollständigen Einleitung in die Offenbarung des Johannes, Bonn, 1848–52, p. 9–15. One of the first impulses to the Science of Apocalyptics was given in 1819, by the English Bishop Laurence, with his edition of Apocalyptic writings from the Ethiopian (Anabaticon of Isaiah; 4th Book of Esdras†);

* [The following remarks by Auberlen (Daniel and the Revelation, Eng. Trans. Edinburgh, 1856, p. 80) are worthy of highest consideration: "The name Apocalyptic (in the use of which we are justified by Rev. i. 1), already signifies that the divine communication and revelation are more prominent in the prophet than the human mediation and receptivity; for ἀποκάλυψις (revelation) signifies a divine, —προφητεία (prophecy, Weissagung) a human activity. Comp. Dan. ii. 22, 23, where it is said of God, that 'He revealeth (αὐτὸς ἀποκαλύπτει LXX.) the deep and secret things; He knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with Him'; and Rev. i. 1, 2, where the supernatural fact is three-fold. God gave the revelation to Jesus Christ, and He, through His angels, signified it to John for the purpose of further spreading it. All biblical prophecy, of course, is based on divine revelation, so that these two words designate, the one the subjective, the other the objective side of the same thing (see 1 Cor. xiv. 29, 30), and are sometimes used indiscriminately, as when John calls his Apocalypse, which is styled 'the revelation of Jesus Christ' (Rev. i. 1), 'the words of this prophecy' (Rev. i. 3). For this reason, however, a distinction is likewise made between the two expressions, and they are used as two distinct species of the same genus, according as the objective revelation, or the subjective prophetic inspiration, is more prominent. Thus St. Paul distinguishes them in 1 Cor. xiv. 6, 'either by revelation or by prophecy.' The prophet stands in connection with the outer world. He addresses words to the prince and the people, as in the Old Testament, to the congregation [Church], as in the New, words with which the Spirit of God, pervading the human spirit with His mighty influence, supplies him. But while the prophet speaks in the Spirit (comp. 1 Cor. xii. 3, ἡ πνεύματι Θεοῦ λαλῶν), the apocalyptic seer is in the Spirit, in his whole person (Rev. i. 10; iv. 2). The united activity of soul and body, which forms the link between man and the outward world, recedes altogether into the background, so that St. Paul, speaking of such a state from his own experience, can say he does not know whether he was in the body, or out of the body (2 Cor. xii. 2, 3). It is the spirit only, that which connects us with God and the invisible world, which is active, or rather recipient, in the apocalyptic state; for all proper human activity towards God can consist only in receiving. Here, where the object is not so much to influence the immediate contemporaries of the seer, as that the seer may receive disclosures for the benefit of all succeeding generations, he is alone with God while He reveals Himself, and perceives only what is disclosed to him from above, as the veil which hides the invisible world is drawn from off his spirit (ἀποκαλύπτει). 'The heavens were opened' says Ezekiel (i. 1), 'and I saw visions of God.' This state is therefore called a trance," etc.—E. R. C.]

† ["The classification of the four books which have been named after Ezra is particularly complicated. In the Vatican and other quasi-modern editions of the LXX., our (Eng. Apoc.) 1st Esdras is called the first book of Esdras, in relation to the Canonical book of Ezra, which follows it, and is called the second Esdras. But in the Vulgate, 1st Esdr. means the

this, indeed, was after Semler had availed himself of such Apocryphal apocalypses as were known to him in interpretation of the Revelation of St. John, being followed by Conradi, and, shortly after, by Eichhorn and Bleek; see Hilgenfeld, p. 4. Subsequent to Bishop Lawrence's work, Nitzsch, in the year 1820, sketched the idea of Apocalypitics. Lücke was spurred on in his task by the "report" of Nitzsch (1st edition, 1832). In 1833, A. C. Hofmann published a translation and exegesis of the Book of Enoch, with which he united a treatise upon the Apocalypstists of the olden time amongst the Jews and Christians, assuming the existence of a coherent whole, composed of apocalyptic literature, and commencing with the Book of Daniel. Quite a series of commentaries, from Ewald's commentary on the Apocalypse, down to the present time, have promoted the general views upon this subject (see Lücke, p. 14). The following work by Hilgenfeld especially belongs here: Die jüdische Apokalypitik in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung [Jewish Apocalypitics in their historical development], Jena, 1857. In accordance with the main features of the two main Apocalypses of the Old and New Testaments, Auberlen, with his Daniel and the Apocalypse, Basel, 1857, likewise claims a place here. [English Translation, Edinburgh, 1856, a work of rare merit.—E. R. C.] In a more general sense, we mention here the Biblical Theologies, the Introductions to the New Testament, the books upon Eschatology and Chiliasm (particularly Conradi, Kritische Geschichte des Chiliasmus [Critical History of Chiliasm], II., p. 365; comp. 231, in the same vol.; III., 1, 60, 107). Note especially, however, the more or less comprehensive editions of Apocalyptic writings. Lücke dates the more distinct collections of apocryphal Apocalyptic writings from Gfrörer's Prophetæ veteres pseudepigraphi, 1840; although this publication did not contain Apocalyptic matter simply (the more ancient collections of Fabricius and Philo were not formed from the point of view which assumed the existence of a general system of Apocalypitics). Subsequently Tischendorf issued: Apocalypses Apocryphæ Mosæ, Esdræ, Pauli, Johannis, item Mariæ Dormitio, Leipzig, 1866. Particular Apocalypses were discussed by Lawrence (see above), Nitzsch (De testamentis 12 patriarch., Wittenberg 1810), Gieseler (Vetus translatio latina Visionis Jesaie, Göttingen, 1832), Hofmann (Das Buch Henoch, see above), Friedlieb (Die Sibyllinischen Weissagungen [The Sybilline Prophecies], Leipzig, 1852), Dillmann (Das Buch Henoch, 1853), Philippi (Das Buch Henoch, sein Zeitalter und sein Verhältniss zum Judasbriefe [The Book of Enoch, the time of its composition and its relation to the Epistle of Jude], Stuttgart, 1868; a monograph of sterling merit), Volkmar (Das 4. Buch Esra [second division of the Hand-Book of the Introduction to the Apocrypha], Tübingen, 1863), et al.

If it is with truth that we have designated the religion of Israel as the religion of the future, we may be permitted to designate Apocalypitics in particular as the vision of the future; partly as the actual prophecy, partly as the popular poetry of the future. Relatively, this applies again to the eschatological longing and hope of the New Testament faith, but particularly to the chiliastic-morbid Jewish-Christian expectance of the future, in accordance with a condition of mind which looked for redemption more in the future Appearing of Christ than in the principal base-laying salvation of His first Advent.

The apocalypitical writings which have sprung up bearing these signs, are divided into the following classes:

- a. Old Testament canonical Apocalypses;
- b. Old Testament apocryphal Apocalypses;
- c. The New Testament Apocalypse;
- d. Jewish-Christian apocryphal Apocalypses.

a. Old Testament Canonical Apocalypses.

We have elsewhere (Comm. on Genesis, p. 86 [Am. Ed.] already stated that for the appearance of the apocalyptic form we go back far beyond Daniel. And this we do in accordance with the two principal marks of an apocalyptic writing; the formal mark—unity of canonical Book of Ezra, and 2d Esdr. means Nehemiah, according to the primitive Hebrew arrangement, mentioned by Jerome, in which Ezra and Nehemiah make up two parts of the one book of Ezra; and 3d and 4th Esdr. are what we now call 1 and 2 Esdras.—SMITH'S BIB. DICTIONARY, ESDRAS.—E. R. C.]

composition; and the material mark—the expectation of an eschatological judgment, passing beyond simple Messianism (first Advent); an expectation in accordance with which we might regard the whole non-Christian Jewish people, in its eschatological expectancy, as a permanent, plastic appearance or embodiment of apocryphal Apocalypics.

With respect to the Old Testament Books—composed, as they are, in accordance with a unitous idea, organically membered, and closing, consequently, with themselves—the phenomenon of the ideal, unitous, organic structure of the Books goes back far behind the first Old Testament apocalypses, to the beginning of Old Testament literature; and when criticism, whose existence is demanded by the very spirit of revelation, shall have outgrown its boyhood, in which, in slavish dependence upon the new, it gives chase, with slackened rein, to the newest, the fact will doubtless be recognized that—with the exception of redactions of original memorabilia—men have done the reverend Scriptures great wrong by this endless untwisting and patching together of the Biblical Books, on the hypothesis of the most spiritless book-making. One composition, at least, it is impossible to misjudge as a whole, even though it may receive damage in particulars—and that is the grand old Book of Job.

In the introduction to the Comm. on Genesis (see above) we have given our reasons for distinguishing an entire group of Old Testament Apocalypses, although not until Daniel does the species appear with features fully stamped.* The second part of Isaiah [ch. xl.—lxvi.] is a unitous composition, having its point of gravitation, manifestly, in the eschatological world-consummation—i. e., it has the sign of the Apocalypse. This is true no less of the appendix to the Prophecies of Jeremiah (chap. xlv.—lii.). The apocalyptic conclusion of Ezekiel (chap. xxxvii.—xlvi.), the whole Book of Zechariah in its indissoluble unity, and particularly the Book of Daniel—with the exception of the sections from chap. x. 1—xi. 45, and xii. 5–13, (see Comm. on Genesis, p. 88, Am. Ed.)—present, in form and purport, the Old Testament eschatological elements which in the original visions of the New Testament Apocalypse have arrived at their perfect significance and configuration. “Among the minor Prophets we regard the Books of Obadiah, Nahum, Habakkuk and Zephaniah as Apocalypses, predominantly depicting, in unitous composition, the judgment upon Antichristianity in its symbolical preludes.” (Genesis, p. 37. [Am. Ed.]).

b. Jewish Apocryphal Apocalypics.

Hilgenfeld (Vorwort VIII.) is doubtless in error in viewing the whole Apocalypics of Judaism as a precursory history of Christianity, and in believing that he has found in Essenism an offshoot of Jewish Apocalypics which conducts us directly to the threshold of Christianity. This idea, which will allow of no distinction whatever between the theocratic and churchly main current and those turbid secondary streams which have their rise in the popular fancy, is based upon the ruling impulse of that school which pseudo-critically jumbles together all things in whose disposition a critical arrangement is to be found;—the same school which regards the Gnostics as presenting a peculiar stage in the development of true Christianity, and zealously labors against the distinction between canonical and apocryphal writings as a hereditary evil of Theology itself. Such confusions, growing out of a special tendency, are rarely to be met with to the same degree in any other department of science. Philology, for instance, is careful to avoid mingling together, without distinction, nay, with a fanatical levelling impulse, ancient classics and obsolete popular literature, to the production of endless trouble and great confusion.

Jewish apocryphal Apocalypics have produced two writings which, in common, have a Jewish character—especially in their imitation of Daniel—and yet stand in decided contrast one to the other. The Jewish stock of the Sibylline books, interpolated and supplemented by Christians, namely the third book of Esdras,† has, like the book of the Wisdom of Solomon, an Alexandrian ground-tone; whilst on the other hand, the fourth book of Esdras, in its Hebrew-Pharisaic character, reminds us quite unmistakably of the book of Jesus Sirach. They possess in common the fundamental idea of the future victory of Judaism over the Gentile world-kingsdoms. This fundamental idea can be attributed to the Book of Daniel itself only by a false religious taste; in that prophecy it is not the restoration of the Theocracy, but an entirely new Heavenly Kingdom of the Son of Man which puts an end to the kingdoms of the world. In both writings (3 and 4 Esdras) the dwindling away of the expectation of a personal Messiah is unmistakable (see Hilgenfeld, p. 77, 78, 86, 221 sqq.; Volkmar, Esra, 260).

* [Does not the prophecy of Balaam (Num. xxiv.) possess all the characteristics of the true Apocalypse?—E. R. C.]

On the other hand, there is a distinction between the two books which accords with the contrast between the Hebrew-Jewish and the Alexandrian-Jewish character; in the fourth book of Esdras, the Pharisaic hatred of the heathen is unmistakably prominent—for instance, in the joy of the blessed at the spectacle of the wicked burning in everlasting flames (Hilgenfeld, p. 201)—; whilst the Sibyl is continually warning the heathen against the service of false gods, and finally anticipates the general instruction of the Gentiles and their conversion to Monotheism (Hilgenfeld, 87, 88). They are distinguished furthermore in that the Hebrew Messiah stands back of the Messianic upliftment of the nation above the Roman world-power, appearing only at the end of the world for judgment especially (Hilgenfeld, 220), while the Alexandrian Messiah is endowed with scarcely any distinctness of form.

Another distinctive mark is, that the Sibyl is glorified as prophecy come to the heathen from the theocratic source;—prophecy whose final aim, like that of Sophia [or Wisdom personified] in the Wisdom of Solomon, is the eschatological renewal of the world: while the Messianism of the fourth book of Esdras, as also of the book of Jesus Sirach, culminates in a growth of books or writings (Sirach xxiv. 23; 4 Esdras at the close: Esdras' 94 books [the English Version of the Apocrypha gives 204 (or nine hundred and four Marg.) as the number of the books that were written, 2 (4) Esdr. xiv. 44]; 24 open, 70 secret writings).

Neither is the contrast in the form of the prophecy to be overlooked. The Alexandrian Sibyl prophesies from an irresistible impulse, in pathological ecstasy (Hilgenfeld, 51), whilst the visions vouchsafed to Esdras are mediated by ethical conduct, fasting and praying, and thus their revelations can assume a conversational form.

According to Friedlieb, the Jewish Sibylline books came into being from the years 160 to 40 B. C. (according to Bleek, an older portion is cotemporary with the Book of Daniel (?), a later part having been produced, he thinks, about 40 B. C.). The time of the Jewish ground-form of the fourth book of Esdras is differently estimated by different exegetes. This disagreement of exegesis is based upon the interpretation of the exceedingly obscure vision of the eagle (dream-vision of the second night). Lawrence interpreted the twelve wings of the eagle as referring to the ancient history of the line of Roman kings and the more modern additions to it; Gfrörer conceived the wings to refer to twelve Roman emperors and associate-emperors [Nebenkaiser]. Lücke interpreted the eagle's three heads as significant of Sylla, Pompey, and Cæsar, as an arbitrarily conceived, successive triumvirate. Least tenable is the view of Hilgenfeld, who seeks to construe the Apocalypse of Esdras into a continuation of the Sibyl, without recognizing the contrast which it presents to the latter; declaring the eagle's twelve wings to be Alexander and the Egyptian kings who succeeded him. According to Volkmar (Das vierte Buch Esra, p. 338), the Jewish author wrote his Apocalypse in the autumn of the year 97, after the fall of Domitian. Contrary to this view is the fact that the second destruction of the Temple, in the year 70, is not mentioned in the book; Volkmar conceives it to be, "by way of disguise," "parallelized" with the first destruction, i. e., represented by, and along with, the first. Since the eagle, i. e., the Roman world-kingdom, comes to its end by a lion, i. e., the Jewish Messianic Theocracy, we can think, in interpreting this vision, of no time save that of the first Jewish insurrection previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, or that of the insurrection under Bar-Cocheba. But since, moreover, the destruction of Jerusalem is itself not mentioned, we are constrained to interpret the vision (whose obscurity is perhaps owing to the circumstances of the period) as referring to the first Jewish war. The first three feathers of the eagle are intelligible enough (Hilgenfeld, 205): Cæsar, Augustus, Tiberius. The following nine feathers are very dimly pictured; they denote imperial pretenders rather than actual emperors. The number twelve, consequently, is more a symbolico-ideal number than one to be historically identified and referred. Only a few of the mock emperors, like Galba and Otho, momenttarily attain dominion. The greatest of the three heads of the eagle, which now awakes, makes an end of the feathers, takes the two other heads along with it, and shakes the whole earth; but suddenly disappears. Finally, the head on the right side devours that on the left, and is left alone until the roaring lion makes an end of it. Now, if this head on the right side were Jerusalem's great enemy, Vespasian, and the head devoured by it, Vitellius, we might go back for an interpretation of the middle head, which suddenly disappeared after shaking the whole earth, to Nero. In consideration of the dim and confused execution of the picture, the effort to interpret all the figures into a harmonious system is less requisite than inquiry into the spirit of the production as a whole; this is thoroughly consonant with the rancorous spirit of the pseudo-Messianic Jewish revolution. Ewald, after Conradi, has already set forth about the same view (see Hilgenfeld, p. 392, note).

In regard to the Book of Enoch, received by Hilgenfeld among the Jewish Apocalypses, we hold the argument of Philippi, who vindicates the original Christian character of the book, to be decisive.

On the other hand, the Ascension of Moses seems to form a supplement to the fourth book of Esdras, originating after the destruction of Jerusalem, for the uplifting of prostrate Judaism.*

c. The Apocalypse of John.

As the Book of Daniel became a pattern for the apocryphal Apocalypses of Judaism, so the Apocalypse of John has been the exemplar for all Christian Apocalypses. But upon the side of Christianity also, nothing but a lack of spiritual taste, i. e., an unspiritual taste, can fail to recognize the distinction between canonical mysteries and apocryphal riddles, between a grandeur of forms in which order prevails, and an extravagance of forms over which confusion reigns.

d. The Christian (Jewish-Christian) Apocryphal Apocalypses.

These arrange themselves primarily into two leading classes: 1. Christianized: 2. Originally Christian Apocalypses.

As Christianized Apocalypses we may name the previously mentioned Jewish Apocrypha, the Sibylline books, and the Book of Esdras. Bleek, Ueber die sibyllinischen Orakel. Theol. Zeitschrift von Schleiermacher. De Wette und Lücke, Vol. I. 20; II. 172 sqq. Friedlieb, Die sibyllinischen Weissagungen, and Hilgenfeld, Die jüdische Apokalypsik.

Amongst the Jewish-Christian Apocrypha which are imitative of the Apocalypse, the principal composition is the Book of Enoch—an Ebionite Jewish-Christian production—for an examination of which the reader is referred to Philippi's work.

As the tissue of apocryphal, and, in many respects, heretical, fable has woven itself about the whole line of the most distinguished Biblical names and writings, so it is in especial with the bungling compositions of apocryphal authors. Most of them have issued forth from obscurity only to become again the prey of obscurity. We follow, in naming them, the Biblical thread:

1. Apocalypse of Adam (Lücke, p. 232).
2. The Book of Enoch, see above.
3. Apocalypse of Abraham. Ophitic. Lücke, 252.
4. Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, see above.
5. Book of Elias, Hieronym. ad Sammachium, Ep. 101.
6. Book of Esdras, (Christianized, see above).
7. Ascensio Isaie Vatic. (see Gfrörer, Prophetæ Veteres Pseudepigraphi, p. 1).
8. Danielis, Tischend., Apocalypses XXX.
9. Apocalypsis Baruch (edidit Ceriani, Monumenta sacra, Mediolani, 1866, see Programm of Dr. Joseph Langen, Bonn, 1867).

* A fragment of this lost book has recently been found. See Langen, Das Judenthum in Palästina zur Zeit Christi (Bonn, 1866, p. 2).

10. Apocalypse of Peter (Lücke, p. 240).
11. Two Apocalypses of Paul, see Tischendorf, p. XIV. (Apocalypses Apocryphæ). On one of these, see Tischendorf, p. 34.
12. Apocalypse of a Pseudo-John, Tischend., Apocal. XVIII.
13. Of Bartholomew (Tischendorf, Apocalypses, XXIV.).
14. Of Mary (Tischendorf, XXVII.).
15. Of Stephen (Lücke, p. 247).

To these may be added some miserable works whose web extends over the post-apostolic period or falls within it. Relatively, The Shepherd of Hermas. The account of an Apocalypse of Cerinthus is dubious (Lücke, 247). Finally, an Apocalypse under the name of Methodius of Constantinople.

Later or more modern apocalyptic productions have scarcely any significance bearing upon the characteristics of ancient apocryphal Apocalypses, which (according to Lücke) became extinct in the fifth century. In Gfrörer's collection the following are cited: Vita Merlini. Galfridi Liber de Prophetiis Merlini. Fratri Hermanni Monachi Vaticinium. Prophetia Malachie de Summis Pontificibus. Apocalyptic traits, however, are also visible in manifold form in the chiliastic writings generally.

§ 5. FIGURATIVE FORM OF APOCALYPTICS.

The Holy Scriptures are, throughout, a record of the Providence of God, as exercised in the establishment of His Kingdom; hence they are themselves overruled by His Spirit. From beginning to end, they rest upon the synthesis of the living word, mighty in deed, and the spiritually significant, speaking fact. Consequently they are acquainted, on the one hand, with no idle words; on the other hand, with no silent facts. From beginning to end, they set forth the Divine in the human, the spiritual in the sensible, the eternal in the temporal, the infinite in the finite, i. e., they deal throughout in sense-imagery—being thus symbolical in the broader sense of the term.

This is true even of the historical portion of the Sacred Writings. The ideas which are reflected in the histories have re-acted upon the symbolism and mode of expression of the facts recounted. And thus Biblical history, by virtue of its matter-of-fact foundations, is distinguished from all heathen mythicism; by virtue of the ideal transparency or significance of its facts, from all the pragmatism* of profane historiography. Whilst the latter circles for the most part between secondary causes and proximate designs, Biblical historiography has in view the supreme causes and supreme designs, and hence recognizes the media between cause and design—secondary causes and secondary designs—so far as it mentions them at all, in their universal significance; none the less in the light of Supreme Providence.

This same character of the Holy Scriptures occasions in the didactic writings the sententious form; in the poetic writings in particular, the wealth of figurative expression and the significance of the composition; its most powerful appearance, however, is in the prophetic writings. Here it converts historical items into symbols of the idea (for instance, the king of Babylon), and ideas into historical forms (grass-eating lions); as a consequence, it shuts up revelation from all common sensuous apprehension of it—for instance, for the mass of the later Jews—whilst it sets it in the brightest light for the disciples of the truth; a fact which holds true in regard to the parables of the Lord, according to Matthew xiii. 13.

The simple sense-image, however, in accordance with the fullness of life and life's illumination in the Holy Scriptures, branches out into three fundamental forms: ALLEGORISM, SYMBOLISM, and TYPISM.†

ALLEGORISM (allegory from ἄλλο ἀγορεύω, to express something in words intended to

* [The German Pragmatik, which is here translated pragmatism, has the wide sense of the Greek word from which it is derived, and not the one-sided and purely offensive meaning of the English derivatives from πρᾶγμα.—Tr.]

† See the author's treatise: Über die Beziehungen, welche zwischen der allgemeinen Symbolik und der kirchlichen Symbolik obwalten. Deutsche Zeitschrift für christliche Wissenschaft, etc., 1855, Nr. 4-6.

convey a meaning other than their immediate one) is a form of imagery which, in accordance with the semblance of outward similarity, employs one phenomenon as the figure of another; imaging, especially, a more spiritual matter by means of a sensible phenomenon. The flowing element of allegory is the simple figurative expression, the rhetorical metaphor (the warrior, a lion; evil, a weed); an allegory is a poetically developed metaphor. It denotes its subject by another which has a similar appearance.*

SYMBOLISM (σύμβολον from συν, βάλλειν) unites a sensible image with a spiritual background, which latter is more or less inwardly and essentially connected with the phenomenon which furnishes the image. The uniting of the two sundered portions of a pledge of hospitality directly unites the pledge with hospitality itself. In general, however, the symbol is based upon the connection of the sign and that which it signifies; so that thus something moral or spiritual is denoted by something perceptible to the senses (a scar, for instance),—the higher by the lower; the combination may either be a conventional one (social connection) or it may be founded upon natural relations. The flowing element of the symbol is metonymy—the change of names; hence, the symbol is a fixed metonymy. It denotes a higher object—one, especially, which addresses itself to the mind—by a lower one, perceptible to the senses, yet akin to the first; in short, symbol may be expressed in one word—the cognate.

TYPISM, finally (τύπος, τύπτω), denotes the impression produced by a blow; a carving; a plan, sketch, or outline; consequently, the germ of a future form. It is the commencement-point, situate on the same line of development with the object denoted; a real prophecy, which fulfills itself in the future object, being, notwithstanding the ideal identity of essence, distinct from it in the substantial reality—like the shadow from the substance which projects it. The flowing element of the type is most prominent in synecdoche, which embraces not only the whole with a part, but also the fulfilment with the base-laying. The type relates to things ideally the same in essence, and really distinct, though, it may be, symbolically cognate; it denotes a future already subsisting germ-wise in the present.

The allegory is a simple image; the symbol is a sense-image; the type is a fore-image. [A type is a symbol in that it is a sense-image, but it is a peculiar kind of symbol;—it is always of the future (a fore-image); it is some person, act, or institution introduced by God into the ritual or history of His people, not only as prefiguring the antitype, but as having an ideal identity therewith—as being, in a sense, the representative thereof; as, for instance, the priest, the sacrifice, of the old economy.—E. R. C.]

It is also necessary, however, to make a distinction between these figures, the hasty coinage of poesy, and complete poetic elaborations of their character. The poetic elaboration of the allegory is the fable (for the most part, though not exclusively, that which avails itself of the animal kingdom in setting forth its ideas); the poetic elaboration of the symbol is the parable, though the latter may in detail likewise employ allegorical features; the poetic elaboration of the type is prophecy, from the formal stand-point (the paramuthia [that speech or discourse which encourages, exhorts, consoles—E. R. C.]).

Nearly related as these forms are, manifoldly connected as they may be in the more elevated productions of the mind—in historical, poetical, and prophetic works—the mingling of them is still inadmissible, whether it be in their three ground-forms—allegory, symbol, type—or in their three-fold gradation from element to form, from the simple form to the poetic application.†

Similarly, distinction must be made between the allegorical exegesis (which has ever been an instinctive supplement of the Christian mind to a Hellenistically shallow, grammatico-historical exegesis) and the exegesis of allegorical or allegorico-symbolico-typical writings;

* The most modern Natural Science allegorizes nature in a high degree, inasmuch as it deals pre-eminently with the outward similarities of created beings, at the expense of inner essential marks.

† It would lead us too far astray from our more immediate subject if we should attempt an exposition of the principle here laid down, together with an examination of extant theories and works upon symbolism—for instance, Bähr's excellent work upon the subject.

just as we distinguish between a poetic representation of the immoral and immoral representations.*

Upon Biblical ground, we have also to distinguish between verbal-prophetic and real-prophetic types.† We beg leave to designate, as the highest real types, the mental or mood types,‡ i. e., Divine real prophecies, unconsciously uttered by men. The choice of the expression is of manifold importance here. The prophecy Gen. iii. [15] is significant of the Messianic Humanity [Christ]; the mental type denotes a unit. The same distinction obtains where the seed of Abraham is spoken of. Paul, Gal. iii. 16, has in mind the real mental type which significantly attaches to the Abrahamic promise. Ps. xvi. and xxii. and many other passages come under this head; especially, the virgin, Is. vii. In accordance with the above, mental types frequently constitute the envelope of verbal prophecies, and form the transition from real to verbal prophecy.§

As further regards allegory in particular, it is self-evident that the entire realm of evil can be symbolized only by allegorical figures—i. e., figures of outward similarity—the world of nature not being related to evil; not even the creaturely serpent is so related, although it is the reflection of an extinct and ruder world-form (“in caverns dwells the dragons’ ancient brood”).

As, therefore, allegorism was requisite in the system of Sacred Writings, so, too, symbolism was necessary, since faith perceives in the visible world the phenomena of a higher and invisible one.

No less requisite, finally, was the typical presentation, as the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament form the documentary evidences of a religion of the future, and in the New Testament also, the sacred writers pass from picturing the joy and satisfaction of the faithful in the Christ appearing in the form of a servant, and for the accomplishment of the work of redemption, to a longing for His glorious second appearance, and to the prophetic pre-description of the same.

With all its figurativeness, however, Holy Scripture is far removed from a poetic fixation of images, which might degenerate into a spiritual image worship; the commandment, Thou shalt not make unto thee any image, is borne in mind throughout. For this holy word, characterized by Kant as sublime, excludes, not plastic and painted images simply, but also images of the fancy, mental figures and likenesses, inasmuch as these, by an erroneous or servile fixation of ideas and attributes, might seem to render finite the Divine. Hence the bold change of imagery (e. g., Ps. xviii.), a circumstance so surprising to a taste formed upon the Greek classics. This absence of fixation makes it possible for the Lion to

* A well-known critic of the Tübingen school reproached the author with interpreting the Apocalypse “allegorically.” He should have said—interpreting it as an allegorical writing, in accordance with its character. The Tübingen school, which can allegorise the Pauline Epistles, takes a different view of matters in approaching the Apocalypse, and strives to apprehend it literally, thus hoping to make good a charge of Judaizing. Such proceedings are euphemistically denominated—tendency. After a similar fashion, Rothe confounds philosophic dogmatics and dogmatical philosophy.

† [A real prophecy, or real type, is a prophecy or type embodied in some person, act, event, which shadows forth some other person, act, or event, yet in the future. Thus, in the destruction of Jerusalem, we have a real type of the final destruction of the world. A verbal prophecy or verbal type, on the other hand, is a prophecy or type set forth in words simply.—E. R. C.]

‡ [Gemüthstypus, Stimmungstypus. Gemüth is a collective term for the affections, desires, impulses, will; it corresponds sometimes to soul, sometimes to mind, sometimes to heart. Stimmung denotes the disposition or (literally) tuning of a man; it may be used in a permanent or a transitory sense. In the latter sense it corresponds to the English mood. A Gemüthstypus or Stimmungstypus, then, is presented when the inner man of some individual is so worked upon as to predetermine the state of one who is yet to come. Ps. xvi., xxii. (as above cited) and xli. afford notable instances of the Gemüthstypus.—Tr.]

§ [The meaning of Lange in this somewhat obscure paragraph seems to be: The man himself in the mood in which he makes the unconscious (as to its prophetic nature) utterance, together with the utterance itself, constitute the complex type of the antitype in a similar mood, and making similar utterances. Thus, David uttering the 22d Psalm was a type of the suffering Messiah making similar lamentations. In such case the words spoken are not only typical, but verbally prophetic of that which is to be; and “form the transition from real to verbal prophecy.”—It must be acknowledged, however, that it is difficult to reconcile this explanation with the references to Gen. iii., xvii., xrv., where the speaker is not an inspired man making utterances, of the prophetic nature and force of which he is unconscious, but Jehovah Himself (see Comm. on Genesis, p. 235, Am. Ed.).—E. R. C.] denote Satan and also the Redeemer; because of it, a wisdom like that of the serpent can be recommended to the disciples; heaven can denote at once that which is worst (Matt. xvi. 6), and that which is most noble (Matt. xiii. 33); and the Christian sage can be represented under the figure of the unjust steward [Luke xvi.]. [Is it true that, in the parable referred to, the Christian sage is represented under the figure of the unjust steward? Is it not the fact that, from an example of worldly wisdom, our Lord would deduce instruction for His un-wise disciples?—E. R. C.]

It is true that the Biblical figures do assume, first in the historical and lyrical Scriptures, but particularly in the Apocalyptic region, a greater conventional fixedness. But this is the case, even here, within certain defined limits. And even here, the term Beasts may denote alternately the highest and the most debased (see Rev. iv. and xiii.).*

Since the Holy Scriptures nowhere concern themselves with school ideas, with anecdotes, with the pragmatism of worldly wisdom or worldly history, but with the life of man, placed, as it is, under the Providence of God as the supreme causality, and related to the final purposes of God, in accordance with the highest laws,—their aim thus being the representation of the infinite in the finite, the spirit-world in the natural world,—they have, on this very account, everywhere a symbolical side, a general symbolical character. The great misapprehension or unapprehension of this peculiar character results, on the part of some, in the conception of the matter-of-fact side of the Scriptures as pragmatically literal; on the part of others, in the stamping of their symbolical side as mythicism. The two tendencies are united in the fact of their turning the idiocratic Hebrew charism of revelation into a Græco-Roman one. Of course, the different Books of the Scriptures are symbolical in widely different degrees. As specifically symbolical in the broader sense, we have to consider the Apocalyptic writings.†

a. Symbolism of Numbers.

See the Art. Zahlen [Numbers] among the Hebrews, in Herzog's Real-Encyclopædie. Also Zahl [Number] in the Biblisches Wörterbuch für das christliche Volk. Zahlen in Winer's Real-Wörterbuch, Vol. II. Kliefoth, Theologische Zeitschrift von Diekhof und Kliefoth, 1862. One. The number of absolute unity, hence of Godhead, of omnipotence; of union, hence of power; of uniqueness or singleness, hence of individuality—of the mind at one with itself—of the one salvation “that is needful.”

* [In the German Version, as in the English, the two words ζώον (Rev. iv.), and θηρίον (Rev. xiii.), are erroneously rendered by but one term, viz.: Thier in the former and Beast in the latter. But is it not most strange that Lange, who recognizes the Scriptural distinction in the Commentary, should thus ignore it in the Introduction?—E. R. C.]

† Compare the author's lecture: Ueber die Beziehungen welche zwischen der allgem. Symbolik und der kirchlichen Symbolik obwalten. See above. Comm. on Matthew, p. 183, [Am. Ed.]

Two. The number of revelation, hence of creation; of nature, hence of life; of harmonious contrast, hence of marriage, of friendship. But also the number of discord, of war, of ruin, of death. The number of witnesses, of certainty.

Three (2+1). The specifically sacred number. The number of life at one with itself in harmonious contrast; i. e., the number of spirit [Geist]; hence the number of the life that is in God.* The number of the absolutely living, three-fold Personality, hence of holiness; the number of the new life, the victoriously ended conflict, the Resurrection. But also the number of unclean spirits (the 3 frogs) and of demonically great sufferings (the 3 woes). Comp. the Concordances. Three and a half (the halved seven): the number of the apparent discontinuance of the Divine work (see Lämmert).

Four (2+2). The number of double contrast, hence the number of space, of the world; the number of the ground-forms of Divine Providence in the world.

Five (2+3, life moved by spirit). The number of the hand, of action, of freedom, of folly as well as wisdom, of motion, of the course of the world (five foolish and five wise virgins; five fingers upon the hand).

Six (3×2 and 2×3, the struggle betwixt spirit and nature). The number of weeks, of labor, of laborious service, of toil and need, of the endless toil of demonic self-annihilation. But also, in the sacred sense, the number of holy operations,—the sacred six whose unity is seven.

Seven (3+4 or 6+1). The number of the world as under the dominion of spirit; of completed work; of rest, of cessation from labor and keeping of holy-day, of the full development of light and life; of the full revelation of spirit, in good as well as in evil, hence the number of time. ["The number seven has a mystical and symbolical significance throughout Scripture, and especially throughout Prophecy, which, however, in no way lessens its chronological value. It is the sum of the number of God, three, and the number of the world, four, and is thus the number of the Divine in relation to the world, of the inward perfection of God, as manifested and viewed in His manifold works and judgments. Where this number prevails God is revealed, and vice versa. The inward objective foundation of the law lies in the seven spirits of God, who are the mediators of all His revelations in the world (Rev. i. 4, iii. 1, iv. 5, v. 6). The outward manifestation of the dignity of this number begins as early as the first Book and first chapter of the Old Testament, where the work of creation is divided by it, whilst it prevails throughout the whole of the Apocalypse, the last Book of the New Testament. Cicero styles the number seven rerum omnium fere nodus (Somn. Scip. 5)."] AUBERLEN, Dan. and Rev., Eng. Ed., p. 133.—E. R. C.]

Eight (2×4). The number of the double world of the Cosmos, in the antithesis of Heaven and earth.

Nine (3×3). The number of the perfect movement of spirit, of renewal (the last simple number).

Ten (5+5). The number of numbers, hence the number of the completed course of time; of the full temporal development of life; the formal, worldly number of completeness. ["Ten is the number of what is human, worldly; it represents the fullness of the world's manifold activity and development. We may illustrate this by examples taken from our Book (Daniel) where the world-power issues in ten heads and ten horns (ii. 41, 42, vii. 7-24)."] AUBERLEN, Dan. and Rev., Eng. Ed., p. 133.—E. R. C.]

Eleven (6+5). The number of the decline of day, of evening, of the evening of the world; of the Church convulsed by the storm raging in the world (Judas and Simeon, or Dan, dropped out).

Twelve (3×4). The number of the spirit-world; hence the number of the foundation, the mediation and consummation of the Kingdom of God. The number of the plenitude of the charisms, as well as the number of the restored number of completeness. The real, heavenly number of completeness.

* See Lämmert, "Zur Revision," etc. See above.

Fractions:  $\frac{1}{2}$ ,  $\frac{1}{3}$ ,  $\frac{1}{4}$ ,  $\frac{1}{5}$ . A divided heart (James i. 8). Beginning of judgment (Rev. viii. 7 sqq.). The completion of satisfaction, atonement (Lev. v. 16). Theocratic tax (Gen. xiv. 20; Lev. xxvii. 30). Partial ruin (Rev. xi. 13). The half of seven,  $3\frac{1}{2}$ , the number of the Divine work and Kingdom as apparently at an end. The number of apparent hopelessness and despair, Rev. xi. 9, xii. 14; comp. Dan. xii. 7. This number is similar to the 42 months (Rev. xiii. 5), or the 1260 days (chap. xi. 3, xii. 6). This equal period of apparent disconsolateness is very differently apprehended by our believing contemporaries; opinions vary as to whether it should be reckoned as consisting of times, days, years, or months. Even to the human mind, one day can be as one year, and vice versa.

Compounds.

4+3. Fortunes of the world and spiritual fortunes. The septenary of the Apocalypse divided into two portions. In general, completed destiny (Matt. v., the Beatitudes; * Matt. xiii., the Parables).

5+5. The entire evolutionary course of freedom in good and in evil (Matt. xxv. 1 sqq. 15).

7+1. Eight days. The round of life, in the antithesis of labor and rest, Luke ix. 28.

9+90. Luke xv. 4.

1000+600. Rev. xiv. 20. Comp. Düsterdieck, Komm. sur Apocalypse, p. 478. The number 1000 is an æon, and the number 600 a vast series.

Multiplications.

2×2. The world. 2×12. The 12 Elders of the Old and the 12 Elders of the New Covenant. The Theocratic and the Churchly Presbytery in a dynamic sense. The charisms of the Old and the New Covenant in their plenitude.

3×2. The new principle. The new. The priestly blessing, Num. vi. 24, 27. The thrice Holy ([Trisagion] Jehovah Sabaoth), Is. vi. —  $3 \times 40 = 120$ . The new Church, Acts i. 15.

4×2, or 8. The universe, an antithesis of the upper and the lower world.— $4 \times 3$ . God's world as a sanctified world. —  $4 \times 10$ . Course of the world, a generation.

5×2. The Church of God in respect of its genuine and spurious constituents, Matt. xxv. 1.

( $6 \times 100$ ) 60+6. The number 666. The number of endless toil and self-consumption which fail to attain the goal of spiritual rest, hence the number of Antichrist.

7×4. The month, the real theocratic measure of time.

7×10. The seventy souls as the totality of Israel (Gen. xli. 27); the 70 disciples (Luke x.); 70 nations (Gen. x.). The fuller form  $72 = (6 \times 12?)$ . (The fullest number:  $72 \times 1000 \times 2 = 144,000$ , Rev. xiv. 1). ["The number seventy is ten multiplied by seven; the human is here moulded and fixed by the Divine. For this reason the seventy years of exile are a symbolical sign of the time during which the power of the world would, according to God's will, triumph over Israel, during which it would execute the Divine judgments on God's people." AUBERLEN, Daniel and Revelation (Eng. Ed., p. 134).—E. R. C.]

8×10 (see Ps. xc.).

10×10. The worldly number of completeness. —  $10 \times 100$ . The chiliad, the æon.— $10 \times 1000$ . The myriad, infinitude.

$12 \times 12$ , or 144. The elect of a period; these multiplied by 1000: the elect of all times.

Bähr I., p. 308 sqq. Friedrich, Symbolik und Mythologie der Natur, p. 426, 634, 671, 678. Winer, Art., Farben [colors]; Bibl. Wörterbuch, same article. The author's "Vermischte Schriften," Mörs, 1840, vol. I., p. 1, Symbolik der Farben. [Smith's Bible Dictionary, Title COLORS.—E. R. C.]

Colors are brought into view in the Scriptures with the idea of the rainbow; in this phenomenon, however, it is not the individual colors, as such, but the entirety which possesses a lofty symbolical significance for the theocratic faith, Ezek. i. 28.

But in the brilliant coloring of the Tabernacle, the symbolism of individual colors meets us in four separate colors (Ex. xxvi.). White, blue (yellow?), purple, scarlet.

The entire chromatic table of the Bible is drawn up by Winer, as follows: "No great variety of colors, natural or artificial, is presented in the Bible: besides white and black, (a) red is most frequently mentioned, in its varieties of brown-red (bay), crimson (purple-red), orange (minium); then (b) green; (c) pale yellow; (d) purple-blue (hyacinth-blue); (e) reddish or fox-brown; many of these appellations are indicative at once of the pigment used and its origin."

On the interpretation of colors in general, compare the works above cited.

In the canonical Apocalyptic writings, the glorious appearance of Christ, in which several colors combine, first demands our consideration: Rev. i. 13-16, comp. chap. x. 1, xiv. 14; xix. 11 sq.; chap. xx. 11—the white throne; Dan. x. 5, 6.

Further, the color of the horses which are placed under the worldly authority of Christ, see Rev. vi. 2 sq.; xix. 11-14; Zech. i. 8, vi. 2, 3.

Again, the brilliant coloring of the great harlot's attire, Rev. xvii. 4, xviii. 12, 16. The color of the dragon, chap. xii. 3; likewise the color of the horses of the horsemen of destruction, chap. ix. 17, comp. Jer. li. 7.

The Woman clothed with the sun, chap. xii. 1 (who divides into two opposite forms, meeting us, on the one hand, under the figure of the harlot, chap. xvi. 1, and, on the other hand, under the figure of the tried Woman, clothed with shining linen at the appearing of Christ, chap. xix. 8), comes forth at the end of the 1000 years as the Bride, adorned in the richest fashion, in the glory of God Himself, chap. xxi. 10, 11 sqq.

Those believers in Sardis, who have kept themselves from defilement, are clothed in white raiment, chap. iii. White is pre-eminently the color of innocence, purity, and righteousness, Rev. xix. 11, 14; but also that of spiritual age, maturity, perfection, eternity, of heavenly existence, of heavenly victory (the white hair, white horse, white throne of Him who was like unto the Son of Man; the white stone, the white garments). White has connected with it the clear brilliancy of snow and crystal, Matt. xvii. 2; Mark ix. 3; Rev. i. 14. Or, this color probably embraces those two symbols. See Rev. ii. 17, vi. 11, and other places. Black denotes, Rev. vi. 5, famine, distress, or simply suffering; thus, Job xxx. 28, 30; Cant. i. 5, 6. An effective contrast is presented Lam. iv. 7, 8. Red is of striking but also manifold significance. Blood-red (crimson) may, like blood itself, when taken in an active sense, denote war (Rev. vi. 4), murder (Rev. xii. 3), bloody victory (Is. lxiii.); but, in a passive signification, it may also denote a sacrificial death as the surrendering of life in blood (Lev. xvii. 11); the Atonement, with its propitiatory and cleansing power (1 John i. 7; Heb. ix. 22; Rev. vii. 14). Purple, on the other hand, is the color of royalty (Cant. vii. 5; Matt. xxvii. 28) or of kingly luxury and voluptuous ease (Luke xvi. 19). The Babylonian harlot decked herself with purple as a sign of her royal dignity, with crimson (scarlet) as a sign of her blood-shedding, with gold as a sign of her luxurious life. As the concrete form of red appears in blood, so the concrete form of yellow appears in gold. Yellow also, however, like red, separates into two distinct and diverse colors. Pale yellow is the color of expiring life, of death, of the kingdom of the dead (Rev. vi. 8); golden or bright yellow is the color of agitated, intensified, radiant life (Ezek. i. 4: Rev. i. 15); a spurious imitation of this last is presented by minium, the yellowish red of idols (Wisd. of Sol. xiii. 14). Allied to this bright yellow is the red or fox color, and, according to others, the brown of Zech. i. 8. [The German Bible gives, in this verse, "red, brown and white horses," instead of the speckled of the text and the bay of the margin of E. V.]. Two equally significant contrasts are formed by sapphire blue, the covenant color, the color of faithfulness, of heavenly stability (Ezek. i. 26), as, first, in antithesis to the green of the emerald, the color of the earth in her verdant spring-time, the color of hope, and, as the ground-tone of the rainbow sub specie æterni, the hue of heavenly promise (Rev. iv. 3); and, secondly, in antithesis to a molley, speckled tint (Ezek. xvi. 16), the hue of manifoldness or diversity, of instability, of change; a final contrast to blue is presented by the sombre, grey, or unclean color of impurity, ashes, death (Job xxx. 19; Is. lxi. 3; Zech. iii. 3, and many other passages).

c. Geometrical Figures. Forms of Measurement.

The quadrangular form of Paradise, as the ideal blossom of the world, indicated by its four rivers, is reflected, in a secular aspect, in the four corners of the world, out of which the four winds blow (Dan. vii. 2); in a spiritual aspect, in the perfect square formed by the Holy of Holies (see Winer, Tabernacle) to which the imperfect square, the oblong of the Sanctuary, leads. The symbolical fulfillment of this square, from which the outer court has been cut off (Rev. xi. 2), is the City of God of the glorified world, the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 2, 16); hence not merely a square, but, by reason of the height of the walls (which is to be symbolically understood), a perfect cube.

The quadrature of the earth is, however, enclosed by the circle of the earth (Is. xl. 22), the world by the circuit of the heaven (Job xxii. 14); the abyss is likewise encompassed by a circle (Prov. viii. 27)—the sphere of Divine Providence.

d. Elements and Natural Phenomena.

Air, earth, water, fire, ashes, hail, lightning, thunder, storm, earthquake.

Air is a symbol of life, of the region of life (1 Thess. iv. 17); hence the last judgment of hardening consists in the pouring out of the seventh vial of wrath into the air (Rev. xvi. 17), so that the sphere of life itself becomes a sphere of death. Air, as set in motion, or as wind, symbolizes the breath of spirit and the spiritual sphere; hence the prince of this world is said to rule in the air (Eph. ii. 2); and, in contrast to the life-wind, which is a symbol of the Spirit of God (Ezek. xxvii. 9; John iii.), the winds of wild and demonic spiritual currents storm over the sea of the life of the nations, exciting it to the production of Antichristian forms.

Water is subject to the wind, as the passive natural life is to the motory spiritual life; water, especially as the billowy sea, stands in distinct contrast to earth as the firm element of the world, to the mountain and, in a most special degree, to the rock. As earth, on the one hand, denotes the earthly, the becoming, the beginnings of life, the transitory (John iii. 31; 1 Cor. xv. 47), the sphere of the becoming, in antithesis to Heaven, the symbol of the being, of perfection, of the glory of God, so, on the other hand, it denotes the religious-moral institutions and regulations of God, the traditional spiritual firmament over against the water-floods of human life, regarded either in its natural inconstancy or as agitated by demonic powers (Ps. xciii.; Job xxxviii.). The true government of God within the sphere of the religious-moral order of things, the Theocracy, is a mountain of God upon earth, or rather a coronal of holy mountains (Pss. xv., xxxvi. 7, lxxv. 6, cxxi. 1). Hence it is that the Theocracy, in its secularization into Jewish ordinance, could approve itself a mountain that lay, an apparently invincible obstacle, in the way of the Apostles' vocation; this same mountain, however, they were assured should by their faith be removed, nay, even be cast into the sea of nations (Matt. xvii. 20, xxi. 21). In consequence of this transposition of the Kingdom of God, there is a Christian order of things; it will be the sign of the last time, however, when the beast out of the earth—the old order of things—shall be subservient to the beast out of the sea. But though mountains depart and hills be removed (Is. liv. 10), yet will not God's mercy depart from His people; high above the mountains rises the eternal Rock, God Himself in His steadfastness and faithfulness (Deut. xxxii. 31, etc.). And, therefore, in the last time the Mountain of the Lord shall be higher than all mountains; the ordinance of the Kingdom in the Church of God shall be exalted above all other and human ordinances (Is. ii. 2).

Out of the rock of God's steadfastness, the fountain of undying life breaks forth. The fountain is the origin of life—of Divine life (Jer. ii. 13, xvii. 13) or of human spiritual life. All originalities, which make up the world's history, are fountains; in the midst is the open fountain of salvation (Zech. xiii. 1). From the fountains issue brooks and streams,— tendencies, godly (Ezek. xlvii. 1 sqq.; Shiloah, Is. viii. 6) and ungodly (brooks [E. V.: floods] of Belial, Ps. xviii. 4); the character of the latter is that of stagnation, ending finally in the perfect stagnancy of the lake of fire. The streams empty into the sea, the great life of the nations (Dan. vii. 2; Rev. xiii.). The sea itself is, after the judgment, divided into two distinct and opposite seas—the crystal sea which, in spite of its fullness, its plenitude of life, is transparent, a pure spiritual life, clear as crystal (Rev. iv. 6)—and the lake or pool of fire; which, in spite of its great extent and its passionate, fiery storms, still remains a pool of absolute stagnation (Rev. xix. 20, xx. 14, xxi. 8).

Earth and water are still further to be considered as elements. The earth as a symbol of a rich and fruitful soil—in a spiritual as well as a material sense—in antithesis to dry, stony, and desert ground (Matt. xiii.); water as a symbol of vitalizing, refreshing affluences (Ps. i.). This latter element is likewise a symbol of cleansing, consecrative discipline (Ezek. xxxvi. 25), and of a penal judgment that leads through death to new life (1 Pet. iii. 21). The water of the ocean is, moreover, a symbol of the separation between this life and the beyond (Deut. xxx. 13), just as the water of the flood symbolizes the separation between the old and the new world. Both imports of water are presented, however, in a yet higher degree in fire—fire as the vital element (Is. iv. 5); fire as the refining and purifying* (Mal. iii. 3), the atoning (Lev. xvi. 27), transforming (2 Pet. iii. 10), and destroying element (Rev. xx. 9).

Under the head of natural laws and phenomena, the antithesis of day and night claims the first place. Both day and night have two aspects, for to the day of life (John ix. 4) the day of judgment corresponds (1 Cor. iii. 13), and to the night of darkness, full of secret works of wickedness (Rom. xiii. 12), the holy night of mystery corresponds (Luke ii. 8).

The antithesis of light and darkness, on the other hand, is less ambiguous. Light, as symbolic of truth, is opposed to darkness, as symbolic of falsehood (1 John i. 6, 7). Yet there is also a holy darkness, as there is a holy night (Ex. xx. 21).

The sunshine is rich in symbolical references, from the first blush of morning to the parting ray of evening (see the Concordances and Zech. xiv. 7). The sun can also smite, however (Ps. cxxi. 6; comp. xci.). And so, in contrast to the scorching, smiting, Oriental sun, the shadow, sister to the night, is adopted as a symbol of the tranquillizing, protecting, and refreshing vital operations of God (Ps. xvii. 8, etc.).

Over against the blue sky, the symbol of eternal faithfulness (Ezek. i. 26), we find the cloud, as a medium of revelation and concealment (Ex. xiii. 21; xl. 34, etc.); as, likewise, the rainbow, as a medium of communication between heaven and earth (Gen. ix. 13; Ezek. i. 28; Rev. iv. 3). Again, we have the cloudy darkness (Ps. xviii. 9–11), and the flying storm-cloud, the latter, as denoting the chariot of God, being indicative of His stormy Providence, as seen in great events.

The cherubim of the cloud and storm government of God (Ps. xviii. 10) are accompanied by the seraphim of the Divine fiery rule (Ps. civ.; Is. vi.). These also were originally designated as cherubim—cherubim, however, who already wield the seraphic flaming sword (Gen. iii. 24).

We meet with rain under the import of times of blessing in a reference to the history of Elijah (Jas. v. 18). Storm, in its grand signification, as the crisis of the customary order of life (Dan. vii. 2; Luke xxi. 25), branches, on the one hand, into thunder and lightning (Ps. xi. 6, xviii.; Matt. xxiv. 27), on the other, into hail and (Rev. xvi. 21) meteors. The conjunction of judgment and salvation finds its climax in fire from heaven (Rev. viii. 10; history of Elijah—the chariot of fire).

Exceedingly significant are the conjunctions of the wonderful shining of sun and moon, and the great hail storm in the history of Joshua (Jos. x.). Likewise the Divine signs in the history of Elijah (1 Kings xix. 11 sqq.); the conjunctions of eschatological phenomena in the Lord's Eschatological Discourse (see the Synoptists); and especially the marking, in the Apocalypse, of decisive crises in the Kingdom of God by great natural crises. The voice of Christ is as the sound of many waters (Rev. i. 15); i. e., it is perceptible from the life and operations of Christ in the stirrings of many nations. Particularly significant are the conjunctions: lightnings, voices, thunders (Rev. iv. 5); voices, thunders, lightnings, earthquake (chap. viii. 5); to these is added, in a third passage, a great hail (chap. xi. 19; comp. chap. xvi. 18). Manifestations of God; epochs, new periods; earth-shakings, catastrophes of judgment.

c. Symbolical Items Drawn from Natural History.

On precious stones, see my Kermischte Schriften, Vol. I., p. 15; Winer's Bibl. Realwörterbuch and the Bibl. Wörterbuch under the head of Edelsteine [Precious Stones]. Calwer, Naturgeschichte (Stuttgart, 1836). [Smith's Dict. of the Bible—TITLE, Stones, Precious.—E. R. C.]

As the Gospel of John, by virtue of its perfect ideal view of the world, is rich in natural symbolism, so likewise is the Apocalypse, especially in the symbolization of subjects drawn from natural history.

In the first place, the symbolism of the twelve jewels in the breastplate of Aaron is resumed in the description of the New Jerusalem (chap. xxi.). As the jewels in the breastplate reflect the Twelve Tribes of Israel in their peculiarities, so in the Apocalyptic jewels the foundations of the wall of the City are mirrored, i. e., the complete number of the charismatic fundamental types of the eternal City of God; marked by the names of the Twelve Apostles. The twelve jewels, as foundations of the wall, are reflected in the twelve pearls that form the gates. The pearls stand toward the jewels as does Omega toward Alpha; they are the perfected lustre and splendor of appearance into which the charismatic foundations have developed; their perfection consists in the fact of their representing, in their quality of gates, on the one hand, the complete openness, universalism of perfect spiritual life, and on the other, its complete seclusion against everything that is base. This seclusion seems to be effected, however, only by a dynamically repellent agency which the pearls exercise of themselves (see chap. xxi. 25, 27).

The twelve jewels of the City of God are preceded by the three figurative jewels in the Theophany, chap. iv. 3. Particular prominence is given to the jasper stone. Its lustre, together with that of the sardine stone, characterizes the appearance of God Himself upon His throne; it is likewise expressive (as the most precious of all stones) of the glory of God which lightens His City, and so we find it again as the material of which the wall of the City is built, and as the first jewel of the foundations. Undoubtedly, therefore, it is not the ordinary jasper, but the diamond (see Düsterd., p. 216). The stones in Aaron's breastplate do not follow each other in the same order as those in the Apocalypse.

In the breastplate we have:

Sardius, Topaz, Emerald, Ruby,
Sapphire, Sardonyx	{	Ligure Jacinth	} Agate,
Amethyst,	{	Turquoise Chrysolite Topaz	{
		{ Onyx Beryl }	{ Jasper Diamond }

In the foundations of the City of God:

{	Jasper Diamond	}	Sapphire, Chalcedony, Emerald,
Sardonyx, Sardius, Chrysolite, Beryl, Topaz, Chrysoprasus, Jacinth, Amethyst.

It is an unmistakable fact that the precious stones of the Apocalypse, chosen in accordance with the knowledge of antiquity, denote in general the elect of the City of God. As twelve, they indicate their numerical completeness (see chap. vii. and xiv.); as shining with a common lustre, their unity; as stones of different hues, their manifoldness; as brilliant stones, the glorification of this earthly life through the light of Heaven. It is, of course, not feasible exactly to combine the twelve Aaronic stones with the twelve sons and tribes of Israel, or altogether to identify the Apocalyptic stones with the respective characteristics of the twelve Apostles, though many analogies may be found in both tables. The stones are, however, most highly significant as bearing upon the Christian doctrine of personality. They proclaim the fact that the individual is not relaxed and dissolved by the universal, but fixed and clarified. Since the jasper is described as the most precious of all stones, and compared with the transparent crystal, nay, spoken of as a crystal jasper, the ordinary jasper cannot be meant. See above.

As an image of the pure and crystallized solar ray, of faithfulness in motion, of motion in faithfulness—hence, of light—gold has an inalienable reference to the sun itself, consequently, to the symbol of the face of God, or Christ, i. e., the manifestation of God's love.

As gold, however, it is indicative of the spiritual solar ray—a celestially pure and right tendency and motion. So, doubtless, the golden girdle denotes a preparation for holy motion (chaps. i. 13, xv. 6); the golden treasure, the true riches of active spiritual life (chap. iii. 18); the golden crowns, the perfecting of holy living in royal liberty (chap. iv. 4); the golden censer, the purity of the prayers ascending to heaven for the coming of the Kingdom (chap. viii. 3); the golden vials of wrath, the Divine purity and integrity in the course of the judgments (chap. xv. 7); the golden streets of the City of God, the sphere of holy life-motion (chap. xxi. 21).

Since the adornment of the harlot (chap. xvii. 4) is worldly, like the worldly merchandise brought to her by the merchants of the earth (chap. xviii. 12, 13, 14, 16), the passages referred to can contain nothing but a general allegorical symbolization of worldly show, in splendor, might, riches and pleasures, through the medium of precious stones, pearls, metals, products of the vegetable kingdom and works of art.

Together with the symbolical import of earth and sea, the symbolism of the vegetable world endows trees and all green things (chaps. vii. 3, viii. 7) with a like general significance. In accordance with well-known images in the Psalms (Pss. i. 3, xxiii. 2, xcii. 12) the tree covered with verdure is indicative of prosperity in human relations. In particular, we would note the two olive trees, chap. xi. 4, which recall the kindred passage in Zech. iv.; in the latter place, however, the olive trees afford nutriment to a candlestick in the midst of them, whilst in the Apocalypse the olive trees themselves are, at the same time, candlesticks, i. e., not simply sources of Christian spiritual life, but likewise organs for the diffusion of the same. In the Old Testament passage, the prophetic and high-priestly offices seem to be intended, in their fructification of the kingly office; in the New, we regard the two olive trees as significant of the Christian Church and State. The vine of the earth (chap. xiv. 18), characterized as the object of the judgment harvest, doubtless denotes, in accordance with John xv. 1; comp. Ps. lxxx. 14, 15; Ezek. xv. 2, xix. 10, the entire human race in its higher destination; it is here contemplated, however, in that ironical perversion of its destiny of which it has in great part been guilty, bringing forth, it is true, grapes in abundance, yet grapes that have but the false semblance of love and joy, being fit only for the wine-press of wrath. On the other hand, the trees of life, chap. xxii., constitute an individual sign of the great superiority of the new Paradise to the old. The one possessed a single tree of life; the other abounds in trees of life, standing on either side of the river; it has thus an avenue of trees or organs for the eternal preservation and invigoration of life, and not only do these refresh the blessed the whole year through, with their twelve manner of fruits, but their leaves also are for the healing of the nations.

The animal kingdom has contributed more abundantly to apocalyptic symbolism than has the vegetable, and that not merely in simple forms but also in allegorical compounds; not merely to denote bestial and demonic impulses,* but also, in a remarkable degree, to illustrate the highest and holiest heavenly relations.

In general, the four living shapes or beasts before the throne of God, which we regard as four fundamental forms of the Divine government,† primarily form a contrast to the beast out of the sea and to the beast out of the earth, i. e., the true radical Antichrist and his prophet, the renegade from the old Christian order of things (chap. xiii.), and to the dragon, the ruler and inspirer of them both (chap. xii. 3), Satan himself.

The lamb is the symbol of the suffering, and in suffering triumphant, Christ. This figure is employed throughout the Scriptures, from the paschal lamb (Ex. xii.) down; it receives special prominence at the hands of Isaiah (chap. liii.), and is also a favorite image in the Johannine writings (John i. 29; comp. 1 Pet. i. 19), particularly in the Apocalypse (chaps. v. 6, vi. 16, vii. 10, xii. 11, xiv. 4).

The horse, in the Apocalypse as in Zechariah (chaps. i. 8, vi. 2, 3), is the symbol of a world-historical movement, or distinct fundamental forms of the course of the world.

The eagle (chaps. viii. 13 to xii.) has the significance of the horse, only in a higher degree. It denotes a ghostly or ideal and infinitely swift motion which (2 Sam. i. 23), as a rule, is directed towards light, the sun, heaven (Prov. xxiii. 5, xxx. 19; Is. xl. 31); wonderfully rapid in descent also, as the astonishingly swift catastrophes of judgment (Job xxxix. 30; Matt. xxiv. 28). Hence, the eagle is particularly fitted to denote the wonderful Providence of God, as exercised towards His people (Ex. xix. 4; Deut. xxxii. 11); or to symbolize mighty sovereigns (Dan. iv. 33), great military expeditions (Jer. xlviii. 40), great spiritual princes (Ezek. i. 10; Rev. xii. 14).

Highly remarkable and singular figures are the three frogs (Rev. xvi. 13). Their element—the swamp—their unanimity in the most perfect monotony, their loud nocturnal clamor and the emulousness with which they strive to outcry each other, are sufficiently characteristic features. Their number, however—three—denotes that they feign to be holy voices of the Spirit. They belong to the sphere of the dogs, which last, as Oriental wild dogs, are to be distinguished from the little dogs (Matt. xv.; Tob. v. 16, [xi. 4.]) Dogs are a symbol of invincible vulgarity, associated though it may be with many gifts; of vulgarity in enjoyment (Prov. xxvi. 11), in possession (Sirach xiv. 2),* in a disregard for holy things (Psalm xxii. 16; Matt. vii. 6), in sensual impurity generally (Rev. xxii. 15). In a more general sense, therefore, they are also a symbol of baseness (2 Kings viii. 13). In connection with the swine, the dog denotes infinite activity and versatility (Eccl. ix. 4) in what is base and sordid, whilst the swine is expressive of a debauched hebetude in the like (2 Pet. ii. 22). The serpent bears sway over this domain, however; he is, in truth, serpent and swine in one, combining supreme demonic cunning with supreme bestial brutality; such is the dragon, i. e., Satan.

Not images of evil itself [in the sense of wickedness or sin—Tr.], but images of the ill that is connected with evil, are the figures of the demonico-physical penal judgments; in the first place, the locusts that ascend out of the abyss (chap. ix. 3). These are allegorical figures: locusts that touch no green thing, but bite and torment men; illusive figures, like tormenting shapes created by the imagination: like horses, and yet not like horses; with things like crowns as of gold on their heads, and yet neither crowns nor gold; faces, as it were the faces of men, and yet not men's faces; their hair as the hair of women, and yet not women's hair; teeth like lions' teeth, and yet not lions' teeth; breastplates as the similitudes of iron breastplates; the sound of their wings as the sound of war-chariots; tails like scorpions' tails—all demonic phantasmagoria, hypochondria, forms of frenzy, self-tormentings of all kinds, such as make up the morbid dark side of the development of modern intellectual and spiritual life. Such is the appearance of these locusts, like the countless spawn of spiritual waste places—horses in their swiftness and strength; crowned with the phantasmal crowns of invincible phantasmal might; as human as though they looked through men's eyes; as effeminate as though clothed with women's hair; and yet, again, ferocious in strength, provided, as it were, with lions' jaws; mercilessly hard and unconquerable, guarded as with iron breastplates; venomous as though stinging with scorpions' stings; tormenting men five months, i. e., through the measure of the whole course of the veriest temporality ([moon, month] measurer of time†), five times repeated, in accordance with the number of moral freedom—here, freedom in false self-destination.

* [The reference is manifestly incorrect. The one intended by the author cannot be discovered.—Tr.]

† [See Müller's Science of Language, Vol. I., p. 16.—Tr.]

Still more fearful is the aspect of the tormenting spirits of the sixth trumpet (chap. ix.); the locusts tormented men, but these slay the third part of men; the former are to the latter as countless swarms of grasshoppers to a serried host of twice ten thousand times ten thousand (200 millions) horsemen. The riders have breastplates of fiery red, dark blue, and brimstone color (brimstone yellow); the heads of the horses are like lions' heads, and out of their mouths issue fire, smoke, and brimstone, as though they were dragons of hell. Thus, the horses are worse than the riders, who seem only to guide them. The horses kill by the three agencies, fire, smoke, and brimstone, as by different plagues. Besides this power in their mouths, they have power in their tails; those resemble serpents, having serpents' heads, which harm men.

We must consider that the sixth trumpet has reference to the approaching end of the world. This consideration points to demonic Antichristian corruptions which burst forth from the Euphrates (not from beyond the Euphrates, whence a way is prepared for the kings, Rev. xvi. 12)—(from Babylon)—as Babylonish distractions. Mark first the close connection in which they stand, and their release for judgment, under four angels of judgment. Next their number—two myriad myriads; a two-fold immensity, to be referred, doubtless, to the antithesis of the two Antichristian beasts. Moreover, it is not the riders, the directors of the horses, who are the real devastators, but the terrible horses themselves, i. e., wild and dreadful movements. Yet the riders are invulnerable; they have on breastplates corresponding in color with the deadly plagues that issue from the mouths of the horses; the flame-color with the fire, the steel-blue with the smoke, the brimstone-color with the brimstone. The men whom they kill, they kill not simply spiritually, but likewise physically;—with the fire of fanaticism; with the smoke of suffocating, negative self-consumings; with the brimstone of a morbid susceptibility for fire and suffocating glow. Thus are slain, snatched away into spiritual and bodily ruin, the third part of men, i. e., a great portion of those under mental or spiritual excitement, representatives of the human number of spirit; the rest of mankind are mortally wounded by the bite of their serpent-like tails, yet they do not repent, either of their idolatry, or of their lawlessness (murder, etc.). The judgment is imminent.

If heads may be regarded only as symbolizing the real principles of definite tendencies, or as the intelligent originators of them (Gen. iii. 15; Ps. lxxviii. 21), the seven heads of the dragon denote seven ground-forms of mischievous demonic principles; the perfect number, seven, being significant of the pretended holiness and Divine origin of these principles. The seven heads of Antichrist represent these principles in their historical development, showing how they finally have borrowed the most perfect semblance of Christianity whilst existing in the element of hatred towards Christ; ay, how they can appear like seven holy mountains of world-historical firmness and order (Rev. xvii.). As the dragon appears as a monster, and moreover as a liar and braggart, having ten horns upon his seven heads—the emphatic expression of the entire course of the world—so, too, does Antichrist wear the semblance of a monster, and that in a peculiar degree (Rev. xiii.). For the horn is, in general, the symbol of power, particularly historical, royal power (Rev. xvii. 12). Still more monstrous, however, than the monster of Antichristianity, is the beast that comes up out of the earth; it has two horns [like a lamb], but it speaks as a dragon, i. e., not simply as Antichrist, but as the devil himself.

The fact that the eyes of the beasts ([living beings—E. R. C.] Rev. iv.) denote the consciousness of the spirit, His illimitable vision, requires no explanation. The feet, as figuring position (chap. x. 2), and the hands, especially the right hand, as figuring action, are also easily intelligible symbols.

The mention of these physical organs leads us to the contemplation of organic sufferings. Complete organic suffering constitutes the corpse (chap. xi. 9), the symbol of complete deadness and annihilation, accompanied by a certain continuance of the dead or slain form. But the corpse, on Biblical ground, is like tinder which has been extinguished but which a spark may re-ignite; it may revive again. And thus it is with the Kingdom of God, when all seems lost.

Evil also may receive a deadly wound, however, which for the time may be healed (Rev.

xiii. 3). Judgment that has taken up its dwelling within is more fell in its operation; this is symbolized by the sore (Rev. xvi. 2, 11); it is that self-dissolution of life that begins with perfect hardening. But, in face of this death-power, we behold the wondrous life-power of the Kingdom of God, indicated by the woman in travail (chap. xii. 2). This last figure leads us to that department of symbolism which is connected with human life.

f. Human Relations.

In accordance both with the Apocalypse (chap. i. 13) and the Book of Daniel (chap. vii.), the human form, in its ideality, is specifically the form of Christ. As the Head of humanity, He is the essential and apparent Image of God; the Son.* He, therefore, not only embraces humanity and reveals Divinity (chap. x. 1), but also rules over and through the Cosmos (chap. i. 17, 18). Therefore, His eyes are like a flame of fire, and His voice like the voice of great waters (great hosts of peoples).

She who gave birth to Him is the woman clothed with the sun, whose footstool is the moon, and who is adorned with a crown of twelve stars. The Kingdom of God, or the ideal Theocracy,† bare Him in the radiant garment of the sun, i. e., the revelation of God; His Kingdom is elevated above the moon, i. e., above the changes of time; it is adorned with the crown of twelve stars, the complete number of all the great bearers of Divine revelation, whilst the Church has seven stars (angels or ideal genii of individual churches or congregations) and the seven individual churches or congregations themselves do but reflect the glory of the Kingdom faintly, as seven candlesticks. The great spiritual adornment of the woman, however, reposes also upon a cosmical foundation: The sun, with its group of stars, constitutes the Christological Cosmos in the narrower sense.

The travail of the woman is doubtless indicative of the birth-pangs of the Messianic time. The Spirit in the Kingdom of God apprehends that Satan is desirous to devour the child, i. e., He is the author of prophecy concerning the suffering Messiah (continuing it even into the New Testament: Simeon, John the Baptist, Mary of Bethany in the act of anointing Christ). He desired to devour Him; this is the Death of Christ, changed into the Resurrection. The child was caught up into Heaven—the Ascension of Christ. Besides the immediate application of this fact, however, the self-same thing is continually going on in the history of mankind. Satan is continually desiring to devour every new birth of the Church. But the true Christendom, as the Church Triumphant, is ever being caught up into Heaven, whilst Satan is continually being more and more cast out of the Heaven of the spirit and the spirit-realm into the external world.

The wilderness, whither the woman flees, is not difficult of comprehension: it is the region of asceticism.‡ She is borne thither upon the wings of the great eagle. A super-terrestrial spirit of renunciation in heroic spirits—existing in a free form, even in the life of John—is the saving power that bears the New Testament Theocracy, the true Church, into the wilderness.

The water-flood, with which the serpent seeks to carry away the woman, is, in accordance with the idea of water-floods, a migration of a nation or nations (see Ps. xciii.). But the earth, that swallows up the flood, is the old order of things, conceived of not simply as secular authority, but likewise as legal and external Churchly authority. The forms of State and Church in the Middle Ages became victors over the flood of peoples in migration. Though it be true that the nations were partially influenced in their wanderings by a higher longing, it is nevertheless a fact that the first moving power of an Attila, for instance, was a demonically savage impulse; and, in every instance, the nations dashed themselves at first against the Church with a shock as of mighty waves.

* [As the Head of humanity, He is THE MAN—"The last Adam," 1 Cor. xv. 45; as the promised Seed, Gen. iii. 15 (including the idea of Headship), He is the SON OF MAN.—E. R. C.]

† [By "the ideal Theocracy" Lange intended, beyond doubt, to indicate the ideal or true Church, continuing one and the same through all dispensations. (See Comm. on Matthew, p. 73, Am. Ed.) He could not have contemplated the Christian Church as such, since that was introduced by Him—in no sense "bare Him;" and that he did not intend to indicate the Jewish Church as such, is made manifest by the subsequent reference to "the seven churches." Thus the Church is described by the preceding phrase as "the Kingdom of God." If this description be correct, "the Kingdom" had really come when Daniel prophesied concerning its coming,—when the Baptist heralded it as "at hand,"—when our Lord taught His disciples to pray "Thy Kingdom come." For further remarks on the Kingdom of God, or the Basileia, the reader is referred to the Excursus on that subject under ch. i. 9.—E. R. C.]

‡ [Auberlen supports, by strong arguments, the opinion that the wilderness is symbolical of the heathen lands in which the Church took refuge when she was driven from Palestine. Elliott (Horn Apocalypticæ, 5th Ed., Vol. III., p. 45) contends, in accordance with the author, that by the flight is symbolised, not a change of place, but a change of state. He differs from Lange, however, as to his explanation of that state, viewing it as implying "the faithful Church's loss of its previous character of Catholicity or universality, its invisibility in respect of true Christian public worship, and destitution of all ordinary means of spiritual sustenance."—E. R. C.]

It is an exceedingly note-worthy circumstance that the one Woman of whom we read in chap. xii. has, in the end of the days (chap. xvii., xviii., xix.), divided into the antithesis of the Harlot and the Bride.* See above.

The two olive-trees of the interim are likewise introduced in the form of two personages endowed with miraculous power [the two Witnesses, ch. xi. 8-13]. They are able to shut Heaven, to inflict external and internal judgments upon men. In the killing of them, however, we behold the Antichristian destruction of Church and State. In their dead bodies we have a certain continuance of their exanimate forms. In their resurrection, at the expiration of three days and a half, i. e., after the lapse of the resurrection period of three days—in the most hopeless hour, therefore—as also in their ascension, we see the exaltation of Church and State into the condition of the unitous form of the Kingdom. Here we behold the coming forth of the Bride. As the matured, free and unique heavenly Church upon earth, she stands opposed to Antichristianity.

Over against the olive-trees stand the seven kings and the ten kings, as Antichristian powers.

The starting-point for the explanation of these kings is formed by the fact that a precursory judgment, executed by the angel of the seventh vial of wrath, has divided the one great city of destruction into three parts (chap. xvi. 19). The first part is constituted by Babylon in the narrower sense of the term; she is connected with the seven kings, or the seven holy, or rather mock-holy, forms of the Antichristian world-power. The second part is formed by the Beast in the narrower sense of the term, represented by the ten kings of the democratic world-power. The third part is formed by the final rising of Gog and Magog, under the conduct of Satan himself (chap. xx.). The Babylonian Harlot is judged by the ten kings. The Beast, with the ten kings, is judged by the Parousia of Christ. The last anarchical rising is judged by fire that comes down from God out of heaven,—the fiery metamorphosis of the end of the world.

The Woman who at first fled from the dragon into the wilderness of a holy asceticism, seems to be again found in the wilderness, chap. xvii. But her asceticism is now holy in appearance only. The Woman has become a Harlot, and has seated herself upon the organ of Satan, the scarlet, i. e., blood-colored, Beast; the Antichristianity of the last time. The beast is full of names of blasphemy, i. e., central principles of impiety; its seven apparently spiritual heads or governments are in contradiction to the ten horns of worldly power. The woman, in her false pomp, also sits on seven mountains, i. e., consecrated powers of order (see above, Mountain); and these are seven kings. It is, in the first place, declared concerning their unified personality, i. e., the Beast itself: It was, and is not, and shall ascend out of the abyss, and go into perdition. This fact excites the wonder of the Christian world here, chap. xvii., and also according to chap. xiii. 8, where it is said: The deadly wound of the Beast was healed. The passages are unmistakably descriptive of Antichristianity in its continuance throughout the history of the world; in its heathen character it was, and received a deadly wound from Christianity; it arose again, however, an apparently Christian Antichristianity, and, in this character, as the perfection of wickedness, it is destined to go into perdition. Accordingly, by the seven kings, we are to understand, agreeably to the features presented in Dan. vii., seven world-powers, or phases of this gradually developing

* The author communicated the idea of this division of the one form of the Woman into two opposite forms to the late Dr. Auberlen, in a letter written, if we mistake not, subsequent to the issue of the first edition of his work on Daniel and the Revelation.

Antichristianity. We cannot assume that the Apocalyptist essentially differs from Daniel. It was necessary, however, for him to go beyond Daniel, in view, among other things, of the fact that Antichristianity would re-appear within Christianity; hence he substituted a round, spiritual seven—taking for his point of departure the last kingly power—for the heathen, worldly four of Daniel. As a fifth power, which to the Israelites had become a world-power, he might regard the Antichristianity of the Herodians, or the Jewish Hierarchy itself in its diffusion over the world; as the sixth, the Roman empire of his own time as distinguished from ancient Rome. The other, it is declared, is not yet come; that is, the apparently Christian, Antichristian world-power. Upon this point the prophecy is brief, in perfect accordance with the laws of prophecy in contra-distinction to historic prediction.

The passage, chap. xvii. 11, has been combined with the declaration concerning the deadly wound of the Beast, chap. xiii. 3, for the purpose of presenting an absurd fable of heathen or Jewish popular life as the main motive of the great prophecy of a Christian Apostle.* The supporters of this view have failed to consider the serious injury which the adoption of such a popular error must necessarily inflict upon the entire Book. They are regardless of the distinction that exists between popular rumor and the opinion of morally cultured minds; between the generality of such minds and enlightened prophets of the Lord. Neither have they considered how impossible it is that the world-monarchies of Daniel, which invariably denote entire groups of kings, should here be converted into the names of single kings, of whom some are even highly insignificant. The confusion which such a proceeding would introduce into the Apocalyptic times is manifest.

It is deserting symbolical exegesis for literal interpretation to declare that the kings are real kings, instead of concrete world-powers; or to seek to define the numbers seven and ten in accordance with chronologic historical dates. Neither can Babylon be significant of Rome in a literal sense, though Rome be the symbolical centre of Babylon; and, notwithstanding the unmistakable allusion to Rome contained in the seven mountains (chap. xvii.), we must not be unmindful of the symbolic import attaching to the septenary, as well as to the figure of a mountain. When Christ is declared to be the Prince of the kings of the earth (chap. i.), the expression is manifestly a symbolically concrete term for the absolute-dynamical and dynamic-absolute dominion of the glorified Christ over all the world-powers of the earth. It is expressive of the dynamical principle of the personality, word, and Spirit of Christ, which principle overrules all materiality and all quantity. So, as the Crown of life, Christ Himself surpasses all the princely crowns or diadems of worldly dominion, and of spiritual victory in Heaven and on earth (Rev. ii. 10, etc.). It is also requisite that we should regard city as a symbolical term for a centre of human fellowship, whether the city of destruction (chap. xvi. 19) or the City of God (chap. xxi. 10) be intended. No less symbolical is the temple, chap. xi. 1. The exegetical assumption of modern critics that the last passage proves the Temple at Jerusalem to have been still standing at the time when the Apocalypse was written, affords another sign of the deep fall of these critics into a false literalism. The sharp distinction made by the Apocalyptist between the temple and the outer court, which last is not measured, but is given to the Gentiles that they may tread it under foot, is manifestly expressive of the distinction between the internal and the external Church, between the true, living congregation of God and a Christendom that is Christian in name only, being in essence truly heathen. It is an antithesis similar to that formed by the Kingdom of priests of the real spiritual life (chap. i. 6), and the merchants of the earth, who have been the intimate business friends of the false queen, just as the kings of the earth have been the associates of her revelry and debauchery. Again, in the merchants and kings we have, manifestly, two symbolic groups. One of these groups denotes all who have served and benefited the queen from self-interest; some of them being represented as egoists, who drift upon the ocean of popular life. The other group is indicative of all who have occupied a relation of mutual support to the false world-power, the enslaver of humanity, the Woman,—lending her the worldly arm of despotism, with a view to being made strong by her through her enslaving of men's consciences.*

* See Düsterdieck, p. 439. Victorin, Corrodi, Eichhorn, Ewald, Lücke, De Wette, Bleek, Baur, Volkmar, and others, p. 440; Düsterdieck opposes this idea. Weiss does the same in his treatise in Studien und Kritiken, 1839, No. 1.

And now, in the midst of all these symbols, and in this out and out symbolical Book, what shall we say to those who ascribe a perfectly literal meaning to the term Jews † (chap. ii. 9, iii. 9), and who, upon this term, erect an entire house of cards, made up of false critical hypotheses concerning the New Testament? Very strong faith is requisite for the assumption that such critics are thoroughly in earnest in thus literalizing, particularly as the Apocalypticist himself characterizes those people who claim that they are the true Jews, as a synagogue of Satan. One would suppose that, previous to the Apocalypse, there never had existed a spiritual conception of Judaism (see Rom. ii. 29; Gal. iii. 29). No less worthy of rejection is the Judaizing, chiliastic interpretation of the passage descriptive of the sealing (chap. vii.) as referring to the national, external Israel. The Christians in the seven churches, which were in a great measure made up of Gentile Christians, must, we think, have better understood how to read a Christian symbolic Scripture than readers of this tendency, who hold that the congregation of believers who (as they suppose) are sealed towards the end of the world, are to be regarded as consisting purely of Jewish Christians. The above view would, moreover, necessitate the inference that precisely 12,000 should be sealed out of every tribe. Since the number twelve is the spiritual number of completeness, denoting the round fullness of the principal charisms of the life of Christ or the Kingdom of God, by the twelve thousand of each of the twelve tribes, the whole plenitude of charismatic forces in the development of the Kingdom of God is denoted; in the form of elect and tried souls, for such only are sealed. Since, however, this sealing has reference to the entire course of the seventh seal, i. e., of the seven trumpets, the interpretation which refers it to a Jewish church subsisting at the end of the world, is utterly incorrect. These hundred forty and four thousand would, moreover, in the true evening of the world, seem to have emerged from their probationary state on the earth (chap. vii.) and to have attained to the triumphal state in Heaven (chap. xiv.). This time they appear as "virgins," i. e., according to Rothe, celibates. Mark well, however, that, in adopting this interpretation, we have to conceive of them as 144,000 celibate Jewish Christians, assuming, moreover, that, on account of their celibacy, they have attained a more elevated position in Heaven. It is thus that the Apocalypse is handled, whilst, in simple accordance with Biblical style, the sealed Israel denotes the sealed New Testament people of God, consisting of Jewish and Gentile Christians; and the idea of "virgins" is sufficiently explained by moral predicates, especially the genuinely Johannean predicate of purity and truth (chap. xiv. 5). Neither is it to be supposed that the plenary number of the elect in the Church Triumphant in Heaven and of the elect on earth in the Church Militant, necessarily denotes the same individuals. The entire people of God is denoted by the symbolical name Israel. And though the heathen [nations], chap. xxii. 2, and elsewhere, form an antithesis to these Jews, that

* F. Baader: The despot and the hierarch play into each other's hands.

† [The remarks of the author proceed upon the assumption that the terms Jews and Israel can be "literally" (normally) applied only to the natural seed of Abraham. This was the old Jewish idea; an opinion repugnant to one of the first principles of the Abrahamic Covenant, which recognized proselytes as forming as integral a portion of Israel as the natural seed, Gen. xvii. 12, 13;—condemned by the Baptist in the declaration, "God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham," Matt. iii. 9; Luke iii. 8;—and denied and disproved by the Apostle Paul in his Epistle to the Romans; conf. ii. 28, 29, iv. 10-17, ix. 25, 26, xi. 17-24. After the breaking off of the natural seed, and the engrafting of the new stock, there was, of necessity, a two-fold use of the terms. Sometimes, and in the most proper sense, they were applied to the covenanted seed (consisting of both the natural seed and proselytes—the Christian Church) who enjoyed the Divine favor, as in Rom. ii. 29; Gal. vi. 16; and sometimes to the community (consisting principally of the natural seed—the Jewish nation), which, as a community, had been "broken off," although it continued to hold covenant relations and is to be grafted in again. The former of these uses was not of course forbidden by the fact that the adopted seed were for the most part uncircumcised, since it is within the power of the institutor of a covenant to change the seal thereof, as has been done in the present case. No confusion can possibly arise from this double use of the terms, since the context always determines the special sense. Both these applications of the terms are literal, or more correctly speaking, normal; neither is, in any proper sense, figurative. The error of those contemplated by Lange consists, not in their contending for a literal application of the term, but in their ignoring the first and most important of its literal meanings.—E. R. C.]

term also is a symbolical expression for the, as yet, unredeemed, considered particularly as masses of peoples. Hence, therefore, it does not follow that the heathen [nations] and races [kindreds] and peoples and tongues, chap. vii. 9, with which the sanctification of the principle of nationality in the Kingdom of God is explicitly declared, form a subordinate complement to the 144,000 elect of Israel; this is the less tenable, since the so-called Gentile Christians are already in Heaven (chap. vii. 9), whilst the so-called Jewish Christians are still being sealed on earth; in antithesis to the 144,000 virgins standing upon the heavenly Mount Zion, whilst the heathen [nations] are still exposed to temptation on the earth (chap. xiv. 8). Further particulars we reserve for our EXEG. AND CRIT. NOTES in loc. Compare Düsterdieck, p. 274 sqq.

It would lead us too far if we should attempt to examine in detail all the human relations touched upon in the Apocalypse, in respect of their symbolical import, and we should also be obliged to repeat many of our explanations further on in this Commentary. Nevertheless, we present the following considerations under the following caption.

g. Human Ordinances, Affairs, and Relations.

The Lord's day [Rev. i. 10]. Sunday as the resurrection-day in the literal sense, and also at the same time as symbolical—the feast-day of the soul.

The trumpet [ch. i. 10]. The signal for the beginning of a new and holy Divine period; of a new Divine work; a new Divine war, judgment, and victory.

The book [i. e., the volume or roll, ch. i. 11]. Divine decrees in a mysterious envelope.

The book of life [ch. xx. 12, 15]. The sum of those whose salvation is assured, being fixed by sealing, and founded upon election, calling, justification, and conservation amid trial and temptation.

The little book [ch. x. 8, 9, 10]. Prophecy relative especially to the end of the world. It is sweet in the mouth, the most delightful mystery, but agonizing in the belly, with its revelation of horrible depths of perdition and judgment.

The seven churches [ch. i. 11, etc.]. Types of the seven ground-forms in which the Church of Christ presents itself in secular and ecclesiastical history. [But, at the same time, literal churches. The view of the author seems first to have been advocated by Vitranga and Sir Isaac Newton.—E. R. C.]

The candlestick [ch. i. 12]. The Church as a light-bearer; like the star, a fountain of light issuing from the Lord, as the Primal Source.

The garment [ch. i. 13]. The festal high-priestly robe in a spiritual sense.

The altar [ch. vi. 9, viii. 3]. The symbol of all believing renunciation and devotion; not, however, in the coldness of indifference, but in the holy glow of a life of prayer.

Nicolaitans [ch. ii. 6, 15] and Balaamites [ver. 14]. The former are a type of all such antinomianism as is inwrapped in spiritual rational forms. Jezebel [ch. ii. 20] denotes the visionary, fanatic forms of antinomianism, whilst the Balaamites are indicative of sensually egoistic forms of the same.

Paradise. The new [ch. ii. 7]. The new world, as a world of new, imperishable fullness of life, reposing upon the consummation of the congregation of human spirits under the influence of the Divine Spirit.

Tree of life [ch. ii. 7, xxii. 2, 14]. Trees of life, of which not only the fruits, but also the leaves are productive of health. The full healing power of nature, freed from all restraint and conjoined with the healing power of Christ and Christian spiritual life; present in distinct organs and forms.

Synagogue of Satan [ch. ii. 9, iii. 9]. A perversion of the elements of revelation to the service of darkness; a perversion based upon theories, and propagandist in character.

The second death [ch. ii. 11, xx. 14]. An unending consciousness of death, that has become an unending form of life. A dying and an inability to die.

The hidden manna [ch. ii. 17]. See John vi. 32; the nourishment of the personal life, through the most intimate and personal vital communion with Christ.

The white stone [ch. ii. 17]. The eschatological justification in the judgment (Matt. xxv.), as a defence against every accusation and a removal of every stain. Christ's confession of His confessor, before His Heavenly Father.

The secret name [ch. ii. 17]. The mystery of a perfected, individually modified personal essence and self-consciousness.

The commission of fornication and the eating of things sacrificed to idols [ch. ii. 14, 20]. Lapse into worldly opinions, customs, society.—Adulterers [ver. 22]. Those laden with the guilt of apostasy. Spiritual renegades on the down-hill road to apostasy.

Cast into a bed [ch. ii. 22]. Sarcastic form of judgment. The vortex of antinomistical essence and perdition, changing from the semblance of Divine bliss to demonic torment.

The depths of Satan [ch. ii. 24]. An ironical designation of the mighty lies, or the apparent depths of knowledge reposing in the principles of Satanic denial.

The rod of iron (Pa. ii.) [ch. ii. 27, xii. 5]. The sceptre of Christ's rule as a sceptre of judgment;—of such judgments as mediately proceed from His work. "I am come to kindle a fire."

Defiled garments; White garments [ch. iii. 4, 5]. Antithesis of a spiritual appearance defiled by carnality (avarice, ambition, sensuality), and such a development of the spiritual mind as has ripened into the adornment of blamelessness before the world and before God.

The open door [ch. iii. 8]. Free spiritual ingress into the world in order to its conversion: a freedom of access mediated by the removal of traditional hindrances, and a Divinely effected susceptibility of souls for the testimony of Christ.

The key of David [ch. iii. 7]. The Potentate over the true communion of the Kingdom of God, having the power of reception and exclusion; in accordance with the typical import of David, as the royal vicar of God in the old Theocracy.

The pillar in the temple of God [ch. iii. 12]. A man in Christ, whose importance is due to the fact that Christ has constituted him an ornament to His house, rather than that He has rested upon him a particle of the Temple's weight.

Behold, I come quickly [ch. iii. 11]. This quickly or soon is ever being more wearisomely protracted, in the judgment of modern exegetes; but it is in reality ever growing sooner, in accordance with the eschatological expectation of a faith that can distinguish between a religious and a chronological date.

The crown [ch. ii. 10, iii. 11]. The glory of victory, liberty, dominion. The Amen [ch. iii. 14]. The personal centre and ultimate goal of all the promises of God and all the true religious hopes of humanity.

Cold, hot [Lange, warm], lukewarm [ch. iii. 15, 16]. Indifferent; living; inwardly inclined to indifference, by a constant wavering betwixt God and the world.

The supper [ch. iii. 20]. The festive solemnization of personal vital communion with Christ and the brethren; as a feast at even, commemorative of the termination of earthly woe, and of an arrival at the eve of heavenly felicity.

The seven seals [ch. v. 1]. The seven dark enigmas of worldly history, unsolvable for the natural human mind; rendered yet more terrible by the number six contained in them, which, to the worldly mind, gives them the appearance of endless woe;* but endued with holiness and healing might by their union in the number seven.

The four riders [ch. vi. 2-8]. Christ as a rider, i. e., as Lord over the world-historical movement corresponsive with Him; the three following riders being His esquires, i. e., absolutely and entirely subservient to the work of Christ.

Golden vials [ch. v. 8]. In form, holy, beauteous measures; made of the gold of purity, faithfulness, and vital freshness.

* [This remark tends to the destruction of all confidence in the symbolical significance of numbers. If it be valid here, it is valid wherever seven occurs, since every seven contains six. On this platform every superior number contains all the symbolic significance of all the numbers inferior to it, which is to reduce the whole matter to an absurdity. These remarks, of course, do not extend to the expressed integers of composite numbers, as 6+1=7.—E. R. C.]

The new song [ch. v. 9, xiv. 8]. As the theocratic wonder, in word and deed, is the specifically new thing under the sun, and as consequently the redemption in Christ, as the New Testament, is the principal new world, so the new song is the celebration of the new world, as the anticipatory celebration of its perfected appearing.

The bow [ch. vi. 2]. Attribute of the first Rider. An agency effectual at a distance; sure, decisive, victorious operation.

The great sword [ch. vi. 4]. Attribute of War.

The balances and measures [ch. vi. 5, 6]. Attributes of Poverty and Death.

Appearance of the kingdom of the dead, or the group of the powers of death [ch. vi. 8]. Attribute of Death.

The souls under the altar [ch. vi. 9]. All martyrdom a sacrificial suffering for the sake of Christ, and an actual prayer for the coming of perfect retribution.

The seal of God [ch. vii. 2]. Positive confirmation and conservation of faithful souls amid the sorrows and temptations of the world; a fact and a consciousness in a unitous heroism.

Dan? The omission of Dan in the enumeration of the Twelve Tribes [ch. vii.]. This is a mysterious circumstance; one, however, which assuredly is not to be explained by placing the Danites in the category of outcasts. It is based rather upon a conventional Israelitish symbolism, being supported by the fact that a great portion of the Tribe of Dan emigrated at an early period. The number twelve, in which no Tribe is missed, shows that deficits in the Kingdom of God are speedily remedied, as was the case when Judas dropped out of the company of Apostles (see Acts i.).

The living fountains of waters (chap. vii. 17). See Ps. xxiii.; here, in the sense of final and perfect thirst-quenching.

The golden censer and the incense [ch. viii. 34]. Spirit and life of prayer.

Wormwood [ch. viii. 11]. Here, the image of a fatal water-miasma. Spiritual water miasms are moral corruptions, infecting reformatory efforts of, and for, the popular life.

The three woes [ch. ix. 12]. Why not seven? They appear as three specifically demonic and Antichristian sufferings, for the trial of the inhabitants of the earth. They are marked by the fifth, sixth, and seventh trumpets (chap. viii. 13).

The key of the pit of the abyss [ch. ix. 1]. The abyss is here hell itself; the pit of the abyss, the channel of such Satanic operations as earth is the subject of* (Matt. xiii. these operations are presented under the figure of tares—evil principles); the fact that the pit was shut is indicative of the preponderance of the holy counter-operations and institutions of the Kingdom of God; the key to the pit denotes the opening of the channel by means of liberty in the abstract, falsely understood,—the administrator of this liberty being an angel of judgment; the ascending smoke is significant of demonic operations which darken the sun of life, the heavenly world, and spread abroad an unheard-of amount of psychical sufferings, hypochondrias, mental and spiritual maladies, despair, and the like.

Worship of devils and idolatry (ch. ix. 20). In a general sense, the cowardly and hypocritical recognition of the power of evil, the homage offered to the geniuses of wickedness—a homage which, from time to time, makes its appearance, whilst it ever assumes mightier proportions—is a worship of the devil, in the broader sense of the term; it very readily unites with the grossest forms of idolatry,—especially figurative idolatry.

The measuring reed [ch. xi. 1]. Temple, altar, and worshippers are measured. The measuring reed of the spiritual life defines the true temple of worship, the true altar of renunciation, the congregation of true offerers of prayer. The outer court, the heathen [Gentiles]: the outside of the Church, false Christians. The golden reed (ch. xxi. 15), the Divine consciousness and heavenly precision in respect to the City of God.

Sackcloth as the garb of the two witnesses [ch. xi. 8]. Penitential robes. Gloomily austere phases of Christianity, in the forms of State and Church.

Power of the two witnesses. For instance, in pronouncing sentence of excommunication and outlawry; in declaring war and proclaiming peace.

* [Remarks on this and many other topics presented in the Introduction are reserved for the Commentary.—E. B. C.]

The great city called Sodom and Egypt [ch. xi. 8]. On the one hand, sensuality carried to a pitch directly contrary to nature; on the other, worship of the dead, asceticism and sorcery; carnality and demonicalness—the one aiding the other, and both forming the sign of the city of destruction.

The wrath of the heathen [nations], and, in contrast, the wrath of God [ch. xi. 18]. The two exercise a reciprocal action. Extreme excitement in the supposed autonomy of the heathenized nations, and extreme tension in the autonomy of God—the two in reciprocal agitation.

Worship of the dragon [ch. xiii. 4]. Similar to the worship of the devil. Cowardly homage offered to the illusive power and glory of Evil.

The tabernacle of God [ch. xiii. 6]. The communion of true believers. The Church in her inwardness and simplicity. See Acts xv. 15, 16; Amos ix. 11, 12.

Victory of the beast over the olive-trees [ch. xi. 7]. The apparent victory of Evil, gradually issuing in the victory of Good. And that above all, in the history of the crucifixion of Christ. The history of the crucifixion is the history of the cross. The eschatological fundamental law, chap. xiii. 10: If the Church take upon herself to wield the arms of the State, she must expect to have those arms turned against herself.

The image of the beast [ch. xiii. 14, 15]. The worship paid to the images of the Roman emperors may serve as an analogue for the worship of the ideals current in the world; for the glorifications and feasts in honor of Antichrist and Antichristianity. The mark of the beast in the forehead and hand, as the Antichristian mark of citizenship (vers. 16, 17). The heathen custom of branding slaves may furnish the analogous idea; the true mark of the beast, however, is doubtless a spiritual signature; the mark on the brow denoting perfect shamelessness, and that on the hand perfect wrong-doing.

666. Six times and sixty times and six hundred times [ch. xiii. 18]. Constant recurrence of the number six; hence the number of aimless work, of infinitely vain exertion and lost toil, which things are to reach their climax in the Man of Sin.

144,000 [ch. vii. 4, xiv. 1]. Twelve times twelve, or the number of the elect in all spiritual tribes or churches, multiplied by 1000 as the number of the son of the whole Christian time-reckoning.

The voice [ch. xiv. 2]. The loud expression of a heavenly certitude. The art of singing the new song, ver. 4: the clear expression of heavenly bliss, an inimitable Divine art.

The virgins [ch. xiv. 4, 5]. It is evident from the context that they are chiefly characterized by integrity, purity, and truth.

The everlasting Gospel [ch. xiv. 6]. The Gospel in its first form extends from the first Parousia to the second; the everlasting Gospel extends from the second Parousia into endless æons. It is the Gospel of the final redemption through the final judgment.

The consummation of Babylon, the fall of Babylon [ch. xviii. etc.]. A royal law of the moral world. See Is. xiv. Jerusalem itself passed through a period of apparent bloom just prior to its destruction. The reign of Agrippa II.; the synagogues scattered everywhere; the proselytes and proselyte colonies; an apparently flourishing culture, and a national pride morbid in its excess.

The wine of wrath of fornication [ch. xviii. 8]. The wine of wrath, the judgment of God in the midst of the intoxication of fanaticism; the wine of the wrath of fornication, drunken exhilaration in the intoxication of apostasy.

The cup of His indignation [ch. xiv. 10, 11]. Lofty irony! Here expressive not so much of the Divine measure as of the visibility of this judicial dispensation.

The sickle [ch. xiv.] The instrument of judgment. The catastrophe which suddenly cuts short the old course of things.

The harvest [ch. xiv. 15]. The fully matured judgment. [The harvest is properly the ripened crop—the peoples matured for judgment.—E. R. C.].

The wine-press [ch. xiv. 19, 20]. The crushing disaster accompanying the judgment and pressing from all crimes all their consequences; the process being at first attended, for the most part, with healing results (Is. lxiii. 3), but at the end being principally damning in its character.

The bridles of the horses [ch. xiv. 20]. If the blood of the slain reaches to the bridles of the horses, it brings the horses, the organs of motion in the history of the world, to a standstill; the course of time is arrested. The space filled by the judgment is designated by the 1600 furlongs or stadia—that measurement being the length of Palestine, which symbolizes the whole world.

The song of Moses, and the song of the Lamb (ch. xv. 8). In the light of the New Testament, the Old Testament becomes new, and the Law becomes another form of the Gospel.

The temple of the tabernacle of the testimony (ch. xv. 5). The inner and lofty primal region of the glory of God, and of His legislation.

The seven golden vials [ch. xv. 7]. As wrath is the lofty synthesis of righteousness and love, so the judgments of wrath are highly consecrate in respect of their sacred measures and their awful contents.

The Euphrates. The boundary line between the civilized and the barbarous world of antiquity; on this side, Babylon (ch. ix. 14), on that side, the kings of the barbarian world (ch. xvi. 12). Armageddon (Zech. xii. 11, xiv. 4; Joel iii. 2, 12). Is there a reference to 2 Kings xxiii. 29, or Judges v. 19? See EXEG. NOTES. At all events, it is the place of the incipient judgment upon Antichristianity.

The golden cup in the hand of the woman [ch. xvii. 4]. Seduction in the guise of conversion to the truly holy. The mother of harlots and abominations. Not merely a harlot, but also a procuress in a spiritual sense.

The drunken woman [ch. xvii. 6]. The complete intoxication of consummate fanaticism.

The seven mountains and the seven kings [ch. xvii. 9, 10]. Seven forms of worldly civilization and worldly powers represented by the City of the Seven Hills.

The beast itself as the eighth king [ch. xvii. 11]. The beast, which is said to be of the seven kings, becomes itself the eighth king, through its intervals of existence. The heathen Antichristian world-power revives again in a Christian world-power.

The going forth out of Babylon [ch. xviii.]. As the Christians went forth from Jerusalem when her judgment began. For the judgment is half immanent,—the intoxication of wrath.

The triumphal song and the lamentation [ch. xix. 1–7, xviii. 17–19]. The judgment in respect to its two sides; their reflection in the Kingdom of light and the kingdom of darkness.

The sea-farers [ch. xviii. 17]. See above.

The merchants [ch. xviii. 11]. See above.

The millstone [ch. xviii. 21]. It is cast into the sea of the life of the nations, and now begins a storm that comes as a judgment upon the beast. The smoke (ver. 18), the dark and gloomy phenomena of judgment.

Amen; Hallelujah [ch. xix. 4]. Both real. God's prophecy, word and work sealed, and the eternal praise of God grounded thereon.

The Marriage of the Lamb [ch. xix. 7]. Those called to the Marriage [ver. 9]. See Matt. xxv. 1 sqq.

The Woman, the Bride [ch. xix. 7]. The perfected Church.

Her adornment [ver. 8]. The glorious appearance of her inner life.

The testimony of Jesus. Ch. xix. 10; Matt. x. 32; Luke xii. 8; Matt. xxv.

The name of Christ, His secret (ch. xix. 16; comp. ch. ii. 17; Matt. xi. 27).

The vesture of the Prince of victory (ch. xix. 13). His blood is, in the first place, the color of His personal, priestly righteousness.

The sword and the rod (ch. xix. 15). Justice and government.

The fowls (ch. xix. 17). Where the carrion is, etc.

The thousand years [ch. xx. 2–7]. See above.

The first resurrection (ch. xx. 4–6). The vernal bloom of the new spiritual humanity in its elect ones; the foretoken of the general resurrection. Excommunication and reception of the Gentiles [ch. xxi. 26, 27]. A complete antithesis of dynamical operations of repulsion and attraction. [See Add. NOTE on the FIRST RESURRECTION in the Comment on ch. xx., pp. 352 sqq.—E. R. C.]

h. Terrestri-cosmical.

The antithesis of Heaven and earth appears throughout this Book in all its significance—a significance intimated as far back as Gen. i. 1; the region of the perfection of heavenly being extending over the region of becoming. Hence, throughout the Apocalypse, the heavenly triumphal feasts precede the conflicts of earth. When finally, however, the true Heaven in Heaven, the City of God, descends upon the earth, it is a sign that earth itself has been perfected into a centre of Heaven,—a centre of Christ's presence, of God's glory, of the perfected Church (ch. xx., xxi.).

Connected with the earth and its cosmical position are the notations of time. The half-hour, the smallest measure of time [in the Apocalypse],—a pause replete with expectation; a moment of extremest tension. The hour, a great and unique period of decision (Luke xxii. 63); see the last hour, 1 John ii. 18. The day, symbol of day's work in its movement towards the end of the world, that great evening when labor is done. The 1260 days, the great period of the Church as a regulated course of things, arranged in days' works which are preparatory to the end of the world. Three days and a half, the fractional week; the overpast time of resurrection and hope; the time of extreme despondency. Amongst the diurnal seasons, morning and evening are especially significant. Morning as the cheerful dawn of a new period; evening as a symbol of the end of the world (Ps. xxx. 5; Zech. xiv. 7). Night, as a symbol of darkness and misfortune (Is. ix. 2, xxi. 11), is possessed of peculiar grandeur and solemnity at midnight; just at this awful climax, however, its higher import unfolds. Night—the time of secrecy (the darkness in the Holy of Holies); of conception and birth (Job iii.); of meditation (Ps. i. 2)—has been consecrated as a period of salvation, both by the first coming of Christ and by the expectation of His second Advent; and the effulgence in the time of the consummation of all things is pictured as a higher union of day and night (Rev. xxi. 23. See below). If, however, the night be divided into night-watches, the conflict of the day is transferred, with increased hotness, to the night. The week: the little periodical alternation of seasons of darkness and light. The 70 weeks, seven times seven such revolutions of light and darkness to the consummation of the Messianic Kingdom. Thence, 62 weeks to the death of Christ (Dan. ix. 26), the Apostolic age, with the destruction of Jerusalem in the midst of the week (ver. 27). Finally, 7 weeks, until the Messiah appears as King in His glory; the New Testament time (ver. 25). The month, or the greater periodical revolution of time, as alternating seasons of light and darkness (42 months=1260 days). The year, the greatest symbol of the revolution of time, as an alternation betwixt diverse periods of conflict between light and darkness; therefore the period of history,—a great day's work of God. A thousand years, a complete æon; used especially to denote a transition-period culminating in the appearing of the æon of consummation at the second Parousia of Christ. The indefinite form—three times and a half (Rev. xii. 14)—is an involved [mathematical] term for the obscure form, three days and a half. Amongst the seasons of the year the symbol of autumn is particularly intelligible (Rev. xiv. 15). The symbolism of spring finds its most beautiful expression in the Song of Solomon, ch. ii. 11–13. As summer appears in connection with autumn, so winter is found in connection with spring. In regard to the change of day and night, we have already touched upon an antithesis which should not be overlooked; viz., that in the City of God of the new earth, the contrast of day and night is removed (ch. xxi. 25; xxii. 5—the region of eternal sunshine), whilst the damned are assigned to a region of change and of becoming,—a region where the contrast of day and night continues, where they are tormented day and night from æon to æon [ch. xiv. 11]. Not only does the change of day and night continue, therefore, but there is likewise a succession of different æons.

In respect to the earth's space-relations, the most prominent antithesis is that of land and water, earth and sea. Earth symbolizes life in its theocratic, ecclesiastic, or political organization (Pss. xciii. 1, xcvi. 10; Rev. xiii.). The sea, on the other hand, symbolizes the billowy life of peoples (Pss. lxxv. 7, lxxxix. 9, xciii. 3, 4; Dan. vii.; Rev. xiii.). Accordingly, the earthquake is a shaking of all ancient authorities and regulations (1 Kings xix.

11, 12; Matt. xxviii. 2). The stormy flood of ocean, on the other hand, is a vehement agitation of national life—an onslaught, frequently, against the holy mountains, or the holy mountain of God (Pss. xv. 1, lxx. 7; Is. ii.). The second power [mathematical] of earth is the mountain,—high and highly consecrate order. The third power is the rock,—the Divine will, purport, Spirit, and design pervading the history of the world; everything striking against this rock is dashed in pieces (Deut. xxxii. 31, 37; Ps. xviii. 2; Is. viii. 14; Matt. xvi. 18. See above).

Christ's Kingdom is most significantly compared to a stone which detaches itself from a mountain—that is, the old Theocracy.

The import of the sea also is multiplied to a second and third power in the abyss, and the pit of the abyss; in the complete unchaining of all national life and its connection with all demonic influences of hell. In the consummation, however, the sea of the unfreely flowing national life is to vanish from earth (Rev. xxi. 1), to form, in its precipitation, the pool of fire,—absolute stagnation in the form of passionate fermentation and commotion. The clear proceeds of land and sea, meantime, form the heavenly sea of crystal, wherein the infinite fullness, freshness, and movement of life are joined with infinite moral firmness and solidity, and ideal transparency and clearness.

Diminutive forms of the earth are, especially, islands; the remote islands of secluded branches of peoples (Ezek. xxvii. 3, et al.; Rev. xvi. 20).

Diminutive forms of the sea are rivers, or spiritual currents (spirits of the times, Is. viii. 6); and springs, or spiritual sources, creative personalities (Ps. xli. 4,* and other passages).

Individual Images.

The four corners of the earth [Rev. vii. 1, xx. 8]. Indicative of the uttermost ends of the earthly world; last and highest power [mathematical] of spiritual heathenism in antithesis to the Christian οικουμένη of the Millennial Kingdom. In connection with this, we have the term—

Gog and Magog [ch. xx. 8]. Symbolical designation of the Eastern barbarians as the last enemies of the Kingdom of God. See Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix.

The mountain that fell, burning, into the sea [ch. viii. 8]. An old order of things which, blazing up in fanaticism, plunges into the service of absolute democracy. Poisoning of the popular life.

The third part of the waters become wormwood by means of the star "Wormwood." The embitterment of a great spirit results in the embitterment of many rivers, or currents of the age, issuing from many fountains, or original spirits or minds.

i. Siderial.

As Heaven in general is used as a symbol, in contrast to the symbolical import of earth (see Terrestri-cosmical, Rev. xii.), so the heavenly luminaries and signs, in particular, are exalted symbols.

Such is, above all, the sun. Considered by itself alone, it denotes the spiritual centre of the Cosmos, the revelation of God upon the earth; finally, the appearing of Christ (Mal. iv. 2; Rev. x. 1).

As the companion of the sun, shining with its reflected lustre, the moon may, on the one hand, denote the Church; as a symbol of change, however, and as a counterpart of the sun, it appears not to have been employed very extensively in this sense. The stars, considered apart, denote exalted spirit-forms, originally heavenly beings (Is. xiv. 12; Rev. i. 20).

In connection with the moon and stars, the sun appears (Rev. xii. 1) as the symbol of the Christian Cosmos, a local centre of the entire Cosmos; at times it also, in this connection, symbolically represents the entire Cosmos.

* [We have to note a variation in translation here; the German Version reads thus: Nevertheless, the City of God, where the holy dwelling-places of the Most High are, shall still be joyful with her springs.—Ta.]

The dawn is a very obvious symbol for the rising of light (Is. lviii. 8); such likewise is the morning-star, the herald of the coming sun: they both particularly symbolize the rising of the Sun of righteousness within the heart (2 Pet. i. 19). Christ Himself, in His first Parousia, is related to His second Parousia as the Morning-star to the Sun and the great Day of Eternity.

All extraordinary signs in the Heavens are symbolical tokens that, with the spiritual development of mankind in the Church of Christ, a development continuing to the end of the world, there corresponds a cosmical development in the sphere of the world, so that these signs are to be regarded as signals on the heavenly heights telling of spiritual events of which earth is the scene (comp. Matt. xxiv. 29; Luke xxi. 25; Heb. xii. 26; Rev. vi. 12. The author's Leben Jesu, Vol. II., Part iii., p. 1276).

Special Items.

The sun black, the moon like blood, the stars falling, etc. (ch. vi. 12 sqq.). Cosmical import: metamorphosis of the old solar planetary system.

A burning star falls from Heaven upon the rivers and fountains [ch. viii. 10]. An apostasy in the spirit-world, having earth for its goal, and poisoning the third part of the mental and spiritual tendencies and original minds (like the burning mountain that falls into the sea, an authority that apostatizes from itself to the popular life).

The tail of Satan casts the third part of the stars of Heaven upon the earth [ch. xii. 4]. Great apostasy in the Kingdom of God, the spiritual Heaven. Transfiguration of spiritual powers into earthly pseudo-political forms.

Signs of the false prophet [ch. xiii. 13]. Illusive wonders. Magical miracles.* The two greatest signs: [1] He makes fire fall from Heaven in the sight of men; according to human judgment. False imitation of Elijah; misuse of the great ban.—[2] He gives a spirit to the image of the beast so that it speaks. The ideal of the beast, a demonic, forced and falsified caricature of public opinion.

The fire from God out of Heaven, which devours the Satanic host of Gog and Magog [ch. xx. 9]. The cosmical fiery metamorphosis of the earth at the end of the world, 2 Pet. iii. 10.

The new Heaven and the new earth [ch. xxi. 1]. The cosmical union of the two spheres of spirit—the one existing in this world, the other in the world beyond—as the appearance of the new and eternal city of God.

k. Sub-terrestrial Demonic Figures.

Hades (Sheol), the realm of the dead (ch. vi. 8), must be regarded as entirely distinct from the pool of fire, Gehenna, hell (ch. xix. 20, xx. 14, 15). The abyss (ch. ix. 2) seems to denote a transition-form. As Hades and the pool of fire are used symbolically, the former denoting the power of the realm of the dead even upon earth, and the latter signifying not merely the sphere of the damned, but also the manner of their spiritual existence—extreme turbulence of passion in the midst of extreme stagnation—so the abyss, likewise, has a symbolical import. It seems to denote the original region of psychico-demonic moods (ch. ix. 5); according to this, Abaddon or Apollyon should be regarded as the personification of God-deserted demonic melancholy and insanity.† The influences issuing from the abyss are, however, less pernicious than the pneumatico demonic corruptions which come from the Euphrates,—that is, from Babylon.

* [Do not the words of our Lord, Matt. xxiv. 24, and those of Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 9, imply that the miracles are to be real? The terms employed on both these occasions (σημεία and τέρατα) are those used to indicate the miracles of our Lord Himself. The phrase τέρατα ψευδούς (miracles of falsehood) of 2 Thess. ii. 9, does not necessarily mean aught else than miracles to confirm the "lie" (ψεύδος) which (verse 11) the Apostle declares that those who are deluded shall believe; and this seems to be its most natural interpretation. There can be little doubt that the signs and wonders (σημεία and τέρατα—LXX.) of which Jehovah warned His people, Deut. xiii. 1-3, were real miracles, which God would empower false prophets to work for the purpose of proving Israel.—E. R. C.]

A synagogue of Satan is spoken of in the epistle to Smyrna (ch. ii. 9), and in the epistle to Philadelphia (ch. iii. 9); a throne of Satan is mentioned in the epistle to Pergamus (ch. ii. 13); and we meet with the term "depths of Satan," i. e., pretended depths, ironically so-called, in the epistle to Thyatira (ch. ii. 24). Satan himself appears (ch. xii.) as a great red (blood-colored) dragon (a union of serpent and swine). He has seven heads,—as if he were engaged in a spiritual work, holding forth the promise of a Sabbath—but ten horns of worldly power; he is thus characterized as a monster, yet nevertheless adorns himself with seven crowns,—in the semblance of holiness. His tail drags the third part of the stars from Heaven, i. e., not by intelligence, but by a wild vivacity, by his apparent power, he drags a multitude of spirits away with him,—not only in the angelic, but also in the human world; the latter is what is particularly meant here. For Heaven denotes also that Heaven on earth that consists of pure spiritual life, the centre of the Kingdom of God, the inner congregation of God. From Heaven to the earth, i. e., a symbolical third part of human congregations, or individual churches, make use of the old established order of things (the earth) in the service of Satan. It is the intention of Satan to devour the holy child; not only is the child, however, personally rescued by being caught up to Heaven, but the universal Christ, also, of the inner congregation of faith, continues to find refuge in Heaven (our citizenship is in Heaven [Phil. iii. 20]), and from this Heaven of the pure spiritual Church, Satan is cast out by Michael and his angels (by the sovereign rule and authority of Christ and the operations of His Spirit). The woman finds refuge in the wilderness, in the unapproachableness of holy theocratic (not hierarchic) asceticism and renunciation; Satan's attempt upon her life is defeated by the earth; this, as the mighty spiritual and secular order of things, obtains the mastery over the floods of peoples with which Satan sought to overwhelm the Church. Thus, Satan's rage is powerless to reach either Christ or the essential Church; he, therefore, turns his efforts against Christians, as individuals (ch. xii. 17).

1. Sub-terrestrial and Terrestrial Demonic Forms.

In connection with the plenitude of heavenly, angelic appearances contained in the Apocalypse, the scantiness of its symbolism in reference to the demon-realm is very remarkable. In this point also it agrees perfectly with the Gospel of John, from which the healings of demoniacs are omitted. An explanation of both circumstances may probably be found in the fact that for John demonic beings retreated into the back-ground, leaving the more conspicuous place to demonic operations.

This very peculiarity lends additional distinctness to Satan, the principal demonic figure; to Antichrist, as his mature and world-historical organ in humanity,—the Bold or Wicked One, we may call him simply; and, as the organ of apostasy in the old religious moral world, to the false Prophet, whom we will call the Vile or Base One.

The human earth is under the influence of another cosmical region which has been the scene of a fall. The centre of this fall—a fall of spirits—is Satan, a fallen angel-prince; a non plus ultra, not of heavenly genius, but of talents originally worldly and still further secularized. The medium of demonic influence consists, not in magical operations, but in sympathetic, pseudo-spiritual operations; signals of false, pretended liberty. The bestial symbol of Satan is the dragon, as the union of serpent and swine.

Antichrist is the last and most perfect of the many Antichrists. He is neither the embodiment of evil (Daub, Judas Iscariot), nor a genius of evil, but man, deformed, through apostasy, into the most perfect organ of demonic worldliness in the working of mighty lies. His origin is the life of the nations demonically unchained—the sea (Rev. xiii.; Dan. vii.).

The false Prophet is the finished birth of worldliness in the secularized old theocratic, or rather hierarchico-political, order of things; he proceeds out of the earth. His tendency is to secure from Antichrist as large a share as possible of that universal dominion which is apparently devolving upon him; if possible, to trick him out of his booty; at all events to bear off a considerable portion of it out of the ruin of the old relations of things, by means of hypocritical homage to Antichrist, and by advancing his principles. The instrument which he makes use of for the furtherance of his ends is the false miracle, supported entirely by moral jugglery. His character, consequently, is that of true villainy, the type of which was Judas, who also thought to secure booty from ruin. His end is the pool of fire.

The insignia of Antichrist, or the demonic Beast, are similar to the insignia of the Devil himself. He, however, makes an open show of his insolence, and wears ten crowns instead of seven. He has also, in boldest despotism, set his crowns upon his horns. The diverse Danielic world-monarchies are united in him—the Leopard, the Bear, the Lion, hence, too, the fourth form, the monster (Dan. vii. 4–6). His apparent triumph is promoted by three things: first, by the healing of his deadly wound; secondly, by the boldness of his blasphemies (Rev. xiii. 5, 6); finally, by the accession of the great renegade, the false Prophet, the Beast of the earth, in whom the real spirit of the earth—i. e., of the old traditional order of things—accomplishes its apostasy. Yes, the Beast of the earth seduces “the earth” itself into worshipping Antichrist. The outward appearance of this Beast of the earth is characteristic; it is the form of the consummate hypocrite. He has two horns like a lamb [the Lamb?], but he speaks like a dragon [the Dragon?]. The wonders which he does, however, consist in jugglery; for only in a lying, magical way can he cause fire to fall from Heaven, and make the image of the Beast speak. His last and mightiest operation he effects by means of the ban of the mark. He completes the Antichristianity of the first Beast, as Judas completed the Antichristianity of the Jews.

m. Heavenly forms.

Heaven itself. In the concrete conception of the term, Heaven is the region of the absolute manifestation of God in the glory of Christ (ch. iv. 1 sqq.); in the spiritual acceptance, it is the region of the heavenly spirit-life, ideal Christianity (ch. xii. 7). Michael and his angels, i. e., the sovereign rule of Christ in His organs, vanquishes Satan and his angels within the ideal Church (inward and outward foes). The consequence is, however, that Satan is cast upon the earth, i. e., upon the earthly Churchly-political order of things.

Jehovah. God reveals Himself in the Apocalypse first as Jehovah; that is, as He Who is, Who was, and Who cometh (Rev. i. 4); this is in entire conformity to the believing expectation that His last manifestation will be in perfect unison with the Old and New Testament manifestations of Him. His manifestation is seven-fold in the Seven Spirits (see Isaiah xi. 2) that, as individual forms of the life of Christ, are all concentrated in the fullness of the Spirit resting upon the Son (ch. i.). This position of the Seven Spirits is likewise in accordance with the expectation of the perfect manifestation of Christ in seven forms throughout the ages. Then Jehovah appears as the All-Ruler upon the heavenly throne, and the glory of His throne and government is depicted anew, in symbolic traits. His appearance is described (ch. iv. 3); His heavenly Presbytery, the four and twenty elders (ver. 4); His manifestation or revelation (ver. 5); the celestially pure character and the operation of His government (the sea of glass) and the four fundamental forms of His government, the four beasts or living shapes (vers. 6–8). These glorify Him in the first place, for they are the fundamental forms of His government itself (ch. viii. 9). This actual glorification is reflected in the contemplation and praise of the elect heavenly spirits (vers. 9, 10). In His hand is the sealed book with the enigmas of the world's history (ch. v. 1). Furthermore, He appears as He that sitteth upon the throne, i. e., the absolute Governor (ch. vi. 16). The prayers of the saints come before God (ch. viii. 4). Even the Angel who wears the features of Christ, swears by Him as the One who liveth from eternity to eternity, the Creator (ch. x. 6). He is in particular the God of the earth (ch. xi. 4), whose spirit of life re-animates the slain and faithful witnesses (ver. 11), proving Himself, by His raising of them, to be the God of Heaven, the Almighty One (ver. 17). His, also, is the Kingdom wherein the power of Christ rules (ch. xii. 10). He is the Father of Christ (ch. xiv. 1). He is, Himself, primarily the Alpha and Omega, the absolute Cause and the absolute End of all things; and He is the living unity of this antithesis as Jehovah, Who is, Who was, and Who cometh (ch. i. 8; comp. xxi. 6). But in union with Him, Christ also is Alpha and Omega, ch. xxii. 13 (i. 11).

In yet another passage [besides ch. x. 6] God the Judge is declared to be also the Creator.

Thus the Apocalypse, like the Gospel and Epistles of John, opposes the germs of Gnosticism (ch. xiv. 7). Hence, also, the Song of Moses and the Song of the Lamb accord in His praise [ch. xv. 3, 4]. His glory fills the heavenly Temple (ch. xv. 8). The last plagues are vials of His wrath [ch. xv. 1, 6, 7, xvi.]; and He it is Whose name men blaspheme on account of these plagues. He exercises absolute sovereignty over the world; He is ruler, therefore, even over evil, in that He turns it into judgment (ch. ix. 5, 14, xiii. 5, 15, xv. [xvi.], the judgment of impenitence, ch. xvii. 17). The rich doxologies of the Apocalypse are for the most part addressed to God, ch. iv. 8, 11 (comp. ch. v. 13, where the doxology of God is joined with that of the Lamb, the former, however, being placed first, ch. vii. 12, xi. 16, 17, xii. 10, xix. 1, 6); worship is likewise addressed to God. His is the Kingdom (ch. xix. 6); He executes the final judgment (ch. xx. 9, 12); from Him the new Jerusalem descends out of Heaven upon the earth and becomes the tabernacle of God, the Most Holy Place of His dwelling on earth itself (ch. xxi. 2, 3); He is the Beatifier (ver. 4). The relation betwixt God and the Lamb comes out distinctly in ch. xxi. 23, where it is declared that the glory of God lightens the City of God, and the Lamb is the light thereof; i. e., Christ the visible image, the perceptible manifestation of God (see ch. xxii. 3, 5). As the God of the spirits of the Prophets, God is likewise the primal source of the Apocalypse itself (ver. 6).

Christ is adorned with all the features of the glorified God-manhood. The revelation of God is also the revelation of Christ. Grace proceeds from Him, as from Jehovah. His titles and traits combine His heavenly glory with His earthly work of redemption and salvation; chs. i. 5, 6, 11-18; v. 6-14; vi. 2; vii. 17; xi. 15; xii. 10; xiv. 1, 2, 14; xix. 11, 16; xxi. 23, xxii. 3. The motive of His glorification is everywhere His great work of redemption. This thought runs through the entire Book as its fundamental idea. He is the Lamb that was slain (ch. v. 6, 12); as Prophet, He is the Amen, the faithful Martyr (ch. iii. 14); as High-priest, He is the Atoner (ch. i. 5, vii. 14); as King, the Liberator or Redeemer (ch. v. 9), the Prince of the kings of the earth (ch. i. 5), the dynamical Prince of the world's history (ch. vi. 1); in the end appearing victoriously as such,—a King of kings and Lord of lords, Who has made His people a Kingdom of priests (ch. i. 6, v. 10, xix. 16); the most mysterious of all personalities (ch. xix. 12); in respect of His essential relation to the Father, the Logos of God (ch. xix. 13); in respect of His human nature, the Root of the race of David and the Morning-star of mankind (ch. xxii. 16).

The Holy Ghost is here glorified in concrete conceptions in the Seven Spirits; in the Spirit that takes possession of the spirit of the Prophet, becoming therein the spring of all visions (ch. i. 10, iv. 1, 2); He is also glorified as the principle of the certitude of eternal salvation and blessedness (ch. xiv. 13); and as the principle of the Church's longing for the Coming of her Lord (ch. xxii. 17). In accordance with the symbolical style of the Book, He also, like Christ Himself, several times appears in angelic form.

God's seat or throne, in its symbolical significance, requires no explanation. Since the Presbytery of Israel, like that of the Apostolic Church, consists of twelve persons, the twenty-four elders form a double Presbytery. This double Presbytery may, doubtless, be regarded as symbolically expressive of the choicest spirits, selected, on the one hand, from the human world, and, on the other, from the angelic world, and represented by the Patriarchs of Israel and the Twelve Apostles. We have elsewhere designated the four living shapes or beasts as fundamental forms of the Divine government.* Each of these Cherubim has six wings,—symbols of agitated, infinitely lively omnipresence. Each is covered with eyes, within and without,—symbols of omniscience and wisdom. They rest not day and night; they are ever conscious, moving, active, like the absolute rule of Divine Intelligence,—glorifying God continually as the Holy One and Jehovah.

Here, in the solemn company that surround the Almighty, angels are not immediately mentioned; in the progress of the action, however, they are brought in (ch. v. 11), and they appear throughout the Book as the media of God's government. For the designation of personal angelic essences is connected with the idea that all manifestations and providences of God are, in a symbolical sense, angels. It is a mysterious circumstance that the principal angel of the Revelation, the Angel of Jesus Christ (ch. i. 1), likewise declares himself to be a personal angel (ch. xix. 10, xxii. 9). The prominence of angelic apparitions—in which Lücke pretends to discover a discrepancy between the Johannean Gospel and the Apocalypse—is primarily explained by the fact that we have here to do with an epoch of revelation, and that the final epoch, in which, as even the Gospels affirm, Christ is to appear in company with His angels [Matt. xxv. 31; Mark viii. 38. See Comm. on John, Am. Ed., p. 611.—Tr.]. The symbolical character of the Book must also be taken into account; in accordance with this, the spirits (heads?*) of the churches are called angels (ch. ii. and iii.). With the book of the seven seals, a strong angel makes his appearance, proclaiming the difficult problem of its unsealing (ch. v. 2). And now countless hosts of angels come forward, praising the Lamb (ver. 11). The four angels who hold the four winds of the earth (ch. vii. 1) are, we believe, symbols of the spiritual powers that hold the spirits of mankind in check; above them is set the Angel of Sealing, who, in accordance with the analogy of Scripture, is a symbol of the Spirit of God (ver. 2). He also is followed by a host of angels praising God (vers. 11, 12). Now the vision passes on to seven distinct angels who stand before God,—the angels of the trumpets—summonses to repentance, embodied in actual events (ch. viii. 2). Even these appear to be dependent upon the Angel who has in charge the prayers of the saints. Here again, doubtless, we have a symbol of the Holy Ghost, Who, awhile ago, was represented by the Angel of the Sealing. An antithesis to the angels holding the four winds (ch. vii. 1) is formed by the four angels bound by the Euphrates, gloomy and mysterious forms which are identified with the judgment of the horsemen themselves (ch. ix. 15). That which constitutes them angels is not the character of personality, but the character of a Divine mission or the unity of four missions—corresponding to the whole world—of divine probational judgments. The absolute sovereignty of God over demonic darkness makes even Abaddon-Apollyon an angel of the abyss (ch. ix. 11).

Since the Parousia of Christ cannot yet be referred to in ch. x. 1, the mighty angel described there as bearing a complete resemblance to the image of Christ, is also, doubtless, a symbol of the Spirit of God. The Spirit of Sealing, the Spirit who represents the saints, by offering all their prayers before God, is also the Spirit of Prophecy concerning the approaching Coming of Christ. The Spirit of God has the little book of the eschatological Gospel in His hand. He over-rules the earth and the sea—stable order and the surging life of the nations. His voice is as the voice of a lion. Moved by Him, the seven thunders utter their voices; these thunders represent the entire course of reformations and missions in the Christian Church; a full revelation concerning these is withheld, because such revelation would encroach upon the free-agency of man. It is likewise the prerogative of the Spirit of God to swear, i. e., to give certainty to the spirit of man. He is the author of New Testament prophecy (ver. 11). He distinguishes between the Temple of true worshippers and the outer court of the Church, which the Gentiles tread under foot (ch. xi. 1, 2). He it is Who causes the two olive-trees to be olive-trees, for oil is a symbol of the Spirit. That Michael, with his angels, in conflict with the Dragon and his angels, is indicative of the Spirit of Christ in His authoritative government, is to us an indisputable fact. The eagle flying through Heaven (ch. [viii. 13] xiv. 6) should likewise be noticed here as the angel of Apocalyptic Revelation to John himself, whose attribute the eagle has become. He flies through the midst of Heaven with his eschatological message, for this revelation flies through the whole sphere of the Christian spirit.

The Angel of Prophecy is succeeded by the Angel of the Church Triumphant (ver. 8); he is followed by the Angel of Judgment (vers. 9–11). The relation and conduct of the angels mentioned (ch. xiv. 14–20) is very mysterious. The form like unto the Son of Man, sitting upon the cloud and bearing the harvest-sickle, i. e., commissioned to cut short the course of the world in order to judgment, is unmistakably Christ. The other angel, charged with the mandate to Christ, will then denote the message of the Father, Who hath reserved the time and the hour to Himself (ver. 15). Over against the specific harvest of Christ there is, however, also another harvest of condemnatory judgment. Accordingly, the fire-angel of the cosmical government of God, the angel who is [ideally] one with the altar of the universal sacrifice of the world in its old form (ver. 18) commands the angel who, in fellowship with Christ, executes the final judgment upon the earth, to thrust in his sickle also for the judgment of wrath. This latter angel with the sickle issues from the Temple (ver. 17); he appears further on (ch. xv. 6) to branch into the seven angels who dispense the vials of wrath. It is a very significant fact that these angels of judgment receive their vials from one of the four beasts [living-beings (ch. xv. 7)]; according to this, this individual life-form of Divine government intervenes between them and God. That the judgments executed are not blind events is shown by one of the seven angels, who acts as interpreter of these judgments (ch. xvii. 1, 7). This, therefore, is the Angel of Prophecy (ch. xiv. 15). Distinct from him is the Angel of Judgment itself (ch. xviii. 1 sqq.; comp. ch. xiv. 17). Somewhat obscurely the Prophecy goes back to the Angel of the Apocalypse in general (ch. xix. 9); again, however, we find the Angel of Prophecy (ch. xiv. 15, xvii. 1, 7), whilst after him the Angel of Judgment again appears (ch. xix. 17; comp. xviii. 1). His standing in the sun probably denotes the cosmical nature of the final judgment which he announces. The blessing of the renewal of the world attends upon the angel who shuts Satan up in the abyss (ch. xx. 1, 2). This angel has the same key that Christ has (ch. i. 18—not to be confounded with ch. ix. 1). Subsequent to the consummation, as the union betwixt heaven and earth, we hear no more of angels until finally at the close, the Angel of the Revelation of Christ is again mentioned (ch. xxii. 8, [xxi. 9?]).

* The Epistles are a component part of the Apocalypse itself, and not merely preparatory thereto. Hence their terminology, likewise, is symbolical—a fact unrecognized by Irvingism. It is not supposable that the heads of the churches should bear a relation to the churches, like that of stars to candle-sticks.

Angels alternate in a remarkable manner with heavenly voices. It is in accordance with the high ecstatic condition of the Prophet that the wonders of vision should be conjoined with wonders of hearing (ch. v. 2, 11, vi. 7, 10, viii. 13, x. 3, xiv. 6, 7, 9, 15, xviii. 2, xix. 17), or should alternate with them. The characterization of the heavenly voices is likewise significant. The first voice—and this is usual—introduces the vision. "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet." The same voice further on resembles the sound of many waters (ch. i. 15). Again it is like a trumpet (ch. iv. 1). From the throne of God proceed lightnings and voices and thunders (ch. iv. 5),—holy revelations which become voices, voices which become thunders. A voice out of the midst of the four beasts (ch. vi. 6) causes the famine to appear as an infliction of specially conscious Divine dispensation. The prayers of the saints, having ascended to heaven, re-tract upon the earth in voices and thunders, in lightnings and earthquakes (ch. viii. 5). Here preachings, words of thunder, precede the lightnings of new illumination and the shocks of mighty changes. A voice from the four horns of the altar (ch. ix. 13) directs, in conformity to this its origin, the immolation of a third part of mankind through the medium of a penal judgment (comp. ch. xvi. 7). It is in consequence of a heavenly voice that the Prophet eats the mysterious little book; the Holy Ghost quickens the word (ch. x. 8). A great voice from Heaven summons the two risen witnesses up to Heaven; a new and great revelation requires a new heavenly condition of State and Church in the form of the perfected Kingdom (ch. xi. 11, 12). Herewith are connected the great voices in Heaven announcing the dawn of the consummation (ch. xi. 15. Similarly the great voice, ch. xii. 10). At the opening of the Temple in Heaven, which now follows, a great hail accompanies the lightnings and voices and thunders and earthquakes (ch. xi. 19). The more detailed development of this latter figure (ch. xvi. 18, 21) makes the hail appear in the light of a great, terrible, and distressful decomposition of cosmical relations. The anticipatory celebration of the consummation in the heavenly Church of the elect is especially solemn (ch. xiv. 1 sqq.). Here the perfected life of nations, of geniuses or prophets, and of art, is united in the harmony of a new and lofty song: The voices of many waters, of a great thunder, and of harpers, singing a song that only the elect and holy company can learn. In yet fuller tones resounds the heavenly concert after the fall of the harlot, in anticipatory celebration of the marriage of the Bride (ch. xix. 1-7). It is also a heavenly proclamation that causes the writing of these words: Blessed are the dead, etc. (ch. xiv. 13); and how often have they been rewritten! Again, the command to go forth from Babylon comes immediately as a voice from Heaven (ch. xviii. 4).

§ 7. PSYCHICO-PNEUMATIC MEDIA OF APOCALYPTICS. APOCALYPTIC VISION.

a. Sacred Vision.

The Theology of the prophetic subjective form of this is wrapped in obscurity as yet.

Orthodoxy makes no distinction between objective phenomena addressing themselves to the common empirical perception of the five senses, and objective phenomena observable by the prophetic perception alone. Theosophy makes no distinction between the perceptive forms of the heathen mantic condition, in which man becomes the un-free, constrained tool of a mysterious influence, supposed to be of ghostly [spirit] origin—in a word between the pathologico-somnambule form of perception—and the ethical ecstasy of the theocratic domain, in which the Seer is freed from the limits of common empiricism. Pantheistic rationalism makes no distinction between those salutiferous visions which are the sources of the higher life, yea, of the recovery of mankind, and fanatical hallucinations whose end is the mad-house (Strauss).

A result of the orthodoxistic confusion of ideas is the fact that the prophetic vision is regarded as merely one form of revelation among several; whilst, on the contrary, the vision is really the medium of all forms of revelation. This truth is expressed by the threefold development of the Hebrew terms denoting prophetic sight: [1] The Seer or Prophet (נָבִיא); [2] The Proclaimer of new things (מְבַרֵּר); [3] The Beholder or Seer (רֹאֵה).

The first thing that we shall premise relative to the subject of prophetic vision and also, in especial, of Apocalyptic vision, is the mysterious fact that a twofold form of consciousness is peculiar to the human soul,—a day consciousness, and a night consciousness. The latter forms the background of life, but is, however, generally veiled and hidden.

Our second premise is as follows: The liberation of the second consciousness was a thing of more ready occurrence when the nations were in their youth and filled with youthful presentiments, than whilst they were passing through the middle age of their development; a new liberation of this night-consciousness is in prospect for the time of perfect development.

It is a well-known fact that this second form of consciousness, the universal existence of which is betrayed by the most manifold signs, manifested itself among the Greeks in a pathological form (manticism [μαντεία, sooth-saying, divination]); this pathological form comes in contact with the ethical form only in the teachings of Socrates (daimonism [δαίμωνισμός]), being converted in the writings of Plato into a sort of theory; whilst on the line of Semitic tradition, the ethical form of vision has, amid the reciprocal action of Divine grace and the ethical struggling of elect spirits, been made the actual organ of revelation.

A polarity, therefore, meets us in all cases: a harmonious contrast of Divine manifestations and human visions or transports—based, these latter, upon the being rapt out of the condition of ordinary consciousness (ecstasy). Without a Divine manifestation through the Holy Ghost, Who subserves Himself not only of natural phenomena and spiritual messengers, but also of the capacities and aptitudes of the human organism, there is no vision; without vision there is no Divine manifestation. Now although this contrast is harmonious and indissoluble in its nature, it is also one of great magnitude; it is, therefore, necessary for us to distinguish between forms of revelation which are predominantly objective and those in which the subjective element preponderates. The most objective form is that powerfulness of manifestation which reveals itself not only to the Prophets in the centre, but also, with a startling might, to profane individuals in their company (Moses in Egypt; Elijah on Mount Carmel; Christ in the Temple; Saul on the way to Damascus). The most subjective form of revelation is inspiration; such as traverses, unwaning, like a midnight sun, the consciousness of the Apostles. The perfect contrast is thus stated: the objective Divine novelty—the wonder, and the subjective Divine novelty—the prophetic word or the preaching Prophet himself.

Founded upon the psychological and historical conditions of revelation is the fact that its subjective forms can admit of augmentation to the richest degree, and diminution to a vanishing point. The beginning of revelatory vision is a visional hearing in a dream (Samuel); a form which is introduced by the natural-prophetic, significant dream (e.g., Joseph's dream, Gen. xxxvii.), but must, however, be distinguished from that. The end of revelatory vision is an Apostolic illumination, the echo of which is heard long after in the Bath-kol.*

It results from the distinction of epochs and periods in the inner, pneumatic history of the world, that the miraculous forms of revelation become latent in the times of periodical development. From the universality of the prophetic aptitude in mankind (this is not saying as much as if we were to say—from the universality of the Christological [Theological?—E. R. C.] aptitude—comp. Acts xvii. 27), and from the momentousness of the human life, especially the Christian life, the expectation likewise results, however, that extraordinary and mysterious events will take place in all times.

Within the cycle of revelation the wonder of hearing develops into the wonder of vision; and the vision of the Seer, from whom the consciousness of the distinction betwixt empiric and prophetic sight is, as yet, absent, is developed in ghostly, historical events and visions, in the experience of which the consciousness of the distinction between this inward sight and common empiricism commences and continually increases.

But this suspense between prophetic experiences and the experiences of the five senses, does but constitute a transition between the incipient and the meridian point of prophecy. In the life of Abraham heavenly manifestation becomes a continual higher empiricism; he walks, like a holy child, on the borders of the spirit-world. In the life of Christ, on the other hand, the suspense between prophetic and ordinary vision is also done away with. His constant and every-day experience is for Him the recognized medium of an uninterrupted vision.

Not even the Apostles were able to walk on these heavenly heights of spirituality in this vale of earth. Christ walked in a faith that was, at the same time, sight; but the Apostles walked in faith, not in sight. Doubtless, however, their life of faith was founded upon, and interspersed with, moments of sight, whilst the intervals were filled up with the power of inspiration—a power which, indeed, for the moment and in particular relations, might sometimes be obscured [diminished]. On the other hand, however, there were also moments in the lives of the Apostles when momentary Divine manifestations were theirs in so rich and mighty a form as to develop into actual and lasting inspirations. The Sacred Writings were the issues of these forth-gushing springs.

On the meridian of a perfect union betwixt manifestation and inspiration, the canonical Apocalypse took its rise. It was based upon visions whose foundation was a burning longing for the Coming of the Lord; a longing awakened by the peculiar and oppressive character of the times, and cherished in minds that, by reason of their ideal nature, possessed a higher prophetic calling. Under the reciprocal action of this yearning and the Spirit of revelation, the visions took shape. In this longing, in the pangs of attraction of love to the Coming of the Lord, the Old Testament Prophets could compete with the Apostles, and thus some of the former became, perforce, Apocalyptists. Each party excelled the other in some particular. The men of the Old Testament had not found satisfaction in the principally perfected redemption, as had those of the New Testament; their faith was pre-eminently hope; hence their longing in the face of the threatening of apparent ruin was more full of human passion, more darkly glowing, and their Apocalyptic productions were more richly colored, more manifold, more original. In the case of the Apostles, on the other hand, the New Testament longing developed gradually out of the most complete satisfaction drawn by faith from the principal redemption and overcoming of the world; the Apostles' longing was based upon this faith and soothed by it. And thus many passed away as martyrs in the first full enjoyment of the principal consummation; and in the case of a few only there was gradually developed a more distinct Apocalyptic vision (Peter, Paul). But one, John, the friend of Jesus, became the Seer and Prophet of His Advent in the truest sense. Hence the New Testament Seers continued scholars of those of the Old Testament in regard to Apocalypitical forms likewise. Whilst the latter were in advance of the former, so far as the painful pressure of unsatisfied longing is concerned, the former excelled in the universality, the spiritual clearness and fullness of their Apocalyptic views.

* [We subjoin the following from Kitto's Cyclopædia. The whole article, which is too long for insertion here, is worthy of perusal. "BATH KOL (בַּת קוֹל, daughter of the voice). Under this name the Talmud, the later Targums, and the Rabbinical writers make frequent mention of a kind of oracular voice, constituting the fourth grade of revelation, which, although it was an instrument of Divine communication throughout the early history of the Israelites, was the most prominent, because the sole, prophetic manifestation which existed during (and even after) the period of the second Temple."—E. R. C.]

The real problem of Apocalypitics is set forth in the question: How can visional ecstasy be conceived of as united to a calmly conscious, self-reflecting working of the materials gathered in such ecstasy into literary form and shape? The common prejudice is against such a combination. Not only ecstasy, but enthusiasm, or inspiration even, is regarded as forming a contrary antithesis to the reflective presentation of ideas or events and the artistic shaping of thought. Unconsciousness and naïveté of feeling are held to be requisite for the presentation of sacred matters. This opinion has a certain truth only as opposed to an over-nicety and artificialness of expression, affectation, false oratoricalness, and poetastery; it is, for the most part, however, itself biased by the mistaken idea that poetry and Prophecy must have a mantic ground-form. The example of poetry even, true, original and elevated poetry, exhibits a direct contradiction of this notion. There certainly does exist a distinction between the original conception of a poem and the artistic elaboration of it. But the mightier the conception, the richer the equipment of fundamental forms, poetic shapes and euphony that accompany it; besides, the original inspired contemplation of a subject continues, as a creative and formative power, throughout the entire calm, reflective and artistic process of elaboration. This is true of art in general; otherwise there could be no question of sacred art. Though we must, therefore, distinguish between the prophetic rapture, which can be so intensified as to cause the Prophet to sink, fainting, upon the earth, and the subsequent preaching of that which he has seen — yet the rapture is, in the first instance, as an ethical mood, fructified by the word of preaching, and in the word of preaching the continuous rapture attains its most complete expression. This fact is presented in the highest degree in the reciprocal operation of the mightiest manifestations and the calmest formative activity of inspiration, in which activity the original Divine voices shape themselves into the human word. Inspiration is in such perfect agreement with the most thorough deliberation and sober-mindedness that it may be clothed in all forms of true learning and pure art. This is true in the fullest degree of the Biblical Apocalypses; they are living syntheses of theocratic revelation and Hebrew art. The Johannean Apocalypse constitutes, in a three-fold aspect, the zenith of the canonical Apocalypses: first, it forms the zenith of eschatological vision; secondly, it forms the zenith of sacred art — art which is Hebrew, though breathed upon by the Greek spirit of measure and symmetry; and, thirdly, we behold in it the zenith of the union of vision and art. Thus it is in itself a typically prophetic presentation of the end of the world, in which the fullness of holiness shall appear in the full radiance of beauty — an intimidating and repellent mystery to the eyes of the profane world.

§ 8. FUNDAMENTAL TRAITS OF APOCALYPTIC COMPOSITION.

The fundamental traits of Apocalyptic composition are already indicated by the general character of sacred composition.

In respect of the inner side of this sort of composition, we distinguish the sacred motive;

the sacred design; and the sacred haste of execution from motive to design. In respect of the formal side, we distinguish the theocratic - world-historical foundation; the solemn language, replete with beauty, simplicity, and devotion; and the cyclical movement toward the goal in a series of original, circular pictures of the whole [Gesamtbilder=panoramas?].

If we apply ourselves directly to the tracing out of these features in the Apocalyptic Scriptures, we shall observe that, in respect of their motive, a world-historical state of necessity in the Church of God begets, within an elect and praying prophet-heart, that unique state of necessity to which Heaven opens;—opens, in order that, by the discovery of a glorious Messianic picture of the future, the fact may be revealed that the temporal necessity of the Church rests upon a Divine plan and is designed to lead to a triumph, the certainty of which is already rejoiced over in Heaven. Hence it is that, in the Apocalypse, every gloomy, distressful scene on earth is supported by a radiant, festive scene in Heaven, and analogies are found even in the Old Testament Apocalypses. Comp. Is. xl., xlix., lviii.; Ezek. xxxvii.

The design of the Apocalypse, both in the Old and the New Testament Scriptures, is practical in the higher sense of that term. It is intended that the Church of God—in the persons of His prominent servants, in the first place (Rev. i. 1)—shall receive, in chromatic rays, the requisite amount of light concerning the future, to enable her to find her way in situations of the greatest obscurity; it is likewise intended that she should possess a treasury of consolation at which she may always be able to quicken her longing, hope, patience, and perseverance, and, above all, her love: in this sense, Prophecy shall ever open more fully to her in accordance with her need, whilst it presents an impenetrable veil to the profane gaze of worldliness as well as to hypocritical chilastic desires. This design is plainly revealed in the Apocalypse of John in a number of passages, and especially in the seven epistles and at the close; it is, however, the design of all Apocalypses. Comp. Is. xl. 1; Dan. xii. 10.

The holy haste of execution, its rapid gravitation to the final goal, is announced in the brevity of expression; the rapid succession of scenes; the ever new configurations of the end; and the strong expression of a presentiment of the end, to which the whole intervening period seems but a brief time. In consideration of the last-mentioned fact, it is a senseless proceeding to interpret the promises of a speedy fulfillment, e. g., Rev. i. 1, as based upon a chronological error. That the Apocalypse intends the sayings concerning the speediness of the end in a religious sense, and not in an ordinary chronological signification, is proved by the ages which this same Apocalypse interposes between the stand-point of the Seer and the day of final decision (comp. 1 John ii. 18, "the last hour;" likewise Haggai ii. 6).

Revelation, in accordance with its theocratically world-historical character, takes in the entire breadth of the world, the entire length, height, and depth of its course, in a manner of which we find scarcely the faintest idea in classical historiography. This character is most clearly pronounced in the Apocalyptic Scriptures. The Book of Daniel presents a construction of the world's history agreeable to the predominant character of the pre-Christian time: the world-monarchies occupy the foreground of the picture until the Kingdom of Christ puts an end to them. In the Apocalypse of John, the entire history of the world is presented in the New Testament light: the Kingdom of God occupies the foreground, arrayed for the final decisive combats with the world-power, whose advances become constantly bolder and more threatening. Even in this Book, however, the vision of the seven seals (ch. vi.), and the figure of the Woman clothed with the sun (ch. xii.), as well as many another feature, carry us back to the old time before Christ. manifold are the links connecting the Biblical Books in harmonious sequence, so that one Book rests not only upon the knowledge, but also upon the basis, of the preceding one. Thus, the Apocalypses are joined to all the foregoing Biblical Books; and as the whole of the Old Testament is reflected in the Prophet Daniel, so the Apocalypse of John presents the image of both the Old and the New Testament. Nay, more, this unique conclusion of the whole of the Sacred Writings is likewise the conclusion of their mysteries; in it, their very first Book, Genesis, is most clearly mirrored, thus imaging for us the Genesis of the first world in the Genesis of the second. Especially close, however, is the connection of the Apocalypse of the New Testament with the Apocalyptic Scriptures of the Old Testament; and that not in regard to the subject-matter alone, but also in respect of its figurative language and its art. The entire learning of the Old Testament, as well as the entire Eschatology of the Gospels and all other New Testament Books, is here reproduced in a perfectly original form; above all, we recognize here the elements of Eschatology presented in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel; as also those of Zechariah in particular, as well as the most manifold traits of other Prophets.

The solemn, devotional language of Holy Writ—language beautiful in its simplicity, and yet ghostly in its sublimity—is the property, in a peculiar degree, of all its Apocalypses; from the Apocalypse of Isaiah, through the Eschatologies of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, down to the Revelation of John. In the latter, however, we have, added to the Hebrew and Hebraizing expressions of the Prophet—who speaks in the spirit (ἐν πνεύματι), not in the language of apostolic, didactic mediation (ἐν τῷ νοῦ)—a Christian Greek element, viz. the hymn, which consists in lyrical outgushes and also in the most metrical domination of the material by the form. The general admiration excited by the diction of Habakkuk, and by the mysterious chiar' oscuro of Zechariah, is a well-known fact; it will be found, however, on examination, that Obadiah, Nahum, and Zephaniah also employ a language peculiarly Apocalyptic.

Of special moment for the true position of exegesis, is the cyclical movement of the Apocalypses, from the stand-point of the Seer to the final goal of the world. The least of the Apocalyptic Writings cannot, indeed, be affirmed to present such an arrangement, though even in them a similar organization is observable, in the division of the special topics of which they treat into rounded and distinct discourses. (Comp. the [Lange] Comm. on Obadiah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah). On directing our attention to the greater Apocalypses, we find that the cyclical construction, in three stages, of the unitous Eschatology (Is. xl.—lxvi.), is marked both by the peculiar character of those stages (I. The restoration of Israel as the servant of God, including the promise of the Messiah, xl.—xlviii. II. The Messiah as the Servant of God, the suffering Redeemer of Israel, xlix.—lvii. III. The Messiah as the victorious Servant of God; and the consummation of the Kingdom of God (lviii.—lxvi.), and by their significant concluding formulas. In ch. xlviii. 22, we read: "There is no peace, saith the LORD, unto the wicked." In ch. lvii. 20, the terms are stronger: "But the wicked are like the troubled sea that cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. [But] there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." Strongest of all is the close, ch. lxvi. 24: "And they shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against [apostatized from] Me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." This climax is, manifestly, a development of the final judgment—a development continually increasing in power, and pointing at last to the lake of fire-spoken of in the Apocalypse, ch. xix. 20, xx. 10, 14, 15 (comp. Matt. xxv. 41).

The Eschatology of Jeremiah is unfolded in a series of pictures of judgment, beginning with ch. xlv.* and closing with ch. li. 64. That this Eschatology forms a cyclical composition, is proved by the unitous line of judicial pictures and their close in the judgment upon Babylon, which also points to the fall of the antitypical Babylon (Rev. xviii.).

In the Eschatology of Ezekiel, three cycles are distinctly visible. I. The Vision of the Resurrection of Israel; the Union between Israel and Judah; and the Eternal Kingdom of the Messiah, as a revelation for the Gentiles (ch. xxxvii.). II. The Judgment upon the northeastern Antichrist, Gog in the land of Magog, the prince in Ros,† Meshech, and Tubal (chs. xxxviii. and xxxix.). III. The new Mystical Temple upon a high mountain in the land of Israel, the place of the Throne of the Incarnate Jehovah (ch. xliii. 6, 7); from this Temple, a stream, adorned on either side with trees of life, issues for the rejuvenation of the world (ch. xlvii.), chs. xl.—xlviii. Ezekiel's vision of the resurrection of Israel points to the first resurrection of the Apocalypse (ch. xx.). His vision of the judgment of Gog points to the Apocalyptic final judgment upon the last form of Antichristianity under the same name (ch. xx.). The new Temple upon the high mountain, with its river and trees of life, finds its final fulfillment in the City of God, with its paradisaical trees of life (Rev. xxi. and xxii.).

* Relatively, the Apocalypse of Jeremiah begins with ch. xlv., as we have stated in the Comm. on Genesis.

In regard to the Prophet Daniel, we have already remarked, in the Comm. on Genesis (Introduction [Am. Ed., p. 38]), that we consider the portions, (ch. x.-xi. 44, and ch. xii. 5-13), as an interpolation.* Irrespective of this interpolation, the work falls into two sections, each of which is composed of cyclical pictures. In the first part (ch. i.-vi.), Daniel appears as the interpreter of foreign oracles within heathenism itself; in the second part, he is no longer the expounder of obscure, dream-like, ghostly, Divine voices and writings within heathenism, but a Prophet of the clearer revelations of Jehovah for His people. In the first part, God's judgment upon the works of heathen arrogance and pride are unfolded, whilst pious men of Israel are wonderfully preserved and glorified; in the second part, the sufferings of the Kingdom of God under the final and the typical Antichristianity are portrayed, together with the triumph of God's Kingdom. Upon the Introduction, ch. i., in which the continuance of a holy Israel, in the midst of heathen temptations, is depicted as the basis of Prophecy and the foundation for the coming of the Kingdom of God, follow the oracles of the first part: a. Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the monarchy-image; confirmation of the Messianic conclusion of the dream, in the preservation of the three men in the fiery furnace through the medium of the fourth Man among them, the "son of the gods" (chs. ii. and iii.). b. The dream of the tree that reached unto Heaven; fulfillment of the dream in the humiliation of Nebuchadnezzar; and his repentance (ch. iv.). c. The oracle in the banquet-room of Belshazzar, and the judgment upon his pride; downfall of Belshazzar; fresh exaltation of Daniel; his apparent fall, and wonderful preservation in the den of lions (chs. v. and vi.). The second part reverts to the time of the first part. Daniel's own visions begin with the dream-vision of the four Beasts as forms of the four world-monarchies (ch. vii.); manifestly, the Israelitish pendant to the dream of Nebuchadnezzar (ch. ii.). The second vision of Daniel (ch. viii.) passes beyond the dream-form; it manifestly presents the precursory, typical Antichristianity of Antiochus Epiphanes, which must by no means be confounded with the final Antichristianity sketched in ch. vii. 7, 8; a sufficiently distinct pendant to the fall of the mighty tree (ch. iv.) Daniel's third vision is even mediated by the Prophet's earnest prayer for Mount Zion; it is, therefore, a highly developed form of the vision. It has reference to the import of the seventy weeks determined by Jeremiah, after which Jerusalem—in a thoroughly Messianico-eschatological sense—should be restored. We read the conclusion of the vision in the following connection: "And even to the summit ['double sense: to the uttermost, and to the top of the Temple'] come the abominations, the ravages, and until destruction, which is firmly decreed, is poured out upon the desolator" (see Comm. on Matthew, p. 425, Am. Ed.) [Dan. ix. 27]. But he shall set up his palace-tents between the sea and the mountain of the holy ornament, yet shall go on towards his end without deliverance [ch. xi. 45]. At that time, however, shall Michael arise, the great chief that standeth for the sons of thy people—it shall indeed be a time of tribulation, such as never was until that time, but, at the same time, thy people shall be delivered, all that are written in the Book of Life—and many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, etc." [ch. xii. 1 sqq.]. In this rounded form the vision constitutes a pendant to the ghostly writing on the wall in the banqueting-room of Belshazzar. With the abominable desecration of the vessels of the Temple, corresponds the abomination of desolation which reaches the summit (double sense [the uttermost, or]), the pinnacle of the Temple; with the sudden fall of Belshazzar, corresponds the destruction that suddenly comes upon the desolator. At the same time, many features of the Book of Daniel point to the Apocalypse. The typical Antichrist of Dan. viii., who has already in ch. vii. appeared in the most general outlines of his antitype, points to the perfect antitype in the Apocalypse. The seventy weeks—which are to be interpreted symbolically, not chronologically—are thus divided (see the Symbolism of Numbers, above): 1. Sixty-two weeks of the troubles restoration of Jerusalem with streets and ditches, but in strait of times; the time until the appearing and slaying of the Messiah. At the end of these weeks, the Anointed, Who is not yet the Prince, shall be cut off. 2. One week. Appearance of the prince, who is not an anointed one. Renewal of the covenant in this week for many, and, in antithesis, cessation of the sacrifice. Downfall of the Jewish State and worship. 3. Seven weeks to the Anointed, Who is, at the same time, the Prince. This is the shadowy sketch of the time from the destruction of Jerusalem to the Parousia of Christ, in which two features only are distinctly prominent: the renewed covenant of the many, on the one side; the contrasted lasting desolation, on the other (the shortened days of tribulation, see Comm. on Matthew, ch. xxiv. [p. 425, Am. Ed.]).

With Daniel's symbolical reckoning of time, corresponds the symbolical reckoning of the Apocalypse (chs. xi., xii.); to the troublous time of the Theocracy in the sixty-two weeks, corresponds the travailling Woman, menaced by Satan (ch. xii.); to the slaying of the Messiah, corresponds His translation to Heaven. To the prince, who is a desolator, corresponds the whole development of New Testament Antichristianity. The appearance of the anointed Prince coincides unmistakably with the Parousia of Christ. In Daniel, however, the anointed Prince manifestly appears in the form of Michael. Finally, an antithesis corresponding to the antithesis of the times is formed by the fact that Daniel is commanded to seal up his writing (ch. xii. 4), whilst John receives an exactly contrary command (Rev. xxii. 10).*

We have already presented our views in regard to the unitous composition of those Prophecies that come under the name of Zechariah, in the Introduction to Genesis (p. 39, [Am. Ed.]). Not only the whole beginning of the disintegration of this Scripture into two parts—a procedure based upon a misunderstanding;—not only the misapprehension of the manifest traits of a later Israelitish age in the second part, but also, in particular, the limitation of the Prophecies to the circumstances characterizing the time of the Prophet, without a due regard to the fact that he has throughout employed the circumstances of his time as symbols and types, has occasioned a permanent and increasing prejudice in favor of the division of the Book. We, however, in spite of a criticism which, though fully warranted in setting forth its peculiar views, is still in its youth, cling to the assumption that the whole Book forms a unitous Apocalypse; its first part, depicting the coming of the Messianic Kingdom; its second, the coming of the Messiah Himself; types cyclically progressive being employed in each case. We regard the opening (ch. i. 1-6) as an introduction, instead of holding, with Köhler, that it forms the first section of the first part. The first vision (ch. i. 7-17) is promissive of the restoration of the Israelitish Theocracy. In connection with the second vision (vers. 18-21, Heb. text ii. 1-4), which announces the destruction of the four hostile powers that have scattered Israel,† it forms the first cyclical general picture. The third vision (ch. ii. 1-13, Heb. text ii. 5-17) depicts the immeasurable fullness and superb security of the inhabitants of the New Jerusalem; with it, the fourth vision, the cleansing of the priesthood from its defilement, even to the point of the coming of the Themach ([E. V. Branch=Sprout] ch. iii. 1-10), must unite to form the second cyclical picture of the future. In the two sons of oil, the fifth vision sets forth the ramification of the Theocracy into the princely and priestly offices; it is the duty of these offices, themselves being filled with the Spirit, to nourish the unitous candlestick of Israel, the light of the world, with the oil of the Spirit; keeping themselves, meanwhile, from the way of violence. Israel is to use no violence toward the Gentile world, but to maintain a severe discipline within; accordingly, the sixth vision (ch. v. 1-4) is conjoined to the fifth (ch. iv.), thus presenting the third general picture in its two aspects.

* ["This prophecy is called the Revelation, with respect to the Scripture of truth, which Daniel was commanded to shut up and seal, till the time of the end. Daniel sealed it until the time of the end; and, until that time comes, the Lamb is opening the seals; and afterwards the two witnesses prophecy out of it a long time in sack-cloth before they ascend up to Heaven in a cloud. All which is as much as to say that these Prophecies of Daniel and John should not be understood till the time of the end; but then some should prophecy out of them in an afflicted and mournful state for a long time, and that but darkly, so as to convert but few. But in the very end, the Prophecy should be so far interpreted as to convert many."] SIR ISAAC NEWTON.—E. R. C.]

† I now am doubtful as to whether the four world-monarchies are intended by this, since the Prophet limits the work of the horns to the past.

According to the seventh vision (ch. v. 5-11) the theocratic domain is purified from all unrighteousness; a threatening antithesis to this is presented outside of the Theocracy, in the fact that this unrighteousness is set down in the land of Shinar. Hence, in the eighth, or last vision (ch. vi. 1-8), God's judgment upon the Gentile world is exhibited as going forth into all the quarters of Heaven; this, and the seventh vision, form the fourth cyclical general picture.

The conclusion of the first part, from ch. vi. 9 to ch. viii. 23, then unmistakably forms the transition to the second part, which consists of a cyclical series of typical representations of the Messiah.

In the first place, Joshua, the High-priest, is, by a solemn crowning, constituted a type of the coming Messiah, Who is to be at once Priest and King (ch. vi. 9 sqq.). Furthermore, the Prophet himself becomes a momentary and extraordinary type of the Messiah (ch. vi. 15 sqq.). Hence he decides the question which the Israelites put to the Priests, as to whether the extraordinary fasts of the exile should be continued; answering the inquiry for the Priests as well as the people, he declares that there is henceforth no ordinance of fasts; that the people are to observe the moral commandments of truth, mercy, and compassion, which, to their destruction, they formerly despised; now, however, judgment should be turned away from them, and, after the restoration of Israel, the fast-days should become joyful feast-days; yea, the salvation of Israel should be diffused amongst all nations (ch. vii. and viii.).

In this transition, the unitous picture of the time of the Messiah is laid before us. It is the programme of the second part, from ch. ix. to the close. Here, in this second part, the future of the Messiah is unrolled before our eyes in typical acts, representative of individual items in His career.

First type. Advent and appearance of the Messiah in poor and humble guise (ch. ix.; comp. Matt. xxi. 5; John xii. 15). Here the barren present and proximate future of the Prophet (Israel's restoration in antithesis to the judgments upon the neighboring Northern nations, — judgments, however, conducing to their conversion) become the basis of a prophecy concerning the Coming of the Messiah; the perspective of this prophecy is manifestly eschatological (vers. 13, 14 sqq.). This picture corresponds with the first vision (ch. i. 7-17.)

Second type. Jehovah's leading the people back out of the heathen world through the sea of tribulation or anguish may be the most obscure Messianic type of this series; its Messianic character is nevertheless sustained by the clearer types of chs. ix. and xi. The point of departure is the hope of a universal restoration of Israel, conjoined with a universal judgment upon the heathen; accordingly, this type corresponds with the second vision, the vision of the destruction of the horns (ch. x. We, like Neumann and Kliefoth, account vers. 1 and 2 as forming a part of this section).

Third type. The Messiah, typically represented by the Prophet, is undervalued at thirty pieces of silver, i. e., the absurdly cheap price of a slave (Matt. xxvi. 15; Ex. xxi. 32). The historical point of departure are the imminent judgments upon the shepherds in Israel (not the Gentile shepherds of the peoples, spoken of in the preceding section) who overshadowed the land like the cedars of Lebanon and the oaks of Bashan. With this type the third and fourth visions correspond, especially the filthy garments of Joshua (chs. ii. and iii.). The leading thought is that the Prophet, the Prophethood, takes the place of the unfaithful shepherds after Jehovah's destruction of the three shepherds* in one month; with his double staff (Grace [Beauty, Eng. Ver.] embracing the Gentile world, and the Theocratic Band uniting Judah and Israel) he [the Prophet—always as a type of Christ] feeds the flocks—the sheep of slaughter in company with the poor of the flock, for the sake of the latter;†

* In accordance with the context, none but Israelitish shepherds can be intended here; and, moreover, such as were destroyed in one (symbolical) month. If the month denote a short periodical change—the Babylonish captivity, for instance—those three false prophets might be meant upon whom Jeremiah proclaims judgment (ch. xxix. 22, 32), viz.: Ahab, Zedekiah, Shemaijah. Are not, however, the three Old Testament offices intended, whose place the Messiah Himself assumes?

† [A variation in translation. The G. V. renders Zech. xi. 7, thus: And I took charge of the sheep of slaughter for the sake of the poor (wretched) sheep.—Ta.]

and even after his rejection, he is commanded to assume the same office (ver. 15) on account of the necessity for an offset and antithesis to the worthless shepherds yet to come.

Fourth type. The lamentation of all the families of Israel over the mortal suffering that they have inflicted upon the visible appearance of Jehovah, the Messiah, a result of the victory over all heathen, vouchsafed by Jehovah to the ideal Theocracy (ch. xii., particularly vers. 10-14). The very pre-supposition of this Prophecy is altogether eschatological; it is the expectation of the perfect fulfillment of the destiny of Jerusalem and Judah; the anticipation of a victory over all nations of the Gentiles—a victory conditioned upon the sanctification of Israel. Thus, it is a Prophecy, every feature of which is symbolical. With it corresponds the fifth vision, of the victory of Zerubbabel through the Spirit of God; and the sixth vision, of the sanctification of Israel (ch. iv. and v. 1-4).

Fifth type. Development of the period of the Spirit of God: prepared by a general mistrust of Prophets, the prophetic form of teaching, psychical inspiration, and the prophetic insignia—a mistrust occasioned by the many false prophets; introduced by the judgment, arising from that mistrust, which was visited upon the last and highest Prophet, and by the scattering of His flock (ch. xiii., especially ver. 7; comp. Matt. xxvi. 31). The two characteristics of this period are, first, the fountain opened for sin in Jerusalem—completed salvation, accessible for all: secondly, the destruction of all idolatry, even the most subtle; the destruction even of the extinct prophetic form; and the banishment of the unclean spirits from the land. This recalls the seventh vision (ch. v. 5-11), in which the unclean spirit, under the figure of a woman, is borne out of the holy land by flying women, whose wings are energized by the wind, i. e., the Spirit.

Sixth type. Antichristianity in its temporary victory: and the appearing of the Lord for judgment. The new world. On the one side, the region of judgment, a region of absolute confusion, self-destruction, and withering; on the other, an absolute consecration of all life to God (ch. xiv., especially vers. 3-7). In this type the eighth vision, as a picture of the final judgment, is reflected; especially when regarded in its connection with the crowning of Joshua (ch. vi.).

The Book of Zechariah, with its symbols, particularly its horses, colors, horns, its measuring-line, its stone with seven eyes, its sons of oil, its roll, its forms of women, its Shinar, its crowns, its sea-waves and rivers, its pictures of judgment and deliverance, its appearance of Christ, and its glorious ideal of the new world (ch. xiv. 21), reminds us in many respects of the Apocalypse. It particularly resembles that Scripture, however, in its cyclical collective pictures, with their advance to the final eschatological form.

Apart from every other consideration, this universal appearance of the cyclical method in the Apocalyptic Books of the Old Testament is decisive against all interpretations of the Johannean Apocalypse, which, after the manner of secular historiography, aim at its resolution into periods following each other in chronologic succession.

The law of the cyclical method rests, first, on the peculiarity of all sacred literature, which aims at edification, not at the imparting of historical knowledge. Secondly, on the peculiarity of Prophecy, which has for its aim great and momentous facts, not particularities. Thirdly, on the peculiarity of the vision, which scans the succession of the ages in collective pictures forming a living, genetic chain.

§ 9. HEBREW ART IN COMPARISON WITH HELLENIC ART. MAGNITUDE OF THE CONTRAST. FATAL EFFECTS RESULTANT UPON THE MISAPPREHENSION OF IT.

When science shall have arrived at a perfect appreciation of the grand and world-historical antithesis between Judaism and Hellenism, between the Theocratic and the Humanistic tendency, then, and not till then, can Exegesis, Criticism, Theology in general, enter upon a new stage of development.

Until that time, Sacred History and Literature, being viewed from Hellenistic standpoint, must continue to endure manifold misrepresentations and even misusage.

For a long time the Biblical language was held in disesteem; the New Testament Greek, especially, being looked upon as a barbarous idiom, whilst the great contrast between the modes of mediation and the secularity of the Greek language, and the immediateness and spirituality of that mode of expression which lies at the basis of the New as well as the Old Testament were disregarded. Neither was any distinction made between the blending of Greek and Hebrew in the traditional Alexandrian Greek of Scripture [of the Septuagint] and that grand linguistic formative process which came into operation on the basis of New Testament spiritual life, and continually exerted a creative energy in the production of new verbal, adjective, and substantive forms. This fact was likewise the fertile source of a multitude of critical abortions.

Furthermore, until to-day, Biblical Historiography, as well as the Sacred History upon which it is founded, has been examined by a standard of ideas drawn from classical antiquity. Orthodoxy competed with neology in insisting upon the most rigidly literal acceptance of Scripture terms. Indeed, neology is but following in the footsteps of orthodoxy, in maintaining now that the Bible inculcates the doctrine that the work of creation was completed in six astronomical days, etc., though this in the case of neology is done in disparagement of the Scriptures, whilst the stragglers who bring up the rear of the older orthodoxy set forth the same views in praise of the Bible.

Thus it happens that the one class speak of perfectly literal historical reports; the other class, of myths. That the one class attribute the character of Greek pragmatism—such a conception of events as proceeds, in treating them from secondary causes and immediate human designs—even to the Biblical historic style; whilst the other class handle a historiography that mounts to the Divine prime causality, and aims at portraying ultimate designs, in accordance with the ideas of common pragmatism, i. e., omitting secondary causes. True Biblical Historiography, however, in its character of historic symbolicalness, presenting, as it does, all individual actual items in the light of ideal and universal significance, passes between these two modes of procedure, like a living spirit between two sleeping sentinels.

The facts upon which Sacred History is based are treated by the one class as a long line of marvellous, i. e., purely external Divine facts; by the other, as a series of merely mental or spiritual, and in many cases morbid, conceptions. The one class regard the subjective visions as utterly unreal items of revelation; whilst the other class identify even objective visional perceptions of true Divine manifestations and heavenly appearances with the godless hallucinations of fantastical enthusiasts. Sacred History, however, is throughout a Divine-human mystery; a tissue of heavenly and earthly threads; a line of points of union betwixt Heaven and earth; betwixt the surest Divine deeds and facts and the innermost life of the human spirit in its æonic contemplation, averted from the world. There has been no more absurd deliverance in modern times than the claim that a really risen Christ would have been obliged to show Himself on the streets of Jerusalem, or even to present Himself for examination before an academic committee.

If we look at both together, the facts and their presentation, a climax of critical absurdity has been reached in the turning of the inspired, original productions into conglomerates of the most external book-making. And if, in other respects, this principle obtains, viz.: that the first and lower exigencies of man awakened language—spoken language, we mean—and the higher exigencies of his spirit gave rise to written language or literature—surely the next step would be to assume that the sublime prophetic and evangelic facts must, perforce, have been immediately fixed in written memorabilia. If, however, the more ancient doctrine of inspiration despised such mediations, for the sake of heightening the miraculousness of inspiration—in this point, also, modern criticism is its heir. It is to the interest of modern criticism to beget the opinion that a spiritless and superstitious literature had come limping a long way behind the sublime facts which it aspired to record.

The Hellenizing view is the product of the misapprehensive handling of the Prophets and the prophetic style. For instance, it is a specifically Greek sentiment that the passion-picture of Isaiah liii. presents the ideal of the Jewish nation or even of the Prophethood. The Greek, indeed, knows of such ideals that hover above the School until they evaporate over the School-masters. The Hebrew, on the other hand, beholds all his ideals in the form of fiery visions, in process of becoming actualities. Hence, his suffering Servant of God can be none but the Messiah in historic reality.

Finally, it is a well-known fact that the peculiar character of Biblical Poetry has been greatly depreciated, Greek models being made the standard of criticism. The critics have constantly sought for Greek images, the Greek or even the Germanic metre, even classical forms of poetic composition, finally, instead of being satisfied with kindred analogies and types.

People failed to recognize the immense antithesis between the æsthetic interest of the beautiful and the ethical interest of the holy. So, primarily, in reference to the poetic image. The Greek elaborates his image and worships its beauty. The Hebrew employs images for the sole purpose of corporealizing or illustrating thought, or conveying a clear idea of the contemplations and sensations of his spirit. Hence the great changes, as well as the immense circuit and bold use, of his images. Compare especially Pss. xviii. and xxii.*

The Apocalyptic Writings form the perfect point of union of Hebrew Prophecy and Poetry; the acme of pure and original Hebrew art; albeit, this dominant type of Hebrew art evinces its New Testament universalistic transfiguration in a plenitude of elements that recall the products of the Greek mind. As, however, in the first Genesis, the Bible begins with the most art-less form of Hebrew Historiography, so, in the second Genesis, at the close of the Apocalypse, it ends with the most art-full form of Hebrew Visionography, of Hebrew Apocalypics. It is no wonder, then, that the Apocalypse must remain a sealed Book for all who read it with the spectacles of Hellenizing conceptions; as, on the other hand, it will be a misleading meteor to all who pretend to read it with Chiliastic longings—to all who, with the allegorizing spirit of orthodoxism, look upon it as a historical painting in allegorical figures and colors, and based upon absolute inspiration.

As the specific characteristics of Hebrew art we would mention these three features: Historical Dynamics; Ideal Symbolism; Ethico-pastoral Practice.

SECOND DIVISION.

SPECIAL INTRODUCTION.

§1. THE APOCALYPSE OF JOHN AS THE CROWN OF ALL THE APOCALYPSES; THE WORTHY CONCLUSION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES. AS THE SECOND GENESIS; THE GENESIS OF THE NEW WORLD OF THE MANIFESTED KINGDOM OF GOD; THE WORLD OF PERFECTED SPIRITUAL LIFE IN THE CITY OF GOD; A WORLD WHOSE GENESIS IS MEDIATED BY THE COMING OF CHRIST.

In the Apocalypse of John, Canonical Apocalyphtics have found their ultimate and highest expression, as well in a material as in a formal aspect.

In a material aspect, we have first to note the clearness of the laws of development, in accordance with which the course of the world,* in its Christological modification, continually approaches its goal. Next we would call attention to the clearness of the dynamical relations. In the midst of the synchronistic circle stands the Church, represented in the Seven Churches, ruled over by Christ the Redeemer, as He walks through the Churches, bearing the sword of His word. About the Church, for the furtherance of her life and of the design which she is to accomplish, moves the collective Divine dispensation of worldly history, in its eschatological modification; represented in the Seven Seals. At the opening of these seals, the history of the world is seen to be under the dominion of Him who rides upon the white horse—even Christ as the Prince of victory. The sombre horsemen in His train—Death and Famine, and the whole realm of the dead [Hades]—must, like esquires, serve His purposes. And His all-sovereign might is manifested no less clearly in the martyrdom of His witnesses throughout the course of history, and in the convulsions of the evening of the world. From the concursum of the Church, and the sufferings of world-history, the Seven Penitential Trumpets [trumpets calling to repentance] are developed;† from this very circumstance of their origin, we should beware of regarding them as predominantly physical events. The counterpart [Gegenbild] of the seven trumpets are the Seven Thunders, indicated in the course of the sixth trumpet, or rather, in the introduction to the seventh. These constitute the most mysterious side of the history of the Kingdom of God [Church]; a side which, consequently, remains hidden, although, as a whole, it may be apprehended in the mind of the Son of Thunder.‡ The preachings of repentance, in their totality, awaking, as they do, on the one hand, the Seven Thunders (Reformations—we will call them), occasion in the region of impenitence, on the other hand, the full manifestation of the Seven-Headed Beast out of the abyss, the Antichristian powers. This, however, occasions in its turn the pouring out of the Seven Vials of Wrath, or judgments of hardening and destruction, the last of which develops into the actual final catastrophe. With the final judgment, Christ is fully manifested as the Prince of Victory. In the united lustre of the Seven Spirits He appears, for the purpose of opening the great Day of Judgment, which, as the great Saturday of a thousand years, begins with the judgment upon cultivated Antichristianity, and closes with the judgment upon the final rabble-Antichristianity, bringing in at last the eternal Sunday. The above are, manifestly, theocratically synchronistic circumstances, concentric circles.

* [For remarks on the term world, see Introduction by the Am. Ed.—E. R. C.]

† [This sentence is somewhat obscure. By the concursum (the original term reproduced) is meant, probably, the pleading assemblage under the altar, brought to view in the opening of the fifth seal, ch. vi. 9-11 (and referred to, vii. 9, 14); and by the sufferings of world-history are intended the sufferings under the sixth seal, vi. 12-17. From the events of these two seals are “developed,” according to the hypothesis of Lange (see p. 83), those of the seventh, or of the trumpets, in the blowing of which is the unfolding of the seventh seal (viii. 1-6).—E. R. C.]

With equal clearness the theocratic chronological succession of time is unfolded. The story of earthly affairs invariably has a heavenly scene for its point of departure; in the latter, the Divine counsel, the Divine foresight of coming events, the Divine celebration of victory, are presented in advance. On this brilliant ground, earthly phenomena develop themselves septenariouly. At first they appear in four more general fundamental forms: the four churches: Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira; the four Apocalyptic horsemen; the first four penitential trumpets, embodied in facts affecting the earth and the human race; the four or five fallen heads of the Beast (or world-monarchies);* the first four vials of wrath which, like the first four trumpets, are restricted to the domain of man, yet verge upon the kingdom of demons.

The four fundamental forms are regularly followed by the last three, which lead us into the realm of spirits, and are thus indicative of the exceeding imminence of the final catastrophe. First, we have the last three churches: the dead, the living, the lukewarm church. The last three seals: the martyrs; the cosmical catastrophe; the seventh seal as the source of the trumpets. The last three trumpets: opening of the abyss; loosing of destructive powers; the seventh trumpet as the transition to the seven heads of Antichrist. The last three or four heads of the Beast (ch. xvii. 10).† The last three vials of wrath: demonic sufferings, seditions, and judgments, especially the judgment upon Babylon. The seventh of the seven generally forms the transition from one series, which it concludes, to the following series. Thus, the seventh seal is the point whence the trumpets issue; the seventh trumpet, the point at which the seven-fold Antichristianity is developed. The other transitions of this sort are less prominent, yet are implied by the context. The condition of the church of Laodicea is, unmistakably, a motive for the speedy coming of the Lord; and His coming begins in the vision of the seals.‡ Similarly, the Beast's seventh head, changing into the eighth (ch. xvii. 11), is the connecting-point for the seven vials of wrath, though the presentation of the vials is significantly intertwined with the presentation of Antichristianity. Apart from the fact that the number six is unfolded here in the number six hundred and sixty-six, with which the opening of the vials of wrath is connected in perfectly regular succession, the difficulty arising here in respect to the connection is solved thus: the summary final judgment of the seventh vial of wrath, ch. xvi., is divided into three great separate judgments (ver. 19): 1. The judgment upon precursory, absolute Antichristianity; the fall of Babylon or the great Whore, who is finally judged in the seventh head of the Beast, which head, however, reappears at last as the eighth head (ch. xvii. 1-xviii. 10). 2. The judgment upon the ten kings, or fully developed radical Antichristianity (ch. xix. 11-xx. 6). 3. The judgment upon the ultimate devilish-bestial Antichristianity of Gog and Magog (ch. xx. 7-15).

The greatest obscurity that spreads over the Apocalypse arises, doubtless, from the fact that the seven thunders (ch. x.) are not disclosed, but must, exceptionally, be sealed up (ch. x. 4), because it was inadmissible that the sketching of them should alter, as it necessarily would have done, the ethical character of their forthgoing in their own time. If, nevertheless, they be reckoned in, there are formed upon the foundation of the Seven Spirits united

* [The division of the Scripture is into five and two, Rev. xvii. 10; the division into four and three, hypothesized by Lange, here manifestly fails. The three heads spoken of in the following paragraph can be obtained only by regarding the eighth (ver. 11) as an independent division parallel with the seven, when manifestly it is either a transformation of the seventh (see Lange further on in the same paragraph), or a heading up in one of the entire seven.—E. R. C.]

‡ [Is this more clearly set forth as a motive than was the declension of Ephesus (ii. 5) or Pergamus (ii. 16) or Sardis (ii. 3), or the faithfulness of Philadelphia (iii. 11)?—E. R. C.]

in Christ, seven churches, seven seals, seven trumpets, seven thunders, seven heads of the Beast, seven vials of wrath. One might conjecture that the Seven Spirits at the commencement of the Apocalypse were designed, as the first septenary, to complete the seven times seven; and that it was so designed, in accordance with the fact that the Christian Sunday precedes the week days. But, according to Hebrew typism, the number seven is the unity which is developed out of the number six; consequently, here also, doubtless, the seventh seven must be transferred in thought to the close.

In this great picture of the world's development, the dynamical relations of the Kingdom of God are in perfect keeping with its innermost relations, as has been already intimated. Heavenly scenes overway earthly ones; Christ, in His heavenly, terrestrio-churchly spiritual power, overways the Church; the Church overways the world of history; the world of history overways nature, the whole cosmos. Together with Christianity, Antichristianity waxes toward its complete ripeness. With the greatest universalism, such as embraces Heaven and Earth, Time and Eternity; such as brings into view, in the history of Christ's Church, the whole celestial world and all the demon-realm, there corresponds, in wondrous harmony, a wealth of concrete traits. These traits are composed of elements of homiletical warmth, doctrinal distinctness, and even deep religious philosophy—elements jointly characteristic of the Johannean mind, and agreeing with the tenor of the Johannean Gospel and Epistles.

As elements of religious philosophy and dogmatics we mention the following:

Ch. i. 4-6, 8, 13 sqq. Chs. iv., v., The Whole Heavenly Vision. Ch. vi. 1 sqq., 12 sqq. The Great Sealing, ch. vii. 1 sqq. 9. Ch. viii. 4. The Three Woes, ch. viii. 13. The Abyss and Apollyon, ch. ix. The Oath of the Angel, or the Divine Assurance in reference to the End of the World, to be found also in the heart of the Church itself, ch. x. 6. The Little Book, or the charm and dread of eschatological investigations, ch. x. 9. The Inner and Outer Church, ch. xi. 1, 2. The Olive Trees, ch. xi. The Woman clothed with the Sun, ch. xii. The Dragon, ch. xii. 3 sqq. The Twofold Antichristianity; The Mark of the Beast; The Number 666, ch. xiii. Mark of the Elect—readiness for suffering, sincerity, or simplicity, ch. xiv. The Everlasting Gospel (of the second Parousia); The Judgment of the World as a Harvest in a twofold sense, ch. xiv. 13 sqq. The Sea of Glass and the Lake of Fire. The sorest Divine Judgments in the hands of the Angels, measured in golden vials, ch. xv. Retribution for the Martyrs' Blood, ch. xvi. 5, 6. Blasphemies of the Hardened, vers. 11, 21. Division of the one final judgment into three parts, ch. xvi. 19. The Great Whore, chaps. xvii. and xviii. The Æons of Judgment, ch. xix. 3. His Name is called, The Word [Logos] of God, ch. xix. 13. His Vesture, dyed with Blood. Distinction in the Judgments, ch. xix. 20, 21. The Second Judgment. The Millennial Kingdom and the First Resurrection. The Third Judgment, ch. xx. The General Resurrection; The Final Judgment. The Book of Life, ch. xx. The Bride. The City of God, ch. xxi. The City of God,—absolutely Open; absolutely Shut (the Attraction of Salvation; the Ban of Dynamical Repulsion), ch. xxi. The River of Life and the Trees of Life of the New Paradise, ch. xxii. The Beholding of God, the Bliss of the Redeemed, vers. 4, 5; Christology, ver. 16.

The following are familiar as homiletical elements of great value: Ch. i. 17, 18. The Seven Epistles throughout, chs. ii., iii. The Doxologies, ch. iv. 11; v. 9, 10, 12, 13, 14; vii. 12; xi. 15 sqq. The Song of Moses and the Song of the Lamb, ch. xv. 3; xix. 1 sqq. Ch. v. 5. Ch. vi. 9-11. Ch. vii. 13-17. Ch. ix. 20, 21: Impenitence. Ch. xii. 9-11: The Judgment of Rejection, and Heavenly Blessedness; similarly, ch. xiv. 11-13. Ch. xviii.: The Cry of Triumph, Babylon is Fallen. The Merchants of Babylon. Desecrated Art, ch. xviii. 16, 22. Ch. xix. 9. Ch. xxi. 8-8. The City of God, ch. xxi. 22-27. Ch. xxii. 7: Behold, I come quickly, etc. The Time of Decision, ch. xxii. 11, 12. Alpha and Omega. Without, ch. xxii. 15. Divine Assurance and Human Longing in regard to the Coming of Christ. The Gospel in the light of Eschatology, ch. xxii. 17. Sanctity of the Book of Revelation, ch. xxii. 18, 19. Ground-tone of the Revelation: The Divine Promise, I come quickly; and the Human Prayer, Even so, come, Lord Jesus. The Benediction in view of the End of the World, ch. xxii. 21.

Passing to a consideration of the formal perfection of the Apocalypse, we must premise that the art of its construction has necessarily been brought into view in the preceding pages, along with the presentation of its material wealth. Categories of the construction : antithesis of the heavenly—branching into the world of spirits and the domain of ecumenical manifestations ; and the worldly—branching into the earthly-human and the ghostly-demonic. This antithesis unfolds itself more and more fully through the different dynamical cycles of the world's development. All these cycles start from a Christological beginning of the world, and touch, in closing, upon its end ; the conclusion of each cycle, however, brings the end of the world nearer and nearer, until the Last Day unfolds its whole import in the Æon of a thousand years, forming, according to the grand conception of Irenæus, a bridge from the old world to the new.

What is true of the artistic construction of the Apocalypse in general, likewise holds good of its allegorical, symbolical, and typical single figures ; of the wealth of its learned reproduction of ancient Apocalyptic figures, as well as of its original creations, and its treatment—partly fixed and partly free—of Apocalyptic images.

If we wish to gain a clear idea of the wealth of forms which the Apocalypse has woven, with the greatest art, into one magnificent tissue, let us fix our eyes more particularly upon the grand similitudes, the rich maxims, the significant dialogues, the warm exhortations, the glowing prayers, the New Testament songs, the sublime doxologies which it contains.

Thus, the Apocalypse is not a morbid Judaistic first-birth of a New Testament literature, as the Tübingen school has declared, but the noble and grand conclusion of Holy Writ ; the crown of Canonical literature ; as a Sacred Book, calculated, we might almost say, more for the readers of the last times, after those of the Apostolic Age, than for the readers of the Middle Ages, or of any mediate time whatsoever. It forms the conclusion, in the first place, of the Johannean Scriptures ; secondly, of the New Testament ; thirdly, of the whole Bible. In a special sense, it closes Eschatological Prophecy ; in the most special sense, it is the close of Canonical Apocalypics. It is the mystery of the living union of the highest Theocratic-Christian Eschatology, with the perfection of Hebrew New Testament universal Christian art.

Constituting, on the one hand, as a Holy Scripture, the conclusion of the old records of Revelation, and having for its object the close of the old form of the world, it is, on the other hand, a Pneumatic Genesis. It regards the last woes of the old world as the birth-pangs of the new world, and unrolls this new world before our eyes as the new, second, Spirit-born creation ; as the new Paradise ; presenting it to us as a radiant and developed picture, with a perspective reaching into the furthest æons. Hence, the first Adamic Genesis is reflected in this second, Christological one ; the earthly days of creation of the one are mirrored in the heavenly days of creation of the other. Together with this antithesis in the kindred subject-matter of both Scriptures, there appears a proportional antithesis in the kindred form of the two. The first Genesis is written with the stylus of child-like simplicity ; and yet there is something sublime in this child-like form, on account of its adjustment to the great subject-matter, with a distinctly symbolical, anti-mythical consciousness. The last Genesis is written in the most finished, artistic style of Hebrew poetry ; in its case, however, the evangelic subject-matter, with its wealth of promises, permits—throughout the artistic form of the Book, replete with ghostly sublimity—the traits of a child-like warmth of feeling and simplicity to appear.

Passing to a consideration of special items, the creation of light on the first day is reflected in the lustre of the Seven Churches. The antithesis of Heaven and earth is reflected in the revelation of the glory of Heaven above the gloom of earth, anguished with the mysteries of the Seven Seals. The antithesis of land and sea—of the earth with its plants, and the sea with its waters—is reflected in the vision of the Trumpets. The appearance of the sun on the fourth day is reflected in the Angel like the sun, who comes down to earth. The demonic Beast, rising out of the sea, corresponds to the fifth day. The Beast out of the earth is the antitype of the sixth day. The Man of the sixth day, as well as his Paradise, is reflected in the festive Congregation of 144,000 perfected souls on Mount Zion ; his more perfect image, however, is visible in the Appearance of Christ, the New Man. So, too, the Paradise of the seventh day is reflected in the New Paradise. And this (the New Paradise) is likewise the perfect antitype of the seventh day, being the Sabbath of God, the eternal Sunday—allegations not applicable to the Millennial Kingdom, which does but precede this Sunday, like a great, Divine Saturday.*

Further particulars concerning the construction of the Apocalypse, see further on.

[The following sentence, the conclusion of the article on the Apocalypse in Schaff's Hist. of the Ap. Church (pp. 418-427),—a sentence replete with beauty as well as truth—is quoted as the fitting conclusion to this section: "The mystic John, the Apostle of completion, was, by his sanctified natural gifts, as well as by his position and experience, predestinated, so to speak, to unveil the deep foundations of the Church's life and the ultimate issue of her history; so that in the Apocalypse the rejuvenated Apostle simply placed the majestic dome upon the wonderful structure of his Gospel, with the golden inscription of holy longing: 'Even so, come, Lord Jesus.'"—E. R. C.]

§2. GENUINENESS OF THE APOCALYPSE. JOHN, AND THE JOHANNEAN SCRIPTURES.

The sudden and total change in the opinion of modern criticism concerning the genuineness of the Apocalypse, alone makes sufficiently manifest what our sentiments should be as to the infallibility of said criticism, and demonstrates the folly of those who suffer themselves to be overawed by its prejudices, as evinced in its premises, results, and dogmatic utterances. In one point, it is true, Lücke and, with him, the Schleiermacher school, and Baur and, with him, the so-called Tübingen school agree, namely, in the assumption that the man who wrote the Apocalypse could not have written the fourth Gospel.†

In the case of Lücke, apart from the influence of traditional and temporal prejudices, we may regard the absence of a comprehension of the fundamental diversity of Evangelicodidactic mediating forms and Apocalyptic-symbolic immediate forms, as one of the chief sources of his declaration against the authenticity of the Apocalypse; though upon this diversity rests the difference between a form of language‡ more purely Greek and that which possesses a more Hebraizing character, as well as the apparent difference in the eschatological ideas presented in the Gospel and the Apocalypse. Eusebius, in particular, with his presbyter John, has been a misleading guide in this connection.§

That which the prejudice of the Schleiermacher school-theology accomplished in Lücke's case was brought about in the case of Baur by the Hegelian school-philosophy, by which he was enslaved. In the application of the deductions of the Hegelian philosophy to the Apocalypse, however, Baur has far exceeded all the bounds of simple philosophical bias. We cannot comprehend how a theologian who showed himself prone to interpret purely historical writings (for instance the Epistle to Philemon) allegorically or symbolically, could, in dealing with a truly allegorico-symbolical writing, so completely turn the tables, and attempt to force upon this Book, of all others, a historical and literal signification. In thus doing, he sought, indeed, to establish a basis for his utterly false and infirm construction of history, alleging the Apocalypse to be the record of a presumptively narrow Ebionite Judo-Christianity. He has thus, however, with one stroke of his pen, utterly caricatured and robbed of dignity, not the Apocalypse only, but also the historical portrait of John, one of the finest in the gallery of great men.

The points of unity in the Apocalypse and the Gospel, as well as the Epistles of John, subsist, first, in the subject-matter: Agreement in the doctrine of the Revelation of God; in the doctrine of Christ, especially as the Logos; in the doctrine of the Kingdom of Light, and the Kingdom of darkness; in the doctrine of Satan, of the Redemption, of the Church's gradual progress in development; finally, in the doctrine of Antichristianity, and in the doctrine of Eschatology in general. The fact that John does not give Antichrist the title of Antichrist, is indeed with significance for those only who cannot accommodate themselves to the allegorical portrayal of Antichrist.

In conjunction with the above-mentioned material points of unity, we have the idiocrasies of the Johannine images and expression, the unitous character of which is apparent even through the contrast of the Evangelic and the Apocalyptic style. Christ, the Logos; the Light; the Lamb; the Redeemer, with His blood; the Bridegroom. The Church, the Bride. Christ's gifts, the water of life, manna, etc. Comp. Guerike, p. 549. In respect to the similarity of diction (in upholding which we submit that it is in perfect conformity to speech ἐν πνεύματι, that, in its originally Greek, yet more Hebraizing expression, it should suffer the mother tongue of the Seer to be more apparent through it), Guerike's collection of examples, p. 550, note 1, may be compared. As to the alleged difference between the idiocrasies of the Gospel and Apocalypse, which, according to Lücke and others, occur in matter and form, the greater part of the spoils of these commentators are dependent upon the false literal apprehension of the Apocalypse, whereby a distinction is converted into a contradiction by the process of forcing a purely spiritual meaning upon the Gospel, and, on the other hand, grossly materializing the Apocalypse. Over and above the inner grounds for a belief in the genuineness of the Apocalypse, we have historical testimonies to its authenticity. These may be classified as direct and indirect.

Direct testimonies: Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. "Ἄνθρωπος τις, ὃν ὄνομα Ἰωάννης, εἰς τῶν ἀποστόλων τοῦ Χριστοῦ."). Irenæus (Hæres. IV., 20, 11: Sed et Joannes, domini discipulus in Apocalypsi; and other passages). Clement of Alexandria (the witness of John, which is cited in Stromata IV., is in Stromat. II. denominated ἀποστολικὴ φωνή). The Muratorian fragment. Advers. Marcion III., 14: Tertullian (Nam et Apostolus Joannes in Apoc.; and other passages). Of almost equal weight are isolated indirect testimonies. The statement of Andreas, Proleg. in Apoc., in regard to the testimony of Papias (on this compare the voluminous discussions). The statement of Eusebius in regard to Apollonius, Hist. Eccles. v. 18. To these add the Apocalyptic reminiscences in the Shepherd of Hermas and elsewhere (c. g., in the letter of the church at Vienne and Lyons). On the strength of the general corroboration of the Apocalypse by historical testimonies, comp. besides Guerike, p. 533, and Langen, Grundriss der Einl. in das Neue Testament, Freiburg, 1868, p. 152, a number of Commentaries, especially that of Ebrard, p. 1 sqq. Deserving of special consideration is the fact that most of the witnesses to the authenticity of this Scripture stood in closest connection with the school and tradition of Asia Minor; this is particularly the case with Irenæus. Finally, we have the self-witness of the Apocalypticist, ch. i. 1, 2, 9, xxii. 8, and it is as little possible to set this aside as to do away with the tradition of the Apostle John on Patmos; on the contrary, each lends support to the other. Dürstendieck (p. 65) in vain seeks to invalidate this testimony. He even goes so far as to declare that this self-witness proves the Apocalypticist not to have been the Apostle John. The sum of the matter, however, is that Dürstendieck was unable properly to appreciate the import of the prophetic-symbolical style. What grounds are those that he puts forth! No trace of Apostolic authority in the seven Epistles! No trace of the intimate relation between the Apostle and the Lord! Of course the names of the Twelve Apostles, ch. xxi. 14, are likewise assumed to prove the non-Apostolic character of the Apocalyptic John. For other remarks of a similar nature, evidencing a lack of even an elementary understanding of symbolism, see p. 96 sqq.

It is demonstrable that the arguments adduced in denial of the genuineness of the Apocalypse are, as a general rule, rooted in misunderstandings and prejudices.* The most ancient prejudice regarded the Apocalypse as chiliastic, because Chiliasm was wont to lean for support upon the Apocalypse. True Chiliasm, however, consists not in the symbolical application of the number one thousand to the transition æon between the earthly and the heavenly world, but in the following particulars: 1. In a principal unsatisfiedness with the first Parousia of Christ, and a consequent transferring of the full principal redemption to His second Parousia; hence, in a subtilely carnal lust of outward appearance. 2. In the chronological computation of the times before the advent of the thousand years, literally understood; with a constant tendency to assign the termination of those times to as early a period as possible, in a common chronological sense. 3. In the idea that, in consequence of a gradual preponderance of the Kingdom of God in the outer world, there will arise, in idyllic wise, a Millennial Kingdom, sensuous, or even Jewish in form,* before the Parousia of Christ (comp. Confessio August., Art. XVII.), whilst Scripture holds in view a spiritualized Millennium, ushered in by a fearful epic catastrophe; a Millennium which is not to commence until after Christ's appearance, i. e., after a single, final appearing, which shall then suffer no interruption whereby a third would be rendered necessary (as Sier, among others, assumed).†

The second prejudice,‡ represented by Luther (see Guericke, p. 531), did not find a sufficiency of orthodox dogmatism and doctrine of justification in this Scripture; nay, it even took offence at the vision form. The doctrine of justification by faith alone, laying, as it does, the foundation of salvation in the forum of conscience in view of the first Coming of Christ (Rom. iii.), cannot, without a slavish adherence to the letter of the great dogma, be transported to the forum of the last judgment in view of Christ's second Coming; this position is clearly proved by the Eschatological Discourse of the Lord, Mat. xxv. 31 sqq. The double meaning of the question concerning the relation of good works to salvation must be met by a strict distinction between principal and eschatological σωτηρία § [salvation].

The more recent prejudice, represented by the greatest humanist of modern times, Göthe, || irrespective of its material estrangement from the Christian monotheistic purport of the Apocalypse, stood before this Scripture as before an enigmatical sphynx; and this was the case because minds occupying the summit of school Hellenism, are not in possession of the theoretic key to an understanding of a production which formed the summit of the Hebrew theocratic view.

The Schleiermacher prejudice (Introduction to the New Testament), in consequence of a one-sided spiritualism [Spiritualismus] ¶ that could not accommodate itself even to the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ, much less to the Eschatology, i. e., the whole ideal realism, of the Apocalypse, was unable to settle to its own satisfaction the question of harmony between the Gospel and the Apocalypse; and this, especially, as the expressed opinions of Schleiermacher, in regard to the Apocalypse, betray a cognizance of it for the most part superficial.

The prejudice of Baur, finally (see Düsterdieck, p. 64), the worst of all prejudices, treated the Apocalypse as a monument of Ebionite, Jewish-Christian narrow-mindedness.

† [Chiliasm, or Millenarianism, do indeed defer the full redemption (the ἀπολύτρωσις) to the second coming of Christ (see Luke xxi. 28; Rom. viii. 23; Eph. i. 14, iv. 30); they, by no means, however, transfer the "full principal redemption" to that period. Lange seems to have contemplated, under this term, not the general class who are so styled by the English-speaking Church, but some peculiar section thereof. The essential doctrines of Chiliasm are: 1. The establishment of the Millennial Kingdom (political and righteous) in a glorious personal advent of Christ. 2. Two resurrections; the first, that of the righteous dead (or the specially faithful) at the establishment of the Kingdom; the second, a general resurrection at the close of the Millennial æon. Within the limits of these fundamental doctrines the different subordinate views, as is to be expected on such a subject, are many. See foot-note, on p. 62.—E. R. C.]

‡ Further particulars in regard to these prejudices, see below.

§ Time seems to have worked a conviction in the minds of many that it is a necessary part of Lutheran orthodoxy to regard the Millennial Kingdom as situate in the Middle Ages, as does Hengstenberg, or at least to deem this doctrine worthy of serious consideration.

That Dr. Hitzig endeavored to prove that John Mark was the author of the Apocalypse, is a fact that requires but a passing mention.

Addendum: Relative to the Life of John.

In respect to the personality of the Apostle himself, to the history of his life, and to his other writings, we refer to the Introduction to the Commentary on the Gospel of John, p. 3 sqq. [Am. Ed.].

We must supplement the sketch there given with the remark that Keim's assertion, to the effect that John never resided in Ephesus, has been conclusively refuted by Steitz in Studien und Kritiken, 1868, No. 3, p. 487: "The tradition concerning the activity of the Apostle John."

§ 3. TIME AND PLACE.

The point of departure for an investigation into the locality and time of the composition of the Apocalypse is given by the following passage in the introduction to this Book, ch. i. 9: "I, John, your brother and companion in tribulation, and in the Kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ."

It is a well-known fact that banishment for the sake of the Christian faith was a form of imperial violent justice, of whose exercise under Nero nothing is known; it was employed, however, by Domitian in company with other regular measures.* Neander (I. 51) is incorrect in denominating the order for the expulsion of the Christians from Rome, which was issued by Claudius in the year 53, and directed primarily against the Jews (Christians, of course, being relatively implicated), an order of banishment. Irrespective, moreover, of the fact that Nero's persecution of the Christians was mainly local, and, hence, necessarily affected two† Apostles who were sojourning in Rome at the time, but left unscathed an Apostle who can scarcely have been settled in Ephesus so soon, but was probably working quietly somewhere in the East‡—irrespective of this fact, we repeat, it is in the highest degree improbable that Nero should have put two Apostles to death, and, when he did take hostile notice of the third, should have let him escape with a simple banishment to Patmos. Under Domitian, on the other hand, together with the execution of Christians, we meet with instances of their political banishment. This fact, alone, assigns the Scripture which we are examining, which manifestly originated on the basis of the Apostle's banishment to Patmos, to the time of Domitian.

Guerike has been persuaded by modern criticism § to depart from the traditional hypothesis that the Apocalypse was written under Domitian, and to transfer it to the time of Nero. The testimony of Irenæus, which, on account of its Johannean references, is of the greatest weight in this matter, runs thus (Vol. V., ch. xxx.): "The Apocalypse was beheld not long ago, but in the time of our own generation (near our own day), toward the end of Domitian's reign." This, Guerike (p. 62) interprets as having reference to Domitius Nero; as if, in the time of Irenæus, any man would have applied the name of Domitian to Domitius Nero. The reasons adduced by Guerike in favor of the origin of the Apocalypse in the time of Nero, are the issue, for the most part, of grand misunderstandings. Had Jerusalem been already destroyed, he declares, in the first place, the Apocalypticist would, in some manner, have referred to the fact. It was a most natural proceeding, however, in pursuance of the Lord's precedent, Matt. xxiv., to point forward to the destruction of the city, if that destruction had not already taken place. Just this is the case, he continues, with reference to those passages that treat of the Temple of God, ch. xi. 1, of the treading of the Holy City under foot, ver. 2, and of the partial destruction of the Holy City, ch. xi. 13. Here § See authorities; for instance, note 3, p. 523. Baur, Lücke, Reuss, Thiersch.

Guerike falls entirely out of the symbolical apprehension of the Book, back into the literal historic understanding of it—a thing which has happened to so many exegetes on so many different occasions, giving rise to endless confusion. In accordance with the interpretation which we have just stated, it would be necessary, likewise, to understand the “Jews,” ch. ii. 9, and iii. 9, literally, and, consequently, in company with the disciples of the Tübingen school, to regard the Apocalypse as an Ebionite production. It would, however, also be necessary to understand the passage cited, ch. xi. 2, as declaring that the Temple itself should be preserved, and only the outer court be abandoned to destruction; similarly, the Prophet would necessarily seem to declare that only the third [tenth? ch. xi. 13—TR.] part of the city should be destroyed, and that by means of an earthquake, and not by the Romans; and also that only seven thousand men should perish on this occasion, and not hundreds of thousands. Again, the passage, ch. xvii. 11, “or, rather, vers. 7–12,” is regarded as indicating the time of the composition of the Apocalypse to have been at least immediately subsequent to Nero. Here, also, the erroneous hypothesis shows a lapse into pure, and compared with the Apocalyptic view, shallow historicalness. The seven kings, it is asserted, denote the first seven Roman emperors; the eighth denotes the returning Nero (p. 525, note 2). Thus, Guerike, though apprehending the passage merely as a type, avows his faith even in this most absurd and untenable invention of modern criticism, viz.: that an Apostolic man such as John shared the vulgar and ridiculous popular superstition relative to the return of Nero.* Guerike likewise cites the Hebrew coloring of the Apocalypse in support of his views. He believes this to be an indication that the author of the work in question had not yet attained that command of the Greek, in writing, which he afterwards possessed. Even in regard to the manner of thinking, Guerike pretends to discover in the Gospel and the first Epistle of John an advance in pneumatological repose and clearness (see p. 530, especially the note). So soon as there is a thorough appreciation of the character of the Apocalyptic vision, in respect to the idiocracy of the visionary mode of contemplation ἐν πνεύματι (1 Cor. xiv.), as well as in respect to the laws of Apocalyptic diction—which is as distinct from historical diction as the diction of the Greek tragic poets is from Attic prose—these ideas of an advanced literary and dogmatic culture of the Apocalypticist will—as unsupported misconceptions of the law of diverse styles, a law extant not only among the Hebrews, but also among the Greeks—be set down to the account of the prejudices of modern criticism.†

Let us review the historical testimonies concerning the time and place of the origin of the Apocalypse.‡ The principal testimony is that of Irenæus (Advers. Hæres., V., 30, 3; in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles., III., 18, see above). The testimony of Eusebius and Jerome is similar. Clement of Alexandria and Origen offer no contradiction. Clement says (Euseb. 3, 23, and Quis Dives, § 42): “As, after the death of the tyrant, he returned from the isle of Patmos to Ephesus.” Origen (on Matt. xx. 22, 23) calls the tyrant “the king of the Romans.” The testimony of Irenæus outweighs opposite and conflicting declarations: the declaration, namely, of the Syrian Apocalypse, followed by later exegetes (see Guerike, p. 61), to the effect that John was banished under Nero; and the declaration of Epiphanius, that his banishment took place under Claudius. Hengstenberg has shown in detail the correspondence of the contents of the Apocalypse to the time of Domitian, and the history of his

* The application of this popular romance to the criticism of the Apocalypse will ever remain a melancholy symptom of that narrow-minded desire for innovation peculiar to modern criticism. Modern critics believe that they make the biblical facts truly historical only by transporting them out of the visionary sphere of the elect, of the Apostles themselves, into the cloudy region of popular tradition—dragging them, as it were, from Tabor to the market-place. And it is even asserted that such a fable of the masses was a main motive of the Apocalypse, and that it is now the guiding-star to its chronology. Comp. against this view (as has been already recommended) Düsterdiock; also a Treatise by Weiss, in Theolog. Studien und Kritiken, 1869, Part 1st, entitled: Apokalyptische Studien. The value of Weiss' contribution is, however, considerably lessened by its support of the same prejudice that gave birth to the unlucky invention above mentioned. Even he maintains that it was a common supposition of the Apostolic period that the return of the Lord would take place in the then current age; and the recognition of this belief he declares to be the common property of modern Theology! The true canon, that all Prophecy must take its departure from the history of the time in which it is given, is thus transformed into the erroneous canon that confines it to that time.

† Comp. the author's Apostolisches Zeitalter, Vol. I., p. 186.

‡ Das Apostolisches Zeitalter, Vol. II., p. 448.—Guerike, p. 61 sqq.

time. He brings forward, in support of his position, these three traits especially, viz.: that martyrdom was already a fact of long standing in the memory of the Church; that a condition of the churches, such as is depicted in the Seven Epistles, warrants the assumption that those churches had already been in existence for a considerable time; and that the despotic rule of Domitian is plainly reflected in the description of the Beast.* Hengstenberg further pertinently remarks, that the opposite conclusions, which some profess to draw from individual passages of the Apocalypse, are attained only by affixing a literal interpretation to these passages, in contravention of the character of this symbolical Scripture.

In a chronological reference we have the following to remark. In accordance with the second Epistle to Timothy, we must necessarily suppose that Timothy was still the head of the Ephesian Church at about the time when a John, or a pseudo-John, is declared to have taken upon him to write, in an episcopal character, to the whole diocese of this metropolis.†

The Apocalypse, therefore, belongs to the time of Domitian; and in respect of its visional origin, it came into existence on Patmos. Where it was written—whether in Patmos or in Ephesus—might appear doubtful. The circumstance that the Apostle despatches an epistle to Ephesus is, however, in favor of the assumption that he indited the Book whilst he was still on Patmos.

The darkest point amongst many dark points attaching to modern criticism, is the supposition that the popular Roman tradition setting forth the speedy return of Nero, as one who was not really dead, but only reported so to be, could have been weakly accredited by an Apostolic man such as the author of the Apocalypse is, perforce, admitted to be, and that it could have been made a principal item in his visionary task.

It is as little within the bounds of possibility that the Apocalypticist, as a mere successor of Daniel, should have contemplated by the Great Beast (Rev. xiii.), which embraces all the four Danielic beasts, i. e., all the world-monarchies, a single king; or that he should have reduced a symbolical king, signifying an entire world-monarchy, to a single individual king.

§ 4. IMPORT OF THE APOCALYPSE. ITS TWOFOLD OPERATION.

Though the Old Testament Prophets were forced lamentingly to cry: "Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed" (Is. liii. 1), still their word did not return void, but did substantially accomplish that whereto it was sent (Is. lv. 8-11). Though Jewish national pride did sensuously and chiliaristically misinterpret the prophetic pictures of God's Kingdom, with disastrous effects for the great fanatical mass of the Jewish people, yet the elect of the nation have taken counsel of the prophetic Word concerning Israel's future, and have found it a compass in all times of darkness. It has lifted up and quickened their hope; it has inspired them with patience and perseverance in the sorest struggles; and, through the better understanding of its spiritual meaning, they have learned to find in its symbolical promises the true path of the future, and have thus been taught renunciation of the world and the abandonment of all sensuous hopes relative to the Kingdom. With the aid of the prophetic Word, the pious of Israel could familiarize themselves with the idea of a poor Messiah; of a Messiah who should, through suffering, attain unto glory. The prophecy of John the Baptist is founded upon the word of the Old Testament Prophets; and the like is true of the whole theocratic self-surrender and import of Mary. Nay, Christ Himself found a comforting confirmation of the rightness [appointedness] of the different stages of His life and passion in the Old Testament Prophecies; as is proved by the whole series of His references to the Old Testament. Thus, too, the Apostles, with the clearest spiritual vision, connected all their promulgations, doctrines, prophecies, and consolations with the Old Testament in general; more particularly, however, with the prophetic word; and, finally, in the most special manner, with eschatologico-apocalyptic prophetic words—with passages in the second half of Isaiah; with Zechariah and Daniel.*

It is, consequently, to be expected that the Apocalypse should be destined to fill a similar place in the times of the New Covenant; that, in an analogous manner, it must, therefore, necessarily remain, for the majority of Christians, an obscure Book—a Book, not simply mysterious, but even enigmatical; that it should be an occasion to many of misunderstanding, of visionary and fanatical misinterpretation, as was the Old Testament Eschatology to the Pharisees; that it should become an offence to many, as were the Prophets to the Sadducees; and yet that it should continue to be, to the kernel of the Christian Church, a guiding-star over the path of the future, shining all the brighter for the gathering gloom of the times. Hence it follows that, in this its import and destination, it will be subject to constant development and confirmation in the days of the future.

It is said that the Chiliasm of the primitive age of Christianity was kindled and nourished by this Book. In the Thessalonian Church, however, chiliastic expectations developed themselves before there was an Apocalypse. And as surely as the second Epistle to the Thessalonians refuted such chiliastic fancies, so surely has the Apocalypse, with its grand perspective into a distant future of the Kingdom of God, and with its exhortation to martyr-patience, exercised a similar composing and purifying influence; whilst, on the other hand, throughout the actual martyr-period, it comforted, strengthened, and lifted up afflicted believers in the midst of their great temptations.

Possible though it was in the Middle Ages for men, in the most subtle chiliastic enthusiasm, to imagine that they had already reached the time of the Millennial Kingdom, yet, even then, the healthful counter-operation of the Apocalypse was not lacking. The signs of this Book gradually encouraged the firmer minds to make a bold stand against the boundless encroachments of the Hierarchy; and though false anticipations and wild extravagancies are to be met with at this time, as in the case of Frederick II. of Hohenstaufen, in the visionary and enthusiastic Franciscans, and many quiet thinkers and prayers, owing to the fact that they held Antichrist to be significant of the Papacy, still the large element of truth in the partly defective, partly erroneous exegesis of the time served to weaken the terrible spell in which priestly despotism held men's consciences, and, by means of the Mystics and the various forms which Protestantism assumed in the Middle Ages, to prepare the way for the Reformation. It was relatively a small thing for Boniface to fell the great oak of Thor, at Geismar, † in comparison with the boldness that was requisite finally to lay the axe to the tree of the conscience-despotism of the Middle Ages.

It is true that, in the period of the Reformation, a new chiliastic misunderstanding was inflamed by the coloring and images of the Apocalypse; a misunderstanding resident chiefly in the minds of the fanatical masses. Since that day there has been a constant growth of miniature chiliastic absurdities, the offspring of a sensuo-enthusiastic apprehension of the Apocalypse. But though ancient Protestant orthodoxy was fain to view the sombre times in which it was placed through so rosy a medium as to fancy itself in the midst of the Millennial Kingdom; though it recently, in the person of Hengstenberg, could even believe this Kingdom to be already past; and though, on the other hand, a rationalistic exegesis, under the pretence of according greater weight to the historical basis of this Book, has robbed it of its eschatological import, its high signification, as portraying the history of * [Jewish national pride did, indeed, ignore those Prophecies which foretold an Advent of the Messiah in humiliation, and Jewish carnalism did misinterpret those which spoke of the future Kingdom as one of righteousness. With these errors Chiliasm has no sympathy. But Jewish piety never relinquished Israel's hope of a political Kingdom to be established on earth (in which righteousness should prevail). This hope Chiliasm also entertains. It is from a failure to distinguish between a mere political Kingdom, and a political Kingdom established and conducted on principles of righteousness and in which righteousness shall dwell, that much of the opprobrious denunciation of Chiliasm proceeds; as though one should charge upon the advocates of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, that they contemplate a sensuous Heaven, and place the gratification of carnal lusts amongst the joys of the blessed. This failure to distinguish is akin to that of the Jews of our Saviour's day; although, it is admitted, it occurs at a different stand-point. It may also be observed, that a great system is not properly chargeable with the extravagancies of a few individual supporters. (See also the Excursus on the Basileia, p. 93 sqq., especially Part II.)—E. R. C.]

† [See Neander's Church History, Vol. III., p. 51 (1st Ed.)—E. R. C.]

God's Kingdom; it has, nevertheless, worked out its destination in the centre of the evangelical congregations of the faithful, fostering the hope of better times; animating the cause of missions; stripping the idols of the modern day—for instance, the first Napoleon—of their magic lustre; and confirming more and more the lofty middle station of the faithful as between the hierarchic and anarchic minds of the most recent times.

Doubtless, in the future, the importance and influence of this Book will constantly increase with the increasing confusion and gloom of the times, with the increasing danger which they offer to sound and sober faith.

But, in considering the grand position which, as the New Testament Book of Futurity, the Apocalypse now occupies and shall continue to maintain, let us not forget the quiet influence which it has exerted as a word of God, opened here and there by one and another believer; a word embracing the past and every present, as well as the future; a word which has operated through all the Christian ages to the instruction and edification of the Church, and especially of individual, contemplative readers of the Bible; operated as an inexhaustible spring of instruction, and even of study, of consolation, of elevation, of warning, and direction.

It is, further, a wonderful fact that this most mysterious of all the Biblical Books seems destined to mediate, in its retroaction, an ever richer explanation of all Holy Scripture—above all, of the Prophetic writings, especially the Old Testament Eschatologies and Apocalypses.

Notwithstanding all this, the Apocalypse is not a popular Scripture. Its author is conscious, at the very beginning of his work, that his revelation is designed, primarily, only for the servant of the Lord, in a special sense; and though at the end he repeats the direction given him, that the Book shall remain unsealed (ch. xxii. 10), he is, nevertheless, convinced that, unsealed, it will be a sealed Book to many; that many will add to it and many take away from it. Accordingly, he has furnished the holy and glorious concluding Scripture of the Bible with an earnest warning, though he was unable to prevent men from ignoring the pure sense of even this warning word. Christ makes an entirely analogous provision in reference to the Law, Matt. v. 19 (comp. Comm. on Matthew, p. 110 [Am. Ed.]). He who augments the terrors of the Apocalypse by englooming additions, prepares for himself an additional burden of Apocalyptic plagues. But he who superficializes its prophecies, lessens his share in the great epic, triumphal joys of the Kingdom of God. If he have done this in innocent narrow-mindedness, an idyllic measure of joy may still be his; he may “sport with the lamb on the water's edge,”—he can have no conception of the joys of the lofty watch-tower. Even modern criticism, so one-sided in many respects, has felt itself constrained occasionally to make laudatory mention of the religious importance and influence of the Apocalypse, comp., e. g., Beuss (Die Geschichte der heiligen Schriften N. T., p. 146).

§5. VARIOUS INTERPRETATIONS OF THE APOCALYPSE. HISTORY AND LITERATURE OF ITS EXEGESIS.

The history of the various explanations of the Revelation of John has been treated in detail in Lücke's work: Versuch einer vollständigen Einleitung in die Offenbarung Johannis [Attempt at a Complete Introduction to the Revelation of John], p. 950 sqq. Bleek also has given a somewhat circumstantial account of it in his Lectures on the Apocalypse [Vorlesungen über die Apocalypse], p. 23 sqq. De Wette has given a synoptical view of it in his Commentary, Introduction, p. 14 sqq.

In sketching briefly the essential points of Exegesis, we follow the plan of Lücke; without, however, sharing his views. In accordance with the fundamental principle that the situation of the Church has, in every age, exercised a decisive influence upon the interpretation of this Book, we distinguish: 1. The pre-Constantinian Martyr Era. 2. The Old Catholic Era, extending to the beginning of the Middle Ages, or to Gregory the Great. 3. The first and predominantly Theocratic half of the Middle Ages, to the time of Innocent III. 4. The second and altogether Absolutist-Hierarchical half of the Middle Ages, reaching to the Reformation. 5. The period of Old Protestant Theology. 6. The Pietisto-Mystical period. 7. The Historico-Critical and Rationalistic period. 8. The Modern Time, as the period of the most manifold antitheses and of incipient universal Apocalypics.

I. The Pre-Constantinian Period.

Fundamental Thought: The Millennial Kingdom is to come; according to the chiliastic view, its coming is imminent. Here, however, we must disclaim the false idea entertained by Lücke, and many modern exegetes, who confound the expectation of a real, triumphant Kingdom of God, which, in a symbolical sense, is to last a thousand years, with Chiliasm proper. This fundamental error, alone, obscures the worth of the otherwise so valuable work of Lücke; its value is no less diminished by his modern definition of historical interpretation, according to which definition only the lower region of the people makes genuine history. Another faulty feature of his book is the failure to distinguish between symbolical and allegoristic interpretation, the latter of which invariably forms the complement of a false historical interpretation. Finally, we would call attention to his own misunderstanding of the idea of recapitulation, and his polemic against the misunderstood idea of the same.

The Chiliasm which was already germinant in the time of the Apostles (see 1 Thess.), which did not wait for the Apocalypse, which attained its rudest development in the Chiliasm of Cerinthus, was followed by the Church-historical Chiliasm of the Montanists. In antithesis to this last, the Apocalypse was rejected by the Alogians, and by Carius in Rome. It was recognized, indeed, by Origen, but allegoristically treated by him (allegorical it was of itself). Origen's disciple, Dionysius of Alexandria, denied that it was written by the Apostle John, yet admitted its canonicalness; he, however diminished its dignity and worth by assigning the authorship of it to the presbyter John, in which opinion he appears to have been timidly followed by Eusebius.

On the other hand, the realistic apprehension of Justin Martyr and Irenæus—the latter of whom is the most important authority concerning the Apocalypse of this period—with all its uncertainty in exegetical method, must, in respect of its sound churchly bent, be carefully distinguished from chiliastic notions;* so much the more, since Irenæus couches in symbolical terms his grand conception of the Millennial Kingdom as a transition period intervening between the form which the Kingdom of God wears in this dispensation and that which it will assume in the dispensation to come.

Hippolytus was akin to Irenæus. He was especially versed in Apocalyptic symbolism: he was, however, on the one hand more historical (literal) than Irenæus, and, on the other, because more historical, more allegoristic.

The Martyr Victorinus of Petabio (A. D. 303) coincides with this period so far as time is concerned; in point of fact, however, he forms the beginning of the following period.

Lactantius anticipated the arrival of the Millennial Kingdom at the end of the sixth series of a thousand years—soon, therefore (in about two hundred years); he believed that Rome should first fall, as also the dominion of Antichrist, who, according to him, was to come out of the East.

II. The Old Catholic Time Down to Gregory the Great.

Fundamental Thought: The Millennial Kingdom has already appeared with the Victorious Coming of Christ. There is still extant a Commentary on the Apocalypse written by Victorinus, bishop of Petabio, in Pannonia.† He regards the thousand years as an approximate designation of the time that should elapse from the first Coming of Christ to the end of the world. The details of his interpretation are somewhat grossly historical and allegoristic. Yet he gives the first sketch of the cyclical mode of presentation, in contradistinction to the chronological method (Lücke, p. 980). For a long time subsequent to him, the study of the Apocalypse was checked by the Dogmatics of the Synods, the criticism of Eusebius, et al., and the Church's satisfaction with its connection with the State. "Not until the end of the fifth century did there appear among the Greeks the first connected and complete Commentary on the Apocalypse, written by Andreas of Cappadocia." This work is in many respects correctly symbolical; frequently, however, Origenistically allegoric. Lücke censures its author for not referring ch. vi. 12 to the destruction of Jerusalem, and for "not even interpreting ch. xi. 1 sqq. as relating to the Temple at Jerusalem." Andreas' exegesis approaches more nearly to that of Lücke in ch. xi. 8 and xi. 13; but his refusal to interpret ch. xvii. 8 as having reference to the returning Nero, declaring that this notion is based upon unchristian γοηρεία, Lücke considers as denoting a want of proper regard for historical truth! In some other respects, also, he evidences a more correct understanding of the Apocalypse than was possessed by Lücke (see Lücke, p. 987), e. g., in the assumption that the seven heads and mountains are seven world-kingdoms. Many points, we admit, are involved in perplexity and uncertainty, especially the sequence of events. He, also, placed the time of the Millennial Kingdom in the period intervening between the first Coming of Christ in the flesh and the coming of Antichrist.

The second independent Greek commentator is Arethas, who succeeded Andreas in the archiepiscopal chair of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, in the sixth century.

In the Latin Church, Augustine and Jerome are the first whose views claim our attention; they wrote no Commentaries on the Apocalypse. Augustine's view of the "recapitulation" of the Apocalypse is a totally external one (Lücke, p. 994), like his analogous view of the days' works of creation.* He, too, regards the Millennial Kingdom as significant of the present rule of Christ. Jerome interprets allegorically, e. g., he makes the Holy City denote the present world. The Donatist Tichonius, a contemporary of Augustine, wrote a Commentary on the Apocalypse which, altered probably in conformity to the views of the Church, has been classed among the works of Augustine. Primasius and Cassiodorus made use of Tichonius. Primasius, likewise, favored the view of the parallel recapitulative style of the Apocalypse.† Cassiodorus also reckoned the Millennial Kingdom from the birth of Christ; he held the first Resurrection to be significant of Baptism.

"The view of the antithesis between the Church and the worldly State was now continually and increasingly pressed upon the Apocalypse."—LÜCKE.

III. First and Predominantly Theocratico-Hierarchical Half of the Middle Ages to the Time of Innocent III.

Fundamental Thought: The Millennial Kingdom threatens to come to an end in this period, with the advent of the year 1000 (or, regarding the number as an approximate one, somewhat later). The first commentators of this period are Bede and Ansbert. The former followed the method of Tichonius. Ansbert availed himself of the writings of Victorinus. He is in favor of the so-called recapitulatio, and (justly) declares the application of ch. xiii. 8 to Nero to be absurd. Next come Berengaudus, the Benedictine, Haymo, bishop of Halberstadt, and Walafried Strabo, in the ninth century; no one of these gives evidence of particular originality.

"The conventional interpretation of the Apocalypse, according to which the Millennial Kingdom was dated from the first Appearance of Christ, etc., was productive, especially in the last decades of the tenth and in the beginning of the eleventh century, of a great movement in the Church. Men expected the speedy coming of Antichrist, and the end of the world." The end of the world did not come, and the delusion passed away. Now, however, the interpretation was modified into a symbolical acceptance of the number one thousand, as denoting an indefinite age.

Lücke leaves undecided the query as to whether the Greek exegete, Æcumenius, wrote a Commentary on the Apocalypse (Lücke, p. 992).

In the twelfth century, Richard of St. Victor produced a Commentary on the Apocalypse. In the thirteenth century, his example was followed by Albertus Magnus. The * "Multa dicuntur, ut mentem legentis exerceant."

† His interpretation of the name 666 is interesting (see Lücke, p. 997).

Commentaries attributed to Anselm of Canterbury and Thomas Aquinas belong to a later time. The mode of interpretation continues, as a whole, historico-allegoristic.

IV. Second and Absolutist-Hierarchical Half of the Middle Ages from Innocent III. to the Reformation.

Fundamental Thoughts: 1. The Millennial Kingdom is soon to expire. 2. It is soon to arrive. The method is the same as in the preceding period. Predominant practical and arbitrary application of the Apocalyptic predictions to the circumstances of the time.

"The prevalent custom of attributing to the Apocalypse imaginary allegorical and mystical meanings was the occasion of a growing abuse of this Scripture. Any historical condition of the Church whatsoever—every stand-point assumed by individuals or classes—every party aim, even—every curious inquiry into the future—every craving after it was believed to be provided with its immediately corresponding Divine prophetic word of condemnation, of encouragement, or consolation—nay, it was even maintained that the Apocalypse furnished exact information in regard to the time of these various phenomena." (LÜCKE, p. 1005.)

"The Romish Church commenced this public abuse." Innocent III. declared that Mohammedanism was Antichristianity, and Mohammed the false prophet. Subsequently, the Hohenstaufens were called Antichristianity; and, again, the heretical opposition was thus denominated. The opposition turned the tables. Gregory IX. first called Frederick II. the Beast of the abyss; whereupon Frederick retorted by applying the same appellation to the Pope.

There is a celebrated interpretation of the Apocalypse from the pen of the Abbot Joachim of Floris, in Calabria.* From this and other writings of Joachim, the visionary and enthusiastic party of the Franciscans fabricated the "Everlasting Gospel," after Rev. xiv. 6. This suggests the Introductorius in Evangelium Æternum, by Frater Gerhardus. (We must also mention the Postils on the Apocalypse, by John Peter de Oliva, A. D. 1297). The disposition of the Ages into the Kingdoms of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, forms the chronological clue of Frater Gerhardus' work; according to him, the period of consummation begins with the year 1254. Joachim of Floris, however, construed the Apocalypse as, from its nature, it should be construed, i. e., more or less cyclically (see Lücke, p. 1009). Joachim does not regard the Papacy itself as Antichrist; Antichrist, he declared, was mixtus—compounded of the corruption of the Church, the enmity of the State to the Church, and Saracen and heretical opposition; "Rome, as the carnal Church, is the new Babylon; the Papacy is, as Dante represents it, Antichristian only in its secularization" "Not merely the fanatical Franciscans, but also the Catharists, and Apostolicals, the Waldenses, the Wicliffites, and Hussites, armed themselves with the Apocalypse as an offensive and defensive weapon against Rome and the Roman Papacy."

Both sides indulged in chronological computations, suiting them to their respective interests (see Lücke, p. 1010 sqq.). Nicholas de Lyra regarded the Apocalypse as a prophetic mirror of all history. Laurentius Valla and Erasmus explained only the verbal sense of the Apocalypse, avoiding deeper investigations; yet Erasmus, in one remark of his, hinted at an historical interpretation, as representative of the then existing time.

V. Period of Old Protestant Theology down to the Appearance of Pietism.

Fundamental Thought: The thousand years are past. Over against this orthodoxistic opinion, the Anabaptist view: The thousand years have just dawned. Method still litero-historical as a whole, in conjunction with allegoristic details. Prominent antithesis between the chronological and the parallel disposition of the Apocalypse.

"The interpretation of Luther marks, in general, the spirit in which the Apocalypse was henceforth interpreted and used in the new Church. Down to more modern days, it belonged to the churchly character of Protestant exegesis to regard the Apocalypse as a prophetic compendium of Church History; the reference of its prophecy to the Antichristianity of papal Rome being looked upon as a settled thing. This is the spirit of almost all the Commentaries of the Reformed as well as the Lutheran theologians of this period. The only particular point of difference in them is, that some, like Luther, Chytræus, and the generality, assume an historical progress in prophetic development; whilst others, like Conradi, apply the law of parallelism to the Apocalypse, and assume a progress from the obscure to the plain. Only a few, like Theodore Beza and Joachim Camerarius, refrained from a prophetic interpretation, and directed their energies principally to a discussion of the verbal meaning and the immediate historical references of the Apocalypse." Lücke.

The interpretation of Luther, in the Preface to the Apocalypse (see Lücke, p. 1014), is very external and abortive; it is arranged to suit the facts of Church History. The thousand years, as he thinks, extend from the time of the Apocalyptist to Gregory VII. The Catholic interpretation of this period is akin to the Protestant, with the exception, of course, of a polemic resentment of the charge of Antichristianity (Lücke, p. 1019). Among the Catholic exegetes, we must mention Bellarmine, Ribeira, Alcassar (the latter, according to Hentenius and Salmeron, makes the following disposition of the Apocalypse: [1] Conflict of the Church of Christ with the synagogue, chs. v.-xi.; [2] with Roman heathenism, with worldly power and fleshly wisdom, chs. xii.-xix.; [3] Victory, repose, and glorification of the Church, chs. xx.-xxii.). Alcassar's follower was Cornelius à Lapide. His first Protestant opponent was David Pareus, whose system of interpretation was partly cyclical, partly chronological (according to Collado, Lausanne, A. D. 1551; he, however, took for granted a perfect parallelism between the seals, trumpets, and vials of wrath). Leading idea: The Apocalypse a drama. The summit of anti-papistical interpretation was reached in the Commentary of the fanatical Hoe von Honegg. An approach to the cyclical apprehension of the Apocalypse is marked by the synchronistic method of the English commentator Mede (first part of the Apocalypse: the fortunes of the Kingdom; second part: the history of the Church). Cocceius apprehends the Apocalypse as portraying the history of the Church.* Witsius, the antagonist of Cocceius, was in favor of the "recapitulation" theory. Grotius, according to Lücke's ideas, represented a great progress in exegesis; he explained the Apocalypse in the light of the historical events of its time, and of the time immediately subsequent to its composition. The Millennial Kingdom, he declares, commenced with the edict of Constantine, in the year 311. Hammond and Clericus interpret similarly. To this period belong also, on the one hand, the fanatical book of Eleonore Petersen; on the other, the explication of Bossuet, after Alcassar, Grotius, and Hammond. Bossuet applies the number 666 to Dioclesian; the loosing of Satan at the end of the thousand years, he thinks, has reference to the Turks and Lutheranism. The French Catholic exegetes, Le Maître de Sacy and Aubert de Versé, in point of characteristics, likewise belong to this period.

VI. The Pietistic-Mystical Period.

Predominant Fundamental Thought: The Millennial Kingdom is to come. Application of Apocalyptic chronology in a cabalistic, rather than a symbolical, sense.

The Spenerian hope of better times leaned for support on the Apocalypse; it marks the beginning of a turn in exegesis (Lücke, p. 1028). Even the important work of Vitringa ('Ανάπτυξις, etc.) which Lücke does not sufficiently appreciate—once more placed Antichrist's appearance in the future, and found many followers (see the notes in Lücke, p. 1035). He restored the polemical interpretation of the Apocalypse against Rome—an interpretation which had been discarded by Grotius.

The more definite application of Apocalyptic numbers was commenced by the English exegete Whiston (a theologian and mathematician). He first declared that Christ's Coming should take place in the year 1715; and then transferred it to 1766. The great philosopher Isaac Newton was the author of Observations on Daniel and the Revelation of John. He supposed that the Revelation was written in the reign of Nero, and believed that it could be understood only so far as it was fulfilled; the grand revolution of things predicted in Rev. x. 7 and xi.

* Anton Driessen was a fantastical follower of this commentator; he flourished in the beginning of the eighteenth century (see Lücke, p. 1038).

12 had not yet come to pass, according to him. In complete contrast to Newton, the master of numbers, the theologian Albrecht Bengel, in various writings (Lücke, p. 1039), especially in the "Erklärte Offenbarung Johannes," founded his interpretation particularly on the definition of the Apocalyptic numbers. On his elaborate and ingenious theory of numbers, comp. Lücke (p. 1040 sqq.) and Burk, Leben und Wirken Bengels [Life and Labors of Bengel] (p. 260 sqq.). In Bengel's exegesis historicist error walks hand in hand with chronistical misunderstanding. The Angel with the everlasting Gospel (ch. xiv. 6) was declared to be Johannes Arndt or his school. The Angel who announces the fall of Babylon (ch. xiv. 8) was thought to be Spener or his school. The Millennial Kingdom, it was said, was to begin on the eighteenth of June, 1836. Notwithstanding the impugnement of the Bengelian system, on the part of Pfeiffer and Kohlreiff principally, that exegete found admiring followers; by some, his system is conserved, with modifications, down to the present day. Lücke furnishes us with a record of his earlier disciples, p. 1044 (note 2; in reference to the diffusion of his system in England and Denmark, see p. 1045, note 1). The person who most overrated him was Oetinger, although the latter endeavored to combine the system of Bengel with the thoroughly chiliastic Apocalypics of Swedenborg. The more recent followers of Bengel, forming an antithesis to the historico-critical and rationalistic mode of interpretation which has come in vogue since his day, are mentioned by Lücke, p. 1055. They are as follows: Michael, Friedrich Semler, Jung Stilling (Siegesgeschichte), Typke, Gerken, Opitz, Leutwein, Rühle von Lilienstern, Sander. A long series of writings, reaching down to the present time, are by Lücke regarded as offshoots of the Bengelian bent, p. 1055, note 4.

VII. Historico-Critical and Rationalistic Period.

Fundamental Tone or Key-note: Predominant Volatilizing of Apocalyptic Eschatology; especially the Prophecy of the Millennial Kingdom; amid a constantly gaining confounding of such Prophecy with Chiliasm.

The motive or inciting cause of the period which we are at present examining—a motive whose sketching by Lücke is not distinguished for clearness—was, negatively, that system of criticism which maintained that the Apocalypse consisted of purely supernatural predictions of Church History and church-historical numbers; and which applied such exegesis to the support of chiliastic extravagances. Positively, it was the felt need of a firm historical and psychological basis for the prophetic glimpses of futurity. The errors of this new critical bent were the issue, in part, of the delight which was occasioned by the novel historical stand-point—historical, it was believed, for the first time in a true sense. For the rest, these errors proceeded from doubt as to the Spirit of Prophecy, as to the authenticity of the Apocalypse, as to the demonic forms of the kingdom of darkness, and as to the reality of Biblical Eschatology.

According to Lücke, Abauzit of Geneva inaugurated this tendency in his Essai sur l'Apocalypse. "The Revelation, written probably under Nero, is nothing—according to its own profession—but une extension de la prophétie du Sauveur sur la ruine de l'Etat Judaique." The German Wetstein was guilty of a curtailing and stinting of the Apocalypse, similar to that attempted by the French Swiss. According to Wetstein, Gog and Magog made their appearance in the rebellion instigated by Barcochba. Harenberg took sides with Abauzit, submitting, however, that the last four chapters of the Apocalypse are eschatological. He believed the Book to have been originally written in Hebrew. Semler* "thought that the true original spirit of the Apocalypse was Jewish chiliastic fanaticism."

On the common basis of a one-sided criticism, Herder formed an antithesis to Semler in this question as in other and more general respects. The contrast is exhibited in his work entitled: Maran-Atha, das Buch von der Zukunft des Herrn, des Neuen Testaments Siegel.† [Maran-Atha; the Book of the Coming of the Lord: the Seal of the New Testament.] The historical perspective of this book is, like that of Abauzit, barren and contracted in the extreme: it consists of Jerusalem and the Jewish war. The formal treatment of the Apocalyptic theme, on the contrary, is enthusiastic, full of idealization, and appreciation of the figurative language of the Orient (see Lücke's commendation). Herder called the Apocalypse: "A picture-book, setting forth the rise, the visible existence, and the future of Christ's Kingdom in figures and similitudes of His first Coming, to terrify and to console." Hartwig, though the disciple of Herder, abandoned the Oriental view for the Greek, holding, with Paræus, that the Apocalypse was a drama. This dramatical view of the Scripture in question was subsequently fully carried out by Eichhorn. Others, taking a more general, poetical view of the Apocalypse, made metrical versions of it; of these the chief were those of Schreiber and Münter, and one by a follower of Bengel, Ludwig von Pfeil. The interpretation already advanced by many, according to which the Apocalypse depicted the downfall of Judaism and heathenism, and the tranquillity and glory of the Kingdom of Christ, re-appeared in the writings of Herrschneider (Tentamen Apocalypses). Johannsen, in his Offenbarung Johannes, set forth a similar view. Thoroughly novel and original, at variance both with the ancient Church-historical and the modern synchrono-historical view, is the book which appeared under the title of Briefe über die Offenbarung Johannis. Ein Buch für die Starken, die schwach heissen, Leipzig, 1784. [Letters on the Revelation of John. A Book for the Strong, who are called Weak]. "The [anonymous] author interprets all specials as generals, relative to the laws, arrangements and developments of nature and of the human life in general; amid, and according to, which laws, arrangements, and developments, God's Kingdom on earth shall one day be perfected." Kleuker maintained once more the eschatological signification of the Revelation (Ueber Ursprung und Zweck, etc. [On the Origin and Design, etc.]). On the other hand, Lücke mentions as followers of the bent of Herder and Eichhorn, Lange, Von Hagen, Lindemann Matthäi, Von Heinrichs (p. 1055).

VIII. Modern Times as the Period of the most Manifold Antitheses and of Beginning Universal Apocalypses.

Fundamental Tone or Key-note: Gradual forthcoming to view of the Theocratic mode of presentation in historical Cycles and conventional Biblical and Apocalypitical Symbols; amid the working of Chiliasm, historic, and neocritical Antitheses.

The first impulse to the furtherance of the study of the Apocalypse, by the study of Apocalyptic literature, was given by Corrodi in his critical history of Chiliasm, of which he had, however, no clear conception. With critical studies, in detail, on the literature of this subject, Bleek entered the lists as early as 1820* (Lücke, p. 1058). He was followed by Ewald, with his Latin Commentary, issued in 1828. Züllig's work, entitled: Johannes, des Gottbesprochenen eschatologische Geschichte [The Eschatological History of John, The man to whom God spoke], combined great pretensions with the most limited field of view, restricting the prophecy of the Book to the destruction of Jerusalem; in its formal aspect, however, it furnished archæologico-apocalyptic material. Lücke closes the examination of the achievements of German Theology in this direction with the names of Tinius, De Wette, Hofmann, Hengstenberg, Thiersch. The first is designated as popular; his views occupy a middle station between the ancient and the more modern treatment of the Apocalypse. De Wette bears off the palm. The reactionary sentiments of Hengstenberg—to whose learning and achievements, in particular directions, special prominence is given—are, according to Lücke, conjoined with elements truly promotive of the growth of Apocalyptic science; for instance, the chapter on the time of the composition of the Apocalypse is an article of considerable value. It is a well-known fact, however, that Hengstenberg's Commentary (popularized by Dressel, and translated into Dutch by Schotel), has given marked offence by its false restoration of the obsolete view in regard to the Millennial Kingdom—as if it were already past. The refutations† of this view, however, have occasioned fresh vindications of it—effusions which seem to indicate that the doctrine in question is regarded as a choice and precious item of genuine Lutheranism.*

Lücke has given utterance to an acknowledgment of the mediatory view of Thiersch (in his work, Die Kirche im apostolischen Zeitalter, p. 251 sqq.) in terms more favorable than could have been expected after his deliverances against the "recapitulation" theory. Thiersch thinks that the Apocalypse, as a whole, should be regarded as a cyclical arrangement of visions, and maintains that, in detail, it possesses the character of prefigurative types of the development of the judgment of the world. Lücke's acknowledgment has almost the aspect of assent.

In conclusion, Lücke glances at the most recent Apocalyptic Theology of the English Church "on both sides of the water." He also submits a list—laying claim to our thanks in so doing—of the most important English Apocalyptic works of modern times. This list, communicated to Lücke by Dr. Geibel of Lübeck, contains the following names: Whitaker, Galloway, Woodhouse, Holmes, Fuller, Cunningham, Gauntlett, Tilloch, Culbertson, Croly, Woodhouse again, Hutcheson, Jones, Irving, Addis (p. 1066 sqq.). Lücke gives special prominence, however, to a work with which he is personally acquainted, viz.: Samuel Davidson's Introduction to the New Testament, etc., 3 vols., London, 1848 to 1851.

Davidson distinguished a fourfold manner of apprehending Apocalyptic Prophecy.

1. Preterists. The prophecies contained in the Apocalypse were fulfilled with the destruction of Jerusalem and the fall of heathen Rome. This is the view of Bossuet, Grotius, Hammond, Wetstein, Eichhorn, Ewald, De Wette, Lücke, and others, among whom is the American expositor, Moses Stuart.

2. Continuists. The Apocalyptic prophecies are predictive of progressive history, being partly fulfilled, partly unfulfilled. Thus, Mede, Brightman, Isaac Newton, Woodhouse, Cunningham, Birks, Elliott (and many Germans).

3. Simple Futurists. According to these, only the first three chapters relate to the historical present of the Seer, all else having reference to the absolute future of the Lord's Appearing. Thus, Burgh, Maitland, Benj. Newton, Todd, and others.

4. Extreme Futurists. Even the first three chapters of Revelation are a prophecy relative to the absolute future of Christ's Coming—being a prediction of the condition of the Jews after the first Resurrection. Kelley, and some Irish authors.

Lücke's criticism of this system, see on p. 1068.

Davidson himself regards the Apocalypse as a prophetic poem of the Hebrew order, i. e., an Apocalypse. He justly maintains that the ages should be regarded as symbolical, not chronological, periods. Notwithstanding this, however, he lays down a historical, not a synchronistic, succession of prophecies: Jerusalem, heathen Rome, the heavenly Jerusalem; viewing them, however, in the light of symbolical terms. He also judges the Millennial Kingdom to have commenced with the conquest of heathen Rome, but makes it a period of indefinite duration; in this particular he, in some measure, resembles Hengstenberg.

Lücke's work is supplemented in De Wette's Commentary, p. 14 sqq., by a number of notices (representatives of Parallelism, p. 15; the exegetes Seraphinus de Fermo, Ubertinus de Casalis, Lambert, Bullinger, Conrad, Jurieux, Launoï, Crocius, Matth. Hofmann, Calovius, Lüderwald, Holzhauser, Franz, Baumgarten-Crusius). This catalogue of Apocalyptic literature is continued by Bleek; the work of this commentator, however, mingles views relative to the authenticity of the Apocalypse with those which have reference to its contents. Bleek embodies his own sentiments in the following propositions: 1. The Apocalypse was not written by the Apostle John, but by John the Presbyter of Papias; 2. It is not, as Eichhorn maintains, a general description of Christianity, as elevated above Judaism and heathenism; but is intended to console and lift up the oppressed Christendom of its time by pointing to the nearness of the Lord's return (by an error, then?); 3. The Parousia of Christ is connected with the fall of heathenism, and especially of Rome, as the principal seat of heathenism; the destruction of Jerusalem, on the other hand, forms no particular item in the prophetic delineation of this Scripture; neither do the visions of the first part of ch. ix. contain any reference to particular historical events of the Roman-Jewish war.

DE WETTE, in compiling his own Commentary, availed himself freely of the manuscript of Bleek (see Bleek, p. 62). De Wette sets forth the view which he himself entertains under three heads: 1. Nero, the Antichrist. 2. The occupation—not destruction—of Jerusalem, an event which, for the Apocalyptist, is still in the future (the scope of Apocalyptic prophecy, then, is narrower than that of the Eschatological Discourse of Christ, Luke xxi. 24!). 3. The Millennial Kingdom, intervening between the conquest of Antichrist and the end, and commencing after the first Resurrection.

LÜCKE, besides viewing Rome as the new Babylon, maintains that Jerusalem presents an antithesis to the Kingdom of Christ, though he apprehends this antithesis in a less absolute sense (to which Bleek takes exception, Beiträge zur Evangelien-Kritik, p. 187, and Studien und Kritiken, 1855, p. 163).

After an exposition of the fundamental idea of his book, Bleek first introduces FR. SANDER (Versuch einer Erklärung, etc.). Sander supposed that 1847 was the decisive year when the Millennial Kingdom should begin. Chr. Hofmann's view, in "Weissagung und Erfüllung," pp. 300–378, is sketched on p. 66 of Bleek's work. Then follow Hengstenberg, Ebrard, Auberlen. Incidental mention is likewise made of Elliott and Gaussen. The editor of Bleek's Lectures has added an examination of the Commentary of Düsterdieck (Part XVI. of Meyer's Commentary).

The leading positions of CH. HOFMANN are as follows: The Apostle John was the author of the Apocalypse; he wrote in the reign of Domitian; the prophecies form distinct series, which, in part, run parallel with each other. The Woman, ch. xii., is the Israelitish Church; the Wilderness is the land of Israel, in the last days, when that land shall again—according to the whole Judaizing school of Hofmann—become the seat of Sacred History. Babylon is Rome; the Seven Kings are seven world-kingsdoms. The Beast out of the Abyss is Antiochus Epiphanes!

HENGSTENBERG: John is the author of the Apocalypse; he wrote it in the time of Domitian. Its contents are: prophecies relative to world and Church history—principally fulfilled; they are arranged in seven groups, supplementary to each other. The Beast is the God-opposed world-power; it is portrayed in seven phases. The Head wounded to Death is the Roman world-power. The Battle, ch. xix., denotes the Christianization of the Germans! The Millennial Kingdom is past, having begun with the Christianization of the Germans. We have no warrant for assuming that any reference is made to the Romish Church, or to Judaism, or to idolatry in the abstract; but reference is had to the anti-Godly and anti-Christian temper of the world. No personal appearance of Antichrist is taught; no first Resurrection, in the true sense of the term, but the bliss of believers in the other world is set forth. The liberation of Satan, the time of Gog and Magog, is significant of our own time, especially since 1848 (according to this theory, Satan would now not only be bound, but must even already be cast into the lake of fire).

EBERARD (conclusion of Olshausen's Commentary, Vol. VII.). He remarks, by way of preliminary, that his is the first attempt on record, distinctly and thoroughly to separate the interpretation of prophecy from the question as to its fulfillment (Bleek is of opinion that he has not zealously prosecuted this endeavor). His views are as follows:—

The Seven Churches have a typical significance for the later Church. The Seven Heads of the Beast are seven world-monarchies. The sixth head is the Roman world-monarchy. This Roman world-power is the Beast that ascended out of the Sea; one with the Whore or Babylon.

The Ten Horns are the Germanic and Slavonic tribes of the migrating nations; these inflict a deadly wound on the Roman world-power, which, however, revives in the new Roman Empire. The Papacy itself is the Beast that ascends out of the Earth, the False Prophet. The Seventh Head are ten kings in the last time. Then ensues the kingdom of the personal Antichrist and the fall of Babylon; finally, the return of Christ. The Forty-two Months = 1260 days (chs. xi. 2, 3, xii. 6, xiii. 5) are a mystical term for the entire period from the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus to the conversion and restoration of the Jewish nation. Wonderful preservation of the corporeal Israel during the Antichristian time. The two witnesses are the Law and the Gospel. The  $3\frac{1}{2}$  days, ch. xi. 9, 11, like the  $3\frac{1}{2}$  times, ch. xii. 14, are equivalent to  $3\frac{1}{2}$  years.

AUBERLEN (Der Prophet Daniel und die Offenbarung Joh., Second [German] Edition, 1857): Daniel forms the basis of the Apocalypse. The Beast out of the Sea is the world-power in general. The Seven Heads are seven world-monarchies. Conditional identification of the Woman in ch. xvii. 3, with the Woman in ch. xii. The Flight of the Woman into the Wilderness is the transfer of the Church of God from the Jews to the Gentiles, and its establishment at Rome. The Harlot is the secularized Church of God in the world; not merely the Catholic Church, though that is denoted in a special degree. The Seven Mountains, ch. xvii. 9, are seven great world-powers, though with allusion to Rome. The Beast slain, as it were, to Death, and thus having a similarity to Christ, is an externally Christian world-kingdom which bears the Woman, the Harlot. Hereby are denoted a secularized Christianity and a Christianized world (making mutual concessions: the mark of the Christian ages). The Wound is healed; this denotes the modern apostasy, the beginning of which appeared in the bestial outbreaks of the French revolution. The Eighth Head is the kingdom of Antichrist. The Millennial Kingdom and the first Resurrection are to be apprehended literally (in the Chiliastic sense, writes Bleek) and as future.

DÜSTERDIECK turns back into the track of the Schleiermacher spiritualistic school of Bleek, De Wette, Lücke, and others. His idea of the ethical conception of inspiration, i. e., humanly conditioned inspiration, which he distinguishes from the rationalistic conception of Eichhorn and the magical (abstract supernatural) conception of Hengstenberg, seems to have led him to this stand-point; he, however, manifests an approach to Hengstenberg in regarding the form of the visions as a part of their substance.

In the most recent times, the cultivation of the Apocalyptic field has resulted in a very extensive literature. We distinguish: 1. Works which pertain preëminently to the criticism of Apocalypics. 2. Theologico-critical Treatises. 3. Theological and theologico-practical Commentaries. 4. Monographs. 5. Chiliastic Monographs. 6. Edifying and homiletical matter on the whole Apocalypse and on individual sections.

1. With the general prefatory dissertations on Apocalypics we may rank the most recent Commentaries on Ezekiel, Zechariah, and Daniel. In reference to the latter Apocalypticist, see the Introduction to the Commentary on Daniel (of the Lange series), pp. 20 and 45 [Ger. Ed.] (reference may also be had, at some future time, to the Introductions to Ezekiel and Zechariah). We have already examined the Apocrypho-Apocalyptic literature.

2. The theologico-critical Treatises include, above all, the articles in Theological Dictionaries, especially the article on the Revelation of John in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie; further, Dissertations on the Last Things (Althaus, Luthardt, Gerlach, etc.). Works on the Biblical Theology of the New Testament, and on the Apostle John and his writings. Isolated writings: Wieseler, Zur Auslegung und Kritik der Apok. Literatur, 1. Beitrag, Göttingen, 1839. Dannemann, Wer ist der Verfasser, etc., Hanover, 1841. Stern, Einleitung, Breslau, 1851. Hosse, Die Prophetie der urchristlichen Gemeinde, oder der rechte Standpunkt der Betrachtung der Offenbarung St. Johannis (Monatsschrift für die Evang. Kirche von Rheinland und Westfalen, 1853, No. 7). Rinck (Wilhelm Friedrich), Apokalyptische Forschungen, Zurich, 1853. *Das System der Apokalypse nach J. Medus v. Charbonnel, 60 Jahre noch und die Welt ist nicht mehr, Stuttgart, 1850. Older works, by Petersen, Leutwein, Tübingen, 1821, 1830.

In reference to chiliastic writings, we would here again remark that it is necessary to distinguish, with a clear perception of Church history, between the Biblical doctrine of the Millennial Kingdom in a symbolical sense and actual Chiliasm. Some commentators—as, for instance, Schleiermacher—have fallen into the error of regarding the doctrine of this subject as set forth in the Apocalypse itself, as Chiliasm.

§ 6. SUPPLEMENTAL TO LITERATURE ON THE APOCALYPSE.

Having laid the preceding history of the exposition of the Apocalypse before our readers, there remain but a few points to glance at, and those more especially of a general character.

The literature on the Apocalypse, like that on the Canticles, is of immense extent. The charm of mystery, of the most significant images, of a language expressive of the strongest feeling, as well as the piquancy of a striking singularity and an apparent sensuousness of view, all these traits combine to assemble exegetes and ascetics, devout men and visionary enthusiasts, allegorists, critics, and criticists of all kinds, before the sanctuary of these Books. From the history of general exegetical literature alone, might be gathered an extensive history of the literature on the Apocalypse. We must limit ourselves here to a mention of the most noted catalogues, the best synopses, and a few suggestive supplementary remarks.

According to Heidegger's Enchiridion, p. 661, the exegesis of the Apocalypse—apart from Commentaries embracing the entire Scripture, or the whole of the New Testament—seems to have been treated, principally, by Reformed and Catholic Theologians. The Biblical Archivarius of Lilienthal, p. 707 sqq., however, shows that Lutheran Theologians have likewise been extensively engaged in the interpretation of this Scripture; with especial reference to the question of Chiliasm. Still, the Bibliotheca Theologica of Walch, Part IV., p. 760 sqq., also represents the Reformed literature on the Apocalypse as particularly extensive. Fuhrmann's Handbuch der Theolog. Literatur, Vol. II., 1st half, p. 343, presents but a meagre account of the more recent literature on this subject (Vogel, Herder, Münter, Eichhorn, Sam. Gottl. Lange). Two lists of the principal works on the Apocalypse are contained in Wiener's Handbuch der Theolog. Literatur, p. 274 (on Daniel, p. 221), and in the first supplement, p. 42 (Daniel, p. 35). There are much more extensive lists in Danz' Wörterbuch der Theol. Literatur, pp. 53, 57 (Daniel, pp. 206-208) and in Supplement I. (reaching to the year 1841-42), p. 6 (Daniel, p. 25). The account of Apocalyptic literature is carried down to the present day by the catalogues in Hagenbach's Encyclopädie, p. 190 (Daniel, p. 187); in Hertwig, Tabellarische Uebersicht, p. 77. Guerike, Isagogik, p. 490. Reuss, Geschichte der Heiligen Schriften Neuen Testaments, 4th Ed., p. 147 (Gnostic Apocalypses, p. 260. Apocryphal Apocalypses, p. 270. On Apocalyptic exegesis, pp. 576, 603).

On the Book of Daniel, Keil, Einleitung ins A. T., p. 438. Comp. also the articles on the Revelation of John, and Daniel, in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie.

The following Commentaries likewise furnish catalogues of literature: De Wette, p. 22 sqq. Olshausen, Ebrard, p. 15 sqq.

For more general lists, see Lange's Comm. on Matthew, p. 19 [Am. Ed.]. John, p. 46 sqq.

In Lücke's Versuch einer vollständigen Einleitung, there is much literary information in the notes.†

[In Darling's Cyclopædia Bibliographica, London, 1859, there are more than 52 columns consisting of the Titles of Special Works on the Apocalypse.—E. R. C.].

Armbruster, Die 7 letzten Posaunen (1) oder Wähen (1), Stuttgart, 1830.

† Antiquarian catalogues of Apocalyptic literature: Steinkopf in Stuttgart, Catalogue 18, 22, 29; Heckenbauer in Tübingen, No. 24; Hanke in Zurich, No. 65; J. Moore, at Delft, Maake, Breslau, 91.

§ 7. GRAND MISCONCEPTION OF THE APOCALYPSE, AND THE REASON OF SUCH MISCONCEPTION.

We are not referring now, primarily, to that misconception which the Apocalypse, as a Biblical Book, must suffer in company with all other Biblical Books, or to that which, as a Prophetic Book particularly, it shares with all Prophetic Books--the misconception of unbelief;—we have reference at present to the misconception which it, specially, experiences at the hands, perchance, of earnest Christian men, or, it may be, of highly gifted minds.

Passing by the misunderstandings of the old Alexandrian school—such as, for instance, were occasioned in the mind of Dionysius of Alexandria by the spiritualism [Spiritualismus] of that school—three great instances drawn from the more modern period, subsequent to the Reformation, will suffice fully to illustrate this surprising fact. Three great men, of different tendencies, whose views we have already cited on another occasion, measured their intellectual strength against the Apocalypse, and signally came short in the effort. We have reference to LUTHER, GOETHE, and SCHLEIERMACHER.

LUTHER says, in his Preface to the Revelation of St. John, 1522: "I suffer every one to exercise his own judgment in regard to this Book of the Revelation of John. I have no desire to tie any one down to my error or prejudice. I say what I feel. I judge this Book to be neither Apostolic nor Prophetic, for more reasons than one. First and foremost, the Apostles did not deal in visions, but prophesied in words, clear and direct, etc. My mind cannot suit itself to the Book, and to me the fact that Christ is neither taught nor recognized in it, is good and sufficient cause for my low estimation of it," etc. Luther, in his preface to the edition of 1534, considerably modified this indiscreet deliverance, conserving, nevertheless, the expression of doubt (see Guerike, Isagogik, 531).

GOETHE gives utterance to the following sentiments in his Letters to Lavater (see footnote, p. 58): "I am a man of the earth, earthy; to me the parables of the unjust steward, the prodigal son, the sower, the pearl, the lost piece of money, etc., etc., are more Divine (if aught Divine there be about the matter) than the seven messengers, candlesticks, seals, stars and woes." It may be seen from this sketch that Goethe did not plunge very deeply into the study of the Apocalypse.

The opinion of SCHLEIERMACHER is particularly unfavorable (Einleitung ins Neue Testament. Vol. VIII. of his Sämmtliche Werke, p. 449 sqq.). This commentator perceives, as he thinks, a lack of unitous connection in the Apocalypse; he discovers in it nothing but universal plagues, represented under sensuous images to which he can attach no great religious value. Viewing the Scripture in question thus one-sidedly, it seems to him a matter of indifference whether the visions be understood or not, and his inference is, that "even a thoroughly correct interpretation of this Book would be productive of but little profit."

Schleiermacher delivered lectures on Church History, yet one grand fact seems to have escaped his observation, viz., that, in the darkest times of the Church, the Apocalypse contributed much to the maintenance of Christian hope and steadfastness. The circumstance that he regarded the Book as Chiliastic, in accordance with an exceedingly superficial prejudice, is deserving of nought save a passing mention.

The cause of this misapprehension is far more evident in the case of Schleiermacher than in the case of Luther. In the Apocalypse, as well as in the Epistle of James, Luther seems to have missed the doctrine of justification. Schleiermacher, on the other hand, was unable to accommodate himself to the Hebrew-symbolical style either of the above-mentioned Epistle or of the Apocalypse. He brought his Hellenizing mode of view to bear upon these Scriptures in particular.

The criticism of the school of Baur has recently reached its meridian in the sphere of the Protestant union. Under this head belongs: Schellenberg, Die Offb. Joh. Ein Vortrag, Mannheim, 1867 (see the Theol. Jahresbericht for 1867, p. 179).

Any attempt to award a full measure of appreciation to the Holy Scriptures, particularly those of the Old Testament (Schleiermacher's misconception of that is well known)—the Prophetic Writings more especially, and hence most especially the Apocalypse—is still greeted with general coldness and disfavor; and the principal reason of this is, doubtless, the confounding of the Hebrew revelational style of writing, and the Græco-Roman intellectual style. For a more general treatment of this subject, we refer our readers to the introductory remarks on Apocalypics.

§ 8. RULES FOR THE INTERPRETATION OF THE APOCALYPSE.

Under the caption: The True Principles of Exegesis, Ebrard (p. 27 sqq.) lays down the following canons:

1. The exegete is by no means to turn to those 'lights which Church History affords,' but is independently to interpret the given text, as such, in accordance with the general rules of exegesis.

2. The business of the exegete is not to query whether such and such a prophecy has been fulfilled; it is his simply to question—what is written here? etc.

3. Exegesis must be conjoined with a careful consideration of its roots in the Prophecies of the Old Covenant.

4. There must be a careful comparison of similar and dissimilar items.

5. Nothing should be symbolically interpreted which is not proved to be symbolical in the Apocalypse itself or by Old Testament visions. Nothing should be apprehended literally which is demonstrated to be a symbol.

6. In exegesis we are not to proceed from the external and formal sides of prophecies, but, on the contrary, always and everywhere from the subject-matter.

The result of these provisions is couched in the following terms: "That school which, in the Revelation of John, finds the fundamental points of Churchly development prophesied; which discovers in it neither conjectures and ideas, nor passages of Church-historical or eschatological detail, but real, true prophecy, is as yet in its infancy."

Such is, doubtless, the case. So far as exegesis is concerned, however, it can assuredly be productive of no harm, if we make use of such "exegetical illuminations" as Church History may offer, as well as examine into the fulfillment of prophecy, reserving to ourselves full liberty the while.

We need not here repeat the rules of general theological hermeneutics. If, however, we follow the progress of Apocalypics, a series of definitions will result from the chain of developments—ranging themselves thus: 1. Revelation; 2. Prophecy—Messianic Prophecy, in particular; 3. Eschatological Prophecy, or Apocalypics.

Parallel with these three material elements we find the following formal elements: 1. Historicalness in ideal significance; 2. Symbolical colors and forms in the service of holy, i. e., objective-subjective, vision; 3. A Hebrew ground-form, which has thoroughly adopted the New Testament idea of universalism; or the perfect synthesis of the Hebrew art-form and Hellenic culture. Let us briefly examine the result.

1 Revelation. It is to be decided whether the Apocalypse really pertains to the sphere of Revelation. And, in handling this question, we must admit that a critical discrimination between genuine and non-genuine chronicles of Revelation is not an art of the most recent times only; far less is it the art of indiscriminately rejecting all that ecclesiastical criticism has won by dint of persevering labor through long centuries. It being, then, ascertained that our Apocalypse, regarded both as a visionary fact, and as a written production, belongs to the sphere of Revelation, it necessarily results that its character as a Revelation must be defended against the tendencies of deistic and pantheistic exegesis. And this most especially in respect to its fundamental idea—the foretokens of, and preludes to, the coming of the Lord for the perfect revelation of His Kingdom. In antithesis to this fundamental idea, the utter frivolity of fictitious motives, such as, for instance, the wretched Neronic tradition, should be shown up. The mere fact that it is a Revelation, proves that the Apocalypse consists neither of mere histories, for the satisfaction of idle curiosity or a profane thirst for knowledge and love of science, nor of bare didactic conceptions, but of ideally significant facts appertaining to the Kingdom of God.

And here be it remarked that the present use of the term historical is calculated to mislead. Deism, in its day, bestowed the epithet of historical on that method which, for instance, constructed the Personality of Christ from Essenism, or translated the word pistis (πίστις) by fidelity to conviction; without questioning where, in the old time, the primeval source of all these things, whose novelty was but apparent, might be situate. In reality, the conception of an all-embracing, primitive cell was involved here. This hatred of the truly new and original is the property, in a still higher degree, of what are denominated modern times [Neuzeit]. Pantheistic rationalism regards Christianity as the product of a compound of Judaism and heathenism. The fact that both these were instrumental in preparing the way for Christianity, rationalism transposes into the assurance that they were the parents of it. Away with originalities!—seems to be the cry. Down, especially, with the highest of them, their peculiar stand-points, and aspects! History begins in the lowlands of humanity.—Then Gehazi must needs be more historical than Elijah, because he is so very human. Judas must be more historical than John. And, finally, the superstitious working up of the Neronic tradition must be more historical than the prophetic-original world-view of a John.

2. Prophecy. Prophecy, in the more general sense of the term, is the organ of the new; of the heavenly source-points of the Kingdom of God; of new words, new works. Prophecy, in the stricter sense, is the opening of new source-points within a sphere that had become historical—the sphere of individual, legal Judaism; the opening of source-points of theocratico-human universalism, of preludes to, and proclamations of, Christianity. This Prophecy is materially conditioned by contemporary inducements, formally conditioned by contemporary conceptions.

The fact that Prophecy has its points of departure in its own time must not lead us to conclude, however, that it is confined to its own time—least of all, to the errors of its time. What we have to conclude from this fact is that Prophecy, as the conditional disclosure of the eternal, which embraces the three periods—the past, the present, and the future—will be demonstrated to be the exegesis of the past, the pastorate of the present, and the guiding-star of the future, by means of its delineation of the fundamental traits of that future. Whilst it is said that Prophecy contemplates the future on a reduced scale in perspective concentration, it must be admitted that the religious measurement of time is totally distinct from the common chronological measurement. The difference is infinite between an Apostle's declaration: The Lord cometh quickly, and the same affirmation in the mouth of a Chiliast. The former does not reckon; he speaks forth his strong presentiment of the speedy Coming of Christ, because to him the history of the world is principally fulfilled; because he feels the Christologically winged, ever more rapid pace of its history to be a continual Coming of the Lord. But the Chiliast reckons,* for to him and his impatience the interval between the first and second Advents of Christ is so much dead space. When, however, the chiliastic impulse begins to assume an authoritative tone with its chronology, the Prophetic and Apostolic spirit brings to light the critical sobriety of its consciousness, effecting this now by the designation of seventy weeks, now by a statement of other symbolical measures of time. Surely it is but a starveling branch in the midst of the Theology of the present day—this confounding of the religious dates of Prophets and Apostles with chiliastic determinations of times and seasons.

3. Eschatological Prophecy. The distinctive mark of Eschatological Prophecy is this: with the genuine characteristics of true perspectivity, it must reach to the second Parousia. Now a spiritualism [Spiritualismus] which regards the idea of the second Parousia as a chiliastic error, cannot fail to be dissatisfied with this claim. To such spiritualism the very idea of Apocalyptic Prophecy is itself a πρώτον ψεύδος. Upon these premises a lengthy strife as to details might be carried on; but we have here to do simply with the collision of opposite principles. It is, indeed, not every negation of the eschatological expectation that has a principal consciousness. Manifestly false, however, is every view that leaves the chariot of Ezekiel, near the first Parousia, deep in the sand of the common historical circumstances of his time. As it may be said with truth that the Baurian Theology causes the Christology of the "Jewish Apostles" to fall behind the Christology of an Isaiah, and makes the characters of the Evangelists and Apostles vanish like murky shadows behind the distinct and shining forms of the Prophecies; so, likewise, it is claimed that the New Testament Apocalyptist knew really less of the future than his brethren of the Old Testament, or at least that his writings reveal less than the eschatological discourses of the Lord and the Apostle Paul. If we have become truly acquainted with the mode of Old Testament Prophecy, we shall not look upon those fundamental traits of the eschatological future which are presented in the Apocalypse as a ground-plan of either Church or world-history; much less shall we be able to mistake the parallel points in the character of Apocalyptic Prophecy, or fail to recognize its cyclical progression.

4. Historicalness in ideal significance, i. e., Hebrew theocratico-religious style. This caption is expressive, on the one hand, of the reality of the historical basis of the Apocalypse (the personal Christ; the Redemption, the Church, the Kingdom of God, the kingdom of darkness, the Resurrection, etc.); on the other hand, of the ideal significance of that basis, which makes it impossible that the Apocalypse should anywhere be purely historical; hence, chs. ii. and iii. may not be restricted to the seven churches of Asia Minor; chs. v. and vi. cannot have reference to periods of the Church's history; nor can ch. vii. and other passages be applied to the Jewish nation, etc.

5. Symbolical colors and forms in the service of holy, i. e., objective-subjective vision. If the colors are symbols, so too are the forms. And, consequently, so likewise are the numbers. It is unnatural, in a symbolical writing, to treat the numbers in accordance with either their common value or their literal value. Again, as it is necessary to distinguish betwixt symbols and dogmas, not taking for granted that a symbol—as, for instance, a beast, a lion—always denotes the same idea, but modifying the signification of the symbol by the context, so it is likewise necessary thoroughly to distinguish those visions which are produced by the Spirit of God from morbid subjective hallucinations, with which they now are often frivolously identified.

6. A Hebrew ground-form which has thoroughly adopted the New Testament idea of Universalism; or, the complete Synthesis of the Hebrew Art-form and Hellenic Culture. In the first place, we have to reject the common enthusiastic, as well as the common humanistic, notion which maintains the existence of a strife between the perceptions of immediate ecstasy, the mediation of those perceptions through the instrumentality of religious writings, aided by a knowledge of previously existing Holy Scriptures, and the framing of said perceptions in artistic forms. Secondly, we would controvert the notion which represents those moments of inspired conception and the moments when the mind, looking in upon itself, passes in review and commits to writing the treasures which have been entrusted to it, as mutually exclusive the one of the other. An ordinary knowledge of the nature of high poetic productivity should lead the critic beyond this sorry judgment. But the point upon which the greatest stress should be laid is this, viz.: that it is an hypothesis utterly contradictory of ethical psychology to suppose that exalted revelations could, by any possibility, have been poured into the vessel of narrow and impure folk-prejudices, folk-traditions, and fantastic extravagances. The wise man indeed says: Apples of gold in dishes [pictures] of silver, but never: Apples of gold in unclean earthen shards! Again, the identification of Apocalyptic forms with forms of Greek poetry, or the dissection of the Revelation into various irreconcilable parts, or the non-appreciation of its unitous composition, is totally at variance with the idea of the Apocalypse.

According to Reuss (p. 147) the following leading tendencies have been developed in exegesis:

1. The Chiliastic tendency. This he should have divided into: (a) the true eschatological tendency; and (b) its caricature, the really Chiliastic tendency.

2. The moral spiritualizing [spiritualisirend] tendency—more accurately defined: the religious-practical allegorizing tendency. This, however, may also be chiliastic.

3. The historizing tendency in various modifications: (a) Church-historical with polemic reference to the Papacy; (b) Political phases, in their relation to the development of the Kingdom of God; (c) Having reference only to the immediate period of the Jewish war.

4. Idealizing modernization of eschatological elements.

5. The purely historical tendency which is determined to insure the views of primitive times in full possession of their rights, and seeks to interpret the Book by them alone, without any regard to the views current in our own day. Reuss mentions Ewald, De Wette, Düsterdieck, Bleek, Volkmar, as representatives of this last tendency—a fact in itself sufficiently illustrative of his conception of the “purely historical.”

Davidson's arrangement of systems, noted by us under § 5, is of greater value.

Auberlen distinguishes [Daniel and Revelation, p. 359 sqq., Eng. Ed.]: 1. The Church-historical view: Bengel, the English and French commentators; Elliott, Gaussen. 2. The view which conceives of the Apocalypse as portraying contemporaneous history: Ewald, De Wette, Lücke, etc. 3. The conception of it as descriptive of the History of the Kingdom of God: Von Hofmann, Hengstenberg, Ebrard—to this third class of exegetes Auberlen himself belongs.

This simple and attractive disposition, however, includes important varieties under its several rubrics. And beside the pure forms, there are also mixed forms of interpretation.

In accordance with our view of the style of theocratic revelation, we might lay down the following distinctions:

1. Abstract historical view: (a) Absolutely Divine Church and world-historical predictions; (b) Absolutely human combinations of contemporary history and popular prejudices; (c) Theosophic and chiliastic mixed forms, confusing—not reconciling—the two elements of which they are composed.

2. Abstract idealistic view: (a) Quietistic allegorizings for private edification; (b) Modern allegorizings as translations of theocratic concretes into deistic or pantheistic abstracts; (c) Chiliastic, mixed forms—Swedenborg and others.

3. Concrete Christological forms: (a) Cyclical view; (b) Rhapsodical view; (c) Mixed forms.

§ 9. CONSTRUCTION OF THE APOCALYPSE.

The Apocalypse, in respect to its formal side, constitutes the meridian of Hebrew poetry and art, embracing in its individual forms the most diverse elements. In respect to its constructive side, again, it is, in accordance with the character of all Apocalypses, a finished composition, a unitous work of art, as are the Biblical Apocalypses in general; beyond the circle of these, the same may be affirmed of the Book of Job, and, in a certain sense, of the Biblical Books throughout. If the laws of this construction be but recognized, the obscure Book of Revelation will present itself to our eyes as a radiant constellation, a symmetrical cathedral, built upon a plan of perfect clearness and transparency.*

In the first place, the Apocalypse is a unitous ideal representation, furnished, like the Gospel of John, with a Prologue and an Epilogue.

The Prologue of the Apocalypse relates to the revelation of the second Coming of Christ, imparted to the Apostle John for believers—the seven churches in particular. Similarly, the Prologue of the Gospel relates to the revelation of Christ's first Coming for the Jews, the disciples of John in particular. The Prologue is comprised in ch. i. 1-8.

In the Epilogue of the Apocalypse the Lord enacts certain definite regulations in reference to His Coming, as in the Gospel of John; here, however, He definitely proclaims His speedy approach, and in the stead of the two Apostles, Peter and John, He sets forth, on the one hand, the word of prophecy concerning His Coming, and, on the other hand, the Church's prayer for that Advent. The Epilogue is comprised in ch. xxii 6-21.

* Comp. Lange's Apost. Zeitalter, Vol. II., p. 454.

The fundamental idea or theme of the Apocalypse itself is: The near Advent of Christ, as the end of the world, in order to the perfect revelation of the Kingdom of God, or the transfiguration of the world into the Father's House, the City of God; considered in respect to its presages and signs, for the instruction, warning, strengthening, and elevating of the believing Church.

The mediation of Christ's Coming is developed agreeably to the idea of a great Divine week; this, as the week of the second creation—the creation of an eternal spirit-world—forms both a contrast and a parallel to the Divine week of the first creation, whose Sabbath was the consummation of the natural world in the appearance of the first man. The characteristic of the Apocalypse, therefore, is the number seven. Seven churches; seven seals; seven trumpets; seven thunders; seven heads of Antichrist, or seven mountains; seven vials of wrath; the seventh Day appears as the perfect revelation of the Seven Spirits in the glorified Christ.

As within each individual seven, within the seven churches, seven seals, etc., a quaternary is set off against the following ternary—the quaternary forming the universal foundation; the fifth image, in the ternary, the special form of the crisis; the sixth the actual culmination of the crisis (the ἀρχή); the seventh image being the consummation or fruit of the foregoing ones, the bud of a following septenary—so it is with the arrangement of the seven principal items; here, too, a quaternary precedes the ternary. The first four images—the seven churches, seven seals, seven trumpets, and seven thunders—are descriptive of the course of the world as its approaching end; the last three images, on the contrary—the seven heads of Antichrist, the seven vials of wrath, and the seventh day, are descriptive of the end itself in its development from the judgment to the glorification of the world. In accordance with the above, the movement of the Apocalypse may be divided into two parts: the course of the world to the end, chs. i.–xi., and the course of the world in the end, chs. xii.–xxi*. We have only to remark that the fragmentary and mysterious sketch of the time of the seven thunders forms the transition from the first to the second half.

In accordance with the law of prophetic sight, the individual items of the septenary do not follow each other chronologically, like different historical periods (as Bengel and many others maintain); on the contrary, the individual visions are invariably pictures of the whole course of the world, characteristic of this course in its various aspects and dynamical relations, and linked together like rings. Accordingly, the seven churches, the pictures of Church-history, appear as the dynamical forerunners of the history of the world. The history of the world, in its seven seals, is the womb of those facts which pre-eminently preach repentance, i. e., the seven trumpets. In the midst of the seven trumpets, the seven mysterious thunders are heard; these are, doubtless, spring and summer messengers for the rejuvenation of the Church. But over against the ever richer, purer, and riper development of Christianity, and almost outstripping it, the parallel development of Antichristianity is seen, the Beast with its seven heads. These seven heads call forth the final judgments, the judgments of hardening, poured forth from the vials of wrath; these judgments are to be carefully distinguished from the penitential trumpets [trumpets calling to repentance]. The last judgment of wrath signalizes the turning-point which brings with it the Coming of the Lord—the seventh day.

But though the seven principal items do not, as chronological sections, progress from the beginning to the final goal, yet there is an advance toward the end in the point of view which each predominantly exhibits. They gravitate toward the goal of the Coming of Christ. And, in this respect, the seven seals are more eschatological than the seven churches; the trumpets more eschatological than the seals, and so on. Nevertheless, the first item, the series of the seven churches, comes in contact with the end of the world, ch. iii. 20, 21, and even the last items, the vials of wrath, and the seventh day, reach back into the beginning of the Christian course of the world. See ch. xiii., the characteristics of the world-monarchies.

* [See Introduction by the American Editor.—E. R. C.]

That which exhibits the construction in all its sublimity, however, is the idea of the absolute teleology of the Divine Government; the absolute and yet free sway of Divine Providence above a fluctuating liberty in the history of mankind, and over the demonic powers of hell; these hellish powers, with ever increasing boldness, induced by their apparent triumphs, are making constant advances against the Divine Rule, until, in the end, the complete unveiling and exhaustion of the Satanic kingdom results in the complete revelation of Heaven and the perfect appearing of the Kingdom of God, both Kingdoms grappling together at last in personal concentrations. This idea of the heavenly assurance of victory finds its expression in the fact that a heaven-picture invariably precedes an earth-picture; a heavenly pre-celebration of the victory of Christ is the invariable forerunner of the earthly crisis, of earthly strife and woe, the conflict of the Church Militant.

With the progress of these heavenly festivals of victory, in their eschatological succession, there is a corresponding progression in the forms of their revelation, i. e., the visions of the Apocalypticist. Thus, the one Apocalypse develops into a unity in the organic manifoldness of individual Apocalypses.

In accordance with the preceding remarks, the contents of the Apocalypse may be arranged as follows:

The Theme of the Book, which may be found in the conclusion of the Prologue, ch. i. 7, 8, is the great Advent of Christ. The Prologue itself characterizes the Book as the Revelation of the Coming of Christ, ch. i. 1-7, 8. The Epilogue proclaims the nearness and grand import of that Coming, ch. xxii. 6-21. The Apocalypse itself, therefore, begins with ch. i. 9, and closes with ch. xxii. 5. It falls into two parts: 1. The course of the world to the end of the world, chs. i. 9-xi. 14. 2. The end of the world to the glorification of the world, chs. xi. 15-xxii.*

THE PROLOGUE, Ch. i. 1-8.

PART I.—Course of the world to the end, or the future generally, as the Coming of Christ. The seven churches; the seven seals; the seven trumpets; the seven thunders, chs. i. 9-xi. 14.

1. The seven churches or lights. First day of creation: Let there be light, chs. i. 9-iii. 22.

a. Heaven-picture. Heavenly appearance of Christ, and ideal forms of the Church; the stars in His hand; the candlesticks at His feet, ch. i. 9-20.

b. Earth-picture. Earthly forms of the Church in the series of the seven churches; and the Lord in the spiritual coming of His word to them, chs. ii. 1-iii. 22.

a. The first four churches in their conflict between light and darkness, pictures of the developing Church: The active church; the martyr church; the mixed church; the enthusiastic church.

β. The three fundamental forms or aspects of the matured Church: The church cold in death; the church warm with life; the dying and lukewarm church (the world within; Christ without).

2. The seven seals or enigmas of world-history in its relation to the Church; unsealed by Christ. Or the second day of creation: Heaven and earth, chs. iv. 1-vi. 17.

a. Heaven-picture. Heavenly aspect of world-history, chs. iv. 2-v. 14.

b. Earth-picture. The unsealed seven (i. e., the six, which develop into the seventh), ch. vi.

a. First four seals. Universal fundamental aspects of world-history in its eschatological modification. War, dearth, and mortality under the supremacy of Christ, or the teleology of the Kingdom of God.

β. The succeeding seals. Martyrdom of the Kingdom of God. Convulsions of the earthly cosmos. Dawn of the day of wrath.

* [See Introduction by the American Editor.—H. B. C.]

3. The seven trumpets, issuing from the seven seals. Third day of creation. Separation betwixt land and water, and appearance of vegetation, chs. vii. 1-ix. 21.

a. Heaven-picture. Sealing of the people of God in this present world, indicated by the sealing of the elect of the Twelve Tribes of Israel. Consummation of the people of God in the other world. Or the firmament of God (Ps. xciii.) in contradistinction to the billowy sea of world-history, ch. vii. 1-17.

b. Earth-picture. The seven (relatively six) trumpets. Or penal judgments, through the prayers of the saints converted into disciplinary sufferings in order to awaken- ing, chs. viii. 1-ix. 21.

a. First four trumpets: Judgment upon the spiritual (and physical?*) earth. Upon the spiritual world-sea. Upon spiritual fountains and rivers. Upon spiritual celestial lights, in their outward appearance, ch. viii.

β. The two succeeding trumpets: Demonic psychical sufferings originating in the abyss, as the first woe from the abyss; and pneumatic world-plagues, ch. ix. The second woe, completed in chs. x. and xi.

4. The seven thunders, or rejuvenizing voices delaying the trumpet of final judgment, the seventh trumpet (ὁ κατέχων; τὸ κατέχον). Fourth day. Appearance of the sun over earth and sea, chs. x. 1-xi. 14.

a. Heaven-picture. Heaven on earth in the sun-like radiance of the manifestation of Christ upon earth. Sealing of the seven thunders, ch. x. 1-7.

b. Earth-picture. Suggestive episodes of the time of the seven thunders. Eating of the little book. Measurement of the Temple, and separation of the outer court. The two olive-trees, or witnesses of Christ. Slaughter of them; their resurrection and ascension. Rise of Antichristianity, chs. x. 8-xi. 14.

PART II.—The end of the world, to the glorification of the world, chs. xi. 15-xxii. 5.

5. The Beast with seven heads, or Antichristianity. Fifth day of creation. Marine animals, chs. xi. 15-xiii. 18.

a. Heaven-picture, chs. xi. 15-xii. 17.

b. Earth-picture. The Beast out of the sea, or Antichristianity as developed out of national life. The Beast out of the earth, or Antichristianity as developed out of the old religious and secular order of things, chs. xii. 17-xiii. 18.

6. The seven vials of wrath, or judgments of hardening. Sixth day of creation, as the day of the appearing of the New Man from heaven, chs. xiv.-xx. 15.

a. Heaven-picture of the incipient judgment (general view), chs. xiv.-xv. 8.

b. Earth-picture of the incipient final judgment (general view). The seven last plagues, ch. xvi. 1-21.

a. First four plagues. Judgment of hardening upon the earth; upon the sea; upon the rivers (spiritual currents); judgment of the transformation of the sun- shine of revelation into fiery heat (comp. the first four trumpets).

β. Fifth and sixth vials of wrath. Judgment upon the seat of the Beast. Judg- ment of the loosing of the kings of the East (see the fifth and sixth trumpets).

γ. The seventh vial of wrath, or the ramification of the one judgment into three judg- ments, ch. xvi. 19-21.

a. Final judgment on the great Whore, executed by the ten kings, representatives of dechristianized national life, chs. xvii. and xviii.

b. Final judgment on the ten kings, completed by the Appearance of Christ, chs. xix.- xx. 6.

c. Final judgment upon Gog and Magog, the last rabble-remnants of Antichristianity, incited to rebellion by Satan; accomplished by fire from Heaven; the fire of the terrestrial metamorphosis, ch. xx. 7-15.

* This is contradicted by ch.-ix. 8.

A. First final judgment, or the judgment on the great Whore; absolute Babylon. A judgment of reprobation, chs. xvii. and xviii.

a. Heaven-picture of the reprobatory judgment on Babylon, ch. xvii.

b. Earth-picture. Fall of Babylon, ch. xviii.

B. Second final judgment, as a damnatory judgment upon the radical dominion of the Beast and the false Prophet, ch. xix. 1-21.

a. Heaven-picture. Pre-celebration of the visible appearing of the Kingdom of God, ch. xix. 1-16.

b. Earth-picture. Victory of Christ, at His appearing, over the Beast; and the result of victory; the Millennial Kingdom, chs. xix. 17-xx. 5.

C. Third judgment, or the fiery judgment on Satan himself, and the last anarchical rebellion instigated by him on earth, ch. xx. 6-15.

a. Heavenly pre-celebration of the consummation, ch. xx. 6-8.

b. Consummate victory over Satan and his kingdom on earth. The general resurrection and the general judgment, vers. 9-15.

7. The seventh day. As the day of the finished new creation, and the eternal new world, chs. xxi.-xxii. 5.

a. Heaven on earth, or the City of God, the new Paradise, ch. xxi.

b. Earth glorified to Heaven, or the Land of God, the Paradisaic world, ch. xxii. 1-5.

THE EPILOGUE, ch. xxii. 6-21.

APPENDIX

A. SIGNIFICANT TERNARIES.

1. The last three churches; the last three seals; the last three trumpets; the last three kings; the last three vials of wrath.
2. The three woes.
3. The three frogs. (a) Out of the mouth of the Dragon; (b) out of the mouth of the Beast; (c) out of the mouth of the false Prophet.
4. The three parts of the great city, Sodom and Egypt, devastated by the seventh vial of wrath; and the ensuing three judgments: (a) Judgment upon Babylon; (b) judgment upon the Beast and the false Prophet; (c) judgment upon Satan, together with his last organ, Gog and Magog. The two or three [?] forthgoings of Antichristianity from the Euphrates.

B. PARALLELS OF THE SEVEN PHASES OF THE COURSE OF THE WORLD.*

In submitting, on the following page, parallels of the seven sevens, it is not with the intention of establishing a thorough analogy of the individual numbers in respect to their denotations; several such analogies will, however, appear—especially between the trumpets and the vials of wrath.†

* The visions of the fore-festivals in Heaven might be represented in a similar table.

† There is also a correspondence, by no means indistinct, between the Rider on the white horse and the first penitential judgment [judgment calling to repentance], as also the first judgment of wrath, upon the earth. To the rider on the red horse, the penitential judgment and the judgment of wrath upon the sea of nations correspond. To the black horse, or Dearth and Tribulation, the penitential judgment and the judgment of hardening upon streams and fountains, i. e., intellectual tendencies and original minds, correspond. To the pale horse, or Death and Sheol, the judgment consisting in the obscuration of the Sun of Life, Revelation, corresponds. Under the quinary, the heavenly subtilty of the martyrs corresponds with the psychical and demonic subtilty of the plague of locusts, and the torments of the Beast himself. Under the senary, the eschatological earthquake corresponds with the loosing of the horsemen from Euphrates, and with the drying up of that river. That the seventh seal is productive of the seven trumpets, and that these, with the increased power of the seven thunders, occasion the manifestation of Antichristianity; and, finally, that Antichristianity induces the sending of the vials of wrath, are palpable facts. With the decomposition of the air, or the separation of spirits, of the seventh vial of wrath, the Parousia is also indicated.

THE REVELATION OF ST. [om. ST.] JOHN THE DIVINE [om. THE DIVINE].

Superscription.

- 1 The Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things which [what things] must shortly [Lange: in swift succession] come to pass; and he sent [sending] and [om. and] signified it [om. it]<sup>1</sup> by his angel
2 unto his servant John: Who bare record [testified] of the word [Lange: Logos= Word] of God, and of [om. of] the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of [om. and of]<sup>2</sup> all things that [whatsoever things] he saw. Blessed is he that readeth,<sup>3</sup> [aloud] and they that hear<sup>4</sup> the words<sup>5</sup> of this [the] prophecy, and keep those [the] things which are written therein: for the time [Lange: decision-time]<sup>6</sup> is at hand [near].

DEDICATION AND GREETING [WITH DOXOLOGY.]

- 4 John to the seven churches which are [om. which are]<sup>1</sup> in Asia: Grace be [om. be] unto you, and peace, from him which [who] is, [om. ,] and which [who] was, [om. ,] and which [who] is to come [cometh]<sup>2</sup>; and from the seven Spirits<sup>3</sup> which [that] 5 are before his throne; And from Jesus Christ, who is [om. who is] the faithful witness, and [om. and] the first-begotten [first-born]<sup>4</sup> of<sup>5</sup> the dead, and the prince of the kings of the earth. Unto him that loved [loveth]<sup>6</sup> us, and washed<sup>11</sup> 6 us from<sup>12</sup> our<sup>13</sup> sins in his own [om. own] blood, and [ins. he] hath made us kings [om. kings—ins. a kingdom]<sup>14</sup> and [om. and] priests unto [ins. his] God and his [om. his] Father; to him be glory and dominion forever and ever [into the ages of the ages].<sup>15</sup> Amen.

THE ANNOUNCEMENT. THEME OF THE BOOK.

- 7 Behold, he cometh with [ins. the] clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also [om. also] which [who] pierced him: and all kindreds [the tribes] of the earth 8 shall wail because of him. Even so [Yea], Amen. I am [ins. the] Alpha and [ins. the] Omega, the beginning and the ending [om. the beginning and the ending],<sup>16</sup> saith the Lord [ins. God],<sup>17</sup> which [who] is, [om. ,] and which [who] was, [om. ,] and which is to come [who cometh], the Almighty [or All-ruler].<sup>18</sup>

a. THE SUPERScription.

[In this section the nature, subject, and writer of the Book are declared, and the importance of the subject indicated by a benediction on those who shall hear and read it in the spirit of obedience. (Altered from Alford).—E. R. C.]

See very rigorous revisions of the text by Kelly.—On John the Theologian, see Biographies of John.

Ver. 1. Revelation of Jesus Christ. Indicative not of the form of the Book, but of its substance. The Book likewise receives its title from its subject-matter. Inadequate conceptions of the essence of the Apocalypse may be found in the works of Bunsen and Holtzmann. [Ἀποκάἀγγελος is employed in the New Testament as indicating—1. The disclosure by word or symbol of that which is hidden or future, Rom. xvi. 26; 1 Cor. xiv. 6, 26; 2 Cor. xii. 1, 7; Gal. i. 12, ii. 2; Eph. ii. 8; 2. The manifestation in substance of that which was hidden or future, Rom. ii. 5, viii. 19; 1 Cor. i. 7; 2 Thess. i. 7; 1 Pet. i. 1, 13; 3. Illumination (possibly) Luke ii. 32; this meaning, however, may be resolved into the first. It is manifest from the following δείξαι that the term is here employed in the first of these senses. The following from the Treatise of Sir Isaac Newton is well worthy of consideration: "The Apocalypse of John is written in the same style and language with the prophecies of Daniel, and hath the same relation to them which they have to one another, so that all of them together make but one complete prophecy.—The prophecy is distinguished into seven successive parts; by the opening of the seven seals of the book which Daniel was commanded to seal up; and hence it is called the Apocalypse or Revelation of Jesus Christ."—E. R. C.]—Of Jesus Christ.—Gent. subj.: Christ the mediatory cause.—God, in the absolute sense, as the Father, being the primal source of all things, is likewise the fountain of Revelation.—[Which God gave unto Him.—God, i. e. the Father: Christ, the Mediator, knows not the times and seasons (καιρός, ver. 3) which the Father hath put in His own power, save as they are revealed to Him. Comp. Acts i. 7; Mark xiii. 32.—E. R. C.]

To show unto His servants.—Statement of the purpose: To set before the eyes of the servants of Christ. Hengstenberg: the prophets. Ebrard: believers. These servants we hold to be believers who are in a condition to discuss the mysteries of the Apocalypse with the Church proper.—Such things are to be shown as must come to pass, in the sense of Providence, in the Christian apprehension of the term. [Must, "by the necessity of the divine decree. See ch. iv. 1; Matt. xxi. 6, xxvi. 54; Dan. xi. 28."—ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

In swift succession [shortly].—Different interpretations of ἐν τάχει. Ebrard correctly interprets it as referring to the rapidity of the course of the events prophesied.* Düsterdieck maintains that this view is inconsistent with ἐγγύς, ver. 3. But the καιρός is ἐγγύς, irrespective of the length of time consumed by what is to come to pass. The whole course of the καιρός has for its final component part a period of a thousand years. The expression: what shall come to pass, cannot, however, be paraphrased by: what shall begin to come to pass. That exegetical prejudice which is incapable of distinguishing between religious and chronological dates, comes in play here (see Düsterdieck against Vitringa and others).—Ἐσθλα is a modification of δείξαι, indicative of the signs employed, the symbolical representation.* It relates to Christ. [Christ is the sender; see ch. xxii. 16.—E. R. C.] Hence, there is a change of construction, according to Düsterdieck and others.

Sending.† ἀποστείλας; absolute.—By His angel (compare ch. xxii. 6).—In respect to the various hypotheses concerning these words—the angel of the Lord—Gabriel—the angel who accompanied the Apocalyptist, or who did but throw him into his rapt state, etc.—we refer to the Comm. on Genesis, p. 385 sqq. [Am. Ed.]. From this Angel of Christ, in His universal form, particular angelic appearances are to be distinguished. Düsterdieck regards the term as generic, signifying that particular angel of whom Christ made use in each particular case. If we assume the angelic visible appearance of Christ to be the angel of the Apocalypse (comp. Acts xii. 11, 15), we do indeed encounter a difficulty in the fact that the angel designates Himself in ch. xxii. 9, as σύνδουλος; doubtless, however, it suffices to remark that He appears to the apostle in the quality of an angel.‡

To His servant John.—Is it conceivable that a presbyter John could have applied this emphatic term to himself, so long as the memory of the great Apostle John endured?

Ver. 2. Who testified.—According to Düsterdieck and many others (from Andreas of Cæsarea to Bleek, Lücke, Ewald, II.) the whole of verse 2d refers to nothing but the present scripture. This supposition they hold to be in nowise inconsistent with μαρτυρήσας. Not only, however, is the Aorist thus rendered of no distinctive value, but the μαρτυρεῖν and μαρτυρία are likewise deprived of their full weight. Neither to a vision nor to the report of a vision could these expressions be applied. We, therefore, with many others—from Ambrosiaster to Eichhorn—refer this passage to what was known as the earlier ministry of John; not simply to his Gospel, but, with Ebrard, to his whole evangelical and apostolic witness, corroborated by his martyrhood, and familiar to his readers.§

* [This restriction of the meaning of σημαίνει is not in accordance with the other instances of its use in the New Testament (three of the five, it will be observed, being by John), John xii. 33, xviii. 32, xxi. 19, Acts xi. 28, xxv. 27. In all these instances the signifying was by word and not by symbol.—E. R. C.]

† [Lange translates, in that he sent (indem er Botschaft sandte), a German idiom equivalent to the sending, with which the E. V. in this translation is corrected.—E. R. C.]

‡ [The comparison of Acts xii. 11 with 15, most certainly does not show that by "the angel of the Lord" ver. 11, it was intended to indicate in any sense "a visible appearance of Christ." The disciples, manifestly, did not intend to designate Peter himself by that which they styled his angel—at the most, all they could have intended was his spiritual representative, a person or thing distinct from himself. On the supposition that by "the Angel of the Lord" it was intended to designate some special representative of Christ, he would be distinct from Christ, and, as a creature, would represent himself as a σύνδουλος. On the supposition that by the Angel was meant Christ Himself, it is impossible satisfactorily to explain the language of ch. xxii. 9. The explanation of Lange does not suffice. However He might have appeared (either subjectively or objectively) to the Apostle, it is impossible to conceive of Him as using the language there attributed to the angel.—E. R. C.]

§ [As supporting this view, see John xxi. 24; 1 John i. 1, 2. On the other hand, ALFORD writes: "The objections to Ebrard's reference are to me insuperable. First, as to its introduction with the simple relative ὅς. We may safely say that, had any previous writing or act been intended, we should have had ὅς καὶ, or even more than this. . . . Next, as to the

The Word of God (comp. ch. xix. 13).—Why should not the Logos be intended, as Ebrard and others maintain? [See the preceding extract.—E. R. C.]

The testimony [Zeugnissthat=witness-act] of Jesus Christ.—Not testimonium de Christo (Lyra), and still less the angelic message of Christ. [See preceding extract.—E. R. C.] How natural it was for the Apostle, in his martyrhood, to think of Christ as the great Martyr (see ver. 5).—Ora vide. Düsterdieck: The visions here described. Comp. against this view 1 John i. 1; Gosp. of John i. 14, xix. 35.—The expression embraces the whole witness of John concerning his whole view of the glory of Christ, in the grandeur of His deeds and demonstrations.

Ver. 3. Blessed is [or be] he. [Comp. Matt. v. 3-11.—E. R. C.]—This conveys an idea of the importance of this book totally different from that which is represented by many moderns—Schleiermacher, for instance, in his Introduction to the New Testament. Düsterdieck affirms that this μακάριος has reference only to a participation in the kingdom of glory, and not to conservation in the conflicts which precede its establishment—as if the two ideas were separable.—That readeth, and they that hear. Representation of a religious assembly. If the hearing be intended to convey the idea of religious earnestness [comp. ch. ii. 6, 11, 17, 29, iii. 6, 13, 22, &c.—E. R. C.] thus being emphatic, why may not the reading be expressive of the same idea? [These words imply the duty of striving to understand—a duty still further implied by the following direction to keep. How can that be kept which is not understood? There are those who refrain from the study of unfulfilled prophecy, upon the ground that “the prophecies were not designed to make us prophets.” This is true; but a prophet is one thing, and an understander of prophecy is another. There is, indeed, a curious prying into things not revealed, an effort to make determinate those times and seasons which our Lord has expressly declared are (for us) left indeterminate (comp. Matt. xxiv. 36; Acts i. 7). Such conduct, however, is entirely different from the reverential, prayerful study of the word as revealed. It should be remembered that our Lord rebuked the Jews and His disciples for not understanding the prophesies relating to His first Advent, (comp. John v. 39, 46; Luke xi. 52; Matt. xvi. 3; Luke xxiv. 25); and that His last great eschatological discourse was delivered that His people might be forewarned (comp. Matt. xxiv. 4, 15, 24, 25, 38)—the implication, of course, being that it should be studied. It is not intended by these remarks to assert that a full and complete understanding of all prophecies will be attained to, by all who faithfully study; their design is to set forth the duty of study. Doubtless, many things will remain dark to the most earnest students, even to the beginning of the end; it may be confidently believed, however, that to such, much important knowledge will be vouchsafed which will be withheld from the negligent; and, furthermore, that all knowledge expedient for them to possess will be granted.—E. R. C.]—The words of the prophecy. These eschatological predictions.—And keep. An edifying impression on the heart is not the sole thing intended here; reference is had to the faithful holding fast of all things set down in this prophecy, and to a corresponding observation of the signs of the times.

For the decision-time. This is not to be considered as relating to μακάριος, as Düsterdieck thinks, for the blessedness cannot refer to the future alone; that time is intended when that which relates to the last things shall begin—hence δ καιρός. [The classical meaning of καιρός is the right measure, the right proportion. In the New Testament it is used to indicate a time, a period; but it seems to carry with it its classical force of determinate proportion—it is a season fixed as to time of occurrence and duration. Comp. Matt. viii. 29, xiii. 30, xxi. 34, xxvi. 18, John v. 4; Acts i. 7, xvii. 27; Rev. xii. 14, etc. But what καιρός is here referred to? Is it not, manifestly, the entire period, viewed as a unit, in which the things symbolically seen by the Apocalypticist should come to pass?—a period near to the Apostle when he wrote; to us, present.—E. R. C.]

5. DEDICATION AND GREETING [WITH DOXOLOGY].

The view of Hengstenberg and Ebrard,* who regard this dedication, from vers. 4-6, as relating only to the seven epistles, in antithesis to the established theory, is opposed to the organic simplicity of the book. The entire prologue belongs to the entire book, as does the entire epilogue. The seven churches, however, as the congregations of the first readers, represent the entire Christian reading-world; just as the Gospel of Luke and the book of Acts composed by him, were not designed for Theophilus alone.

Ver. 4. John to the seven churches.—On the relation of the Apostle John to the Church in Asia Minor, comp. Church History. The fact that the seven churches formed an ecclesiastical diocese, extending from the metropolis of Ephesus to Laodicea, is intimated by the address of the Epistle to the Ephesians, taken in connection with Col. iv. 16. [It is difficult to perceive the intimation. Most certainly the fact that neighboring Churches are exhorted to exchange epistles directed to them respectively, does not imply that they belong to one diocese.—E. R. C.] On the accounts of John's labors in Ephesus, comp.

things witnessed. The words δ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ κ. ἡ μαρτυρία Ἰ. Χρ. cannot with any likelihood be taken to mean “the (personal) Word of God, and the testimony of Jesus Christ;” for why, if the former term refer to Christ personally, should He be introduced in the second member under a different name? Besides, the words occur again below, ver. 9, as indicating the reason why John was in the island of Patmos; and there surely they cannot refer to his written Gospel, but must be understood of his testimony for Christ in life and words: moreover, ἡ μαρτυρία Ἰησοῦ is itself otherwise explained in this very book, ch. xix. 10. But there is yet another objection to the supposed reference to the Gospel arising from the last words, ὅσα εἶπεν. First, the very adjective ὅσα refutes it; for the Evangelist distinctly tells us, John xx. 30, that in writing his Gospel he did not set down ὅσα εἶπεν, but only a portion of the things which Jesus did in the presence of His disciples. . . . But still more does the verb εἶπεν carry this refutation. In no place in the Gospel does St. John use this verb of his eye-witnessing as the foundation of his testimony. . . . But in this book it is the word in regular and constant use, of the seeing of the Apocalyptic visions. . . . Taken then as representing the present book, τὸν λόγον here will be the aggregate of οἱ λόγοι, ver. 3; ἡ μαρτυρία Ἰ. Χρ. will be the μαρτυρία τῆς προφητείας, embodied in the Church in all ages.—E. R. C.]

Grace be with you and peace.—As in the writings of the Apostle Paul principally. Comp. also 2 John iii.

From the; He is present, etc.—Declaration of the name of Jehovah, not an etymological analysis of it, as earlier exogetes imagined (see the citation of Bengel in Düsterdieck). The declaration He is, He was, He cometh, or He is to come, does not do full justice to the idea, for the word Jehovah signifies that God is ever present, at hand, for His people, as the faithful covenant-keeping God; neither is this idea contained in the expression who is, etc. [Alford writes: "A paraphrase of the unspeakable name יהוה, resembling the paraphrase אלהים אשר אלהים in Exod.

iii. 14, for which the Jerusalem Targum has, as here, qui fuit, est, et erit: as has the Targum of Jonathan in Deut. xxxii. 89; Schemoth R. iii. f. 105, 2: 'Dixit Deus S. B. ad Moysen: Ego fui et adhuc sum, et ero in posterum.' Schöttg., Wetst., De Wette."—E. R. C.] On the [grammatical] impurity of this formula, and the attempts to smooth it down (τοῦ-ἡν-ἐρχόμενος), see Düsterdieck, page 100. [Trench, in his Com. on the Epistles to the Seven Churches, thus treats of "the departure from the ordinary rules of grammar: Doubtless, the immutability of God, 'the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever' (Heb. xiii. 8), is intended to be expressed in this immutability of the name of God, in this absolute resistance to change or even modification which that name here presents. 'I am the Lord; I change not' (Mal. iii. 6), this is what is here declared."—E. R. C.] The name is no direct designation of the Trinity; at most, it contains but an indirect allusion to the three economies.

From the seven Spirits.—See Is. xi. 2; Rev. iii. 1; iv. 5; v. 6. The seven Spirits burn like lamps [Germ. Fackeln, torches] before the throne, as Spirits of God, and are at the same time seven eyes of the Lamb. By this we understand seven ground-forms of the revelation of the Logos or heavenly Christ in the world (hence ideals of Christ; lamps of God; eyes of Christ); neither, therefore, seven properties of the Holy Ghost, though the Spirit of God is their unitous life; nor properties of God (Eichhorn); nor the symbolical totality of the angels (Lyra); nor the seven archangels, in accordance with the traditional view (of these archangels six only are grouped together on canonical and apocryphal ground); as in Is. xi. 2, the six spirits are merged in the unity of the septenary [Siebenzahl];* nor seven of the ten Sephiroth (Herder). We must likewise distinguish from these seven Spirits the Spirit who speaks to the churches (ch. ii. 7, xi. 29); with reference to Zech. iii. 9, iv. 6, 10.*

Ver. 6. From Jesus Christ.—From Him also the blessing of grace and peace comes; hence, to Him divine operations are attributable.

[Who is.].—The nominative, making a change in the construction, manifestly gives prominence to the three following designations of Christ as favorite Apocalyptic names. As God Himself, in an Apocalyptic view, is preëminently He Who is present, Who was present, and Who draweth nigh [present], so Christ is, first, the Great Martyr in a unique sense; secondly, the Conqueror of death; thirdly, the Prince of the kings of the earth. In accordance with the sense, a τοῦ δ would be in place here also. These names, therefore, serve neither as a foundation for that which follows nor for that which precedes them, though it is not without reason that Ebrard parallelizes these three names of Christ with the following three soteriological operations. With the faithful Witness correspond the words: Who loveth us, etc. The three offices of Christ are likewise suggested here, though Düsterdieck disputes even this. We must remark that the reading ἀναυτι would convert the high-priestly function into a kingly one.

The faithful Witness.—See ch. iii. 14; also ch. xix. 11, xxi. 5, xxii. 6.—Düsterdieck apprehends this as intimating the fact that Christ is the Mediator of all divine revelation, and disputes the very reference in point; viz.: to the fact that Christ, in the extremity of temptation under suffering, sealed the revelation of God with His testimony (Ebrard). The revelation of God is likewise enwrapped in both the following points; the First-born and the Prince. Other references [of the faithful Witness—Ta.] either to the fulfillment of threats and promises, or to the truth of the apocalyptic words, pass by the fundamental idea. [The following comment of Richard of St. Victor, quoted by Trench, sets forth the truths involved in this appellation in great fullness: "Testis fidelis, quia, de omnibus quæ per Eum testificanda erant in mundo testimonium fidele perhibuit. Testis fidelis, quia quæcumque audivit a Patre fideliter discipulis suis nota fecit. Testis fidelis, quia viam Dei in veritate docuit, nec Ei cura de aliquo fuit, nec personas hominum respexit. Testis fidelis, quia reprobis damnationem, et electis salvationem

* [That created beings cannot be intended by the Seven Spirits is evident from their being mentioned between the Father and Jesus Christ, and also from their being regarded as sources of blessing. The view as to their nature advocated by Lange is inconsistent with their being associated with Persons, and their being named with and still more before Christ. Trench judiciously remarks: "There is no doubt that by 'the seven spirits' we are to understand not indeed the sevenfold operations of the Holy Ghost, but the Holy Ghost sevenfold in His operations. Neither need there be any difficulty in reconciling this interpretation, as Mede urges, with the doctrine of His personality. It is only that He is regarded here not so much in His personal unity, as in His manifold energies; for 'there are diversities of gifts but the same Spirit,' 1 Cor. xii. 4.—The manifold gifts, operations, energies of the Holy Ghost are here represented under the number seven, being as it is the number of completeness in the Church. We have anticipations of this in the Old Testament. When the Prophet Isaiah would describe how the Spirit should be given not by measure to Him whose name is the Branch, the enumeration of the gifts is sevenfold (xi. 2); and the seven eyes which rest upon the stone which the Lord had laid can mean nothing but this (Zech. iii. 9, cf. iv. 10; Rev. v. 6)."—E. R. C.]

nunciavit. Testis fidelis, quia veritatem quam verbis docuit, miraculis confirmavit. Testis fidelis quia testimonium Sibi a Patre nec in morte negavit. Testis fidelis, quia de operibus malorum et bonorum in die iudicii testimonium verum dabit."—E. R. C.]

The First-born of the dead.—See Col. i. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 20.—The idea of the ancient Church, that the day of a man's death is the day of his higher birth, was founded upon fact in the history of Jesus, and upon the word of the apostles. [The reference however, of the title First-born of the dead was not to a glorification co-incident with death, but to the resurrection of Christ from the dead. Comp. Col. i. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 20, 23.—E. R. C.] Christ, according to the epistle to the Colossians, is the ἀρχή in a two-fold sense: the ἀρχή of the creation and of the resurrection; the latter is of course implied here, for the heavenly birth of Christ is the efficient cause of the resurrection of the dead (Eph. i. 19 sqq.).*

The PRINCE of the Kings.—In ch. xix. 16, He is called the King of kings. There He has taken possession of the kingdom; in the beginning of the Apocalypse He has but unfolded the power and right of a king in a princely manner before the eyes of His people, and commenced to give proof thereof in the world; see Matt. xxviii. 18; Acts xiii. 33; Phil. ii. 6 sqq. Comp. Ps. cx.; Is. liii., and other passages. As the kingly principle, even now dynamically ruling over the kings of the earth, and destined in the end to prevail over the Antichristian powers also, He works on and on until His appearance as the King proper.

The three names jointly form the foundation for the truth of the facts of the Apocalypse. The whole of divine revelation, whose goal is a new world, is sealed by the faithful Witness; the principal foundation of its work of renewal—a deadly work to the old world—is in the First-born; it is continually at work and unfolding its royal power in the Prince.

From Him who loveth us.—According to Dürstendiek [the E. V., Lachmann and Alford], the doxological formula begins here. The doxology at the close of ver. 6, however, is independent; † it is founded upon all that has been previously affirmed of Christ. Dürstendiek rightly insists upon the significance of the present [tense] form ἀγαπᾷν (ch. xxii. 17; ‡ Rom. viii. 37). The real motive for the foundation of a new world is the loving glance of God and Christ at the men of God, who are to be the fruits of creation and redemption.

* On Dürstendiek's controversy with Ebrard in respect to ἀγαπᾷν, Acts ii. 24, see the note in Dürstendiek, p. 113.

† [This position can be maintained only in defiance of all grammatical propriety. For obvious reasons, the datives ἀγαπᾷντι and ἀκούσαντι should be connected, not with the preceding genitives governed by ἀπὸ, but with the following αὐτῶν. The solecism of ver. 4, can have no place here, as the grounds of its existence are wanting; and, further, a similar solecism, were it in place, would give us ἀγαπᾷν and not ἀγαπᾷντι.—E. R. C.]

‡ ["The certainty that Christ continually loves His people is as significant, in the connection of the book, as the certainty that He is the Faithful Witness, etc. The Bride, rejoicing, comforts herself with the coming of Him who loves her (Rev. xxii. 17; comp. Rom. viii. 37)." DÜRSTENDIECK, p. 113.—Th.]

And washed us.—It is an unmistakable fact that one and the same root lies at the foundation of both ἀβύειν and ἁλύνειν;* that the one involves the other, and that both are embraced in this concrete expression of Scripture. Nevertheless, the ideas of liberation from the guilt [reatus = liability to punishment.—E. R. C.] of sin and liberation from the bondage of sin are contra-distinguished, not only in doctrinal theology, but also in the Holy Scriptures. Now it is manifest that in ch. vii. 14, a liberation from guilt is meant; so likewise in 1 John i. 7. These analogies, as well as the consideration that an atonement for the guilt of sin lies at the foundation of a redemption from its power, add weight to the remark that the operation of Christ's blood is distinct from His special act of making us kings. We cannot, therefore, with Dürstendiek, find "substantially the same idea in both readings."

Ver. 6. A kingdom.—It is true that believers are, in a spiritual sense, kings as well as priests. They are true priests, however, through individual self-sacrifice. It is impossible for them, on the other hand, to exercise an individual government, thus encroaching upon the rights of Christian fellowship;—kings they can be only in the community of the Church. Hence there are material reasons, as well as documentary ones, for preferring the more difficult reading ἡμᾶς τοῦ ἡνὺν and ἡμῶν; though the abstract fact that Christians are spiritually possessed of kingly dignity is to be maintained; that fact is also supported by ch. v. 10 (βασιλεύειν). The term, then, denotes neither, on the one hand, a people of kings, nor, on the other: the subjects of the kingdom, for the essential element in this kingdom is that the members of it rule by serving and serve by ruling (Matt. xx. 25 sqq.) or the identity of sovereignty and subjection [serving]. The ideas of serving and subjection are widely different.—E. R. C.] Christians, therefore, are a kingdom, because they are priests,—by virtue of a self-abnegation, heavenly in its purity. (On the Old Testament type, see Exodus xix.) [See Excursus at the end of the section.—E. R. C.]

To His God.—Ἀντὶ τοῦ "appertains to the whole term τῷ θεῷ καὶ πατρὶ." (Dürstendiek, against De Wette and Ebrard.) Believers are priests on the basis of the High-Priesthood of Christ, because, with reconciled consciences, they have immediate access to God in prayer for themselves and intercession for others (Rom. v. 2), in the spirit of self-surrender, giving proof of this spirit in their sufferings, and that not only as witnesses (Rom. xii. 1); these sufferings are of course (as Ebrard remarks in reference to Col. i. 24) to be distinguished from the perfect expiatory passion of Christ. "We find a kindred conception in ch. xxi. 22, where the new Jerusalem is represented as destitute of a temple." (Dürstendiek.)

To Him be.—According to De Wette and Dürstendiek, δόξα should be supplemented by * [Liddell and Scott present both ΑΥΩ and ΑΟΥΩ as root words, the latter contracted from the old ΑΩΩ. They remark in a note under the latter—"Akin to Lat. luo, diluo, eluo, lauo, but hardly to the Greek λύω." (A similar note is appended to the former).—E. R. C.]

ἐν, after the manner of 1 Pet. iv. 11. A more obvious explanation of the ellipsis is in accordance with the sense of Rev. iv. 9, 11, and other passages. [Alford remarks: "The like ambiguity is found in all doxological sentences."—E. R. C.]

C. THE ANNOUNCEMENT. THE THEME.

Ver. 7. Behold, He cometh.—In the following words the Apostle announces the theme of his book with prophetic vivacity. Behold, ἰδοὺ (see ch. xvi. 15). He directs the attention of his readers to a new and grand fact as one who himself beholds and wonders. This form is likewise met with in the Gospels.—He cometh. Not: He shall come. The strong Apocalyptic term He cometh, for He cometh quickly, is partly based upon the idea that He is continually coming—continually on the way.

With the clouds.—Dan. vii. 13; Mark xiv. 62.—"Among the later Jews the Messiah is actually called the Cloud-Man" (Düsterdieck after Ewald). God also is said to have His dwelling among the clouds (Ps. cxvii. 2, cxviii. 11). The cloud is, so to speak, a material symbol of the divine presence, or the divine mystery—partly veiling, partly revealing. [We are not to suppose, however, that the declaration "He cometh with clouds" is figurative. The clouds with which He will come may be symbolic, but they will be real. Of the literal fulfillment of a prophecy solemnly repeated by our Lord in His discourse on the Mount of Olives (Matt. xxiv. 30), and again to the High Priest, before the Sanhedrin, on the occasion of His trial (Matt. xxvi. 64; Mark xiv. 62); and referred to in the account of the ascension (Acts i. 9, 11);—all under circumstances that preclude the idea of figure;—there should be no doubts.—E. R. C.]

Every eye.—All mankind; not believers simply (Matt. xxv. 82).

And they who pierced Him.—According to Düsterdieck, this is significant of the Jews alone. The following sentence he renders: and all the Gentiles shall wail because of Him. This, however, does not accord with Zechariah xii. 10. Why should not those who at the first pierced the Lord be the mourners afterwards? And if a mere external historical meaning be attached to the former clause, the saying would apply to a few individual Jews only. The text leaves the question as to whether, and to what degree, repentance is involved, undecided. An element of judgment, startling to all, is enwrapped in the appearance of the Crucified One. Particular interpretations by Ebrard and Düsterdieck, see in the work of the latter, p. 116. The ἐξενεργῶν appears also in John xix. 37. It was for the Apostle a point of the highest symbolical significance. [Alford makes the following important comment: "As there (John xix. 36) St. John evidently shows what a deep impression the whole circumstance here referred to produced on his own mind, so it is remarkable here that he should again take up the prophecy of Zechariah (xii. 10) which he there cites, and speak of it as fulfilled. That this should be so, and that it should be done with the same word ἐξενεργῶν, not found in the LXX. of the passage, is a strong presumption that the Gospel and the Apocalypse were written by the same person."—E. R. C.]

Yea (ναὶ), amen.—Double assurance in the Greek and Hebrew.

Ver. 8. Alpha and Omega—(ch. xxi. 6).

—Indication of the principles and the final goal of all things, in a symbolism drawn from the Greek alphabet (see Rom. xi. 36). Hence the interpolated gloss by way of exegesis. The corresponding Jewish symbolism says: from א to ת. The deduction of the divine Essence from the revelation of that Essence in the world forms the foundation for the deduction of the divine Rule, in accordance with the divine Essence as revealed; and upon this latter deduction the certainty of the last things is based.

The All-ruler.—It is not without reason that this expression παντοκράτωρ is of constant occurrence in the Apocalypse. It is one of the tasks of the last times to hold fast this assurance, notwithstanding all appearance to the contrary. [The Apocalypse is the only portion of the New Testament in which the word occurs, except in 2 Cor. vi. 18. It is, however, of frequent occurrence in the Septuagint, and to that book we must look for the determination of its meaning. In Job it is used to translate שׁׁד, the Almighty; elsewhere it is employed as the second member of the compound expression (κύριος παντοκράτωρ) which most frequently represents—not translates —the Hebrew compound יְהוָה צְבָאוֹת Jehovah of hosts. (Sometimes the second term is translated by τῶν δυνάμεων (Ps. xxiv. 10), τῶν στρατιῶν (Amos vi. 14), and frequently it is reproduced, σαββαθ, as in Is. i. 9). Now, it is impossible to suppose that the Seventy regarded παντοκράτωρ as the Greek equivalent for צְבָאוֹת; the most natural supposition is that they looked upon the entire Hebrew expression as an ellipsis for יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵי צְבָאוֹת, which would give as the meaning of the Greek term one consistent with its etymology, viz.: God of hosts. This supposition is confirmed by the fact that, in several instances where the three terms occur, as in Jer. v. 14, xv. 16, xlv. 7; Amos iii. 18 (in this instance four), παντοκράτωρ is used to render the last two. From all these facts it is natural to conclude that it was used as a term expressive of infinite supremacy, including the two correlated ideas of universal dominion (God of hosts) and almighty power. This meaning, which is most in accordance with the classical and sacred usage of the words from which παντοκράτωρ is compounded, and which is consistent with every instance of its use in the New Testament, is, almost certainly, the meaning that should be attached to it.—E. [EXCURSUS ON THE BASILEIA, VER. 6.]

By the American Editor.

[The expression KINGDOM of God (and its manifest synonyms, Kingdom of Heaven.* The

* [The phrase Kingdom of Heaven occurs only in the Gospel of Matthew. That it is strictly synonymous with Kingdom of God is manifest from the following comparisons:—Matt. iv. 17 with Mark i. 14, 15; Matt. v. 3 with Luke vi. 20; Matt. xiii. 11 with Mark iv. 11, Luke viii. 10; Matt. xiii. 31 with Mark iv. 30, 31; Matt. xix. 14 with Mark x. 14, Luke xviii. 16; Matt. xix. 23 with Mark x. 23, Luke xviii. 24. Matthew himself uses Kingdom of God five times (vi. 33, xii. 28, xix. 24, xxi. 31, 43). It needs but a glance at these passages to perceive that he uses the phrase as synonymous with the one more frequently employed by him.—E. R. C.]

Kingdom, Kingdom of Christ, etc.) is of most frequent occurrence in the New Testament, and apparently of greatest importance. It is the phrase employed to designate that—(1) which the Baptist heralded (Matt. iii. 2); which our Lord, in the beginning of His ministry, proclaimed as at hand (Matt. iv. 17; Mark i. 14); (3) to the exposition of which His life before His Crucifixion was mainly devoted (Luke iv. 43, and the Gospels pass.); (4) concerning which He gave preëminent instruction throughout the forty days that followed His Resurrection (Acts i. 3); (5) which He sent forth His disciples to herald before His Passion (Matt. x. 7; Luke ix. 2; x. 9); (6) concerning which His ministers, after His Ascension, went everywhere giving instruction (Acts viii. 12; xiv. 22; xix. 8; xx. 25; xxviii. 23, 31; and the Eps.

It might naturally be supposed that some one objective would be represented by this oft-recurring and apparently important phrase, and yet there is no expression which the great mass of interpreters regard as having been used in so many varied and mutually exclusive senses. In some instances it is represented as designating something established on earth in New Testament times, either before the Crucifixion, or at the Ascension, or on the day of Pentecost; in others (and by the same interpreter), as something to be established in the future. Where it is regarded as indicating something already established—in some instances it is viewed as representing true religion in the heart; in others, the vital Church; and in others still, the apparent Church. Where viewed as designating something future—sometimes it is held to signify the millennial era on earth; and sometimes the Kingdom of glory in Heaven. Dr. Robinson, who may be regarded as a representative of the most numerous school of evangelical interpreters, and who, through his Greek and Hebrew Dictionaries, exerts a most powerful influence upon the theological thought of the ministry of this country, under the title Basileia, thus writes: "We may therefore regard the kingdom of heaven, etc. in the New Testament as designating in its Christian sense, the Christian dispensation, or the community of those who receive Jesus as the Messiah, and who, united by His Spirit under Him as their Head, rejoice in the truth, and live a holy life in love and communion with Him. This spiritual kingdom has both an internal and an external form. As internal, it already exists and rules in the hearts of all Christians (it is then a principle.—E. R. C.) and is therefore present. As external, it is either embodied in the visible church of Christ, and in so far is present and progressive; or it is to be perfected in the coming of the Messiah to judgment and His subsequent spiritual reign in bliss and glory, in which view it is future. But these different aspects are not always distinguished, the expression often embracing both the internal and external sense, and referring both to its commencement in this world and its completion in the world to come." In his following digest of passages he gives instances of all these alleged uses. Now it is evident that a dispensation, a principle, and a people actuated by that principle, are distinct, mutually exclusive objectives. To suppose that they were designated by one and the same expression, and that expression manifestly one of the most important in the Book of Life, is to attribute to the inspired writers a looseness in the use of language which, to say the least, would be thought strange in an uninspired teacher, and which, in the case of men writing under the influence of the Spirit for the instruction of the Church in all ages, is scarce conceivable. To such a supposition we should be driven only by most urgent considerations. The question naturally arises—Is there not some one objective which the expression may be regarded as indicating in each instance of its occurrence, and which objective shall satisfy all the demands of the expression—grammatical and contextual—in all its occurrences in the word of God? If such an objective can be set forth, it must, manifestly, be regarded as the one contemplated by the Spirit of the Lord. The writer believes that there is such an one—complex indeed, as is the objective of the term Church—but which, in all its fullness, may be regarded as designated by the expression wherever it occurs.—To the exposition of that objective this Excursus is devoted.

As preliminary, however, to this consideration of the nature of the Basileia (which, for the sake of precision, that Kingdom of God heralded by John and preached by Jesus will, in this article, be styled) it will be necessary to discuss another topic, viz.: its futurity. The generally received opinion that the Scriptures teach that it, in some one of its phases, was established in the days of our Lord, or shortly after His Ascension, lies at the basis of the prevalent idea as to its nature; and, consequently, until that opinion is at least shaken, and several of the texts which, almost without question, are assumed so to teach, are shown to have no such force, it cannot be expected that due weight will be given to those expressions which set forth its nature in language inapplicable to aught that now exists, or has ever existed, on earth.

I. THE FUTURITY OF THE BASILEIA.

Before presenting the scriptural argument it is proper to premise that—

(a). The fact that the natural Kingdom of God includes the earth as a revolted province, affords no proof that the Basileia prophesied by Daniel as future was established by Jesus. That natural Kingdom existed from the beginning.

(b). The mere fact that the existing order of things on earth—an organized Church, grace in the heart—can be spoken of as a Kingdom, does not imply that the Basileia has been established; a similar state of things existed when Daniel prophesied of the establishment of the Basileia as future.

With these remarks we proceed to the argument.

1. Our Lord and His Apostles at every stage of New Testament history referred to its establishment as future:

(1). Indefinitely as to accompanying event (only the leading passages will be cited): Jesus preached that it was at hand (i. e., not then established) Matt. iv. 17; Mark i. 14; He taught

His disciples to pray "Thy Kingdom come," Matt. vi. 10; Luke xi. 2: He sent them forth to preach the coming Kingdom, Matt. x. 7; Luke ix. 2, x. 9: near the close of His ministry He spake a parable for the instruction of those who thought it "should immediately appear" (μελλει αναβαινεν), Luke xix. 11: in the institution of the Supper He again and again referred to its futurity, Matt. xxvi. 29; Mark xiv. 25; Luke xxii. 16-18, 24-30: it is declared that, after the Resurrection, "He opened their (the Apostles') understanding, that they might understand the scriptures" (Luke xxiv. 45), and also that "He was seen of them forty days, (and) speaking of the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God," Acts i. 3;—on the last day of His sojourn with them, they, illuminated and instructed, asked a question, "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore the Kingdom unto Israel," evidently based upon the belief that it had not already been established, and He gave an answer that implied the correctness of that belief; is it conceivable either that they were mistaken, or that, if they had been, He would have so answered as to confirm them in their mistake? The Apostle James speaks of believers as heirs of a promised Kingdom, ii. 5: Paul, of his being preserved unto God's heavenly Kingdom, 2 Tim. iv. 18; of inheriting the Kingdom, 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10, xv. 50; Gal. v. 21; Eph. v. 5; of his fellow-workers unto (εις) the Kingdom, Col. iv. 11: Peter exhorts believers so to walk that they might enter into the everlasting Kingdom, 2 Pet. i. 11.

(2). By representing it as synchronous with the second glorious Advent of the Messiah: This intimation was first given by Jesus just before the Transfiguration and after He had begun to show to His disciples that the first Advent was to be one of humiliation, comp. Matt. xvi. 21, 27, 28; Mark viii. 31, 38, ix. 1; Luke ix. 22, 26, 27. It is evident from a comparison of our Lord's last discourse (the Greek text) on the Mount of Olives (Matt. xxiv., xxv.; Mark xiii.; Luke xxi. 5-33), with the LXX. of Daniel (vii. 9-27, ix. 27, xii. 1-13), that He had those prophecies in view throughout; and that He, as did Daniel (vii. 13, 14), connected the establishment of the Basileia with a future glorious Advent of the "Son of Man;" comp. Matt. xxiv. 3, 27, 30, 39, xxv. 1, 31, 34; Mark xiii. 26; Luke xxi. 27, 28 (and note especially) 31: see also 2 Thess. i. 5-10; 2 Tim. iv. 1. (There was probably an allusion to this in the institution of the Supper; comp. Matt. xxvi. 29; Mark xiv. 25; Luke xxii. 16, 18, with 1 Cor. xi. 26).

2. Jesus implied that the offer of immediate establishment was withdrawn from the Jewish Church because of its rejection of Him, and that the establishment itself was postponed; comp. Luke xix. 41-44 (the weeping over Jerusalem and the accompanying remarks) with the subsequent addresses in the temple, Matt. xxi. 23-xxiii. 39, especially xxi. 42, 43, xxiii. 37-39. The preceding scriptures do not in themselves imply more than the withdrawal of the offer from the Jewish Church, in order to an immediate establishment amongst Jewish and Gentile converts; but, in connection with the words of Jesus referred to under the preceding head, the implication of an indefinite postponement becomes manifest. This view finds confirmation in the prediction of the humiliation of the Church until the day of Christ's glorious appearing, 1 Pet. iv. 13; (see also Acts xiv. 22; 2 Tim. ii. 12, iii. 12, etc.).

3. There is no critically undisputed passage in the Scriptures which declares, or necessarily implies, even a partial establishment in New Testament times (Rev. i. 6, is not contemplated in this argument, as the correct reading is uncertain).

The passages which have been referred to as proving the doctrine of a present establishment may be divided into two classes, viz.: those which it is alleged (1) logically imply it, (2) directly declare it. These will be examined in the order indicated. It should be distinctly noted that it is not denied that many of these passages are consistent with the hypothesis of a present establishment. All that is now claimed (save in reference to one or two of them) is that they are also consistent with the hypothesis of an entirely future establishment.

(1). Those passages which, it is alleged, logically imply a present establishment of the Basileia.

a. Those in which our Lord, and others, declare it to be near (εγγισεν), as Matt. iii. 2, iv. 17, etc. Admitting that any reference in argument to the distinction between prophetic and historic nearness would, in this connection, be out of place, it is enough to say that the offer of an immediate establishment, an offer subsequently withdrawn because of virtual rejection, fully satisfies all the requirements of the language referred to.

b. Those which declare that Jesus was a King, Matt. ii. 2, xxi. 5; John i. 49; xviii. 37, etc. Reference need only be made to the manifest distinction between a King de jure and a King de facto. He was born King of the Jews, and yet confessedly for thirty years He did not establish His Kingdom. A similar explanation may be given to the fact that believers are styled a Βασιλειον λεγοντα, 1 Pet. ii. 9. (The fact that He is now exalted to the throne of universal dominion, Eph. i. 20-22, no more proves that the Basileia is now established on earth, than did the universal government of God in the days of Daniel prove that the Kingdom of God was then established on earth. We must distinguish between a Kingdom on earth, and a Kingdom over earth—which includes earth as a revolted province.)

c. The exhortations of our Lord to "seek the Kingdom of God," Matt. vi. 33; Luke xii. 31. It is manifest that both these exhortations are consistent with the hypothesis of a future Kingdom—as though He had said, So act; that when the Basileia is established you may enter it. Indeed the contexts of both exhortations require that we should put that interpretation upon them: the one in Matt. follows the direction to pray "Thy Kingdom come" (ver. 10), and that in Luke is manifestly parallel with the exhortation to wait for an absent Lord (vers. 35-40).

d. The declaration "this generation shall not pass," etc., Matt. xxiv. 34; Mark xiii. 30; Luke xxi. 32. The term γενεα is one of the most indefinite in the Greek language. It is used to represent a race of men, a generation (of which three make a century, an age (see Liddell and Scott). Immediately after the preceding utterance our Lord declared that the time of His second coming was concealed (Matt. xxiv. 36); is it not probable that, in using this indefinite term, He did so designedly, that no note of time might be given?

c. The declaration of Jesus, "There be some standing here," etc., Matt. xvi. 28; Mark ix. 1; Luke ix. 27. This, according to the opinion of Chrysostom and others (see Lange Comm. on Matt. xvi. 28), may find its fulfilment in the immediately following Transfiguration. In this event the Basileia was not merely symbolized, but in all its glory was for a moment set up on earth (comp. 2 Pet. i. 16-18).

(2.) The passages which, it is alleged, declare a present Basileia.

a. Matt. xi. 12; Luke xvi. 16. It is assumed that βιάζονται and ἀπαύγουσιν are taken in a good sense, as in the E. V. Against this assumption may be urged—(a) the established usage of the words: βιάζων occurs in the New Testament only in the passages under consideration; in the LXX. it occurs (undisputed) ten times, it represents rape (Deut. xxii. 25, 28; Esther vii. 8), the breaking through the barriers around Sinai (Exodus xix. 24), simple violence (Sir. iv. 29; xxxi. 24; 2 Macc. xiv. 41), urging (Gen. xxx. 12; Judges xix. 7; 2 Kings v. 23); the leading idea of the word when applied to persons is, inimical violence; ἀπαύγειν occurs thirty-three times in the LXX., and (with possibly four exceptions) is always used in a bad sense; it represents the violence of the robber, the ravens of the lion and the wolf (Gen. xxxvii. 33; Lev. vi. 4, etc.); in the New Testament (besides the instance under consideration) it occurs, Matt. xiii. 19; John x. 12, 28, 29; vi. 15; Acts viii. 39; xxiii. 10; 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4; in all these instances the idea is that of overmastering force, and in the first four, which (with the one under consideration) are the only instances of its use by our Saviour, it indicates sinful force: (b) The unfitness of the terms, when used in a good sense, to represent the approach of a penitent sinner to Christ: the disciples were captives—not conquerors; (c) Their unfitness in a good sense, and their fitness in a bad sense, to represent the condition of things then existing. It is true that in the beginning of our Lord's ministry the people crowded around Him; but few, however, in the modern sense of the phrase, "entered the kingdom;" on the occasion indicated by Matt. xi. 12, the people were deserting Him (vers. 12-25), and their leaders were engaged in that system of opposition and persecution that culminated in His crucifixion. Must we not conclude that by these words our Lord intended to indicate that violent opposition to, and ravens upon, the offered kingdom in the person of Him, its representative, which resulted in the withdrawal of the offer (Matt. xxi. 43) and the fearful denunciations of Matt. xxiii. 18-39?

b. Matt. xii. 28; Luke xi. 20. The original in both cases is ἐφάσαν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, not ἐρχεται (Luke xvii. 20), nor ἀναπαύεσθαι (Luke xix. 11). "In the New Testament, with the exception of 1 Thess. iv. 15, (?) φθάνειν occurs only in the later, weakened sense of reaching to" (Lange Com. on 1 Thess., p. 43, E. V.). The phrase is similar to the one in 1 Thess. ii. 16, where, manifestly, it was not designed to represent the wrath spoken of as already poured forth upon its objects—they were living men, but as having reached unto, overhanging them, comp. also Rom. ix. 31; 2 Cor. x. 14; Phil. iii. 16; 1 Thess. iv. 15, in all which, however, the prepositions are different. The passages under consideration aptly accord with the idea of a near approach of the Basileia to the Jews in the person of Christ, implying an offer of establishment which might be withdrawn; they are equivalent to the declaration of Luke x. 9, 11.

c. Luke xvii. 20, 21. This passage, probably, by the advocates of the prevalent theory of the Basileia, is regarded as their most important proof-text, both as to its nature and present establishment. In this portion of the Excursus, only its bearing on the latter of these points is to be considered. In the E. V. there is a difference in tense between the question of the Pharisees and the answer of Jesus—they asking, when the Basileia should come, and He answering, it cometh not with observation, it is within you—which necessarily implies a declaration of then existing establishment. This difference is altogether unauthorized—both the question and the answer are in the present; the question of the Pharisees should be translated "when cometh (ἐρχεται) the kingdom of God?" The question was asked in the vivid, dramatic present; it manifestly had reference to the future; it would be in defiance of every conceivable law of language to suppose that our Lord, in following the lead of His questioners, intended to indicate a different tense. The question and the answer are but illustrations of that law proper to all languages, but pre-eminently to the Greek, by which a certain future may be represented by a verb in the present; illustrations may be found, Matt. xxvi. 2 (after two days is the feast of the passover, and the Son of Man is betrayed, etc.); 1 Cor. xv. 42-44 (it is sown in corruption, it is [in the future resurrection] raised in incorruption), (see Jelf, Winer, Kühner, and grammarians generally). To the conclusion that the language of our Lord must be understood as having reference to the future, it may also be remarked, we are shut up by the following considerations: The supposition that He indicated an existing Basileia (a) implies that it was set up in (or among) the Pharisees; (b) disconnects His words from the immediately-following address to the disciples, whilst the contrary supposition brings them into manifest and beautiful connection therewith, and with His other utterances.*

* [Fully to appreciate this remark, we must appreciate the force of the terms παρρησιάζομαι and ἐνός. The former of these occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, and only in one disputed passage in the LXX. Its verbal root, however, occurs several times, and always has the force of close watching or observation (Mark iii. 2; Luke vi. 7; xiv. 1; xx. 20; Acts ix. 24; Gal. iv. 10). In accordance with the meaning of the verb, the Lange Com. (Van Oosterzee) translates μετα παρρησιάζομαι: "with or under observation," remarking "so that it can be recognized and observed by outward tokens, and that one could exclaim with assurance, Lo here! lo there!" The translation of it ubtless is correct, and also, in the main, the accompanying remark. The latter, however, might be so modified as to distinctly set forth the twofold idea of observation—(1) as to essence (as that which in itself is visible), and (2) as to manifestation or approach (as the dawn, whose approach is with or under observation). With this modification: not under observation,

d. In this connection may be considered that class of passages which are regarded as teaching the doctrine of a present Basileia from their use of a present verb when mentioning it. (Reference is not now had to those in which there is aught in the context that apparently requires the hypothesis of a present kingdom—each of these receives an independent consideration). These passages are: all those parables which thus refer to the Basileia, Matt. xiii. 31, 33, 44, 45, 47, etc.; also Matt. xi. 11; Rom. xiv. 17. These, it is admitted, are all consistent with the hypothesis of a present kingdom; but, under the rule set forth under the preceding head, they are all grammatically consistent with that of a certain future establishment. That there is nothing in the nature of the Basileia as set forth in the parables to require the hypothesis of a present kingdom, but the contrary, will appear in the second general division of this Excursus.

a. Acts ii. 29-36. It is assumed by many that the exaltation of ver. 38 constitutes the session on the throne of David of ver. 30. But the assumption is wholly gratuitous. Nowhere in his sermon did the apostle declare the oneness of the two events; and most certainly the exaltation there spoken of does not imply the session as already existing—it may be an exaltation begun, to culminate in a visible occupancy of the throne of David. (The visible establishment by an emperor of the seat of his government in the heart of a once revolted province, does not derogate from his dignity—does not imply an abdication of government in the rest of his empire.) But beyond this, not only is the assumption gratuitous; it is against probabilities that amount to certainty. The apostle, be it remembered, was arguing with Jews, to prove that the absent Jesus was the Messiah (ver. 36); he was arguing with those, one of whose most cherished beliefs it was that the Messiah should occupy a visible throne. To suppose that, under such circumstances, he should advance a doctrine at war with this belief without a word of explanation or proof, and that too in a sentence capable of an interpretation consistent therewith, is inconceivable. The interpretation suggested by the writer is confirmed not only by its consistency with the previous teachings of our Lord, but by the address delivered by the Apostle Peter shortly after, Acts iii. 19, 20. The literal translation of the passage referred to is as follows (see Lange Com. and Alford): "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, in order that the times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and that He may send the Messiah Jesus, who was appointed unto you, whom the heavens must receive until the times of the restitution of all things," etc. It is also confirmed by the subsequent teachings of the apostle in his epistles; comp. 1 Peter i. 4-7, 13; 2 Peter i. 11, 16; the κληρονομία and ἀποκάλυψις of the I Epistle are manifestly synonymous with the βασίλεια and παρουσία of the II.

1 Thess. ii. 12. The preposition in the Greek is εἰς. But since believers on earth are not yet in glory, the whole expression is manifestly proleptical, and the E. V. gives the translation, unto.

Col. i. 13. At first glance, the passage apparently teaches that believers are already translated de facto into the Basileia; it may however legitimately be regarded as teaching a de jure translation. Not only does this interpretation bring the passage into harmony with the great mass of Scripture, but it seems to be required by the immediately preceding and succeeding contexts; believers are not yet delivered de facto from the ἐξουσία of Satan (Eph. v. 12), nor have they yet received de facto, certainly not in completeness, the ἀπολύτρωσιν (comp. Luke xxi. 28; Rom. viii. 23; Eph. i. 14; iv. 30; see Lange Comm. in loc.).

Heb. xii. 28. The reception of the Basileia herein spoken of manifestly may be de jure. Believers on earth receive a sure title to their future possession.

II. NATURE OF THE BASILEIA.

would mean either without visibility (as the wind), or without the signs of gradual approach (as the lightning). The strict meaning of ἐντός is within, in the midst of, as in Matt. xiii. 36; that which is ἐντός men individually, is that which is internal to them individually; that which is ἐντός them collectively (viewed as one whole), is that which is internal to them as a whole—in the midst of them—among them individually. This latter use of the term occurs Xenophon Anab. i. 10, 3—ἐλάλα καὶ ταύτην ἔδωσαν (οἱ Ἕλληνες) καὶ ἄλλα ὅρατα ἐν τῷ δόξαι αὐτῶν, etc. (see Alford in loc.) Now, remembering the close connection in the Jewish mind between the establishment of the Basileia, and the glorious coming of the Son of Man—a connection established by the prophecy of Daniel (vii. 13, 14), and not previously rebuked but approved by Jesus (Luke ix. 26, 27)—let any one hypothesize as the meaning of μετὰ παραπορεύσεως with the signs of a gradual approach, and of ἐντός in the midst of, and read the entire passage, vers. 20-30. The Pharisees ask our Lord "when cometh the Kingdom of God?" He answers, "It cometh not with the signs of a gradual approach; neither shall they say, Lo here, or lo there, for to the Kingdom of God is in the midst of you." Then turning to His disciples He says: "The days will come when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of Man, and ye shall not see it. And they shall say to you, Lo here, lo there; go not after nor follow. For as the lightning that lighteneth (flashes) from one part under heaven shineth to the other part under heaven (comes) with the signs of a gradual approach, so also shall the Son of Man be in his day," etc. Does not the very unity perceptible in the entire address—the vividness of the scene it presents—the manifest oneness of the doctrine with that elsewhere taught by our Lord, especially on the Mount of Olives—place the stamp of truth on the hypothesis? Does it not become manifest that this passage, so far from teaching the doctrine of a present establishment of the Basileia, must be numbered amongst those that connect the establishment with the Second Advent?—E. R. C.]

When the Baptist and our Lord began to preach "the Kingdom of God is at hand," the subject of their discourse was no novelty. The Jews were then expecting the establishment of a Basileia, which had been foretold by the prophets. The phrases "Kingdom of God," "Kingdom of Heaven," do not indeed occur in exact form in the Old Testament; cognate expressions, however, appear, which may be divided into two classes—(1). Those which refer to the natural Kingdom of God over the universe, Dan. iv. 8, 34, vi. 26; Ps. cxlv. 12, 13; (LXX. iii. 33, iv. 31, vi. 26; Ps. cxliv. 12, 13). (2). Those in which the then future Basileia of the Messiah was predicted, Dan. ii. 44, vii. 14, 27, (LXX. as Heb.); allied to the prophecies from which these citations are made, are Isa. xi., xxxii., lix. 20—lxvi. 24; Ps. ii., lxxii., etc. There can be no doubt that the Basileia foretold in the latter class was the one contemplated by Jesus, especially in view of the distinct reference to the prophecies of Daniel, and the quotations therefrom, in His great eschatological discourse on the Mount of Olives.

1. The apparent characteristics of the Basileia as deduced from a normal* interpretation of the prophecies referred to, are as follows:

It was a government to be established.—(1) in a glorious, visible advent of "the Son of man," Dan. vii. 13, 14; (2) in the συντέλεια τοῦ καιροῦ, Dan. ix. 27, xii. 4, 13; (3) after a period of great θλίψις, Dan. xii. 1, xi. 26, 27; (4) whose members should be governors (the subject nations were under, not members of the Basileia), Dan. vii. 18, 22, 27; (5) as oecumenical, Dan. vii. 14, 27, et pass. the other prophecies; (6) as political, in the proper sense of the term, as indicating an external government exercised, as are now merely human governments, over the persons and property of men, (passim the prophecies; (7) whose members should be the saints (spiritually holy ones) of the covenanted people of the preceding æon or καιρὸς, Dan. vii. 18, 22, 27 (comp. 27, ix. 27, xii. 4, 13); (8) in which righteousness (spiritual and external) should prevail, (pass. the prophecies).

Let it be observed concerning these characteristics—a. That no one is exclusive of any other; all may co-exist in one and the same objective. b. That if fairly deduced from the normal sense of the Old Testament Scriptures they are to be regarded as the true characteristics, unless it can be shown that the New Testament teachers declared that the prophecies are not to be normally interpreted, at least in reference to the points specified. c. That whilst the first six accord with those presented in what is universally recognized as the old Jewish scheme, the 7th and 8th are different—for the Saints of the covenanted people, the Jews substituted the natural seed of Abraham, and for spiritual, mere ceremonial righteousness.

2. Jesus and the other inspired New Testament teachers recognized the truth of the foregoing characteristics.

They did so not only by positive affirmation in respect to each one; but also by direct condem-

* [Normal is used instead of literal (the term generally employed in this connection) as more expressive of the correct idea. No terms could have been chosen more unfit to designate the two great schools of prophetic exegesis than literal and spiritual. These terms are not antithetical, nor are they in any proper sense significant of the peculiarities of the respective systems they are employed to characterize. They are positively misleading and confusing. Literal is opposed not to spiritual but to figurative; spiritual is in antithesis on the one hand to material, on the other to carnal (in a bad sense). The Literalist (so called) is not one who denies that figurative language, that symbols, are used in prophecy, nor does he deny that great spiritual truths are set forth therein; his position is, simply, that the prophecies are to be normally interpreted (i. e. according to the received laws of language) as any other utterances are interpreted—that which is manifestly literal being regarded as literal, that which is manifestly figurative being so regarded. The position of the Spiritualist (so called) is not that which is properly indicated by the term. He is one who holds that whilst certain portions of the prophecies are to be normally interpreted, other portions are to be regarded as having a mystical (i. e. involving some secret meaning) sense. Thus, for instance, Spiritualists (so called) do not deny that when the Messiah is spoken of as "a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief," the prophecy is to be normally interpreted; they affirm, however, that when He is spoken of as coming "in the clouds of heaven" the language is to be "spiritually" (mystically) interpreted (see the quotation from Robinson in the introduction to the Excursus). The terms properly expressive of the schools are normal and mystical.—E. B. C.]

nation of the Jews for misinterpreting the Scriptures, where they substituted different doctrines, and by silence at times, as well as occasional affirmation, in respect to all those other points on which the Jewish belief accorded with them. (In the following exhibit, for purposes of compactness and distinctness in argument, the 7th and 8th of the characteristics will be considered first, and in the inverse order—the preceding notation, however, being preserved.)

(8). The Basileia was to be a government in which righteousness (spiritual and external) should prevail.

It is a universally recognized fact that the great mass of the Jews of our Saviour's day regarded all righteousness as consisting in ceremonial observance. Our Lord in rebuking this opinion, and in declaring to the people, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees ye shall in no case enter into the Kingdom of heaven," (Matt. v. 20), proceeded on the ground, not that the true meaning of the Old Testament had been hidden beneath a mystic veil which He came to remove, but that they had "made the law of God of none effect (i. e. had set aside its normal interpretation) through their (your) traditions" (Matt. xv. 6). Throughout the whole of His ministry, as lies on the surface of the New Testament, He taught the great doctrine previously taught by the prophets, that into the Basileia nothing impure should enter. (As to the special force, as bearing on this point, of the parables in Matt. xiii., xxii., xxv., see below.)

(7). Whose members should be the saints (spiritually holy ones) of the covenanted people of the preceding æon.

The Jews believed that the members of the Basileia were to be selected from the members of the covenanted people of the preceding æon, and on this point our Lord uttered no denial. He referred not merely to those then living as entering into the future Kingdom, but to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as having a place therein, Luke xiii. 28. His teachings manifestly accorded with their beliefs. The Apostle Paul declared, "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," and, further, that upon those who remain upon earth until the coming of the Lord a resurrection change should pass (comp. 1 Cor. xv. 50-52 with 1 Thess. iv. 14-17), implying that those who inherit the Kingdom are the changed Saints of a former dispensation.

For the Saints, however, the Jews substituted the ceremonially righteous, and for the covenanted people, the natural seed of Abraham. Both these substitutions Jesus condemned, and that in accordance with the normal interpretation of the Old Testament. The former condemnation and its ground were virtually considered under the preceding characteristic.

As to the latter, the Baptist declared: "God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham," Matt. iii. 9, and our Lord declared to the Chief Priests and Elders, "The Kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation (ἐθνος—gentile people) bringing forth the fruits thereof," Matt. xxi. 43. Now, in making these declarations, Jesus and His forerunner were not uttering new revelations—they were proceeding on the platform of Old Testament Scripture, whose normal sense was ignored by the Jews. It is true that the covenant belonged pre-eminently to the natural seed of Abraham; yet, from the beginning, on the one hand, great branches of that seed had been cast aside; and, on the other, provision had been made for the reception of proselytes, and it had also been prophesied that in process of time Jehovah would call them His people ( $\text{Ὁς}=\lambda\omicron\varsigma$ ) who had not been His people, Hos. ii. 23. In that portion of the epistle to the Romans (ix.-xi.) in which the Apostle establishes the covenant relations of converted Gentiles, their true engrafting into the covenanted people (x. 17-21), he does not speak of it as a strange thing, but argues it as the fulfillment of prophecy, quoting the prophecy of Hosea above cited (ix. 24-26). Manifestly the New Testament teachers not merely approve this characteristic, but the Apostle Paul approves it as in accordance with the Old Testament.

(1). It was to be established in a glorious visible advent of "the Son of Man."

This is universally recognized as one of the most prominent doctrines of the Jews. If it had been an error, it is inconceivable that our Lord would not have rebuked it in terms as decided as those employed in reference to other errors. But on the contrary He affirmed it, and affirmed it, manifestly, as the fulfillment of the prophecy of Daniel (see under section 1, (2), of the I. division). The only instances in which it is claimed that He denied it (or spoke of a Basileia as coming in any other mode) are Luke xvii. 21, 22, and those few passages in which He referred to the Kingdom in the use of a present verb. The passage in Luke is best explained as being in harmony with His other teachings (see above), and the other passages, as we have seen, are grammatically consistent therewith.

(2). In the συντέλεια τοῦ καιροῦ (Dan. ix. 27, xii. 4, 13). This was directly taught and in manifest reference to the prophecy of Daniel, comp. Matt. xxiv. 8, 6, 18, 34; Mark xiii. 7; Luke xxi. 9, 31; see also Matt. xiii. 39, 40, 49, with context.

(3). After a period of great θλίψις (Dan. xii. 1, vii. 26, 27). Confirmed in the New Testament, Matt. xxiv. 21, 29; Mark xiii. 19, 24; 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13; 2 Thess. i. 4-7.

(4). The members to be governors (Dan. vii. 18, 22, 27). This was a doctrine never controverted by our Lord; but, on the contrary, He again and again so spake as to manifest that He took its truth for granted. See Matt. xix. 28, xxiv. 47, xxv. 21, 28; Luke xii. 44, xix. 17, 19, xxii. 29, 30. The counsel that He gave His disciples on the occasion of the ambitious request of the Sons of Zebedee, Matt. xx. 25-28, and the rebuke He administered at the Last Supper, Luke xxii. 24-27, cannot be understood as negating that doctrine. His design on both these occasions was, not to teach that there should be no ruling in the Basileia, but to rebuke the ambitious spirit that seeks after authority for the sake of self, and to teach that the true idea of ruling is that of rendering service. This is evident from the fact that He presented Himself, the acknowledged Master, as their model; and from the further facts that, on the first of the mentioned occasions, He implied that one was to sit on His right hand and another on His left (to share in superior authority), Matt. xx. 23, and that, in the latter, immediately after the rebuke, He declared to His Apostles that they should sit on thrones, Luke xxii. 29, 30. (See also 1 Cor. vi. 2, 8; Jude 14, 15; Rev. iii. 21, v. 10, xx. 6, xxii. 5.)

(5). As ecumenical. No one affirms that this characteristic was ever denied by our Lord. It was not, indeed, directly declared by Him that the saints should be associated with Him in the rule of all the earth; it was manifestly implied, however, in His evident reference to the prophecies of Daniel as of normal interpretation without any qualification, and in His association of His disciples with Himself in government, in connection with the known belief of the Jews. It seems to be directly affirmed, 1 Cor. vi. 2, 8; Jude 14, 15; Rev. xx. 6.

(6). As political, (i. e., an external government exercised over the persons and property of men).

There can be no question as to the apparent teaching of the Old Testament on this point; all the prophecies bearing on the Basileia present the idea of an external, political government. And it is also universally admitted that the Jews were expecting such a kingdom of the Messiah, an expectation which was shared by the Apostles. It is utterly inconceivable that if they had been mistaken on this point, especially as their mistake was confirmed by the apparent teaching of the prophecies, the Great Teacher would not have distinctly undeceived them. And yet throughout His whole ministry He continually so spake as to leave them in error if they were in error. On the occasion of the Last Supper, He employed language which must have confirmed them in their belief on this point, Luke xxii. 29, 30,—a belief not shaken by His forty days teaching on the subject of the Basileia after His resurrection, as is evident from their last question, and in which He must have still further confirmed them by His answer, Acts i. 8-7. The alleged instances of His teaching a contrary doctrine will be considered in the following division.

III. Our Lord and His disciples taught no doctrine of the (or a) Basileia (either complete or inchoate) as lacking any one of the preceding characteristics.

It is alleged that this was done in those utterances in which the Basileia is spoken of in the use of a present verb, and also in Luke xii. 14; xvii. 20, 21; Matt. xiii. 31-52; John xvii. 36; Rom. xiv. 17. All these passages, it is contended, set forth a Basileia having a merely internal character. As to those texts whose force in this direction is derived merely from their grammatical form, we have seen that they are consistent with the idea of a future Basileia. We have also seen that Luke xvii. 20, 21, is consistent with the theory maintained in this excursus. The other passages will be considered in their order.

Luke xii. 14. "Who made Me a judge or a divider over you?" The kingdom had not then been established; our Lord at that time occupied simply the position of a teacher.

Matt. xiii. 31-52. It is contended that in the parables of the mustard seed and the leaven especially, Jesus taught concerning the Basileia, that it begins silently and imperceptibly in the heart and in the community, and gradually increases. The force of the argument is derived from the assumption that in these parables the thing next to the verb of comparison is that to which the Basileia is compared—that in one case it is compared to the mustard seed, and in the other to the little leaven which the woman hid. But if this rule hold good in one case, it must in all others; and under its operation we have the kingdom likened (ver. 24) to the sower, (ver. 45) to the merchant-man, (xx. 1) to the householder. (xxii. 2) to the king, etc. Manifestly, in all these instances, we must pass over the next thing to the verb of comparison, to seek for the object of comparison. Doubtless the true explanation of the phrase "the kingdom is likened, etc.," is the one given by Alford on Matt. xiii. 24, "as like the whole circumstances about to be detailed," i. e., the entire parable presents a truth concerning the kingdom. With this explanation, unity as to the nature of the Basileia (which on the current interpretation is lacking) is brought into this whole series of parables, and these and all the other parables are brought into beautiful consistency with all the other teachings of our Lord. The series in Matt. may be regarded as setting forth that nothing impure, imperfect, or immature, can have place in the Basileia—in such case the good grain, the mighty tree, the thoroughly leavened lump, the treasure separated from the field, the pearl, the good fish, will represent it.

John xviii. 36. In this utterance, it is contended that our Lord intended to declare to Pilate that the kingdom He came to establish was not after the manner of the kingdoms of this world, i. e., not external, political. It is admitted that the utterance considered in itself will bear this interpretation; but it will also bear one consistent with the theory herein advocated, especially in view of the introduction of viv in the last clause of the verse, which may be regarded as a particle of time—My kingdom is not now established. Which of these interpretations are we to adopt? The one supposes that our Lord whispered into the ear of a heathen (neither the disciples nor the Jews were in the Pretorium, ver. 28), the great truth concerning His kingdom, which he had not only concealed from His disciples (hid from them in a bewildering enigma) but a few hours before on the solemn occasion of the institution of the Supper, Luke xxii. 29, 30; but which, also, He continued to conceal throughout the forty days of His subsequent continuance with them, during which time He is represented as "speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God," Acts i. 8, and as opening "their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures," Luke xxiv. 45! The other interpretation supposes that He spake in consistency with His previous and subsequent teaching.

Rom. xiv. 17. This passage is perfectly consistent with the hypothesis of a merely internal Basileia, but manifestly it is also consistent with the hypothesis of a perfectly holy external government. "Meat and drink" do not necessarily infer externality, they may refer to mere fleshly enjoyment which has no place in the Basileia as set forth in this excursus.

In conclusion of the whole subject it may be remarked:

(1). If it has been fairly shown that the great mass of Scriptures in which the term Basileia occurs, require as the objective thereof the one set forth in this excursus, then is it utterly illogical, from the possible force of a few scattered passages, which may, without straining, be interpreted in consistency with the others; either, on the one hand, to deny the validity of the objective established, or, on the other hand, to hypothesize a second and variant objective—to conclude that the term was used ambiguously.

(2). The theory herein defended is not liable to the objection that it presents a "carnal" or "material" doctrine concerning the nature of the Basileia. Most certainly the doctrine is not "carnal" in the bad sense of that term, nor as teaching that gross flesh and blood shall inherit the kingdom; nor is it "material" save so far as the doctrine of the resurrection of the body is so. It agrees with this latter doctrine in implying that the redemption of Christ respects the body as well as the soul, and also with the doctrine set forth in Rom. viii. 18-23.

(3). Much important matter bearing on this subject, connected with the scriptural use of the terms συντέλεια, παρουσία, ἐπιφάνεια, ἀνάστασις, παλιγγενεσία, ἀποκατάστασις, κληρονομία, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, has necessarily been passed over. Fully to discuss the subject in connection with all these terms would require a volume.

(4). If the foregoing reasoning be valid, increased doubt is thrown upon the reading ἡμῶν βασιλείαν, ver. 6, of this chapter. Should, however, the now generally accepted reading be sustained, the passage may be rendered consistent with the theory herein supported by attributing to ἐποίησεν a proleptical, or rather de jure, force.

And, lastly, this excursus has been written in a spirit of deep conviction, but not, it is trusted, in one of dogmatism. The writer feels that any man should study so vast and important a subject with the deepest humility and self-distrust, and express his conclusions with the utmost modesty; and he more keenly feels, as he finishes his work, than in the beginning, how unfit he is to grapple with it. If aught of dogmatism should have appeared in the expression of his views, he trusts that it will be attributed to the necessity of his situation, where brevity in expression is of prime importance.—E. ## EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Vers. 9-20. ALFORD: "Introduction to the Epistles, Appearance of our Lord to St. John, and command to write what he saw, and to send it to the seven churches."—E. R. C.]

The entire section has a two-fold significance. In the first place, as a heavenly action [an action taking place in heaven], it lays the foundation for the critical review of the seven churches in the seven epistles. Secondly, it forms the basis of the whole Apocalypse. We must observe, however, that it is contrary to the text and to all internal probability to suppose that the entire series of visions, and even the recording of them, took place in one day (Bengel, Hengstenberg and others). In accordance with prophetic form, John begins his book with the announcement of his calling and commission; comp. Jer. i.; Ezek. i.

Ver. 9. I, John.—We find the same expression in ch. xxii. 8; comp. ch. i. 4. Düsterdieck: "The conjunction of ἐγὼ with the name is Danielic" (Dan. vii. 15, viii. 1, ix. 2, x. 2, xii. 5). [TRENCH: "The only other writer, either in the Old Testament or the New, who uses this style is Daniel—'I, Daniel' (vii. 28, ix. 2, x. 2)."—E. R. C.] It is, therefore, an apocalyptic form, and it has been imitated by apocryphal apocalypticists. The conjunction of the name with what follows signals the Apocalypticist as the living mediator between God and the Church.

Your brother and companion.—This companionship has its foundation in Jesus, in fellowship with Jesus. It is a companionship at first in tribulation; then in the glory of the kingdom; the great contrast being harmonized by endurance (Rom. viii. ; 2 Tim. ii. 10, 12; 1 Pet.). To the suffering of affliction at the hands of the hostile world, as a suffering with Christ, for His name's sake, the principal possession of the glory of the kingdom corresponds, on which principal possession the hope of the perfect appearing of that glory is based. The goal is not attained, however, without endurance in Christ; see ch. xiii. 10, xiv. 12. ["As yet, however, while the tribulation is present, the kingdom is only in hope; therefore he adds to these, as that which is the link between them 'and patience (endurance) of Jesus Christ'; cf. Acts xiv. 22, where exactly these same three, the tribulation, the patience, and the kingdom, occur. Ὑπομονή, which we have rendered 'patience,' is not so much the 'patientia' as the 'perseverentia' of the Latin; which last word Cicero (De Invent. ii. 54) thus defines: 'In ratione bene considerata stabilis et perpetua mansio'; and Augustine (Quest. lxxiii. qu. 31): 'Honestatis aut utilitatis causa arduum ac difficilium voluntaria ac diuturna perpassio.' It is indeed a beautiful word, expressing the brave patience of the Christian.—ἡσυχία τῶν ἀρετῶν, Chrysostom does not fear to call it." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

Was in the isle.—The Apocalypticist introduces himself to his readers under the aspect of his martyrdom [Martyrium], wherein they also participate, in that blessed fellowship of love and suffering, to which the Apostle Paul delighted to refer (see 2 Cor.). Düsterdieck thinks that this reference of "companion" to a suffering of affliction as a martyr is not admissible. The simple and obvious traditional reference of the following words: "for the word of God, etc."—to John's banishment to the Isle of Patmos, a fact attested by Church history, is disputed by De Wette, Lücke, Bleek, Düsterdieck. Διά, as they take it, indicates that John was on the island of Patmos in order that he might receive the testimony of Jesus. A marvellous idea, this, that John should have been obliged to travel from Ephesus to Patmos for the sake of receiving a revelation from Jesus! These commentators affirm that, according to the usage of the Apocalypse, the μαρτυρία Ἰησοῦ cannot mean witness concerning Jesus, as Ebrard and others suppose. "On the contrary, the genitive accompanying μαρτυρία is invariably a subjective genitive." In support of this view they cite: ch. i, 2, xii. 17, xix. 10, xx. 4, in connection with the passages ch. i. 5, xii. 11.* The Apocalypticist, however, manifestly regards the μαρτυρία of Jesus as a grand unitive fact, as that world-historical witnessing unto, and suffering for, the truth (John xviii. 37), in which Jesus stands in the midst of His people as the faithful Witness, but which all faithful believers participate in, by virtue of the very fact that they testify of Jesus. For testimony of or concerning Jesus has a heavenly significance only through its being a testimony with Jesus of the whole revelation of God; as, on the other hand, a testimony with Jesus can not exist without a testimony of or concerning Him. [Believers, in filling up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ (Col. i. 24), continue His witness—they witness both with and concerning Him.—E. R. C.] Moreover, it cannot be denied that this strained interpretation, which identifies the ideas of revelation and testimony, is in the interest of that criticism which seeks to set aside the authorship of the Apostle John. The expression, was on the island, permits a distinct discrimination between the time of the revelation itself, or the grand series of visions, and the time of the inditing of the scripture. Whether it follows, however, that, at the time of writing, the Apocalypse was no longer on the island, is extremely doubtful. Various attempts to explain ἐν νῆσῳ, see in Düsterdieck, p. 120. [ALFORD remarks: "When an event is notified with ἐγένετο, we express the meaning by 'came to pass:' when a person, we have no word which will do it;" and he continues on the same word, ver. 10: "Not merely 'I was,' but 'I became.'"—E. R. C.]

That is called Patmos.—The first readers of the Apocalypse were of course aware of this; doubtless, therefore, τῇ καλουμένῃ is not intended as an indication of the smallness of the island, but as a historical item for the more extended circle of readers. On the situation and character of the island (Patino or Palmosa), comp. the lexicons and works of travel.

Ver. 10. I was in the spirit, i. e., transported out of the ordinary every-day consciousness, and placed in the condition of prophetic ecstasy [trance], Acts [x. 10;] xi. 5, xxii. 17, 1 Cor. xiv. 2. The contrast is: to be in one's right mind [the ordinary right condition of mind; or rather to be ἐν ἑαυτῷ.—E. R. C.] (Acts xii. 11), or to be and to speak in the understanding (νοῦς) [1 Cor. xiv. 14]. It is the contrast of reflecting consciousness, holding intercourse with the world through the medium of the senses, and of a higher, or rather, polarly opposed form of consciousness, in which direct spiritual contemplation predominates. By the spirit, therefore, we undoubtedly are to understand, not the Spirit of God (as Grotius and others maintain), but that spiritual life of man which stands contrasted with his relation to the world; which, as a prophetic state, is inconceivable without the operation of the Holy Spirit, and hence presupposes the more general life in the Spirit (Rom. viii. 9) as its basis.* [The expression is simply ἐν πνεύματι, the article does not appear. "That which is born of the Spirit, is spirit" (ἐκ τοῦ Πνεύματος πνεῦμά ἐστι), John iii. 6. The ordinary condition of the Christian, and the extraordinary condition of the prophet, are spiritual conditions produced by the Holy Spirit.—E. R. C.]

On the Lord's day.—Not transported by the Spirit of the Lord to the Last Day (Wetstein

* ["The usage of our writer himself in the passages where he speaks of death by persecution (vi. 9, xx. 4), show that with him δὲ in this connection is because of, in consequence of. De Wette naively says that had it not been for these parallel passages such a meaning would never have been thought of here. We may as simply reply, that owing to those parallel passages it must be accepted here." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

and others), for the being in the spirit is an independent idea, but on Sunday (Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xi. 20, xvi. 2). On the reference of this to Easter-day, and the ideas connected with this view, see Düsterdieck, p. 121. [Alford discusses the entire subject at considerable length.—E. R. C.]

And I heard behind me.—This represents, as Düsterdieck correctly remarks, the utter unexpectedness and surprisingness of the divine voice. Consequently, its pure and certain objectivity likewise. Various interpretations—as indicative of the invisibleness of God—of the position of the prophet, as on earth, etc., see in Düsterdieck. That commentator, however, fails to recognize the reference to the fact that, in the region of prophecy, the auricular wonder generally precedes the ocular wonder; and after the latter has faded away, the tones of the former are still heard—a fact in perfect accordance with psychological relations. The Jewish popular notion that no man can see God without dying, can of course have no application here; it is itself, however, but a dark reflection of the actual fact that every first or greatest view of the glory of the Lord has so astounding an effect upon the prophet as to cast him to the earth (Is. vi.; Jer. i. 6; Ezek. i. 28; Dan. viii. 17); thus it was here. Ebrard rightly gives prominence to the gradualness of the development of the visionary state.

As of a trumpet.—Düsterdieck remarks that this is a mere comparison without any particular significance. The trumpet, however, significantly opens the Apocalypse, as a signal of the last time; see 1 Thess. iv. 16 [Matt. xxiv. 31]. In Exodus xix. 19, it is the signal of the revelation of the law. According to Numbers x. 6, 7, the mere blowing of the trumpet was the signal for the gathering together of the congregation; the sounding of an alarm, on the other hand, being the signal for the breaking up of the camp—a distinction such as exists between the symbolical import of the peal of bells and the cannonade. This voice, according to Hengstenberg, proceeds from Christ Himself. Düsterdieck regards ch. iv. 1 as militating against this view. It is, manifestly, the visional trumpet of the visional form of the Angel of Christ, i. e. Christ Himself in His symbolical appearance.

Ver. 11. Saying: What thou seest.—Prophetic present.—In a book (βιβλίον).—Hengstenberg: Everything, to the end of ch. iii., is intended. Düsterdieck: The whole revelation is meant. Since this first, leading vision forms the foundation not only of the seven epistles, but also of the entire scripture, the latter view is established beyond a doubt. The commission to send the book to the seven churches devolved upon John immediately at the opening of the revelation in Patmos. This alone does not prove that the book was written on Patmos; nor, still less, that its author wrote it while in the ecstatic condition (as Hengstenberg affirms). But since it is not supposable that John made any unnecessary delay in writing down such great things, it is highly probable that the book was written during his stay on Patmos. It would seem as if the first ἐγενόμην were modified by the second, particularly when we consider the great contrast between being in the spirit (πνεῦμα) and being in the understanding (νοῦς).

Send unto the seven churches.—Though the seven-foldness of the churches constitutes, as a sacred number, a symbolical type of the whole Church, this type is also founded upon a unitous organization of the diocese of Ephesus, to be inferred from the exchange of Paul's Ephesian cyclical epistle from [i. e., received by the Colossians from.—E. R. C.]. Laodicea and the epistle to the Colossians (Col. iv. 16). *—The order of the seven churches accords with their geographical position in respect to Patmos and Ephesus. Comp. the maps, ancient geography, and the travels of Schubert, Strauss, and others.

Ver. 12. And I turned about.—Effect of the voice. To see the voice.—The prophetic voice pre-supposes a speaker in the background, and to visional seeing a more general sense attaches.

Seven golden candlesticks.—These are the first things that he sees, for the whole Apocalypse treats of the future of the kingdom of God as represented by the Church. Seven candlesticks; "not one candlestick with seven arms" (Düsterdieck, in opposition to Grotius).

Ver. 13. And in the midst (ἐν μέσῳ).—The fact that Christ is always in His Church (Matt. xxviii. 20) and, indeed, in the midst of the seven candlesticks, is here symbolically displayed to prophetic contemplation. Herder has observed that every one of the seven epistles commences with a feature of this vision. On the candlesticks comp. Matt. v. 14-16. The appearance is directly signalized as an appearance of Christ by the apocalyptic sign, Dan. vii. 13, x. 16-18. Why is the word ὁμοιος used? Hengstenberg; To indicate that the Person seen is no mere man. Lyra: To indicate that it is the Angel of Christ. Ebrard: The Danielic ἄγγελος (ch. vii. 13). The state of the case is simply this: Christ is called the Son of man, but is like a son of man (Rom. viii. 3; Phil. ii. 7). The Seer adopts the latter form as the original apocalyptic term, and the one corresponding to the mysteriousness of the phenomenon. Doubtless he was in part led to the use of this expression—Son of man—by the fact that it was Christ's own name for Himself; [It was one of the prophetic names of the Messiah—a name highly significant (see note*, p. 24), and the name adopted by Christ Himself.—E. R. C.]; and ὁμοιος is also in part expressive of the apostolic view that the human personality of Christ, in its glorification, is clothed with the splendor of divine majesty. The garment of Christ, the long talar (ποδήρης, reaching to the feet), denotes the High-priest; the golden girdle, the King. Christ is both these in the highest power, since He even makes His people kings and priests (ver. 6). He wears the girdle about His breast, not about His hips. Why is this? Ebrard's explanation is justly rejected by Düsterdieck (p. 124). It is well known that the girdle, when worn about the loins, denotes a preparedness for travel and, consequently, for labor; surrounding the breast, it is an ornament, expressive of rest and festivity. The priests also wore their girdles thus, according to Josephus (see the citation in Düsterdieck).

* [See remarks on ver. 4, p. 90.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 14. His head and His hairs.—The head (pursuant to the irregular conjunction of terms) first appears under the aspect of the hair; since that, according to Oriental ideas, was the especial representative of its dignity. The whiteness of the hair is doubly characterized, the second image surpassing the first (Is. i. 18; Mark ix. 3). What does this whiteness denote? Cocceius: Purity from sin. Hengstenberg: Holiness and glory. De Wette: A celestial light [lucid] nature. Düsterdieck, with others: Eternity, in accordance with the appearance of the Ancient of Days, Dan. vii. 9;—with reference to Rev. i. 17, 18. In the history of the transfiguration and elsewhere, the white lustre certainly denotes the lucid or light-nature, in which eternity is conditioned by purity and maternity [together with the dignity and authority that (especially among the Orientals) belong to age—the Ancient of days.—E. R. C.], perfection. [Augustine (Exp. ad Gal. iv. 21): “Dominus non nisi ob antiquitatem veritatis in Apocalypsi albo capite apparuit.”—E. R. C.]

As a flame (chap. xix. 12; Dan. x. 6).—Interpretations: Vitrings and others: Omniscience. Hengstenberg and others: Avenging justice. Ebrard: Holiness, consuming all that is unclean. Düsterdieck: Omniscience, directed, with holy wrath, against all that is unholy. De Wette: The transluminating, consuming glance of heavenly light-essences (analogy: classical descriptions of the gods). It is significant that the eyes of flame re-appear in the epistle to Thyatira. The all-piercing glance of the Judge is specially directed to the distinguishing of mock-holy fanaticism, such as Jezebel's, from genuine spiritual life. The Greek term for pureness, sincerity, εὐκρίνεια, is derived from the sun-ray [and the English pure, from πῦρ, fire.—Tr.]

Ver. 15. His feet like unto fine brass [or molten gold].—In the epistle to Thyatira this specification is conjoined with the eyes of flame. On the obscure χαλκοὺς βᾶνους, comp. the lexicons, Ebrard, p. 188, and Düsterdieck, p. 126. The interpretations furthest from the point are: olibanum [Erzweltrauch, frankincense of deep hue] (Ewald); furnace ore [Ofeners] (Hitsig); but neither is white ore [Weissers, “a mixture of sulphuret of silver, sulphuret of copper, sulphuret of lead, and sulphuret of antimony.”—Sanders' Wörterbuch.—Tr.] (Hengstenberg), or Lebanon ore (iron) [Ebrard], satisfactory. For what idea could readers living in Asia Minor connect with either of these? Züllig supposes χαλκοὺς βᾶνους to be a provincial term peculiar to Asia Minor. Perhaps we should go back to λεῖβος, λεῖβελος, λεῖβός, λεῖβιδόν, and translate: fused copper [Kupferguss—a gush or flow of molten copper], glowing copper, heated in the furnace to a white glow, a golden stream, so that λεῖβανος may be a word unknown, indeed, to the lexicons, and yet a perfectly correct term for molten, white-glowing metal;* see ch. x. 1. According to De Wette, these feet, radiant with a fiery glow, are significant only of brightness and splendor; according to Düsterdieck, they denote the down-treading of unholy foes, with reference to Ps. lx. 12; Is. lxiii. 6; Dan. x. 6. But as feet in themselves are instruments of motion, and as the golden-yellow hue denotes pure motion, so, especially, this metal, purified in the furnace, fluent and glowing with white heat, denotes the holiest motion. And hence, also, this characteristic of Christ is properly opposed to the unholy and mischievous motion of a fanatical Jezebel of Thyatira.

And His voice as the voice of many waters.—The surging waters represent the life of the nations. As the voice of Christ is, on the one hand, like a trumpet of God, it may, on the other, be heard in the sea-like roar of the voices of Christian nations. Whether the many waters admit of so simple a translation as “the majesty of ocean, calmly roaring” [die Majestät des ruhig rauschenden Meeres] is doubtful.*

Ver. 16. And having (ἔχων) in His right hand.—The stars have, with exceedingly bad taste, been turned into jewels or rings (Eichhorn). [“Not on His right hand, as a number of jewelled rings, but in his right hand, as a wreath or garland held in it.” Alford.—E. R. C.] The fact of His being able to lay the same hand on the head of John is contrary to the sensuous apprehension, but not to the symbolical representation. That the stars are in His hand is expressive not simply of the fact that the churches are His property (Düsterdieck), but also that they are surrounded by His providence. We cannot, with Hengstenberg, regard this trait as pre-eminently expressive of His punitive power, though neither is that to be excluded. Nor is the element of comfort (Herder) pre-eminent. What is primarily taught is simply Christ's [property in, and] rule over His Church, a doctrine branching into consolation, admonition, and warning.

And out of His mouth.—This unpicturesque but symbolically pregnant combination is expressive of the fact that Christ overcomes the world with His word, as with a two-edged sword, Is. xi. 4; xlix. 2; Wisd. xviii. 15; 2 Thess. ii. 8. Christ's simple word is intended here; hence there is also a reference to the power of that word in so far as it is contained in the preaching of His servants (a point which Düsterdieck denies); even the testimony of each individual Christian is included, Eph. vi. 17. [The word of the Lord is almighty; by His word He acts—He creates, He overcomes, and He destroys. The last, or the last two, seem to be the fact, or facts, set forth by this figure.—E. R. C.]

And His countenance.—Düsterdieck translates: His appearance, declaring that in ch. x. 1, the word is πρόσωπον [instead of ὄψις]. But is it probable that different portions of the body would be described and the face, of all * [Alford correctly remarks: “This word has defeated all the ingenuity of commentators hitherto. . . . If conjecture were admissible (which it is not), I should in despair of any way out of the difficulty, suggest whether the word might not have been χαλκολεβάνη, a stream of melted brass: ΔΙ having been read ΔΙ or Ν.”—E. R. C.]

* [It is to be regretted that Lange does not give us the name of the author whom he quotes. If the above sentence was written in ridicule, it is singularly inappropriate. There is an internal calm, a “hiding of power,” in that which is truly mighty when producing effects within its scope, that makes the expression “calmly roaring,” when applied to the ocean, beautifully appropriate. As there is no sound on earth so majestic as the roar of ocean, and at the same time so suggestive of a hidden power, what figure so appropriate to represent the voice of the Almighty!—E. R. C.]

things, left out? And are we to suppose that the whole form shone as the sun, and yet that the white hair, the stars in the hand, and the white glow of the molten metal were perceptible in this dazzling radiance, whilst the face itself was invisible? Dan. x. 6, would then offer a diversity.—In its might.—The noon-tide blaze of the sun, unobscured by clouds or mist.*

Ver. 17. And when I saw Him.—Exodus xxxiii. 20; Is. vi. 6; Ezek. i. 28; Dan. viii. 17, x. 7. "The impression made by the appearance of the Lord is that of deadly terror, for because death is the wages of sin, no sinful man can stand before God and live" (Düsterdieck). In the first place, we must distinguish the pure meaning of Ex. xxxiii. 20 from the popular Jewish notion set forth in Judg. xiii. 22; the astounding and, possibly, well-nigh fatal effect which the appearance of the Heavenly and Holy One produces on sinful man does indeed remain; yet, as Ebrard justly remarks, it would be a very one-sided proceeding to regard this element of fear in view of death as the only one at work in the breast of the aged John. Was an element of rapture combined, an emotion of pleasurable fear, as the same commentator claims? At all events, the tremendous operation of the physiological and cosmical contrast is to be taken into account. Perfect spiritual sight is in itself a sort of death to this world (second consciousness), a state into which the seer is transported by a death-like convulsion, and a transportation from the earthly to the heavenly condition of existence is not conceivable without a metamorphosis. Comp. the history of the transfiguration and the resurrection. On the inconsistency which De Wette pretends to discover in this description, see Düsterdieck. Be it remarked only that this event signalizes the commencement of the visionary state and not its entire course.

He laid His right hand upon me.—See the miracles of Christ. According to Düsterdieck, the laying of the right hand upon John was but a friendly sign accompanying the aid actually given by the word of Christ. Unseasonable separation of the two sides of one act!

* [TRANCH: "The description of the glorified Lord, which has now been brought to a conclusion, sublime as a purely mental conception, but intolerable if we were to give it an outward form and expression, and picture Him with this sword proceeding from His mouth, these feet as burning brass, this hair white as wool, and the rest, may suggest a few reflections on the apocalyptic, and generally the Hebrew symbolism; and the very significant relations of difference and opposition in which it stands to the Greek. Religion and art for the Greek ran into one another with no very great preponderance of the claims of the former over the latter. Even in his religious symbolism the sense of beauty, of form, of proportion, overrules every other and must, at all costs, find its satisfaction. . . . But with the Hebrew symbolism it is altogether different. The first necessity there is that the symbol should set forth truly and fully the religious idea of which it is intended to be the vehicle. How it would appear when it clothed itself in an outward form and shape, whether it would find favor and allowance at the bar of taste, this was quite a secondary consideration; may be confidently affirmed not to have been a consideration at all; for, indeed, with the one exception of the cherubim, there was no intention that it should embody itself there, but rather that it should remain ever and only a purely mental conception, the unembodied sign of an idea. I may observe, by the way, that no skill of delineation can make the cherubim other than unsightly objects to the eye. Thus, in this present description of Christ, sublime and majestic as it is, it is only such so long as we keep it wholly apart from any external embodiment."—E. R. C.]

Fear not.—The same words that ring through the Gospels.

I am the First, and the Last [ver. 18]. And the Living One.—The First: this, Christ is in a mediate sense, as the Father is the same in an absolute sense: He, Christ, is the principle of the world (Epistle to the Colossians) and the final goal of the world (Epistle to the Ephesians), especially of the Kingdom of God; and both these He is in the unity of the simple Living One, whose life and demonstrations of life go on from Alpha to Omega (ch. xxii. 13). The Living One does not directly signify ζωοποιῶν (Grotius) [it includes it, however.—E. R. C.]; but neither does it simply mean one who is alive; in power and effect it denotes Him who is the fountain of life, and who now restores life and animation to the paralyzed John.

And I was dead.—As Man, also, He is the Living One, Who, by His resurrection, has got death behind Him and under Him (Rom. vi. 9; Acts xiii. 34).

And behold, I am living.—He lives from æon to æon. This expression is significant of eternity—not, however, as a rigid unit, void of distinction and diversity, but as a series of peculiar and original conformations of the æon or the æons of the æons. The latter conception is one of infinite grandeur. As there is a heaven of heavens, i. e., as the uranic units unite into one more general unity, so there is an æon, composed, not of years, but of æons, and this æon, again, unfolds into a plurality. And Christ does not live passively into these æons, but as He who has the keys of death and Hades. Hell is not spoken of in this passage.

The keys denote authority—exclusive authority. Christ can redeem men from death and Hades, and can cast men into them; and He alone is possessed of this power, ch. iii. 7, ix. 1, xx. 1. And have these keys, through Peter's hands, been transmitted to the popes? The distinction between death and the realm of death occasions difficulty. We cannot think of death as a place to which keys give access. This place is Hades; see the articles on Sheol and Hades.* Thus both terms seem to express one and the same idea (De Wette); yet the Seer further distinguishes between death and Hades, ch. vi. 8; xx. 14. In the first passage, Death manifestly appears as the former lord of Hades, the previous possessor of its keys—Death is personified, therefore, as in Ps. ix. 13; Job xxxviii. 17. And it is personified because it had become an independent power, inasmuch as the natural spirit-life of humanity was powerless in its presence. Christ, in communicating to John a new and exalted consciousness of this His glory, not only raises him up again, but also endues him with that elevation of mind without which he would be unable to view the terrors of the last times.

Ver. 19. Write now [therefore]—Because thou art now freed from thy dread, and hast but to write of life's triumph over death. This verse, based upon verses 17 and 18, is in part a repetition of ver. 11 (Hengstenberg). What thou hast seen, is not limited to the vision introduced in ver. 12 (Düsterdieck), but includes what thou shalt have seen, i. e., the whole series of visions. The visions, however, relate first to what is, what now is (thus most commentators, whilst Bleek, De Wette and others interpret  $\hat{\alpha} \epsilon\iota\sigma\iota\nu$  in the sense of: what it signifies), and, secondly, to that which is to come. ["Two meanings of  $\hat{\alpha} \epsilon\iota\sigma\iota\nu$  are possible. 1. The things which are, viz., which exist at the present time . . . 2. What things they (the  $\hat{\alpha} \epsilon\iota\delta\epsilon\varsigma$ ) signify . . . In deciding between these we have the following considerations: a. the use of the plural  $\epsilon\iota\sigma\iota\nu$ , as marking off this clause in meaning from the next, which has  $\hat{\alpha} \mu\acute{\epsilon}\lambda\lambda\epsilon\iota \gamma\epsilon\nu\theta\acute{\alpha}\iota$ . If this latter is singular, why not this? Is it not because the  $\mu\acute{\epsilon}\lambda\lambda\epsilon\iota \gamma\epsilon\nu\theta\acute{\alpha}\iota$  merely signifies the future time, in which this latter class, en masse, were to happen, whereas this  $\hat{\alpha} \epsilon\iota\sigma\iota\nu$  imports what these things, each of them severally, mean? And, b. this seems to be borne out by the double repetition of  $\epsilon\iota\sigma\iota\nu$  in the next verse, both times unquestionably in this (the second) meaning." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 20. The mystery of the seven stars.—This adjunct is of the highest moment in a two-fold aspect. In the first place, it gives us to understand that the whole apocalyptic prophecy will really be a history of the seven stars and the seven candlesticks; secondly, that the entire series of visions will consist of symbolical mysteries, not to be understood literally, requiring interpretation; yet susceptible of interpretation through biblical means. The interpretation which Christ here gives by way of example, reminds us of the interpretation of the first two parables in Matt. xiii., also designed as a guide to the interpretation of the rest. Hence an angel of exegesis appears once more in the darker portion of the Apocalypse, ch. xvii. 7 sqq.; and at the close of ch. xiii., there is a fresh reference to the fact that we have to do with riddles. The mystery of the seven stars is that which is symbolized by them. Sacrum secretum, per ipsas significatum (Lyræ). "A  $\mu\upsilon\sigma\tau\eta\rho\iota\omega\nu$  is everything that man is unable to understand by means of his own unassisted reason, and which can be apprehended only through divine showing and interpretation, such as immediately follow here" (Düsterdieck). But this definition is undoubtedly too narrow; or do commentaries on the Apocalypse pretend to be the direct result of divine notifications? A mystery is a deep-lying and concealed truth or fact, to be disclosed not by direct revelation, but by the Spirit of enlightenment in His own time, which time, however, God has always reserved to Himself, 1 Tim. iii. 16. Düsterdieck justly declares that the command to write this mystery is fulfilled throughout the book, "for the prophetic unfolding of the hope in the triumphant consummation of Christ's Church through His own return, rests upon the mystery of the seven stars in Christ's hand and the seven candlesticks amidst which He walks—i. e., upon the fact that Christ is the all-powerful protector of His Church, the vanquisher of all its foes." [Lange seems to misapprehend Düsterdieck. The "divine showing and interpretation" spoken of by the latter is not necessarily an immediate divine influence upon the mind of each apprehender—as Lange evidently supposes him to mean. A  $\mu\upsilon\sigma\tau\eta\rho\iota\omega\nu$ , revealed immediately to one for the instruction of others, is revealed for all, and to all, who, under the ordinary enlightening operations of the Spirit, apprehend His instructions. It is generally supposed that the essential idea of a "mystery" is that of something hidden—that it ceases to be a "mystery" when it is apprehended. This is indeed the meaning of the term in ordinary language, and seems to be the one contemplated by Lange; it is not however the import of the term as employed in Scripture. There the essential idea is simply that of something undiscoverable by mere human reason—it is necessarily hidden until it is revealed, but the fact of being hidden does not enter into its essential character; it continues to be a "mystery" after it has been revealed, and after the revelation has been apprehended. Specifically, there are hidden mysteries, revealed mysteries, and (so far as individuals are concerned) apprehended mysteries. The symbolic relation of marriage to the union between Christ and His Church is as much a mystery now, as it was before the inspired Apostle announced it in the Epistle to the Ephesians (v. 32). And so with the mysteries of which the Apostles were stewards, comp. 1 Cor. iv. 1, with Matt. xiii. 11, 1 Cor. i. 26; the mystery of the gospel, Eph. vi. 19, of the faith, 1 Tim. iii. 9, etc. (See all the passages in which the term occurs; the Greek term is invariably translated mystery, and the English word never occurs save as the translation of  $\mu\upsilon\sigma\tau\eta\rho\iota\omega\nu$ ).—E. R. C.]

The seven stars are angels.—This interpretation seems at first sight but to exchange one mystery for another; we must consider, however, that in apostolic times the idea of angels was more intelligible than at the present day. Interpretations: 1. Heads, teachers, (Mal. ii. 7); either as bishops (ancient view) or as the whole ecclesiastical government of the church—the presbytery eventually, with the bishop at its head (Hengstenberg; Rothe: the bishop in idea). 2. The church itself (Andreas and others), or the personified church-spirit (De Wette; he identifies this church-spirit with the  $\hat{\alpha}\gamma\gamma\epsilon\lambda\omega\varsigma \epsilon\theta\epsilon\rho\omega\varsigma$ ). 3. The messenger of the church, i. e., the delegate, who went to and fro between the church and the Apostle (Ebrard). John, however, could not write to this delegate, since it was he who took charge of all manuscripts; neither is it probable that there was more than one delegate between John and the Church in Asia Minor.

If we consider the distance betwixt a star and a candlestick, we shall put both bishops and presbyteries out of the question, and above all, Irvingite wandering stars. We must consider, in the first place, that the epistles are addressed to the angels just as though they were addressed to the churches themselves. The angel receives praise and censure as the representative of the church. Again, he seems to be significant of the conscience of the church; the church's reformation and awakening were to proceed from him. Now both these points coincide in the idea of the personified character or life-picture of the church (to be distinguished from the church-spirit; comp. Acts xii. 15). It may indeed be objected that a symbol cannot be replaced by a symbol (Rothe). And certainly a symbol cannot be written to. But the ideal (in the sense of existing in idea, not in the sense of conforming to God's perfect idea) fundamental type of a Church is a reality in heaven and in the sight of God, as well as in the church's own disposition, and every amendment of a church must start from a laying hold on this fundamental type. It also results from this address that the letters are not episcopal, but apocalyptic. Episcopal letters Christ would, we believe, have left to John. It further results that the epistles form a constituent part of the Apocalypse, and not a mere introduction to it (Bleek); and, furthermore, that the churches are cited not simply as empirical congregations, but as seven universal types of the Church in all places and ages. That there is an empirical foundation for the epistles, is an unquestionable fact.

[NOTE ON THE ANGELS OF THE CHURCHES.—The subject of the Angels of the Churches is one of great interest, apart from the fact that it has an important bearing on the question of the government of the primitive Church. Beside the interpretations given by Lange, there are two others which it is most strange that he failed to mention—since the former was advocated by Origen, Greg. Nys., and Jerome, and in modern days by Alford; and the latter by Vitringa, Lightfoot, Bengel, and Winer. They will now be presented, and will be numbered in continuance of the interpretations given above. 4. Celestial angels, in some way representing the churches. 5. Officers in the primitive churches similar to the שְׁלִיחַ (nuncius ecclesie) of the synagogue. The objection urged by Lange to the 3d view is insuperable; and to this may be added the fact that there is no evidence that any delegate from the churches waited upon John. The 5th view is supported only by a similarity in name—the title of the synagogue officer referred to may be translated: ἄγγελος ἐκκλησιαστικός. It seems to be a fatal objection, however, that the Hebrew minister was one of the inferior officers of the synagogue (see Kitto's Cyclopædia, Tit. SYNAGOGUE), and the Angel of the Apocalypse, if a single person, must have been the chief ruler of the church. SCHAFF (Hist. of the Ap. Ch.) thus writes: "We must at the outset discard the view, that the angels here correspond to the deputies of the Jewish synagogues. . . . For these had an entirely subordinate place, being mere clerks, or readers of the standing forms of prayers, and messengers of the synagogue; whereas the angels in question are compared to stars, and represented as presiding over the churches; nor have we elsewhere any trace of the transfer of that Jewish office to the Christian Church." The 2d view, the one advocated by Lange, viz.: that by angel was meant the church, or the personified character thereof—is liable not only to the objection mentioned by himself, but to the far stronger one, that the angel is clearly distinguished from the church (vers. 18, 16, 20). The arguments in favor of the 4th view may be abridged from Alford as follows: (1) The constant usage of this book, in which the word ἄγγελος occurs only in this sense; (2) the further usage of this book, in which we have, ch xvi. 5, the ἄγγελος τῶν ὑδάτων introduced without any explanation, who can be none other than the angel presiding over the waters; (3) the expression of our Lord Himself, Matt. xviii. 10, together with Acts xii. 15, both asserting the doctrine of guardian or representative angels; (4) the extension of this from individuals to nations, Dan. x. 21; xii. 1; (5) the fact that throughout these Epistles nothing is ever addressed individually, as to a teacher, but as to some one person reflecting the complexion and fortunes of the church, as no mere human teacher or ruler could; (6) as against the objection that sin is charged upon the angel, "that there evidently is revealed to us a mysterious connection between ministering angels and those to whom they minister, by which the former in some way are tinged by the fates and fortunes of the latter. E. g., in our Lord's saying cited above (Matt. xviii. 10), the place of dignity there asserted of the angels of the little children, is unquestionably connected with the character of those whose angels they are," etc. As against this view it may be urged—a. that the preceding answer is not satisfactory—the citation does not support the assertion; and even if it did, it would afford no basis for the charging the sin of the churches upon the holy ministering spirits of God; and b. it is well nigh inconceivable that our Lord should have selected a human Apostle yet in the flesh, as His medium of communication with the blessed spirits who minister before His face. The first view is not only the most natural, but it is liable to the fewest objections.

The epistles are such as might properly have been addressed to the chief ruler or rulers of the respective churches, and would naturally have been addressed to them as representing their congregations. The sole difficulty arises from the use of the term angel. This, however, in view of the peculiar nature of the Apocalypse, should occasion no serious difficulty, and most certainly the difficulty is less in supposing an unusual application of the term, than is connected with any hypothesis that gives to the term a precedented meaning. No opinion is expressed as to whether by the angel was meant a single prelate, a bench of presbyters, or the moderator of a presbytery—a primus inter pares. These are questions which are not determinable from the passage before us, and which can be determined only from a discussion of the entire scriptural teaching on the subject of Church order—a discussion which cannot in this place be entered upon. (For valuable discussions of the subject of the Angels, see Neander, Kitto's Bib. Cyc., title BISHOP; Alford, Trench (The Epistles to the Seven Churches), Onderdonk's Episcopacy tested by Scripture, Alexander's Primitive Church Offices, Killen's Anc. Ch., Schaff's Hist. of the Ap. Ch. and Hist. of the Chr. Ch., Vol. I.)—E. R. C.]

The seven candlesticks.—The churches as light-bearers. Their sevenfoldness is the ramification of the one seven-armed candlestick in the temple, symbolical of all revelation. "For this very reason the churches must represent the Church universal, or the kingdom of God" (?). DE WETTE.

Seven churches.—Are merely the seven churches in the empirical sense intended (Wolf; a singular variation by Harenberg, see in Düsterdieck), or have they a more general import? De Wette and many others are in favor of the latter view. In adopting the latter view, we must distinguish between the Church and the Kingdom of God, however. The question next suggests itself as to whether these types are to be chronologically apprehended and applied strictly to the different periods of the Church (Vitringa); or whether they are types of different conditions of the Church (Düsterdieck); or, finally, whether a combination of these two views is admissible (Ebrard); or, again, whether these types shall be realized in the last times exclusively (Hofmann). On these points, see the Introduction and the Notes on the Seven Epistles. We will but remark in passing, that the typical grouping of the ecclesiastical ground-forms of ecclesiastical life in a totality, composed of the sacred number seven, is evident; the chronological arrangement unmistakably offers striking analogies—a circumstance which, however, must doubtless be referred to the fact that the outward consecution of these forms is based upon a considerable degree of inner ethical construction, nearly in accordance with the psychological law of oscillation. To that decrease of the first love, accompanying an honest zeal and activity, in Ephesus, succeeds a re-inflammation of the Church under her martyrdom in Smyrna; the mixture with the world which gained ground in Pergamus, amid all the faithful confession of the Church there, is followed by the reaction of a more active spiritual life in Thyatira, where even worldliness is induced to assume the garb of religious enthusiasm, which agitations, however, relapse into deep exhaustion, into a death-slumber, such as appears at Sardis; then, again, follows the reaction of faithfulness in the Church of Philadelphia, with its little strength; this reaction, however, cannot hinder the condition of final lukewarmness in the Church—a condition elsewhere described in the eschatological discourses and parables of the Lord.

[These variations, it may further be observed, occur in individual Christian experience, in the life of individual churches, and in the history of the Universal Church. And not only so, but they all find their illustrations in different portions of the Catholic Church of any one period. Though in each period the Church as a whole may predominantly present one of the seven types, yet illustrations of all the others may be found in different sections. (See add. note, p. 189.—E. R. C.)]

B.—EARTH-PICTURE OF THE CHURCH; OR THE REAL, EARTHLY WORLD-PICTURE OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES. THE SEVEN EPISTLES TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES.

CHAP. II. 1-29.

1. The Metropolis.* [Ephesus.]

- 1 Unto the angel of the church of [in<sup>1</sup>] Ephesus write; These things saith he that holdeth [ins. fast] the seven stars in his right hand, who [he that] walketh in the
- 2 midst of the seven golden candlesticks; I know thy works, and thy<sup>2</sup> labor, and thy patience [endurance], and how [that] thou canst not bear them which [that] are evil: and thou hast tried [didst try<sup>3</sup>] them which [who] say<sup>4</sup> they are apostles,
- 3 and [ins. they] are not, and hast found [didst find] them liars: and hast borne [endurance], and hast patience [didst bear], and [om. , and] for my name's sake hast
- 4 labored [om. hast labored], and hast not fainted [become weary].<sup>5</sup> Nevertheless [But] I have somewhat [om. somewhat] against thee, because [that] thou hast left
- 5 thy first love. Remember therefore from [om. from] whence [Lange: from what height] thou art fallen,<sup>6</sup> and repent, and do the first works; or else [but if not] I will [om. will] come unto [Lange: upon] thee quickly [om. quickly<sup>7</sup>], and will

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 2. The ου after κόρον, founded upon B*. [N.], etc., is wanting in A. C. [P.], etc. Omitted by Tischendorf and Düsterdieck [also by Lachmann and Alford]. Analysis [and analogy] seems to be in favor of its retention.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 3. Otherwise the Rec. See Düsterdieck. [The Rec. reads, Καὶ ἰδόντας καὶ ὑπομονὴν ἔχεις, καὶ διὰ τὸ ὁρᾶν μου κεκοιτίας καὶ οὐ κέκμηκας. Alford gives a number of readings, and well remarks, "There is a seeming inconsistency in οἶδα τὸν κόρον σου . . . καὶ οὐ κεκοιτίας, which caused those who were not aware of St. John's use of the last word (John iv. 8), to alter the sentence as in var. readd."—E. R. C.]

* Brandt: 1. "The Mother Church."

6 remove thy candlestick out of his [its] place, except thou repent. But this thou hast [Lange: retainest], that thou hatest the deeds [works] of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches;<sup>8</sup> To him that overcometh [conquereth] will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of [om. the midst of<sup>9</sup>] the paradise of [Lange: my<sup>10</sup>] God.

2.* The Martyr-Church persecuted by Judaism. Smyrna.

8 And unto the angel of the church in Smyrna write; These things saith the first and the last, which was [who became—ἐγένετο] dead [Lange: the First of the martyrs], and is alive [revived]; I know thy works<sup>11</sup> and [ins. thy] tribulation, and [ins. thy] poverty, (but thou art rich) and I know [om. I know] the blasphemy of them which [thy calumny from those who<sup>12</sup>] say they are Jews [Lange: and the calumny of those who say they are (true) Jews], and are not, but are [om. are] the [a] synagogue of Satan. Fear none of [or not] those things [Lange: nothing of that<sup>13</sup>] which thou shalt [art about to] suffer: behold,<sup>14</sup> the devil shall [is about to] cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation [Lange: a tribulation of] ten days: be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a [the] crown of life. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; He that overcometh [conquereth] shall not be hurt of [injured by] the second death.

3.* The Martyr-Church persecuted by Heathenism. Pergamus.

12 And to the angel of the church in Pergamus write; These things saith he which hath the sharp [ins. two-edged] sword with two edges [om. with two edges]; I know thy works, and [om. thy works and<sup>15</sup>] where thou dwellest, even [om. even] where Satan's seat [throne] is: and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied [didst not deny] my faith, even in those [the] days wherein [in which]<sup>16</sup> Antipas was my faithful<sup>17</sup> martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth. But I have a few things against thee, because [that<sup>18</sup>] thou hast there them that hold [ins. fast] the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak<sup>19</sup> to cast a stumbling-block [Lange: a means of infatuation] before the children [sons] of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols [Lange: idol sacrifices], and to commit fornication. So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans [ins. in like manner].<sup>20</sup> which thing I hate [om. which thing I hate]. Repent [ins. therefore<sup>21</sup>]; or else [but if not] I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight [war] against them with the sword of my mouth. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; To him that overcometh [conquereth] will I give [ins. to him<sup>22</sup>] to eat [om. to eat]<sup>23</sup> of the hidden manna, and will give [ins. to] him a white stone, and in [on] the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving [except] he that receiveth it.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 13. Of this passage there are three readings: viz. ἐν αἷς [Rec. N. P.] αἷς [B*, Alford brackets it.—and both omitted [A. C., Lachmann]. The omission may be due to the fact of the seeming inconsistency with the foregoing hast not denied, etc. Treg., and Tisch. (8th ed.) omit.—E. R. C.]

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 13. [A. and C. give a second μου after μάρτυς, also Lachmann, Alford brackets, which would give as the translation—my martyr, my faithful one. Treg., and Tisch. give the μου.—E. R. C.]

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 16. The ὅτι which is wanting in the Rec. has strong authorities in its favor. [N. P., Vulg. omit; it is given by A. B*. C., Lach., Treg., and Alf. Tisch. (8th ed.) omits.—E. R. C.]

* Brandt: 2. "The churches of the beginning, martyr churches." [Smyrna and Pergamus.]

4.* The Church stained by Idolatry. Thyatira.

- 18 And unto the angel of the church in Thyatira write; These things saith the Son of God, who hath his<sup>18</sup> eyes like unto [as] a flame of fire, and his feet are like 19 fine brass [to chalcolibanus—(Lange: as white-glowing molten copper)]. I know thy works, and [ins. the] charity [love], and service, and faith [the faith, and the service], and thy [the] patience, [endurance of thee;] and thy works; [om. and thy works;] and the [thy] last [ins. works] to be [are] more than the first. [Lange: thy love and thy faith, thy zeal in service and thy endurance in suffering
 20 (and how<sup>20</sup>); thy last works are more than the first]. Notwithstanding [But] I have a few things<sup>20</sup> [om. a few things] against thee, because [that] thou sufferest [ἀφεις] that woman [thy wife or Lange: the woman<sup>21</sup>] Jezebel, which [who] calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce [and she teacheth and seduceth—Lange: and teacheth (applies herself to teaching) and seduceth]<sup>22</sup> my servants to commit
 21 fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols [Lange: idol-sacrifices]. And I gave her space to [time that she might] repent of her fornication [om. of her fornication]; and [Lange: but] she repented not [om. repented not—ins. willeth
 22 not to repent of her fornication<sup>22</sup>]. Behold I will [om. will<sup>20</sup>] cast her into a bed,<sup>21</sup> and them that [those who] commit adultery with her into great tribulation, except 23 they repent of their [her (αὐτῆς)] deeds [works]. And I will kill [slay] her children with death; and all the churches shall know that I am he which [who] searcheth the [om. the] reins and hearts: and [Lange: , and that] I will give unto 24 every one of you [to you, to each,] according to your works. But unto you I say, and unto [om. and unto] the rest in Thyatira, as many as have not this doctrine [teaching] [Lange: these doctrines] and [om. and] which [such as<sup>23</sup>] have not known the depths of Satan, as they speak [say]; I will [or om. will<sup>23</sup>] put upon 25 you none [cast not upon you any] other burden. But that which ye have already [om. already], hold fast till [until] I [ins. shall] come [Lange: until I
 26 come<sup>24</sup>]. And he that overcometh [conquereth], and [ins. he that] keepeth
 27 my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: And he shall rule [shepherdize] them with a rod of iron [an iron rod]; as the vessels of a potter shall [om. shall]<sup>25</sup> they be broken to shivers [are shattered or he shattereth]:
 28 even [om. even] as I [ins. also have<sup>25</sup>] received of my Father. And I will give 29 [ins. to] him the morning star. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

CHAP. III. 1-22.

5.* The Church for the most part Spiritually Dead. Sardis.

- 1 And unto the angel of the church in Sardis write; These things saith he that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven stars; I know thy works, that thou hast
 2 a<sup>26</sup> name that thou livest, and [ins. thou] art dead. Be watchful [Become thou watching], and strengthen the things which remain, that are ready [which were about]<sup>27</sup>

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 18. ὁ ὢν rests upon B. O. [P.], etc. It is omitted by Lachmann and Dürstler.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 20. Kai δίδασκει καὶ πλανᾷ. A. C. N. See Delitzsch, No. 20, [also B*. P. and critical editors generally.—E. R. C.]

Ch. III. 1. The article τὸ before ὄνομα is omitted.

* Brandt: 3. "The intermediate churches," externally unimpeachable, but inwardly fallen. a. Lapsed into idolatry; b. lapsed into spiritual death. (Both too strong). [Thyatira and Sardis.]

- to die: for I have not found thy works [or any works of thine]<sup>38</sup> perfect [completed]
 3 before [ins. my<sup>39</sup>] God. Remember therefore<sup>40</sup> how thou hast received and heard [hardest] and hold fast [keep<sup>41</sup>], and repent. If therefore thou shalt [dost] not watch, I will come on [upon] thee<sup>42</sup> as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

GENERAL REMARKS ON THE SEVEN EPISTLES.*

In the use of the sacred number seven throughout the Apocalypse, we must note the indications of a distinction between four and three. Dürstendieck remarks (p. 21) that in the case of the seals and trumpets, the quaternary takes the precedence (this is additionally marked in the case of the four riders by the parenthesis of the four beasts; and in the vision of the trumpets, by the fact that the last three are designated as the three woes), and the trinary follows; in the seven churches and the vials, on the other hand, a three precedes the four. In the case of the vials, Dürstendieck, not groundlessly, regards the thought that we have presented as indicated by the interlocation of ch. xvi. 5-7; though the vials, in respect of their effects, may also be perfectly well divided into four and three. The first three epistles, according to this commentator (and Bengel, Ewald, De Wette and others, p. 141), are distinguished from the last by the form of the conclusion. In the first three epistles, the admonition: he that hath an ear, etc., is followed by the final promise (ch. ii. 7, 11, 17), whilst in the last four, such a promise precedes the admonition (ch. ii. 29, iii. 6, 13, 22). This variation is, we admit, well worthy of notice; yet the inner marks of the churches favor the distinction of four (mixed forms) and three (perfectly distinct forms). The fundamental forms of the individual epistles have been presented by Bengel, as follows (Hengstenb. I. p. 157): The plan of the seven epistles is the same in all. For in each we find: 1. An order to write to an angel of a church. 2. A glorious title of Jesus Christ ["taken for the most part from the imagery of the preceding vision." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]. 3. An address to the angel of the church: wherein is contained a. a testimonial to the mixed, the bad or the good condition of the angel; an admonition to repentance or perseverance; b. an announcement of what is to come to pass, referring chiefly to the coming of the Lord. 4. A promise to him that conquereth, together with the word of awakening: he that hath an ear, etc.

* See Lange's Apostol. Zeitalter, II. 470.

"The titles put forth by the Lord at the beginning of each letter are most illustrious, as is also indicated by the words: these things saith:—the Supreme Majesty,—like the Old Testament: thus saith the Lord."

"The address in each epistle consists principally of plain and perspicuous expressions. In the promise, on the other hand, the Spirit deals more in figurative expressions. In the address, the Lord Jesus speaks principally and primarily to the churches then existing in Asia Minor, especially and particularly to their angels. The promise speaks in the third person of those who conquer—both in those first times and also in the ages after them."

"Amongst the seven angels of the seven churches there were two, the one at Ephesus and the one at Pergamus, in a mixed state; and two, those at Sardis and Laodicea, were extremely corrupt. Not only the latter two, whose whole condition was bad, ch. iii. 8, 19, but also the former, who were defective in some particular respect, ch. ii. 5, 16, are recommended to repent. And so at Thyatira the adherents of Jezebel are admonished to repentance—the woman herself willing not to repent, and the angel of the church having no need of repentance so far as he himself is concerned, ch. ii. 21, 22. The condition of two of the angels, those at Smyrna and Philadelphia, was good; hence they needed no admonition to repentance, and are only encouraged to persevere. There is no mixed or good or bad state whose pattern might not be found here, as well as apt and salutary doctrine therefor. Though a man were as dead as the angel of the church at Sardis, or as flourishing as the one at Philadelphia and the aged Apostle John himself, this book suiteth his case, and the Lord Jesus hath somewhat to say to him therein."

"In the seven epistles there are twelve promises. In the third, fourth, and sixth, there is a two-fold promise, and in the fifth a three-fold promise; each one of the promises being distinguished by a particular expression: I will give, I will not blot out, I will confess, I will write.—The promise to him that overcometh [conquereth] is declaratory, sometimes of the enjoyment of the most precious boons, sometimes of immunity from the extremest misery. The one is included in the other, and when a part of the blessedness and glory of the victor is expressed, the whole should be understood, ch. xxi. 7. That part is particularly expressed which relates to the virtues and deeds referred to in the address.—Some things contained in these promises are not again expressly mentioned in the Revelation; as, for instance, the manna, the confession of the victor's name, the name of the New Jerusalem written upon the victor, the sitting upon Christ's throne. Some things bear a resemblance to what is afterwards declared concerning Christ Himself; viz. the secret name, ch. xix. 12; the shepherding of the nations, ch. xix. 15; the Morning Star, ch. xxii. 16. Some things are expressly mentioned again in their proper place; as the tree of life, ch. xxii. 2; immunity from the second death, ch. xx. 6; the name in the book of life, ch. xx. 12, xxi. 27; the abiding in the temple of God, ch. vii. 15; the name of God and of the Lamb on the righteous, ch. xiv. 1, xxii. 4." BENGE.

The fundamental idea of all the seven epistles is the fundamental idea of the Apocalypse itself—the Coming of the Lord. The arrangement is the epistolary form in apocalyptic sublimity: superscription, substance, conclusion. The superscriptions have the common form of Christ's self-designation, with the prophetic announcement: τάδε λέγει (Amos i. 3, etc.); they present the various attributes of His majestic appearance as described in ch. i. The distribution of the attributes harmonizes with the churches. For Ephesus, the metropolis: the seven stars and seven candlesticks. For Smyrna, the martyr church, He that was dead and is alive again. For Pergamus, where Satan's seat is: the sharp, two-edged sword. For Thyatira, where the spirit of fanaticism is rampant: the eyes as flames of fire, and the feet like a glowing stream of molten metal. For dead Sardis: the Possessor of the Seven Spirits (of life) and the seven stars. For faithful Philadelphia: the Possessor of the keys of David, the Opener of a door to the church. For Laodicea, as for Ephesus, a more general designation of Christ, yet under the name of the Amen, Who certainly fulfills His threats. The attributes also correspond with the commendations, admonitions, and threats, i. e., with the criticisms and the promises. In the criticisms, praise and blame are sometimes united; and where praise predominates (as in the case of the first four churches), the first place is given to it; where censure predominates, it has the first place (Sardis). So in one case we find praise exclusively (Philadelphia), and, in another, only censure (Laodicea). The promises are always promises of entire blessedness in concrete terms, such as are appropriate to the condition, conduct, and conflict of the church. Ebrard remarks that the first four promises are taken from consecutive items of Old Testament history (Paradise, death, manna, David); the last three relate to the final establishment of the Kingdom (p. 157). The epistle proper is grounded upon the Lord's complete knowledge of the state of the church (oida, etc.). This is followed by a portraiture of the church and the award of praise and blame; next follows the prognosis, the prediction of good or danger; finally, the application: admonition, threat, consolation. The conclusion is a specific conditional promise, accompanied by the exhortation to hear the words of the Spirit; amid constant reference to the Coming of the Lord.

FIRST EPISTLE. EPHESUS.

Chap. ii. 1-7.

Ver. 1. Ephesus was the metropolis of proconsular Asia; not merely in a political, but also in an ecclesiastical sense. It is placed at the head of the seven churches as the actual see of John, Hengstenberg, remarks; a proposition which is groundlessly denied by Düsterdieck. On Ephesus, see Winer, Das Wörterbuch für das Christliche Volk, and Books of Travel.* [Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, Schaff's History of the Apostolic Church, Kittó's Bib. Cyc., etc.—E. R. C.] At the present day, the only remains of this once pleasant city are some ruins and the village of Ajosoluck. The church was founded by Paul (Acts xviii. 19, xix. 1). On its Pauline period, see the Commentaries on Ephesians and 1 Timothy. Because Timothy was the head of this church for a time, Alcasar, Cornelius à Lapide, and others, have regarded him as the angel of the church. This opinion was held even in opposition to the traditional notion, according to which John was the successor of Timothy.

That holdeth [fast]—κρατῶν, stronger than ἔχω, ch. i. 16. Düsterdieck thinks it involves the idea of Christ's ability to cast the stars out of His hand. [The idea is that of holding with power, comp. John x. 28.—E. R. C.] We must distinguish, however, between stars and candlesticks (ver. 5, ch. iii. 1). The stars, perhaps, are "graven in His hand."

Who walketh.—"The περιπατῶν resembles the passage ch. i. 13." It is a stronger expression, however. [The idea presented seems to be that of one who walks about to trim the lamps. According to the opinion of Sir Isaac Newton. E. R. C.] Ebrard justly refers this more general designation of Christ, in respect of His relation to the churches, to the metropolitan character of Ephesus. Düsterdieck does not recognize this reference.

Ver. 2. [I know=οἶδα.—Knowledge concerning, not approval, is indicated by this term; the same word is used in reference to the church of Laodicea, ch. iii. 15. The commendation spoken of below is to be gathered from the context and not from this term.—E. R. C.]—Thy works.—With reference to ver. 4, it may seem a strange thing that He should begin with a commendation of the works of the church. Yet they are commendable, though not exactly heroic deeds against false teachers, as Hengstenberg maintains. The active zeal of the church may have formed a contrast to the heathen mysticalness and moonstruck character of the city. The form of the works branches first into labor or toil, and perseverance or endurance. It is thus [as perseverance or endurance] that we translate ὑπομονή in this place, since the word cannot be a mere repetition in ver. 8. ["This word κόπος, signifying, as it does, not merely labor, but labor unto weariness, may suggest some solemn reflection to every one who at all affects to be working for his Lord, and as under his great Task-Master's eye. This is what Christ looks for, this is what Christ praises in His servants." TRENCH.—"Κόπος and ὑπομονή form the active and passive sides of the energizing Christian life. The omission of the σου after τὸν κόπον, serves to bind the two together in one. They are expegetical, in fact, of ἐργα; cf. 1 Cor. xv. 58," etc. ALFORD.—E. R. C.]—With this seal in the life of the Church, a healthy polemical system corresponds, which may also be divided into two forms. In the first place, the church cannot bear bad men—this means, of course, in the domain and mask of religion—and, secondly, it even dares, by means of a Christian proving of spirits, to unmask men giving themselves out as apostles, and to show them to be liars. False teachers, manifestly, are meant [see Acts xx. 29, 30]; men assuming to possess apostolic authority, whether they appeared in the guise of inspired persons, or as Judaizing traditionalists. According to Düsterdieck, this saying would be meaningless after the destruction of Jerusalem. It is well known, however, that in all ages of the Church persons have appeared who have laid claim to apostolic authority. Düsterdieck thinks that these men were tried by their works pre-eminently; but false apostles should be pre-eminently, though not exclusively, tried by their doctrine. [Comp. 1 John iv. 1-3.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 3. And that thou hast patience [endurance].—Here follows the third commendation of the church, for its good conduct under suffering; this also is exhibited under two aspects—suffering in general, for Christ's name's sake, and steadfast endurance under these sufferings. [There can be little doubt that the alteration of the text in this passage is due to an apparent inconsistency between οἶδα τὸν κόπον σου, and οὐ κενόηκας (see Textual and Grammatical). There is a world-wide distinction between being weary in the flesh (a mark of faithfulness in working) and being wearied in spirit (a mark of faithlessness), which, doubtless, the Apostle designed to indicate, and which the alterers failed to grasp.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 4. [I have against thee.]—The unauthorized introduction of somewhat into the E. V. weakens the force of the rebuke—which, as it came from the mouth of Jesus, was unequalled. Trench well remarks: "It is indeed not a 'somewhat,' which the Lord has against the Ephesian Church; it threatens to grow to be an 'every thing;' for, see the verse following, and comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 1-3."—E. R. C.]—That thou hast left thy first love.—This reproach is a contrast and counterpoise to all previous praise, almost outweighing it, in fact. Some of the different interpretations of this first love are characteristic. The two following are antithetic in their nature: Calovius understands the words as signifying a watchful zeal for the purity of the word of God (i. e., doctrine), while Eichhorn, on the other hand, thinks that the church is charged with a want of clemency in the judgment of the false teachers. Grotius understands the passage as referring to a defective care for the poor. Ebrard thinks it indicates a diminution, not of love to Christ, but of Christian brotherly love. Düsterdieck will not allow that the words bear a comparative meaning, but maintains that the first love was actually lost. If it were completely lost, as love, the church's Christianity were at an end. What Düsterdieck means, however, is the maiden form of love, with reference to Züllig, Hengstenberg, and Jer. ii. 2. But the Spirit of Revelation cannot have intended to say that the first bridal or blossom-like form of development of Christian life must be permanent. Neither can brotherly love be called the first love, in comparison with love to Christ; nor can we suppose it possible for the former to vanish whilst the latter remained. Least of all is it assumable, after the commendations bestowed, that the church was lacking in its care for the poor. According to the presentation of the contrast in the epistle, there was, manifestly, in proportion to a flourishing, outside show of churchly life, an incipient lack of inwardness and fervor—i. e., a lack of true divine knowledge, of habitual prayerfulness, warmth, contemplativeness; in a word, just those traits began to be lacking whose deficiency became more and more perceptible, not before the destruction of Jerusalem, but toward the end of the first century. Such a deficiency may be connected with a morbid prosecution of Christian works; as, for instance, is the case in our own time, even in evangelical circles. In a time when three important Lutheran ecclesiastical schools no longer sound the depths of the Lutheran doctrine of justification, and the religious expectation of the speedy coming of the Lord is almost universally exchanged for a chronological error, we have a practical illustration of what it is to have left the first love. [The words seem scarce to require a comment. The obvious reference is to the loss of that glowing, all-absorbing love to Jesus, as a personal Saviour, which at the first constrained them to devoted service (comp. Eph. iii. 16-19, iv. 15, 16). This view is borne out by the following verse, where the decay of love is followed by the decay of works of righteousness. See also Jer. ii. 2 sqq.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 5. Whence thou art fallen.—From what a height of ideal Christian life (comp. the writings of the Apostles and the works of the apostolic fathers).

And repent.—In reference to this fall, inward reflection is needed—a new internalization of Christian character. And thus, do the first works does not mean, do yet more outward works, but, do the living inward works on which all sound Christianity rests. [The reference doubtless was to both inward and outward works—to the internal works of love and faith, and to the bringing forth of fruits meet for repentance in the outward life. The "first works" do not mean more ritual observances, yet they do include such outward works as are described, Eph. iv. 17, to the end of the Epistle.—E. R. C.]

But if not.—The magnitude of the threatened punishment shows that the internal condition of the church is exceedingly bad. The grand trouble is that it is travelling a downward road. If the inward life be once neglected, and replaced or covered up by an external zeal for works, the false movement, if not corrected by repentance, goes on to spiritual death. This fact is demonstrated by the history of the mediæval Church, and by that of the modern evangelical awakening. [Not only was the internal condition of the church bad, but also the external. It is to be feared that many Protestants confound externality with mere externality, and so lose sight of vital truth. True religion has an outside as well as Pharisaism—an outside which differs from the latter not only in that it is more scriptural, but also in that it is broader, more complete. It may be indeed narrower in a merely ritual direction, but, in all other respects, it is more extensive. It should ever be remembered that our Lord exhorted, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works," Matt. v. 16, and that the Apostle Paul presented it as one of the characteristics of true Christians that they are "zealous of good works," Tit. ii. 14. The Pharisees, in losing internal piety, narrowed the field of external religion; they placed it altogether in ceremonial observances; in tithing mint, anise, and cummin (which was a duty) and in other uncommanded rites, and ignored the weightier matters of the law, Matt. xxiii. 23. They omitted not merely the internal graces of judgment, mercy, and faith, but the actions proceeding from these graces. The mark of a decaying church is not an external zeal for works, but a zeal for works in a contracted, often an uncommanded field, whilst the broad surrounding territory of Christian duty is left uncultivated. This, doubtless, was the condition of the Ephesian church.—E. R. C.]

I come upon thee.—Properly, unto thee (σοί). (The ἐν of ch. ii. 8 is similar. Both forms are expressive of the unexpectedness of the coming.)

Will remove thy candlestick.—Since the church is also itself called the candlestick (ch. i. 20), the following explanation readily suggests itself: efficiam, ut ecclesia esse desinas (Aret.); or, if the angel be regarded as the bishop: I will take from thee thy church, thy position (Zeger)—the ordinary expression for which, however, would be: I will remove thee. The interpretations of Grotius and Ewald are also inadequate. But since the candlestick is here distinguished from the church, it doubtless denotes the Christian quality of the church, consisting, according to the Christian saying, of light and life. History teaches us what becomes of the dead body in the case of such a removal of the soul. This passage suggests a reference to the perfect desolation of Ephesus, as compared with Smyrna and Philadelphia.

Ver. 6. But this thou hast.—Properly, doubtless: thou still retainest. The sign of hope presented in ver. 3 is again and more distinctly set forth. Hate cannot be resolved into disapprove (as De Wette interprets); it is, however, to be referred to the works of the Nicolaitans—not to them personally (Lyra). The dogmata lying at the foundation of the works, are doubtless also intended, though not exclusively, as Calovius supposes.

Nicolaitans.—A sectarian tendency in the Apostolic Church, on which comp. Church history and the Encyclopædias.* It is obvious from the epistles themselves—1. That they form a contrast to "the Jews" in Smyrna and at Philadelphia [ch. ii. 9], ch. iii. 9; and, on the other hand, 2. That they are akin to, and, in practice, even identical with, the Balaamites at Pergamus, ch. ii. 14, and the school of Jezebel at Thyatira, ver. 20.† We distinguish three opinions in regard to the Nicolaitans: 1. The Catholic tradition representing the deacon Nicolas, Acts vi. 5, as the founder of the sect; 2. The correction proceeding from Clement of Alexandria, stating that from a misunderstanding of an utterance of Nicolas, the doctrine that the lusts of the flesh must be indulged had been derived; 3. The assumption, since Heumann, that the term Nicolaitans is a symbolical expression; in support of this hypothesis it is alleged that the Greek word Nicolas means conqueror of the people; the Hebrew Balaam, devourer of the people; the two, in symbolical unity, signifying religious seducers of the people (analogous is the Antichrist Armillist, ἐρητύλας [desolator, ravager of the people]). From the Epistle of Jude, ver. 11 (comp. 2 Pet. ii. 15), we see that the name of Balaam had previously been symbolically employed in reference to antinomistic corrupters of the people. The apocalyptic symbolism might take advantage of this fact, freely translating the name. In this case, however, the Apocalypticist would most probably have made one name suffice him; and so the tradition of the misuse of the name of Nicolas does not seem to be altogether unfounded. It is possible that one and the same antinomianism branched into three forms: 1. A doctrinal form (Nicolaitans); 2. A worldly-wise form (Balaamites); 3. A spiritualistic form (Jezebel).

"The Nicolaitans are, undoubtedly, not identical (Hengstenberg) with the kakoi mentioned in ver. 2; yet they certainly do belong to those bad people." (Düsterdieck.) On the confusion of opinions, see the last-named commentator. The reference of the false apostles [ver. 2] to "the Apostle of the Gentiles and his adherents," is presumptuous and even audacious.

Ver. 7. He that hath an ear, i. e., the organ of hearing; here, in a spiritual sense. The singular is more significant, our plural [Luther's version has Ohren, ears] more popular and emphatic. [Let him hear.—Hear in the sense of heed, as in Matt. xviii. 15–17, xiii. 18 (comp. with 15).—E. R. C.]

The Spirit.—The Holy Spirit, as the Spirit of Christ and the inspiration of the Prophet.

* See Lange's Apostol, Zeitalter, II. 625. [Also, Schaff's Hist. of the Apost. Church, p. 61, sq.—Allford in loc.—E. R. C.]

† [The sole reason that can be drawn from the epistles for distinguishing them from "the Jews" is that they are separately mentioned—when, had they been the same, or allied, we should expect the fact to be declared. A similar and still stronger reason exists for distinguishing them from the Balaamites, arising from the fact that they are separately mentioned in the same epistle, and that without a word that could lead us to suppose that they were not distinct sects. No conceivable reason arises from the Scripture for connecting them with the followers of Jezebel. Those, indeed, who hold that the Nicolaitans were allied to the Balaamites, must also hold that they were allied to the school of Jezebel, since it is manifest that the last two were similar, comp. ii. 14 with 20.—E. R. C.]

Düsterdieck justly gives prominence to the fact that John's personality is in no way abrogated, but glorified, by his ascription of what is said, to the Spirit.

To him that overcometh [conquereth].

—The same exhortation at the close of all the seven epistles denotes the victory of a steadfast life of faith over the temptations and trials indicated, and over all adverse things in general. [It also implies that the Christian life, throughout the entire period covered by the seven epistles, is to be one of conflict. It pre-supposes the warfare and the preparation of Eph. vi. 10-20.—E. R. C.]

Will I give.—The give is emphatic, meaning—not bestow a portion—but grant power, authorize.

Of the tree of life.—A reference to the new Paradise (see chaps. xxi., xxii.). To eat of the trees of life, the heavenly-earthly antitypes of the tree of life in the first Paradise. An emphatic promise of eternal life, of the enjoyment of eternal nourishment to eternal rejuvenation. Since the lack of the first love is a lack of life, the promise of heavenly life is a fitting one.

In the paradise of [My] God.—(John xx. 17). The word My has been objected to (see the TEXTUAL NOTES) probably because it was thought to militate against the Divinity of Christ. But even in glory, Christ can call the God Who, as the Faithful One, will so transcendently abide by His faithfulness, His God, in order to denote the infinite certainty of infinite promise. [Similar expressions occur, John xx. 17; Eph. i. 17; Rev. iii. 12. As the Fons Deitatis, the Begetter, the First Person of the Trinity is at once the God and the Father of the Divine Son.—E. R. C.]

SECOND EPISTLE. SMYRNA.

Vers. 8-11.

Ver. 8. Of the church in Smyrna.—This city is situated on a harbor of the Ægean sea, and is flourishing even to this day. See the Real-Encyclopædias and Books of Travel. Letters of Ignatius, Polycarp, Church Histories.

"Many, particularly Catholic exegetes, etc., also Calovius and Hengstenberg, have regarded Polycarp as the angel of Smyrna." [Altered from Düsterdieck.—Tr.] This assumption is based upon the false theory in regard to the angel.

[These things saith the first and the last, etc.]—Being addressed, as this epistle is, to the Church exposed, and hereafter to be still more exposed, to the fiercest blasts of persecution, it is graciously ordered that all the attributes which Christ here claims for Himself should be such as would encourage and support His servants in their trial and distress." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

Who became dead.—This self-designation of Christ harmonizes with the martyr-state of the church. [And revived.]—"The words (both clauses of this designation) seem to point to the promises in vers. 10, 11." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 9. Thy tribulation.—This has reference to sufferings from persecution—shame and distress—extending even to imprisonment and death (ver. 10 sqq.)

And poverty.—It is more probable that this has reference to the spoiling of the church's goods (Heb. x. 34, Primas and others), than to the helplessness of originally poor persons, in contrast to rich Jews, able to bribe the government (Hengstenberg).

But thou art rich.—In heavenly goods (ch. iii. 18; Eph. i. 8; Matt. vi. 20, [v. 11, 12], etc.) Soul-elevating contrast. (Πολύκαρπος, Hengstenberg!)

And (I know) thy calumny.—This calumny,* as addressed to heathen, might be an accusation of riotousness and sedition (Acts xvii. 6); as addressed to Jews or Jewish Christians, it might be an accusation of apostasy from the Law or from Ebionite Christianity. It is a query whether real Jews are intended here (most commentators), or Judaizing Christians (Vitringa and others). The two readily made common cause, however, in taking offence at the free development of Christianity, and the Prophet might reproach them both with not being genuine Jews, i. e., believers on the Messiah (comp. the Epistle of James). Hence, even if the Apocalypst were speaking of real Jews, he would take the word in a higher, symbolical sense; we would remark in this connection, that, in the Gospel of John, on the other hand, the word Jews denotes, in the historical sense, Judaizers. Ch. iii. 9, however, seems to be more in favor of the supposition that Jewish Christians are intended. Though it cannot be denied that, in many cases, the Jews incited the heathen to the persecution of Christians, we cannot suppose (with Düsterdieck) that, at the beginning of the Jewish war, the Jews, who were almost all insurrectionists, could have accused the Christians, who were peaceable citizens, of anything like insurrection or sedition.†

Synagogue of Satan.—Cutting oxymoron. Not a synagogue of the Lord (Num. xvi. 3 and elsewhere), but the extreme opposite of that. As Antichristian adversaries of the church's Christianity (see James ii. 2). Düsterdieck recalls Hosea iv. 15: Bethel a Bethaven. [ALFORD referring to TRENCH: New Testament Synonyms, § 1, thus writes: "He (Trench) brings out there how ἐκκλησία, the nobler word, was chosen by our Lord and His Apostles for the assembly of the called in Christ, while συναγωγή, which is only once found (James ii. 2) of a Christian assembly (and there, as Düsterd. notes, not with τοῦ Θεοῦ, but with ἡμῶν) was gradually abandoned entirely to the Jews, so that in this, the last book of the Canon, such an expression as this can be used. See also his Comm. on the Epistles to the Seven Churches." It is to be observed that συναγωγή was not gradually abandoned, but was at once relinquished. As a term relinquished by the true Israel, it might be applied to an assembly either of those clinging to Judaism, or of an heretical Christian sect.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 10. Fear none of those things which

* [The translation given in the text—thy calumny from those, etc.—is more nearly in accordance with the Greek than the E. V.—E. R. C.]

† [May it not be that our Lord used the term "Jews" in its highest sense, as indicating the true Israel (see note on p. 27.)? This explanation gives obvious and special force to the entire expression, "who profess themselves to be Jews, but they are not, but a synagogue of Satan."—E. R. C.]

thou shalt suffer.—The prison is indicative of persecutions on the part of the magistracy, which, however, in persecuting, is unwittingly the devil's servant (see ch. xii.). Düsterdieck: "The meaning of the name (διάβολος, slanderer) should not be emphasized here (contrary to Züllig and Hengstenberg); otherwise we should expect to find ὁ διάβ. in ver. 9, and ὁ σαταν. in ver. 10." Still, the idea of the adversary (Satan) takes precedence of the idea of the slanderer (devil), and the incarceration of the pious is a practical slander.

[Behold, the devil is about to cast some of you into prison, i. e., through his influence upon the minds of magistrates, as he influenced the Sabeans and Chaldeans against Job (i. 15, 17). This passage agrees with other Scriptures, in teaching not merely the personality of the devil (Satan), but also that his permitted power over the world and members of the Church, though weakened, is still continued. Comp. Luke xxii. 81; 1 Thess. ii. 18, 2 Thess. ii. 9; Eph. vi. 11, 12; 1 Pet. v. 8, etc.—E. R. C.]

That ye may be tried.—Though temptation on the part of the devil is at the same time a testing or proving on the part of God, here the devil's tempting to apostasy is intended. Three terms for the devil are presented here, therefore: enemy, accuser, tempter.

Tribulation ten days.—The numeral is not to be taken literally (Grot.), and denotes neither a long time (à Lapide and others), nor a short time (De Wette and others, [Alford, Trench]), but a divinely meted, periodical world-time, according, however, with the minor measure of the worldly life of Smyrna—numbered days; i. e., the period of the expiration of the old world-time in Smyrna; which period, if we regard it as thus meted and modified by days, may undoubtedly appear a short time. Interpretations: 1. Ten days are equivalent to ten years. The persecutions under Domitian or Decius. 2. The ten persecutions of the Christians (Ebrard). This time of persecution must be distinguished from the universal time of tribulation of the Church, ch. xiii. 5 (42 months=1260 days, ch. xi. 3, xii. 6=3½ times, ch. xii. 14).

Be thou faithful.—Τίνον is significant—pointing to a long and perilous way.

Unto death.—The faithfulness must be the faithfulness of the martyr, who is ready even for death; a faithfulness exceeding the persecutions. This exhortation may be beautifully generalized thus: be faithful until death. [The two ideas of unto and until death are conjoined. Be faithful, though faithfulness lead to death; be faithful until you die.—E. R. C.]

The crown of life.—1 Pet. v. 4. Τὴν στέφ. τ. ζωῆς. Düsterdieck: Genit. apposit. See, in opposition to this, the Lange Comm. on James i. 12, p. 47 [Am. Ed.]. "The summum of life as life's prize of honor." Genitive of appertinency, therefore. Various interpretations: Züllig: The royal crown of the faithful. Hengstenberg, figuratively: The most precious thing. Düsterdieck, correctly: The figure of the victor's crown, taken from the competitive games. [The question here is as to whether the στέφανος spoken of is the diadem of the king, or the wreath of the victor. In favor of the latter interpretation may be urged that the term is στέφανος, and the further fact, that the promise is to the victor. This, at first glance, may seem to settle the question. It will not be denied that, according to strict classical usage, διάδημα represents the crown of the king, and στέφανος that of the conqueror in the Grecian games. It should be remembered, however, that at this very time the crown of the Roman Emperors was the στέφανος—(See Elliot, Hor. Apoc., Vol. I., p. 136 sq.), the symbol at once of victory and dominion. The question is as to the force of the term in the New Testament. Διάδημα occurs but three times, Rev. xii. 3, xiii. 1, xix. 2; the word everywhere else translated crown is στέφανος. In 1 Cor. ix. 25 and 2 Tim. ii. 5, there is, manifestly, reference to the wreath of the victor; but, on the other hand, the crown placed on the head of Jesus in mockery of His claim to be a King, was styled στέφανος, Matt. xxvii. 29, etc.; (see also Rev. iv. 4, 10, vi. 2, xiv. 14, where the crown of the ruler is referred to). A consideration of these Scriptures establishes the conclusion that, in the New Testament, this term, like the English crown, is used to designate both the diadem and the wreath. This conclusion is confirmed by the well-known fact concerning the Roman Emperors above alluded to. From this point of view there can be little doubt that the στέφανοι of the glorified saints are the symbols at once of their victory in the contest of earth, and of their authority as kings in the Kingdom of Heaven.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 11. He that overcometh [conquereth].—The promise corresponds with the address and charge. Overcoming is here the concrete victory over temptation in the persecutions announced; a victory founded, as it necessarily must be, upon a general victory over evil.—To such a victor, invulnerableness against the second death is assured.

The second death.—A designation of damnation (ch. xx. 6, 14, xxi. 8), with reference to Jewish Theology (see Düsterdieck, De Wette, Wetstein, Buxtorf). This, therefore, is indirectly the surest promise of eternal life. The more certain the first death seems to be, the more surely will the one assailed by it receive an entrance into that free realm, where all is imperishable and unfading, where death is a thing of the past. [See the Excursus on Hades, p. 364.—E. R. C.]

THIRD EPISTLE. PERGAMUS.

Vers. 12–17.

Ver. 12. Pergamus or Pergamum in Mysia; formerly a royal residence; later, a principal city of Roman Asia. This was the city of Æsculapius, as Ephesus was that of Diana. It is now called Bergamo. There are many ruinous remains of the old city. See the Lexicons and Books of Travel.

The sharp, two-edged sword.—Here, too, the attribute of Christ corresponds with the situation of Pergamus; see ver. 16. The sharp sword is, however, not an instrument of external penal judgments, but the organ of the Spirit's judgments (see Eph. vi. 17; John xvi. 8).* It was an hypothesis of Lyra, that the epistle was addressed to a bishop named Carpus.

* [The term in Eph. vi. 17 is, not as here, ῥομφαία, but μάχαιρα; and surely that single passage (neither term occurs

• Ver. 13. Satan's throne.—The same idea is made prominent at the end of the verse: where Satan dwelleth.—Double recognition is made of the church's faithfulness, on account of the perils of the place in which it is tested. Interpretations of the term throne of Satan: 1. Worship of Æsculapius, whose symbol was the serpent (= devil, Grotius, and others). 2. Acme of idolatry (Andreas and others). 3. Dwelling-place of heathen and Nicolaitans (Calovius and others). 4. Extreme of persecutions (Ewald and others). 5. Museum of Pergamus (Zornius). Pergamus being the seat of the supreme court, it was natural that it should be the central point of persecution (Ebrard). Düsterdieck also mentions this supposition, without giving it its due weight. It has reference, indeed, to a later period of the first century, when persecutions began to be judicial. [TRENCH judiciously remarks: "All which we can securely conclude from this language is, that from one cause or another, these causes being now unknown, Pergamus enjoyed the bad pre-eminence of being the headquarters in these parts of the opposition to Christ and His Gospel. Why it should have thus deserved the name of 'Satan's throne,' so emphatically repeated a second time at the end of this verse, 'where Satan dwelleth,' must remain one of the unsolved riddles of these Epistles."—E. R. C.]

And thou holdest fast My name.—Revelation and knowledge of the essence and governance of Christ. Düsterdieck, on the other hand, in accordance with a widely diffused and inevident interpretation: The true objective Person of Christ, together with its riches and glory. The same expositor denies that confession is intended, as De Wette maintains. The church has already given proof of this, its holding fast of the name of Jesus, in a time of tribulation and martyrdom, when it was tempted to deny and would not.*

My faith; i. e., belief in Christ, resting upon His faithfulness. Objective genitive; ch. xiv. 12, and other passages. Comp. Rom. iii. 25, 26. [This interpretation is not required by the construction. Πίστις may be regarded as having been used concretely, as in Jude 3, etc., and the genitive as that of the source.—E. R. C.]

In which Antipas.—We follow the reading αἰς, supported by Cod. B. and adopted by Griesbach.* This reading has been objected to, probably on the ground that the church generally was faithful. Accordingly, αἰς has been omitted—a proceeding which gave rise to still greater difficulties, on which comp. Düsterdieck (p. 158). Again, an explanatory ἐν has been prefixed to αἰς. On the plays upon the word Antipas, comp. Düsterdieck ('Ἀντι-πας, against all; Anti-papa, or ἰδοπάτρον = Athanasianism; Pergamus = Alexandria). De Wette: "A certain Antipas (Antipater) must have suffered martyrdom in Pergamus some time previously." The later martyrologies announce that in the time of Domitian, Antipas, bishop of Pergamus, was killed by being placed in an iron image of a bull, heated red-hot. Tertullian mentions the martyr Antipas, taking the name, most probably, from our passage. Eusebius (Hist. eccles. iv. 15) cites three other martyrs of Pergamus. Hengstenberg conjectures that the symbolical name, against all (Ἀντι-πας), denotes Timothy. Ebrard ironically expatiates upon this view (p. 174). Consistent symbolical interpretation may lead to attempts at the interpretation of names; but consistent symbolical interpretation does not demand that the names of the seven cities should also be interpreted.

Ver. 14. A few things against thee.—We must not regard this as a litote and understand the opposite to what is said (Heinrich).

Thou hast there them.—Members of the church are intended, but not the whole church. It has not completely purified itself from these people; has been negligent in church discipline.

Who hold the doctrine of Balaam.—Persistently hold it fast, κρατύνοντας. The combination of the history of Balaam, Num. xxii. 25 sqq., and the story of the avenging war of Israel against Midian, ch. xxxi., served for a foundation to a Jewish tradition to the effect that Balaam taught Balak how, by the institution of idolatrous sacrificial feasts, he might entice the Israelites to fornication and thus corrupt them.† It was a doctrine, not in the sense of a system, but as a maxim. And whilst Balaam hoped for outward gain, and the Nicolaitans, on the other hand, were following an Antinomian principle, we find, together with the coincidence of the two names, a certain difference which we have previously pointed out.

[To cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat idol offerings.]—"There are two words which claim here special consideration, σκάνδαλον and εἰδωλόθυτον. Σκάνδαλον, a later form of σκανδάλιον. . . and σκανδαλιζω . . . occur only, I believe, in the Sacred Scriptures, the Septuagint and the New in John xvi. 8) affords too narrow a basis upon which to build any hypothesis as to the general use of even the latter word—most certainly nothing can be gathered from it as to the symbolic force of σκάνδαλον. The most natural interpretation of σκάνδαλον (comp. ver. 16, i. 16, vi. 8, xix. 13, 21) is that it is symbolic of the destroying power of Christ's word—it implies external penal judgment; (see also Isa. xl. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 8). A comparison of the declaration of the following verse, "where Satan's throne is," with 2 Thess. ii. 8, where it is declared that "the Lord shall consume with the Spirit (i. e., sword) of His mouth. . . him, whose coming is after the working of Satan," may shed light upon the use of this designation in this connection.—E. R. C.]

* [The Am. Ed. would suggest that, by the expression My name in this place, and in ch. iii. 8, is meant Christ Himself in all His offices. Two meanings of the term ὄνομα seem to prevail in the New Testament. 1. The verbal expression (title) which designates any person or thing, as in Matt. i. 21, x. 2, etc. 2. The personality itself, as in Matt. xli. 21; John i. 12, ii. 23; Acts iii. 16 (ὄνομα), iv. 12; Rom. x. 13, etc. To this class belongs the term when it occurs in such phrases as (1) for My name's sake (Matt. x. 22, etc.) i. e., for My sake; (2) in My (or Thy) name (Matt. xxiv. 5; John xvii. 12, etc., as the representative of My (or Thy) personality. A third sense is probably found, ch. iii. 1, where it seems to indicate reputation; this sense, however, may be resolved into the first. The meaning assigned by Lange is unsupported by argument and is altogether unprecedented. The meaning suggested above is in accordance with a prevalent use of the term, and is consistent with the context.—E. R. C.]

* ["As the shorter text runs (omitting αἰς), and probably also if we read the αἰς of the Cod. Sin., 'Ἀντιπας is regarded as indeclinable, which circumstance has apparently led to all the perplexing varieties of reading." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

† Why not: offering resistance—the whole man?
 ‡ ["Certainly it is not expressly asserted in Num. xxxi. 16, that it was Balak whom Balaam advised to use this agency against Israel; but the narrative almost implies it. Balak was in power, and was the most likely person to authorize and put in force the scheme." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

Testament, and in such writings as are immediately dependent upon these (see Suicer, S. V.); being almost always in them employed in a tropical sense; Ju-lith v. 1, Lev. xix. 14, are exceptions. Σκάνδαλον is properly a trap (joined often with παγίς, Josh. xxiii. 13; Ps. cxl. 9; Rom. xi. 9), or more precisely that part of the trap on which the bait was laid, and the touching of which caused the trap to close upon its prey; then generally any loop or noose set in the path, which should entangle the foot of the unwary walker and cause him to stumble and fall; σάνδαλον = πρόσκομμα (Rom. xiv. 13) and σκανδαλίζειν = προσκοπεῖν (Matt. iv. 6; Rom. ix. 82); and next, any stone or hindrance of any kind (Hesychius explains it by ἐμποδισμός), which should have the same effect (1 Pet. ii. 7). Satan, then, as the Tempter, is the great placer of 'scandals,' 'stumbling-blocks,' or 'offences,' in the path of men; his sworn servants, a Balaam, or a Jeroboam (1 Kin. xiv. 16), are the same consciously. All of us unconsciously, by careless walking, by seeking what shall please ourselves rather than edify others (1 Cor. viii. 10), are in danger of being the same; all are deeply concerned in the warning of Matt. xviii. 7. Εἰδωλόθυρον is a New Testament word to express what the heathen sacrifices were, as they presented themselves to the eye of a Christian or a Jew, namely things offered unto idols. The Gentiles themselves expressed the same by εἰδωλόθυρον (which word occurs 1 Cor. x. 28, according to the better reading, St. Paul there assuming a Gentile to be speaking, and using, if not an honorable, yet at any rate, a neutral word), or by θεόθυρον, which the Greek purists preferred." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 15. So hast thou also.—De Wette explains καὶ οὕτως as indicative of a comparison with Ephesus. Düsterdieck remarks: "It either refers to Balak, or, which is more probable, to the ancient congregation of the children of Israel. Yet this too would be a reference to Balak." This fact, at all events, is indicated; viz. that in Pergamus, as well as elsewhere, two kindred forms of Antinomianism occur. It is also intimated that the sect of the Nicolaitans had its own independent origin in a misinterpretation of the doctrine of Christian liberty. This lax tendency, on the ground of a misunderstood liberty, was springing up in Rome and Corinth at the time of the Pauline Epistles to the Christians of those cities; it had attained further development at the time of the pastoral Epistles, and subsequently received, among the methodical Anomians, the sect-name of Nicolaitanism. At the time of the Epistle of Jude and the Apocalypse it was illustrated by the Old Testament history of Balaam, an etymological kinship of names aiding this comparison. This is more probable than the supposition that the Greek name is a mere translation of the Hebrew Balaam. The practice of the different factions of Antinomianism (Balaamites, Nicolaitans, the fanatical school of Jezebel) amounted to the same thing, viz. disorderly conduct under the cloak of liberty; the first specific mark of this disorderliness being a participation in heathen sacrificial banquets; the second, connected with the first, a sexual laxity amounting to actual unchastity.

Ver. 16. Repent, therefore.—This repentance, as the painful self-prostration and stirring of the church, must result in its cleansing from Nicolaitanism. ["This command is addressed not only to the Nicolaitans, but to the Church, which did not, like that of Ephesus, hate them, but apparently tolerated them." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

But if not.—The threat appears much milder than that addressed to Ephesus.

I will come unto thee, i.e., upon thee. How?

And will war against them.—This act will be a humiliation for the church, inasmuch as it accomplishes directly, without the church's instrumentality, what the church itself should effect—thus suspending, to a degree, the church's authority, and making it appear in the light of a dependent church, taking away its independence. But how shall this be done? Grotius: Prophets are to accomplish what the bishop has neglected to do. Calovius: The Lord will act through another bishop. The fact is, the Lord comes to the slothful individual church with the spirit of the metropolitan church; and, when it becomes utterly sluggish, He comes to it with theocratico-hierarchical authority, or by means of separatist contrasts.

With the sword of My mouth.—This is indicative of a spiritual conflict and victory through the word and the Spirit of God. It has no reference, therefore, to the avenging sword which came upon the misguided Israelites (Ewald, De Wette, and others); particularly, in view of the contrast between the Old and the New Covenant. The sword of the angel that stood in the way of Balaam can scarcely come into consideration, for this reason, if for none other—because that passage in the life of Balaam preceded his actual sin.*

Ver. 17. Of the hidden manna.—The victor in Pergamus is the recipient of two promises which, however, constitute a substantial unity. The hidden manna stands contrasted with the impure communion of idolatrous sacrifices, and hence, as well as in accordance with the Johannean idea (John vi.), characterizes the enjoyment of the highest, heavenly communion with Christ and the holy and blessed, as the partaking of a manna which is hidden as yet—perhaps like that which was kept for the Jewish Sabbath—or as the mystery of the inner life of blessedness. With this manna, the white stone with the new name corresponds. The white stone is that acquittal in the judgment which shall be based upon a recognition of the verification and righteousness of the new life; and the new name is the distinct individual personality of the new life; every beatified spirit has a particular and unique consciousness of this personality—a consciousness known, in this uniqueness, to none but the recipient himself (ch. xix. 12).

Different interpretations of the manna: The Lord's Supper; Spiritual refreshments; Justifica-

* [See note on ver. 12. The interpretation of Lange, in this and the preceding paragraph, requires us both to regard that which was manifestly spoken of as a threat against the persistently unrepentant, as a promise of highest blessing; and to take ωλεαίς in the altogether unnatural and unprecedented sense of indicating the convincing influence of the Spirit. Comp. comment on ver. 12.—E. R. C.]

tion; The manna in the Ark of the Covenant, which has been hidden since the destruction of the Temple; Christ; Heavenly bread. ["There can, I think, be no doubt that allusion is here made to the manna which, at God's express command, Moses caused to be laid up before the Lord in the sanctuary (Ex. xvi. 32-34; cf. Heb. ix. 4). This manna, as being thus laid up, obtained the name of 'hidden' . . . This 'hidden manna' . . . represents a benefit pertaining to the future Kingdom of glory. . . . I would not indeed affirm that this promise has not prelibations which will be tasted in the present time. . . . The words imply that, however hidden now, it shall not remain hidden evermore; and the best commentary on them is to be found at 1 Cor. ii. 9; 1 John iii. 2." TANNON.—E. R. C.]

Interpretations of the white stone: The glorified body; Analogue of the names on the breastplate of the High Priest—priestly dignity, therefore; A reference to the heavenly reward; Tessera hospitalis; The stone used in casting lots for succession in the priestly function; The glory of victory.

The two meanings which attached to the white stone among the Greeks, viz.: acquittal in judgment and the award of some rank or dignity—are, manifestly, most intimately connected. Justification in the final judgment must, however, be distinguished from the justification of faith, though the two are connected and agree in the possession of a negative and a positive element (absolutio; adoptio in the principal sense; in the sense of consummation).

Interpretations of the name: The name of God; Consecrated to God; Son of God, or elect person. Most commentators: The victor's own name. This is new as the pure expression of the new, heavenly life, in antithesis to the old conventional name, meaningless in many cases, and often a name of shame.

[The remarks of Trench (Ep. to the Seven Churches, pp. 170-181) on the white stone and the new name are worthy of the highest consideration. He repudiates the idea that these symbols "are borrowed from heathen antiquity," declaring that "this Book moves exclusively within the circle of sacred, that is of Jewish, imagery and symbols; nor is the explanation of its symbols in any case to be sought beyond this circle." Following Züllig (Offenb. Johannis, Vol. I., pp. 408-454), he suggests that the ψῆφος λευκῆ may be, not a white pebble, but the Urim and Thummim—probably a diamond, a precious stone shining white. The "new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it (the stone)," he identifies with the new name of Christ ch. iii. 12, and suggests that it was symbolized by what was written on the Urim (probably the holy Tetragrammaton) which no one knew except the High Priest to whose charge it was committed.—E. R. C.]

FOURTH EPISTLE. THYATIRA.

Ch. ii. 18-29.

Ver. 18. Thyatira.—In Lydia, between Pergamus and Sardis, a provincial city; now called Akhissar. See the Encyclopædias and Books of Travel. Lydia was a woman of Thyatira, Acts xvi. 14. This Lydia may be referred neither to the loving zeal of the church nor to Jezebel (Düsterdieck). For a mention of wavering views in regard to the elements of the church and worthless views concerning the bishop, see Düsterdieck.

[The Son of God.—"Our Lord thus names Himself here, in accordance with the spirit of that which is to follow; ver. 27 being from Ps. ii., in which it is written, 'The Lord hath said unto me, thou art my Son,'" (ALFORD); comp. vers. 26, 27, with Ps. ii. 8, 9. The reason of the reference to Ps. ii. may possibly be found in a comparison of ver. 20 with Ps. ii. 1-3, and the history of Jezebel, 1 Kings xvi. 31; 2 Kings ix. 37. The Jezebel of the Old Testament was a heathen, a king's daughter, and a queen; she took counsel against the Lord, and seduced the people of God to iniquity. This interpretation requires us to suppose that the Jezebel of ver. 20 occupied a position analogous to that of her Old Testament type. Symbolically (on the hypothesis that the churches represent different ages of the Universal Church) she may represent a world-power, professedly converted and assuming the position of a teacher, introducing idolatry and impurity into the Church.—E. R. C.]

His eyes like a flame of fire.—With reference to the fanaticism in Thyatira. His eyes pierce through the sphere of spirit, and perceive the impure motives of all fanaticism, be it hierarchic or sectarian, ascetic or libertine; and this with a view to making it manifest and judging it.*

And His feet.—He, "Who, with His feet like unto brass, tramples on all that is unclean and inimical." (Düsterdieck.) This, however, is not the way in which fanaticism is judged. It is made manifest in its nothingness by the feet of Christ, in their holy, glowing motion, passing over its imbecility and worthlessness and resolving them into themselves. To the extent that this nuisance is the originator of moral scandals, it is broken in pieces with the iron sceptre as heathenish (ver. 27).

Ver. 19. I know thy works.—These are subdivided into four fundamental traits: love and faithfulness—the one showing itself in a loving service to those requiring help; the other manifested in steadfastness under persecutions and temptations. To these is superadded the fact of the church's growth—that its last works are more than the first. The opposite of Ephesus (Düsterdieck).

Ver. 20. But I have against thee.—There is a connection between the very vitality of the church of Thyatira and the fact that it suffers itself to be dazzled by the fiery semblance of life in the fanaticism of Jezebel and her followers: that it is unwatched on that side.

The woman Jezebel.—As the Anomians were formerly traced back to Balaam, so here they are traced to Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, 1 Kings xvi. sqq.

* [The sins of Jezebel and her followers can hardly be styled "fanaticism;" they were lapses into idolatry and impurity (see note on ver. 20). The eyes of flame are not only indicative of spirit-searching power (ver. 23) but also of the wrath of the Son of God, the Husband of the Church, flaming against those guilty of spiritual, as well as physical, adultery.—E. R. C.]

The individual traits of the description call for the conclusion that Jezebel was a religious fanatic, who claimed to be a prophetess and had founded a school of Antinomianism, in which an impure intercourse of the sexes was reduced to a religious system, and clothed in the garb of pious enthusiasm. The name is symbolical, but scarcely the sex of the person. It should be observed that the seduction to fornication occupies the foremost place in this instance, and that much more stress is laid upon it than upon the eating of idolatrous sacrifices.* Here, therefore, we have the primitive type of a story that has been often repeated by isolated Gnostic sects even down to the present day.

Other interpretations: 1. Jezebel was the wife of the bishop (Grotius and others); hence the reading τῇ γυναικί σου. 2. Heresy personified, or the Nicolaitan false teachers (Vitringa, Hengstenberg, and others). 3. A woman really called Jezebel (Wolf, Bengel). 4. The Jewish synagogue (Züllig).

The fornication to which the Old Testament Jezebel was the seducer, was connected with the service of Baal and Astarte; Jezebel had brought the worship of these gods with her from Sidon and propagated it in Israel (see 2 Kings ix. 22, and other passages). Hengstenberg conjectures that the ancient Jezebel was a demonically inspired prophetess of Baal.

Ver. 21. And I gave her time.—Ebrard groundlessly takes this in a present sense; rendering it thus—from this time she shall have yet another respite for repentance.—She has not made use of her respite; she willeth not to repent.—The disorder, therefore, has already lasted some time, and though the church, as a church, has suffered its continuance, admonitions to repent have not been wanting. We need not conclude from this, however, that John has previously issued a written reprimand (Ewald. Nor does John here speak as a bishop).

Ver. 22. Behold, I cast her into a bed.—The punishment, whose prefacing with behold indicates its severity and speediness, is, in its ironical expression, conformable to the sin; just as the cup of intoxication is poured out for the intoxicated. A bed of torment corresponds with the bed of fornication.

According to Lyra and others, κλίνη denotes the punishment of Hell; while most commentators regard it as indicative of the bed of sickness, with reference to Ps. xli. 3. [A bed of sickness, physical and symbolical, the result of her own impurity, may be intended.—E. R. C.] But whether such a menace of sickness is intended to be conveyed here is exceedingly doubtful. By the bed we understand an insulated sectarianism, in which Jezebel and her followers will be the instruments of their own destruction; the threatened casting into this bed, therefore, we apprehend as a threat of excommunication, to be executed by the Spirit of the Lord in and along with the church (1 Cor. v. 3 sqq.), if she do not thoroughly repent.* We emphasize as follows: Behold, I cast her into a bed, and those that commit adultery with her—into great tribulation.—“For the destruction of the flesh,” St. Paul says. After its excision from the church, the school, as a sect, must necessarily be given over to eccentricity, discord, the pangs of remorse, and despair, to say nothing of the disgrace which would attach to it, and the censure of the world.

Those who commit adultery with her.—The fornication is now characterized as adultery, for together with the actual occurrences of this sort, religious apostasy, previously present in germ, is thus symbolically designated; in this case, it is apostasy from Christ and from the Spirit of His Church. With her. In fellowship with her; as her companions and followers.

Except they repent.—An ultimatum preceding excommunication, such as was addressed to the false teachers in the Galatian Church, Gal. i.

Of her [αὐτῆς=] works.

Ver. 23. And I will slay her children.—According to Grotius and others, these are actual children of fornication—as such, however, they could not be the objects of so severe a threat. According to Dürstiedick and many others, they are the previously mentioned companions of Jezebel, the μαχεβόντες. Ebrard: “The Jezebel brood, in which iniquity threatens to propagate itself in time to come.” These children are plainly distinguished from the immediate companions of Jezebel, both by name and by the form of the threatened punishment. They are the second generation of disorderly sectarianism, in which the whole power of spiritual and physical death becomes manifest; and there is an unlimited perspective into futurity in the threat—hence it is declared that all the churches shall know this Divine judgment.

With [Lange: By the power of] death.—Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death (Jas. i. 15). Explications of ἐν θανάτῳ: 1. Death is Hell: 2. Pestilence (Septuag. Ezek. xxxiii. 27); 3. The Hebrew formula: כִּוְּתֵן חַיִּים, as the penalty of adultery, Lev. xx. 10. Dürstiedick urges cogent reasons against the supposition, entertained by Hengstenberg, that the passage in Leviticus is alluded to. Ἐν signalizes θάνατος as the instrument of killing—hence, as deadly power. [“A strong Hebraistic expression, meaning that he would certainly destroy them.”] BARNES.—“Others find a reference to the two sweeping catastrophes which overtook the Baal priests and votaries at exactly that period of Jewish history to which the mention of Jezebel here points (1 Kings xviii. 40; 2 Kings x. 25). To me it seems no more than a threat that their doom should be a signal one, that they should not die the common death of all men, nor be visited after the visitation of all (Num. xvi. 29), but leaving the precise manner of that doom undefined." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

* [It is true that “the seduction to fornication occupies the foremost place,” but it is intimately conjoined with the eating of things sacrificed to idols. This conjunction, together with the distinct reference to the Old Testament Jezebel, implies that the fornication itself was connected with idolatry. Now, whilst it is conceivable that Christian fanaticism (i. e., fanaticism starting from Christianity) may have assumed the form of an improper intercourse of the sexes, it is utterly inconceivable that it could have assumed that of idolatry. Far better is it to regard Jezebel as a heathen at heart, and those seduced by her, as errorists led astray by her heathen teaching, than as fanatics. She may indeed have been a heathen, but not a Christian, fanatic.—E. R. C.]

* [The Church excommunicates; the woe here threatened is one that Christ Himself threatens and inflicts. Exclusion from the visible Church is not necessarily implied, but rather that spiritual corruption and death which follow a withdrawal of the influence of the Spirit.—E. R. C.]

And all the churches shall know.—Düsterdieck: "Every Divine judgment upon the world is a manifestation of the Lord's glory, resulting, in accordance with the Divine intention, in the advancement and strengthening of believers in knowledge."—They shall know, especially, that God is the Holy One, that He is pure Light, and that He knows and judges all impurity, even when arrayed in the closest semblance of holiness.

All the churches—congregations—in the whole Church. We can say, with Grotius, "The Asiatic churches, if we only do not apprehend them externally, but as types of the whole Church."

That I am He.—The absoluteness of God is here indicated, from the special point of view that it is He who tries and searches the reins and hearts, the whole inner life, and the innermost disposition of man. ["This is clearly a claim to Omniscience, and as it is the Lord Jesus who speaks in all these epistles, it is a full proof that He claims this for Himself." BARNES.—E. R. C.] Grotius and Bengel make a distinction in the concrete unity of the expression, interpreting loins as the lusts or passions, hearts as the thoughts; this is in opposition to the unitous sense of the passage, in which, at the utmost, a harmonious contrast is indicated.

To you, to each.—Address to the guilty ones. Within the more general chastisement, the judgment upon each individual shall be proportioned to his works. [According to your works.—"This promise, or this threat, for it may be either (is it not both?—E. R. C.) is one which we commonly keep at this time too much in the background; but it is one which we should press on ourselves and others with the same emphasis wherewith Christ and His Word presses it upon us all (Ps. lxii. 18; Matt. xvi. 27; Rom. ii. 6; Job xxxiv. 11; Prov. xxiv. 12; Jer. xxii. 19). It is indeed one of the gravest mischiefs which Rome has bequeathed to us, that in a reaction and protest, itself absolutely necessary, against the false emphasis which she puts on works, unduly trusting therein to share with Christ's merits in our justification, we often fear to place upon them the true; being, as they are, to speak with St. Bernard, the 'via regni,' however little the 'causa regnandi,' though here too it must of course never be forgotten that it is only the good tree which brings forth good fruit; and that no tree is good until Christ has made it so." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 24. But unto you I say, [the rest in Thyatira, etc.—The and of the E. V. is omitted; see TEXT. AND GRAM. NOTES.—E. R. C.]. 'Address to individuals who, as such (not as members of the church as a body), are guiltless. They are characterized by two marks. First, they have not this erroneous doctrine; and, secondly, they have hitherto not known the pretended depths in it as depths of Satan, as they express themselves now that their eyes are opened. The objectionableness of the doctrine in question was clear to them, but not its Satanic depth, its nature, and operation—ruinous to souls, poisoning the words of truth, fatal to spiritual life.

Interpretations: These false teachers boasted that they knew the depths of Satan (Neander, Hengstenberg). These false teachers, like the Gnostics, boasted that they knew the depths of life and, especially, of the Godhead; but the Apocalypticist sarcastically reverses this boast by intimating that their pretended depths are depths of Satan (Grotius and many others).

"As they say," according to Vitringa, refers purely to the depths; this restriction, however, seems somewhat violent, and it is more probable that the innocent individual members of the church have themselves now recognized the greatness of the evil, and sarcastically handle the claim of the false teachers.

["It was the characteristic of the falsely called γνώσις to boast of its βάθεα, or depths, of Divine things. . . . We may safely therefore refer the expression οὐκ ἔγνωσαν τὰ βάθεα to the heretics spoken of. But it is not so clear to whom, as their subject, the words ὡς λέγουσιν are to be appropriated; and, again, whose word τοῦ σατανᾶ is, whether that (1) of our Lord, (2) of the heretics, or (3) of the Christians addressed. If ὡς λέγουσιν belongs to the Christians, then the sense will be, that they, the Christians, called the βάθεα of the heretics, the βάθεα τοῦ σατανᾶ, and were content to profess their ignorance of them. So Andr., Areth., Heinr., Züllig, Ebrard: and so far would be true enough; but the sentence would be left very flat and pointless, and altogether inconsistent in its tone with the solemn and pregnant words of the rest of the message. If ὡς λέγουσιν belongs to the heretics, we have our choice between two views of τοῦ σατανᾶ: either (1) that the heretics themselves called their own mysteries τὰ β. τοῦ σατανᾶ. But this, though held by Hengst., and even by Neander . . . as a possible alternative, and recently by Trench, can hardly be so, seeing that the words surely would not bear the sense thus assigned to them, viz.: that they could go deeper than and outwit Satan in his own kingdom: and seeing, moreover, that no such formula, or any resembling it, is found as used by the ancient Gnostic heretics: or (2) that the ὡς λέγουσιν applies only to the word βάθεα, and that, when according to their way of speaking, τοῦ θεοῦ should have followed (cf. 1 Cor. ii. 10), the Lord in indignation substitutes τοῦ σατανᾶ. This has been the view taken by most commentators, e.g., Corn.-à-Lapide, Ribera, Grot., Calov., Wetst., Vittr., Bengel, Wolf, Eichhorn, Ewald, De W., Stern, Düsterd. And, it appears to me, that this alone comes in any measure up to the requirements of the passage, in intensity of meaning and solemnity, as well as in verisimilitude." ALFORD. See, as representing other views, Trench and Barnes in loc.—E. R. C.]

I cast not upon you any other burden.

—Our first effort must be to gather the meaning of the other burden from the epistle itself. The sinful toleration of Jezebel must now be exchanged for the opposite course, i. e., the excommunication of the false teachers, unless they repent. And this, indubitably, is a painful and heavy task, a burden; the Apostle will, however, lay none other on the church.

Explanations: 1. No other suffering than that which ye already bear (Bengel and others); including the threats (Ewald). 2. No other obligation than the one indicated—to prohibit the eating of idolatrous sacrifices, etc., Acts xv. 28. Not the entire Mosaic law, therefore. The former of these interpretations is too indefinite, the latter too far-fetched.* Equally valueless is the interpretation of Grotius: Sactant illi se rerum multarum cognitione, eam a vobis non exigo (gnosis, then, is the ἀγνοία βάσις!); Bengel: As Jezebel was burden enough to them; Eichhorn gives a still different explanation, see De Wette.

By the following promise, we see what they are to do. They are to combat the new heathenism arising in that sectarian school; and to wield the iron sceptre of the Messiah, in accordance with the promise, yet in a spiritual sense.

Ver. 25. But that which ye have.—The ἔχειν is to be converted into a κρατεῖν in the manner indicated.

Hold fast (have more than ever). Seek to hold it fast in its whole consistency. They need not, therefore, work themselves up to another stand-point, but must consistently work out their actual spiritual life (ver. 19). ["The aorist is more vivid and imperative than would be the present; it sets forth not so much the continuing habit, as the renewed and determined grasp of every intervening moment of the space prescribed."] ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

[Until I shall come.—The ἄν gives an uncertainty when the time shall be, which we cannot convey in our language."] ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 26. And he that conquereth.—The promise, in this case also, is in perfect harmony with the tenor of the epistle. The overcoming is modified here by the keeping of Christ's works to the end, or to the goal of the works themselves in their perfect consistency. In ἡμεῖς, we find, on the one hand, the acknowledgment that they occupy the right stand-point, and, on the other, the demand that they should keep it pure, after the example of Christ, and as His instruments. Together with the eschatological goal, therefore, reference is had to the ideal goal of perfect Christian development. The works of Christ, which are particularly meant, however, are here those of purifying severity, ver. 27. The works of His people must in their purity be His works, and this in antithesis, also, to the works of Jezebel.

Power over the nations [heathen].—This, according to Düsterdieck, is to be fulfilled, "when the βασιλεία is set in operation at the Coming of the Lord." A one-sided adjournment of the promises to the day of the Parousia, in accordance with Meyer's method. It is apostolic doctrine that the Parousia does not bring the beginning of the blessedness and glory of the new life, but their final consummation. It is so with the preceding promises and so with this. The power of Christianity over the heathen world, which power is to be perfected at the end of the world, begins with the victorious power of the Christian spirit over heathen works and ways.*

Ver. 27. And he shall rule [shepherdize] them with an iron rod.—Neither can the wielding of an iron sceptre be adjourned to the end of the world. This sceptre unmistakably denotes the element of severe discipline in the shepherdizing of the flock; a preponderance of spiritual power over the carnal mind (see the parable of the leaven) is also expressed by the antithesis of the iron sceptre and the earthen vessels dashed in pieces by it. Of course, the dashing in pieces is a spiritual act, and one that is performed only in proportion to the resistance offered.

Düsterdieck, in consequence of his peculiar views, fails to recognize the element of truth in Grotius' explanation: Evolvam illum in gradum Presbyteri, ut judicet de iis, qui non Christiane, sed ἐθνικῶς vivunt; and παῖς θεοῦ.—verbum dei, cuius pars est excommunication. Düsterdieck likewise denies that there is any reference to the conversion of the heathen, either separately or in connection with the idea of the future royal rule.

Shepherdize [ποιμαίνειν] is the Septuagint rendering of מִרְיָה, Ps. ii. 9. Alcasar regarded the iron rod as significant of the bishop's staff or crosier. "Brightman thought it denoted the power which Protestant princes have exercised over popish cloisters," etc., (De Wette).

As I also.—The personal Christ as the entire Christ in His Church.

Ver. 28. And I will give him.—The morning-star is to be a recompense of that purity which is the fundamental requirement of the whole epistle. According to 2 Pet. i. 19, the morning-star symbolizes the full dawn of the New-Testament day. According to Rev. xxii. 16, Christ, on the way of His speedy Advent, is the bright Morning-star. The promise, therefore, is that the pure and unadulterated Christian, as a victor over fanaticisms, shall, in advance of others, behold the morning-star of the new time, the last time, the Coming of the Lord, as if that morning-star were his own; nay, he shall even point to the morning-star as the object of his prophecy. He shall stand "in the morning radiance of eternity," in the full enjoyment of Christian hope, Christian progress, the true ante-celebration of the Coming of Christ.

Interpretations: 1. The glorified body of Christ; 2. The devil, with reference to Is. xiv. 12; 3. The king of Babylon; 4. Christ; 5. The gloria illustris, the heavenly δόξα; starry radiance.

["It is observable that it is not said that He

* [The view thus characterized is supported by a comparison of the sins of the Jezebelites with Acts xv. 28, 29. In that passage abstinence from these very sins is enjoined, viz.: ἀπέχεσθαι εἰδωλοθύτων ... καὶ πορνείας, and is characterized as a βάσις in almost the same language here employed. In support of the view advocated by Lange, it must be admitted, are the words of our Lord, ver. 20, "thou sufferest that woman," etc., implying the duty of casting her out of the church. The reason assigned for this interpretation in the following paragraph is futile: The "iron sceptre" was not promised to the Church Militant, as an organism, but to individuals; and not to individuals in the present state of conflict, but to those who, at "the end," should appear as conquerors (vers. 25-27).—E. R. C.]

* [That Christianity possesses a power over the heathen world is not denied; the power, however, is not that of "the iron sceptre" (ver. 2)—the power of government. The adjournment of these promises to the day of the Parousia is in accordance with the express language of Christ Himself. See the preceding note, and the Excursus on the Basilis, ii.; (comp. Luke xiv. 17).—E. R. C.]

would make him like the morning-star, as in Dan. xii. 3, nor that he would be compared with the morning-star, like the king of Babylon, Isa. xiv. 12; nor that he would resemble a star which Balaam says he saw in the far distant future, Num. xxiv. 17. The idea seems to be, that the Saviour would give him something that would resemble that morning planet in beauty and splendor—perhaps meaning that it would be placed as a gem in his diadem and would sparkle on his brow—bearing some such relation to Him Who is called ‘the Sun of Righteousness,’ as the morning-star does to the glorious sun on his rising. If so, the meaning would be, that he would receive a beautiful ornament, bearing a near relation to the Redeemer Himself as a bright Sun—a pledge that the darkness was past—but one whose beams would melt away into the superior light of the Redeemer Himself, as the beams of the morning-star are lost in the superior glory of the Sun.” BARNES.—E. R. C.]

FIFTH EPISTLE. SARDIS.

Ch. iii. 1-6.

Ver. 1. Sardis, once the wealthy capital of Lydia, and the city of Croesus, is now a poor village, bearing the name of Sart. An earthquake took place here during the reign of Tiberius. Melito was bishop of Sardis about the middle of the second century. For particulars, see Commentaries and Books of Travel.

From the description given of the church, it appears that its members, with the exception of a small remnant, were almost entirely secularized. Though occupying a correct position in respect of creed and worship—having the name of life, therefore—the faith of the church was a dead faith, and its life of that worldly form which is always accompanied by the most manifold moral defilements. Yet the reproach of death is not absolute; otherwise, there could be no question of a part that was in danger of dying or, still less, of a vital strength that should reanimate this part, the elements of which strength the angel must find in the church itself.

“Ewald’s conjecture, that the Christians of Sardis had, on account of their heathenish life, not been molested by the heathen, and that this is the reason why the epistle does not speak of θλίψις and υπομονή, is scarcely in accordance with the text.” (DÜSTERDIECK). Even if [as DÜSTERDIECK avers] “the church had enough of the semblance of Christianity to preclude the friendship of the heathen,” there is no foundation for the assertion that Ewald’s conjecture is not in accordance with the text, save the bare fact that it is not expressly laid down in the text.

That hath the seven Spirits of God.—The seven fundamental forms of the revelation of Christ, in the seven fundamental forms of the working of God’s Spirit, with Whom He (Christ) is anointed without measure; corresponding to the seven stars or fundamental forms of the Church. Why is Christ thus described here? Explanations: Because of His omniscience, penetrating the innermost recesses (De W. and others). But this would be a repetition of the idea set forth by the eyes like a flame of fire (see Thyatira). Unlimited power to punish and reward (Hengstenberg). But the Seven Spirits are not Seven Spirits of judgment. They denote the holy all-sidedness of Christ and Christianity, here as opposed to the false all-sidedness of a sham Christianity, which is conformed to the world. Inasmuch as they are indicative of the fullness of the Spirit of Christ, they are proclaimed to a church which, from its lack of spiritual life, is at the point of death. Bengel: The Seven Spirits have reference to the vital forces which Christ proposes to communicate to the church.

[By the Seven Spirits, as was set forth in the note on ch. i. 6, we must understand the Holy Ghost, “seven-fold in His operations.” Christ is spoken of as having the Spirit, not because in the days of the flesh, as the Son of man, He was anointed with the Spirit without measure (John iii. 34), but because, as the Son of God, the Spirit of God is His Spirit (Rom. viii. 9), and because He sends the Spirit (John xv. 26, xx. 22; Acts ii. 33). Who acts as His representative (John xv. 18, 26). In reference to the fitness of the assumption of this designation in the address to the Angel of the Church of Sardis, Trench well remarks: “To him and his people, sunken in spiritual deadness and torpor, the lamp of faith waning and almost extinguished in their heart, the Lord presents Himself as One having the fullness of all spiritual gifts; able therefore to revive, able to recover, able to bring back, from the very gates of spiritual death, those who would employ the little last remaining strength which they still retained, in calling, even when thus in extremis, upon Him.”—E. R. C.]

And the seven stars.—The Spirits and stars are contrasted here. The seven stars must receive their vital light from the Seven Spirits; these latter are also the source whence Sardis must draw its light.* [“Since the ‘stars’ are the angels of the seven Churches’ (i. 20), we must see in this combination a hint of the relation between Christ, as the giver of the Holy Spirit, and as the author of a ministry of living men in His Church (Eph. iv. 7-12; John xx. 22, 23; Acts i. 8, xx. 28).” TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

Thy works, that thou hast a name.—We are not to read: And that thou, etc. DÜSTERDIECK interprets: From thy imperfect works I know that thou, etc. The meaning of the passage, however, is, doubtless—the sum of thy works is sham Christianity.

A name.—Several have interpreted this as referring to the fortuitous name of the bishop (Zosimus, etc.), or to his office. Others have better interpreted it by referring it to the outward semblance of the church. [“In name” (BARNES); “Nominally” (ALFORD); thou hast the reputation.—E. R. C.]

Thou livest.—In accordance with the conception of life in Christ. [“The word life is a word that is commonly employed in the New Testament to denote religion, in contradistinction from the natural state of man, which is described as death in sin.” BARNES.—E. R. C.]

And thou art dead.—Spiritual deadness, as spiritual sleep, indulged in to the furthest extremity which admits of a waking; hence the admonition of ver. 2. Our passage, particularly, proves that the state of the angel represents the state of the church.

Ver. 2. Become thou watching.—This is a stronger term than the simple awake. Watchfulness or wakefulness must become as much an attribute of the angel's life as sleep—carelessness, indifference—is now.

And strengthen the things which remain.—Here also we must take the angel in his connection with the church. It does not mean, therefore, the remaining good in thy soul (Bengel); nor, the rest of those in the church; but the dying, though not yet dead, life which constitutes the vitality hitherto possessed by the church. Novatianism could only have written: the ones who remain [τοὺς λοιποὺς], and it is true that, from another point of view, there would necessarily be a reference to persons as constituting the remainder (Ezek. xxxiv. 4). The present passage, however, treats of the general edification of the church, not directly of the special cure of souls. The "official conception" of the angel regards τὰ λοιπὰ as representative of the laity (Hengst.).

[ALFORD thus writes: "The latter view (that τὰ λοιπὰ refers to persons), is taken by (Andr., Arth., as reported in Düsterd., but not in Catena) Calov., Vittr., Eichh., De Wette, Stern, Ebrard, Düsterd., Trench, et al. And there is nothing in the construction to preclude the view. But if I mistake not, there is in the context. For to assume that the λοιποὶ could be thus described, would surely be to leave no room for those mentioned with so much praise below, in ver. 4."—E. R. C.]

For I have not found thy works perfect [completed].—Good works are not the only ones intended here—at the best, they are still imperfect, as a matter of course; nor is the external conduct in general referred to; but the actual collective works as phenomena of the spiritual condition: they are not complete before Christ's God; in His light and judgment they lack the impress of the New Testament spirit, the stamp of principal perfection in the purity and sincerity of love. Pure, ripe, rich are the predicates of Christ's works and of Christian works in Him.

["The word here employed is not that which we commonly render 'perfect;' not τέλεια, but πεπληρωμένα; so that the Lord contemplates the works prepared and appointed in the providence of God for the faithful man to do as a definite sphere (Eph. ii. 10), which it was his duty and his calling to have fulfilled or filled to the full, the same image habitually underlying the uses of πληροῦν and πληροῖσθαι (Matt. iii. 15; Rom. xiii. 8). This sphere of appointed duties the Sardinian Angel had not fulfilled; not, at least, 'before God;' for on these last words the emphasis must be laid. Before himself and other men his works may very likely have been 'perfect,' indeed we are expressly told that he had 'a name to live,' ver. 1, etc." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 8. Remember, therefore.—Not only the reception of the Gospel on the part of the church (how received), but also its character as Gospel (how heard), is specified by πᾶς. In each connection there is a reference to the qualitative nature of living Christianity. The dege-neration of the subjective keeping of God's word is accompanied by a degeneration of the objective form of truth; orthodoxy itself, when dead, becomes heterodoxy; Thus, not only the receiving, but also the thing received, must be traced back to original (principal) vitality. Dead orthodoxy sinks the doctrine in doctrines, the primary articulation in derived articles. The result of right remembrance, which always constitutes the essence of true repentance, will be a compliance with the following commands.

["This may refer either to some peculiarity in the manner in which the Gospel was conveyed to them—as by the labors of the Apostles, and by the remarkable effusions of the Holy Spirit; or to the ardor and love with which they embraced it; or to the greatness of the favors and privileges conferred on them; or to their own understanding of what the Gospel required, when they were converted. It is not possible to determine in which sense the language is used, but the general idea is plain, that there was something marked and unusual in the way in which they had been led to embrace the Gospel, and that it was highly proper in these circumstances to look back to the days when they gave themselves to Christ." BARNES. "The charge against Sardis is not a perverse holding of untruth, but a heartless holding of the truth; and therefore I cannot but think that the Lord is graciously reminding her of the heartiness, the zeal, the love with which she received the truth at the first." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

And hold fast and repent.—The distinctions of Bengel are not applicable to this passage (see Düsterdieck).—True holding and keeping is a constant seizing and holding fast; here, a renewed seizing and holding fast that lead to repentance. The significance of the perfect εἰληπαρ, as contrasted with the aorist ἤκουσας, indicated by Ewald, would have greater weight if λαμβάνειν did not denote the manner of the subjective appropriation.

[Hold fast.—"1. The truth which thou didst then receive; 2. What remains of true religion among you. Repent in regard to all that in which you have departed from your views and feelings when you embraced the Gospel." BARNES.—E. R. C.]

If, therefore, thou dost not watch.—Stress is again laid upon the main matter, and a threat connected with its non-observance. The threat itself corresponds with the command. To spiritual sleepers the Lord, as Judge, always comes as a thief in the night (Matt. xxiv. 42). Spiritual sleepers have lost all perception, by their spiritual senses, of the threatening signs of the development of judgment unto its catastrophe. As this applies to the judgment at the end of the world, so it also holds good in regard to all preliminary judgments upon whole congregations as well as upon individual souls. Even though there may be an obscure presentiment of judgment, the proximity and actual hour of it take its objects by surprise; the hour is hidden from the sleepers, and the judgment comes upon them in as strange a form as a thief.

Ver. 4. But thou hast a few names in Sardis.—The Lord's righteous verdict always distinguishes between the guilt of communities and the guilt or innocence of individuals; here also the distinction is made. The contrast which the persons indicated in the text present to the dead mass of the church, makes them appear as living members, known to the eye of the Lord by name [comp. John x. 3]; after being made to prostrate themselves under the general verdict, they are relatively excepted from that verdict as individuals.

["In most cases, where error and sin prevail, there may be found a few who are worthy of the Divine commendation; comp. Rom. xi. 4." BARNES.—E. R. C.]

Which have not defiled their garments.

—This sentence is not absolute praise, inasmuch as it is simply negative; still it is great praise, inasmuch as the individuals referred to have withstood the general infection. On the various one-sided explanations of the garments (the body, as the garment of the soul; the conscience; the righteousness of faith, the baptismal robe), also Ebrard's interpretation, see Düsterdieck [this commentator regards all such special interpretations as an unwarrantable straining of the text.—Tr.]. But neither must we stop at the general conception, maculari per peccatum (Lyra), against which Aretius and Vitrings have insisted upon the ideas of life and its actions, or confession and morals. The divine sharp-sightedness of the Lord is proved by the fact that among the Sardians who have the semblance of life, He perceives their defilement or non-defilement by the mere appearance of their life, by their actions. If the works of the majority, in their negative aspect, were formerly characterized as not complete, not perfect, here they are indirectly characterized as polluted, defiled by the filth of worldliness, of earthly-mindedness, of heathenishness; thus Christ passed sentence upon the pious-mouthed Pharisees, judging them from their very words. And so the spotted garments do really refer to the polluted consciences, and, symbolically, to the defiled baptismal robe.

["That 'white raiment' there [ver. 5] is the garment of glory—this the garment of grace. That incapable of receiving a stain, being part of an inheritance which, in all its parts, is ἀμάντος (1 Peter i. 4); this, something to which σπίλοι (Eph. v. 27; James iii. 6), μάγματα (2 Peter ii. 20), μολυμαί (2 Cor. vii. 1), can only too easily adhere. . . . This, itself a wedding garment (Matt. xxii. 11, 12), but not necessarily identical with the fine linen, clean and white, the righteousness of saints (Rev. xix. 8), is put on at our entrance by baptism into the Kingdom of grace; that at our entrance by the resurrection into the Kingdom of glory." TREXON. "There can be little doubt that the simpler and more general explanation is the right one; viz.: who have not sullied the purity of their Christian life by falling into sin." ALFORD. So also BARNES.—E. R. C.]

And they shall walk with Me in white.

—The reward of these is appropriate to their conduct, yet far superior to it. "The white robes, with their 'bright hue of victory' (Bengel), are peculiar to the inhabitants of Heaven (ver. 5; ch. vi. 11; vii. 9; xix. 8). Those who keep their garments undefiled in this earthly life, shall walk with Christ (μετ' ἑμοῦ, compare Luke xxiii. 43; John xvii. 24) in white robes, living, thus adorned, in statu gloriæ immortalitatis (N. de Lyra), before the throne of God and of the Lamb, in the full and blessed enjoyment of fellowship with Him" (DÜSTERDIECK). On a reference of the promise to the Israelitish sacerdotal dress, see Düsterdieck.

Because they are worthy.—Here also we learn, in accordance with Scripture, to distinguish between the righteousness of faith in the court of the Spirit and the repentant conscience, and righteousness of life in the tribunal of the Judge of the world (ch. xvi. 5); recognizing the fact, however, that the latter is always conditioned upon the former.

["They have shown themselves worthy to be regarded as followers of the Lamb; or they have a character that is fitted for Heaven. The declaration is not that they have any claim to Heaven, on the ground of their own merit, or that it will be in virtue of their own works that they will be received there; but that there is a fitness or propriety that they should thus appear in Heaven." BARNES. "God's word does not refuse to ascribe a worthiness to men (Matt. x. 10, 11; xxii. 8; Luke xx. 35; xxi. 36; 2 Thess. i. 5, 11); although this worthiness must ever be contemplated as relative and not absolute. . . . There are those who 'are worthy,' according to the rules which free grace has, although there are none according to those which strict justice might have laid down." TREXON.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 5. He that conquereth shall thus be clothed in whitegarments.—The ever-recurring term ὁ νικῶν has here the special meaning of victory over temptation emanating from the subtle worldly-mindedness and slumbrous spirit of the church. The faithful in Ephesus had to overcome the temptation of excess in external works, amid which the first love grew cold. Believers in Smyrna had to overcome the trial of persecutions unto death. Believers in Pergamus were to overcome anomianism. Believers in Thyatira must be victorious over fanaticism. The Philadelphians were tried with Judaism, and the Laodiceans, finally, had the temptation to self-righteousness to surmount. The richer expression, he shall thus be clothed, etc., gives prominence to the free act of grace in the righteous recompense; as does also the clause:

And I will not [Lange, never (οὐ μὴ)] wipe out his name.—His name was entered in the Book of Life simultaneously with his calling and conversion. Such names may, however, be wiped out—a destiny awaiting many in Sardis.* But the names of the conquerors shall never be wiped out.

The figurative expression, book of Life, borrowed from the registers of the living citizens of a community (see Düsterd.), like the idea of calling, is not always used in exactly the same sense; sometimes it predominantly denotes the actualized ethical relation of man to God (Ps. lxix. 28; Is. iv. 3; Dan. xii. 1; Rev. xx. 12; xxi. 27); sometimes it is pre-eminently significant of the relation and conduct of Divine grace to man (Ex. xxxii. 32; Ps. cxxxix. 16;

* [It is not asserted in this passage that the names of any who shall finally perish were ever entered in the Book of Life, nor is it necessarily implied.—E. R. C.]

Rev. xvii. 8); and sometimes the predominant idea is that of the concrete unity of the two elements which we have mentioned, the reciprocal relation of which is always implied (Phil. iv. 8; Rev. xiii. 8).*

But I will confess his name.—Third promise. The recurrence of the name is significant. It is the mark of a dead church-life that only a collective Christianity remains, that Christian names, pronounced personalities, are lacking. In Sardis, however, there are still a few such names; and these the Lord will confess by name as His own, before God His Father, and before the angels of God—in the most glorious circle of life, therefore. Highest glorification of the highest definiteness of their personal life! [Comp. Matt. x. 32; Luke xii. 8.—E. R. C.]

["It is a very instructive fact, that everywhere else in the epistles to all the churches, save only to this and to Laodicea, there is mention of some burden to be borne, of a conflict either with foes within the church or without, or with both. Only in these two nothing of the kind occurs. The exceptions are very significant. There is no need to assume that the church at Sardis had openly coalesced and joined hands with the heathen world; this would in those days have been impossible; nor yet that it had renounced the appearance of opposition to the world. But the two tacitly understood one another. This church had nothing of the spirit of the Two Witnesses, of whom we read that they 'tormented them that dwell on the earth' (Rev. xi. 10), tormented them, that is, by their witness for a God of truth and holiness and love, Whom the dwellers on the earth were determined not to know. . . . The world could endure it because it too was a world." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

SIXTH EPISTLE. PHILADELPHIA.

Ch. iii. 7-13.

Philadelphia, like Sardis, was situated in Lydia, about thirteen hours' journey southeast from that capital. It derived its name from its builder, the Pergamene king, Attalus Philadelphus. Though frequently visited by earthquakes, the city still exists under the Turkish name of Alah Shehr, a living monument of the faithfulness of Divine promises in the midst of ruins. Comp. the Encyclopædias and Books of Travel. On its church-historical reminiscences see Düsterdieck. In Philadelphia, as in Smyrna, there was a "synagogue of Satan," i. e., an association of Judaistic enemies of Christianity, in opposition to which the epistle, whose images are theocratic throughout (see Düsterdieck), signalizes the church as the true people of God.

Ver. 7. These things saith the Holy [One], the True [One].—The Lord's self-designation is here in perfect accordance with the theocratic idea of God, and that in reference to the question as to which is the true people of God. The description is connected as a whole with the import of the Son of Man, ch. i. 13, in accordance with Dan. vii.

The Holy One.—The specific predicate of the God of Israel, the Sanctifier to Himself of a peculiar people—or a people of possession (see 1 Peter i. 15, 16). "Christ, rejected and blasphemed by the synagogue of Satan, is nevertheless, simply and plainly the Holy One, the true Messiah and Lord of the Church" (Düsterdieck). The personal manifestation of the God of Israel, the Founder of the Theocracy. Düsterdieck (p. 186) cites a number of instances of the misapprehension or ignoring of this obvious reference.

[Comp. Luke i. 35; Acts iii. 14. "Christ claims here to be ὁ Ἅγιος, the Holy One; cf. Acts ii. 27; xiii. 35; Heb. vii. 26. In all these passages, however, ὁστος, not ἅγιος, stands in the original; nor are these words perfectly identical, though we have but the one word, 'holy,' by which to render them both. The ὁστος, if a man, is one who diligently observes all the sanctities of religion; anterior, many of them, to all law, the 'jus et fas,' with a stress on the latter word. If applied to God, as at Rev. xv. 4; xvi. 5, and here, He is One in whom these eternal sanctities reside; who is Himself the root and ground of them. The ἅγιος is the separate from evil, with the perfect hatred of the evil. But holiness, in this absolute sense, belongs only to God; not to angels, for He chargeth His angels with folly (Job iv. 18), and certainly not to men (Jam. iii. 2; Gen. vi. 5; viii. 21). He then that claims to be 'the Holy One'—a name which Jehovah in the Old Testament continually claims for Himself—implicitly claims to be God," etc. TRENCH. "As opposed to the συναγωγή τοῦ σατανᾶ below." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

The True One.—In the New Testament, the term, "the true" [der Wahrhaftige, ἀληθινός, veritable, see Comm. on John, p. 460, Am. Ed.—E. R. C.] denotes not only the fulfilment of Old Testament prophecy (2 Cor. i. 20), but also the substance of the Old Testament shadowy sketches (John i. 17). Accordingly, the attribute ἀληθινός is related to ἀλήθεια, and founded thereupon; the two epithets are contra-distinguished, however, by the pre-eminence of the idea of substantiality, of true spiritual life, in ἀληθινός. Comp. the series of interpretations cited by Düsterd. The blasphemies of the Jews who refused to see in the Lord aught but the hanged one—hence, a false Messiah—are correctly pointed out by Hengstenberg as the antithesis to ὁ ἀληθινός. As Christ is personal holiness as the realized fundamental idea of the Old Covenant, so He is also the True in the sense of the fulfilment and essential consummation of the Old Testament, the perfect essential form of the Messiah.

["We must not confound ἀληθινός (=verus) with ἀληθής (=verax). God is ἀληθής (=ἀψευδής, Tit. i. 2), as He cannot lie, the truth-speaking and truth-loving God; with whom every word is Yea and Amen; but He is ἀληθινός, as fulfilling all that is involved in the name God, in contrast with those which are called gods . . . That is ἀληθινός, which fulfills its own idea to the highest possible point. . . . Nor is ἀλθινός only, as in this case of God, the true as contrasted with the absolutely false; but as contrasted with the sub-ordinately true, with all imperfect and partial realizations of the idea; thus Christ is ὥς ἀληθινός (John i. 9; 1 John ii. 8), ἀπὸς ἀληθινός (John vi. 32), ἀντελὸς ἀληθινός (John xv. 1); there is a σκηπὶ ἀληθινῇ in Heaven (Heb. viii. 2). In each of these cases, the antithesis is not between the true and the false, but between the perfect and the imperfect, the idea fully and the idea only partially realized; for John the Baptist also was a light (John v. 35), and Moses gave bread from Heaven (Ps. cv. 40), and Israel was a vine of God's planting (Ps. lxxx. 8), and the tabernacle pitched in the wilderness, if only a figure of the true, was yet pitched at God's express command (Ex. xxv.)." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

* [The phrase: βιβλος (τῆς) ζωῆς, occurs Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5; xx. 15, and βιβλίον τῆς ζωῆς, xiii. 8; xvii. 8; xx. 12; xxi. 27. (Ex. xxxii. 2; Dan. xii. 1, probably refer to the same, although the word ζωῆς does not appear; and possibly Ps. lxxix. 28, and Is. iv. 3, may have a similar reference.) In all these passages it is manifest that the simple hypothesis of a register (figurative, of course), of those who are to inherit eternal life, satisfies every contextual requirement.—E. R. C.]

That hath the key of David.—The key of the house of David was kept by the steward of his house; it was the province of this official to grant or deny access to the king, and to decide all questions of presentability at court. According to Is. xxii. 22, the key was given to Eliakim, after being taken from Shebna.* This key to the perfected theocratic Royal House, the House of the Messiah, the Messianic Kingdom, is now held by Christ the Messiah Himself (not by a steward); He and He alone decides, first, by His word and Spirit in the Church, and, again, by His authoritative rule in the world, the question as to who belongs to the people of God. And thus He forms in His Church the contrast to the synagogue of Satan. That which the Judaists would exclude, He includes; what they would include, He excludes. The difference, however, is that their communion, like their excommunication, is a mere delusion, whilst His acts have absolute reality. When He opens, none can shut: the world cannot take away His peace—no, not even from the martyr. When He shuts, none can open: the sentence of judgment which He by His Spirit executes in the spirits of men, can be invalidated by no fanatical self-delusion, or deception on the part of others.

["Christ teaches us here that He has not so committed the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, with the power of binding and loosing, to any other, His servants, here, but that He still retains the highest administration of them in His own hands." TRENCH. Is not "emphasis" to be laid on "the ὅ ἐχον"—the "steward" may hold the key, subject to the authority of the Master, the latter alone can be said to possess it? This view supports the interpretation of Düsterdieck given below.—E. R. C.]

Various interpretations. Christ alone opens the Holy Scriptures; Lyra.† The cross of Christ instrumentum omnipotentis; Alcasar. That supreme power which is the property of the Lord, Matt. xxviii. 18; Düsterd. and others. Christ, as Lord and King of the Kingdom, admits into it and excludes from it (Düsterd., Hengst., and others).

Ver. 8. I know thy works.—We do not, with Bengel and others, pass over the next word idōi, etc., and find a specification of the works in the subsequent ὅτι, etc.; but neither are they "destitute of further qualification" [Düsterd.]; on the contrary, they contain the motive of the following: Behold I have given [δέδωκα, etc.]; they are consequently an expression of full recognition.

Before thee a door opened.—Does this mean: The door into the Kingdom of God is opened for the church, though the Judaists would fain shut it, or is it a door to successful activity? The former apprehension, with various modifications, is supported by Bengel, Hengstenberg and others (see Düsterd.), whilst most commentators favor the latter conception, interpreting the passage as referring to the church's opportunity for missionary labors. Düsterdieck declares in favor of the latter view, with reference to ver. 9. The connection may also be thus construed, however: So far from thine adversaries being able to shut the door upon thee, they shall be constrained to turn to thine open door themselves. If we translate thus: Behold, I have determined that the door shall stand open before thee, we include both particulars, and it generally proves that that church which itself enters into the Kingdom of God draws in others with it.†

For thou hast little strength.—This must not be understood as indicative of spiritual weakness (a lack of miraculous gifts, Lyra), but of the external smallness or insignificance of the church (Düsterd., et al. ["The words 'little strength' may refer either to the smallness of the number; . . . or it may refer to the spiritual life and energy of the church—meaning that, though feeble, their vital energy was not wholly gone. The more natural interpretation seems to be to refer it to the latter." BARNES. It may refer to either of these, or both; conjoined with their lack of temporal wealth.—E. R. C.]). Though thou hast little strength ["not as E. V., 'a little strength,' thereby virtually reversing the sense of the words: μικρὰν ἔχεις δύναμιν, importing 'thy strength is but small,' and the E. V. importing 'thou hast some strength,' the fact of its smallness vanishing under the indefinite term 'a little,' . . . and (using that little well)."] ALFORD.—E. R. C.].—The sense is, though thou hast little strength, Thou didst keep, etc. [This idea of the German, weakened by the parenthesis, must be preserved.]

Thou didst keep My word, etc.—The church has already proved its faithfulness by confessing Christ in tribulation; therefore the Lord will grant it spiritual success exceeding the measure of its external power.

Ver. 9. Behold, I will make them [Lange: I give (δίδωμι) that some] of the synagogue of Satan.—Here also that community

* [Prof. Stuart advocates a third interpretation, viz.: (as presented by Barnes) "that they had before them an open way of egress from danger and persecution."—E. R. C.]

† [The view of Düsterd. (Alford, Trench) and others requires more than this—it demands that the door opened should be between the church and the unconverted; comp. (as referred to by Trench) 1 Cor. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. xi. 12; Acts xiv. 27; Col. iv. 3. It is true that Christ does open this door; but is not the door which He unlocks with the key of David that which leads into the Kingdom of Heaven? As King, He bursts open the gates of His enemies. Ver. 9 can hardly be regarded as supporting the view of the text; being "made of the Synagogue of Satan," and "falling down before the church" (not worshipping before God), are not the results of the open door to the unconverted, referred to in 1 Cor. xvi. 9, etc.—E. R. C.]

* [Is. xxii. 22 (LXX.). Δίδωμι αὐτῇ τὴν κλεῖδα οἴκου Δαυὶδ ἐπὶ τῷ ὄντι αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀνοίξει καὶ οὐκ ἔσται ὁ αποκλεισμένος, καὶ εἰσέλαι καὶ οὐκ ἔσται ὁ ἀποκλεισμένος.—E. R. C.]

of Judaism which assumes to be the true Israel,* is denominated a synagogue of Satan, with the same energy with which the Johannean Gospel opposes Judaism. Even from this community of demonic adversaries, the church shall win some souls. Here, too, the διδῶμι has more the appearance of an enactment than of a gift. He makes a disposition of these few already; subsequently He causes them to come.

And fall down before thy feet.—As it was prophesied in the Old Testament that the Gentiles should be converted and come unto Zion to the Jews, so here it is predicted that the Judaizing Jews shall in their conversion come to the Church of Christ as the true Zion. Even the προσκυνεῖν, as an expression of homage, and, at the same time, humiliation before the Church of Salvation and of the presence of the Lord, is heard in the following prophecies: Ps. lxxii. 9; Is. ii. 3; xlix. 23; lx. 14; Zech. viii. 20. On the misinterpretation of this passage in favor of the Catholic Hierarchy, see Düsterd., p. 192.†

And to know that I have loved thee.—ἡγάπησα denotes a continuous love, begun in the past. Düsterd. refers this demonstration of love to the death of Christ, in which case Philadelphia would only represent the Church total. Others interpret the word as indicative of the superiority or excellence of the Philadelphian church. De Wette: That I have known thee to be a faithful church. Both considerations must, however, be recognized in their unity: That My love to thee has become manifest in thy life of faith. The recognition of Christ is implied with the recognition of the church, and as the real motive of the latter. Düsterdieck gives prominence to the thought that the Jews shall know the love of Christ as manifested in His death upon the cross, whilst now they still blaspheme Him as a crucified malefactor.

Ver. 10. Because thou didst keep the word of My patience [endurance].—Düsterdieck makes the pronoun μου relate, not to τῆς ὑπομ. alone (like Ewald, De Wette, Hengstenberg and others), but to the whole conception τὸν λόγον, etc. (with Grot., Eichhorn and others). But the reading: My word of patience, gives rise to obscurity, suggesting the thought that the words of other teachers have glorified patience. There are also different explanations of this apprehension of the sentence. The word which, among other things, prescribes patience (Heinrich); The word which bestows and demands patience (Düsterd.). Isolated utterances of Christ, recommending patience—Christian patience (Hengstenberg). This interpretation approximates the other).

[BARNES: "My word commanding or enjoining patience, that is, thou hast manifested the patience which I require." TREXCH: "Better, however, to take the whole Gospel as 'the word of Christ's patience,' everywhere teaching, as it does, the need of a patient waiting for Christ, till He, the waited-for so long, shall at length appear." The translation, constancy or endurance, or steadfastness, is altogether to be preferred; the idea of patience is rather that of uncomplaining submission under trial—in this sense it is a misnomer to speak of the ὑπομονή of Job, Jam. v. 11.—E. R. C.]

The word of the patience of Christ is also variously interpreted as the word of My passion, My constancy (Calov.). The word which, as the word concerning the cross, demands, in respect of its purport and in respect of the obligation which it imposes, steadfastness such as is peculiar to Christ and His people (Vitranga). We read: The word ripened in persecution into a word of perseverance, to the martyrs' testimony [martyrium], to confession. Hence: Thou hast kept my word in the fiery trial of temptation and opposition, when the word concerning the cross became a word of the cross;—the word in the beauty and power of the cross. The Holy Scriptures contain multiplied references to ὑπομονή; particularly Rev. ii. 2, 8, 19; xiii. 10; xiv. 12 [Luke viii. 15; xxi. 19; Rom. ii. 7; v. 8, 4; viii. 25; xv. 4, 5; 1 Thess. i. 3; 2 Thess. iii. 5; Heb. x. 36; xii. 1; James i. 3, 4, etc.—E. R. C.]

I also will keep thee.—Three-fold interpretation: [1] Thou shalt be excepted from the hour of temptation. [2] Thou, with all the faithful, shalt be preserved from the plagues of unbelievers. [3] Thou shalt be kept through exterior temptation; it shall not become to thee an internal temptation to apostasy (Vitranga, Hengstenb., and others). Düsterdieck: "The expression την. ἐκ must be distinguished from την. ἀπό."

From the hour of temptation.—The hour of temptation is the culminating point in the time of temptation (Luke xxii. 53), the moment of the crisis. In general, doubtless, the severe conflicts of faith which the Church must undergo previous to the Coming of the Lord (see ver. 11) are here intended, as bringing with them the danger of apostasy.

More particular definitions: The preservation represented ch. vii. 3 sqq. (Ewald, De Wette); the tribulations of Antichrist (Primasius); in addition to these, the plagues of the sixth angel (Bede).—Needless limitations.

False modifications: The persecutions under Nero (Grotius), Domitian (Lyra), Trajan (Alcasar and others).

* [See foot-note to chapter ii. 9.—E. R. C.]

† [There can be no doubt that there is special reference here to the prophecies of Is. xlix. 23, lx. 14; and there can be as little doubt that a conversion is implied in these prophecies. The conversion, however, is not that of the present missionary era of the Church—that which follows the preaching of the Gospel to the unconverted through the "open door" alluded to in 1 Cor. xvi. 9, etc.;—during which time the converts are at once admitted into the Church. It is a conversion which is consequent upon the subjection of the nations to the established Basileia.—On Is. xlix. 23, J. A. ALEXANDER thus comments: "The addition of these words, 'face toward the earth,' determines the meaning of the preceding verb (XXX. προσκυνήσας) as denoting actual prostration, which is also clear from the next clause, where the licking of the dust cannot be naturally understood as a strong expression for the kissing of the foot or of the earth, in token of homage, but is rather like the biting of the dust in Homer, a poetical description of complete and compulsory prostration, not merely that of subjects to their sovereign, but of vanquished enemies before their conquerors (comp. Micah vii. 17; Ps. lxxii. 9)." A conversion is implied in this passage under consideration, it is true; but that which was directly contemplated in this threat of the Lord is subjugation. See also preceding note, and the Excursus on the Basileia, pp. 93 sqq. —E. R. C.]

prophecy of evil, a threat, a persecution, or an affliction (see Luke iv. 13; viii. 13; xxii. 28, 40, 46; Acts xx. 19; 1 Cor. x. 13; Gal. iv. 14; 1 Tim. vi. 9; 1 Peter i. 6; iv. 12, etc.). It is so styled because it is a trial, a test, of faith or the spirit of obedience. The hour of temptation (test-ing) is doubtless that special period referred to, 1 Pet. iv. 12 (τῇ ἐν ὑμῖν πυρώσει πρὸς πειρασμὸν ὑμῖν γινωσκένη), and by our Lord, Matt. xxiv. 21, 22; (a period both of testing and of punishment—primarily, however, of the former). This special period, be it observed, is distinguished from the period of ordinary πειρασμοί referred to 1 Peter i. 6, and Matt. xxiv. 4-18. It is also to be observed that the promise is not of preservation in trial, as was the promise to Peter, Luke xxii. 32; but of preservation from (ἐκ) the hour or period of trial (comp. 2 Peter ii. 9). The idea of this promise seems to be, that as the Philadelphians had continued steadfast throughout the period of ordinary testing, they were to be exempted from those extraordinary πειρασμοί which were to come upon the world.—E. R. C.]

Which is about to come upon all the world [οἰκουμένην].—Though it is relatively true that the Roman empire was the οἰκουμένην [Grot., Vit., Stern, et al.].* it must here symbolize the whole of the inhabited world. This is indicated by the next clause.

To try them that dwell upon the earth.—According to Düsterdieck, “the mass of mankind in antithesis to believers, redeemed out of all peoples.” The following passages are cited in illustration of this view: ch. vi. 10; xi. 10; xiii. 8, 14. It results from ch. xiii. 8, however, that the inhabitants of the earth are more or less identified with unbelievers only on account of the great majority of the latter over believers. It is true that the temptation comes, as a judicial infliction, only upon the unbelieving; yet the tempting fact comes, as a rigorous trial, upon believers also, in order to their confirmation. This result they owe to Divine preservation.

Ver. 11. I come quickly.—Constantly recurring announcement, designed for the awakening and terrifying of foes and the consolation and elevation of the pious. We would again insist upon the fact, that it is no definition of time in the common chronological sense; it is to be apprehended in an exalted religious sense. The term ταχύ always involves the surprisingness of the coming, as unexpected, sudden, terribly early and terribly great.

Hold that fast which thou hast.—See ch. i. 3; ii. 25; xxii. 7. Cherish the charism peculiar to thee. The ever new reproduction and more thorough acquisition of the thing possessed is expressed, together with the holding of it fast (Matt. xxiv. 13). Here the charism of steadfastness in the faith is denoted. [“Whatever of truth and piety you now possess” BARNES.—E. R. C.]

That no man take thy crown.—That no man despoil thee of the victor's wreath.† that awaiteth thee at the goal; i. e. that none cause thee to lose it. Not, therefore, in the sense of another's coming before and winning it in the church's stead (Grot.). Μηδεὶς, however, represents the power of temptation, finally concentrated in Antichrist, with reference to the competitive contests of antiquity.

Ver. 12. A pillar in the temple.—The distinct promise corresponds again to the distinct conduct of the church: 1. A pillar in the spiritual Temple of God; 2. An eternally consecrate inmate of the Temple; 3. Adorned with the three-fold inscription: a. With the name of God; the complete expression of perfect religiousness. b. With the name of the City of God; the complete expression of perfect ideal churchliness. c. With the name of Christ; the complete expression of perfect Christliness, which embraces in one both the foregoing considerations. This promise will, of course, not be perfectly fulfilled until the Coming of the Lord; yet we cannot, with Düsterdieck, regard its fulfillment as exclusively subsequent to the second Advent. Düsterdieck not only denies the reference of the promise to the Church Militant alone (Lyra, Grot., and others), but he even disputes its application to it and the Church Triumphant (Vitranga and others). [“The promised reward of faithfulness here is, that he who is victorious would be honored as if he were a pillar or column in the Temple of God. Such a pillar or column was partly for ornament, and partly for support, and the idea here is, that in that Temple he would contribute to its beauty and the justness of its proportions, and would at the same time be honored as if he were a pillar which was necessary for the support of the Temple.”—BARNES. ALFORD judiciously observes: “It is no objection to this view (substantially the one set forth above) that in the heavenly Jerusalem there is no Temple, ch. xxi. 22; but rather a corroboration of it. That glorious City is all Temple, and Christ's victorious ones are its living stones and pillars. Thus, as Düsterdieck well remarks, the imagery of the Church Militant 1 Cor. xiii. 16 sqq.; Eph. ii. 19 sqq.; 1 Peter ii. 5 sqq., is transferred to the Church Triumphant, but with this difference, that the saints are no longer the stones merely, but now the pillars themselves, standing on their immovable firmness.” This passage is but one of many which set forth the pre-eminence of the victorious saints of the present dispensation, in the future æon of blessedness and glory. They are the ἀπαρχή, the first fruits, Jas. i. 18; Rev. xiv. 4; the bride, Rev. xxi. 9; kings in the Kingdom then to be established, Rev. ii. 26; iii. 22; priests in the holy congregation, Rev. i. 6; v. 10; xx. 6; pillars in the heavenly Temple. (See also note on ch. ii. 26).—E. R. C.]

And he shall nevermore go out. (Καὶ ἔξω οὐ μὴ ἐξέλθῃ ἔτι.)—The pillar shall not be put out, according to Ewald and others. But there is doubtless a change of figure. The victor can no more fall away or be separated from the blessed fellowship of God. His secure position in the eternal Temple as a pillar, for firmness and beauty, is only equalled by his sure establishment therein as an inmate. [Continued purity, and exemption from association with anything impure, seem to be emphasized by the use of ἔξω; comp. ch. xxii. 15.—E. R. C.]

* [There is no authority for this limitation of the prime reference of οἰκουμένην (comp. Matt. xxiv. 14; Luke iv. 5; Acts xvii. 31; Rom. x. 18; Heb. i. 6; Rev. xii. 19; xvi. 14).—E. R. C.]

† [Στέφανος—that which is at once the wreath of the victor and the crown of the king. See note on ch. ii. 10.—E. R. C.]

Hengstenberg justly says, that this applies to every Christian, for to be a Christian is to be a victor. The inscription also refers to the victor, not to the pillar, see ch. xiv. 1. On the reference of the name of Jesus to Jesuani, Jesuitæ, see Düsterdieck's note, p. 197.

An analogue of the three names in Jewish Theology, see in Düsterdieck, p. 198.

Which cometh down out of heaven.—See ch. xxi. As the Church in this world is ever growing more spiritual, so the Church in the other world is constantly becoming more real, more corporeal, until its perfect worldly appearance is consummated in the resurrection. [See under ch. xxi. 1-3.—E. R. C.]

As the three names, in close connection with the Trinity, are expressive of a three-fold manifestation of the Divine image in the beatified one, so they also denote a three-fold appertinency or consecrateness on his part.

[And I will write upon him the name of my God.]—"Christ will write this name of His God upon him that overcometh—not upon it, the pillar. It is true, indeed, that there were sometimes inscriptions on pillars, which yet would be σημαί, rather than στυλαί; but the image of the pillar is now dismissed, and only the conqueror remains. In confirmation of this, that it is the person, and not the pillar, whom the Lord contemplates now, we find, further on, the redeemed having the name of God, or the seal of God on their foreheads (vii. 3; ix. 4; xiv. 1; xxii. 4), with probable allusion to the golden plate inscribed with the name of Jehovah which the High Priest wore upon his (Exod. xxviii. 36-38). In the 'Kingdom of priests' this dignity shall not be any more the singular prerogative of one, but the common dignity of all."

TRENCH.—And the name of the City of my God.—"What the name of this City is, we are told Ezek. xlvi. 35: 'The Lord is there.' Any other name would but faintly express the glory of it; 'having the glory of God' (Rev. xxi. 11, 23). He that has the name of this City written upon him is hereby declared free of it. Even while on earth he had his true πολίτευμα ἐν οὐρανοῖς (Phil. iii. 20; see Ellicott thereon), the state, city or country to which he belonged was a heavenly one; but still his citizenship was latent; he was one of God's hidden ones; but now he is openly avouched, and has a right to enter in by the gates to the City (xxii. 14)." TRENCH.

—And . . . My new name.—"This 'new name' is not 'The Word of God' (xix. 13), nor yet 'King of kings and Lord of lords' (xix. 16). It is true that both of these appear in this Book as names of Christ; but at the same time neither of them could be called His new name; the faithful having been familiar with them from the beginning; but the 'new name' is that mysterious and, in the necessity of things, uncommunicated and, for the present time, incommunicable name, which, in that same sublimest of all visions, is referred to: 'He had a name written, that no man knew, but He Himself' (xix. 12); for none but God can search out the deep things of God (1 Cor. ii. 12; cf. Matt. xi. 27; Judg. xiii. 18). But the mystery of this new name, which no man by searching could find out, which in this present condition no man is so much as capable of receiving, shall be imparted to the saints and citizens of the New Jerusalem. They shall know even as they are known (1 Cor. xiii. 12)." TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

[The following extract from Gibbon's Decline and Fall (ch. lxiv.) will be read with interest in this connection: "Two Turkish chieftains, Sarukhan and Aidin, left their names to their conquests, and their conquests to their posterity. The captivity or ruin of the seven churches of Asia was consummated; and the barbarous lords of Ionia and Lydia still trample on the monuments of classic and Christian antiquity. In the loss of Ephesus, the Christians deplored the fall of the first angel, the extinction of the first candlestick, of the Revelation; the desolation is complete; and the temple of Diana, or the church of Mary, will equally elude the search of the curious traveller. The circus and three stately theatres of Laodicea are now peopled with wolves and foxes; Sardis is reduced to a miserable village; the God of Mahomet, without a rival or a son, is invoked in the mosques of Thyatira and Pergamus; and the populousness of Smyrna is supported by the foreign trade of the Franks and Armenians. Philadelphia alone has been saved by prophecy, or courage. At a distance from the sea, forgotten by the emperors, encompassed on all sides by the Turks, her valiant citizens defended their religion and freedom above four-score years; and at length capitulated with the proudest of the Ottomans. Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins; a pleasing example that the paths of honor and safety may sometimes be the same."—E. R. C.]

SEVENTH EPISTLE. LAODICEA.

Ch. iii. 14-22.

Our Laodicea was situated on the river Lycus in Phrygia Major, in the neighborhood of Colosse and Hierapolis; it was a large and rich commercial city. Bearing earlier the name of Diospolis, and then of Rhœas, it received its subsequent appellation in honor of Laodice, the Queen of King Antiochus II. In the year 62 this city, like Colosse and Hierapolis, was destroyed by an earthquake, but was speedily rebuilt. An insignificant town called Eskibissar, surrounded by ruins, now forms the last trace of its existence. Laodicea was the last of the seven churches; hence, a circular letter to these (the Epistle to the Ephesians) had, on reaching this city, arrived at its final destination, and from there an exchange could readily be effected between it and the Epistle to the Colossians (Col. iv. 16). Notwithstanding this, Winer still talks of a lost letter from Paul to the Laodiceans.* The bearer of the seven epistles, having gone northward from Ephesus through Smyrna

* [There are three opinions concerning the destination of the Epistle to the Ephesians: 1. That it was addressed specifically to the church in Ephesus; 2. That it is the Epistle to (from—ἐκ) Laodicea mentioned Col. iv. 16; 3. That it was a circular letter for all the churches of Asia Minor. For full discussions of the entire subject see Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, Alford, Eadie, Hodge, the Lange Comm. on Ephesians (Am. Ed.), etc. The evidence in favor of the last two opinions is of the most meagre character.—E. R. C.]

to Pergamus, turned southward to Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia and Laodicea; thus traversing a trivium and a quadrivium.*

For further particulars, see Encyclopedias, Books of Travel and Geographical works.

"A bishop and martyr of Laodicea, called Sagaris (A. D. 170), is mentioned by Eusebius, H. E. iv. 26; v. 24; even Archippus (Col. iv. 17) is named as bishop (Const. Apost. viii. 46). Each has been regarded as the angel of the church; and in the expression  $\eta \alpha\rho\chi\eta \tau. \kappa\tau.$ , ver. 14, Hengstenberg has even discovered an allusion to the name of Arch-ippus as the most influential leader of the church at Laodicea." (DÜSTERDIECK.) A curious discovery, certainly! Colossians ii. does not distinctly prove, as Düsterdieck assumes, that in Paul's time the Laodicean church, as well as that at Colosse, was in danger from erroneous theosophic doctrines, though Vitringa, with astonishing acuteness, maintained that there were traces of such things in the very epistle that we are examining (Düsterdieck, p. 199). The spiritual condition of the church may be clearly gathered from the epistle addressed to it, but cannot be explained from the external circumstances of the church itself.

Ver. 14.† These things saith the Amen.—Here also a harmony of all parts may be taken for granted at the very outset. The central point of all the terms contained in the epistle lies, manifestly, in the false self-gratulation of the Church as expressed in ver. 17. In the first place, such a morbid assurance of completeness, involving a cessation from striving, and even from aspiration—such a conviction of having arrived at a state in which all need is done away with ( $\pi\epsilon\pi\lambda\omicron\upsilon\tau\eta\kappa\alpha$ )‡—does not arise in a healthy condition of faith, for even on the firm ground of the peace of reconciliation, such a condition implies—nay, is itself—a longing and striving after perfection (the true righteousness of faith, an agonizing after righteousness of life).

But, again, this assurance of completeness and consequent stoppage of all exertion does not spring into existence where there is a mere legal holiness of works; the goad of the law is constantly rousing those under its bondage—or, at least, the worthier portion of them—from the false repose to which they, for a moment, may have yielded, and urging them on. Spiritualism [Spiritualismus],§ however, is always and everywhere thoroughly satisfied, whether it appear in a mystical form, declaring, I too am a son of God, or in a rationalistic guise, affirming that there is no such thing as a son of God, no such thing as the Atonement. Spiritualism [Spiritualismus] has the property of not being warm, because it has no spiritual [geistlich] blood, no social, historical or personal life; but neither is it cold, for it has its religious views and opinions, its party even, for which it can, for a time, be enthusiastically or fanatically hot. It does not, however, grow warm for the living fellowship of God and the Church of God. Now this spiritualism [Spiritualismus] may, in Laodicea, as well as elsewhere, have been based upon the antecedents of theoretical, theosophic heresies; at the writing of the epistle, however, these heresies were a vanishing point in the background; the enthusiastic soarings in the clouds had been succeeded by the reactionary fall of satiety and lukewarmness. Hence the word of revelation does not directly attack theoretical errors of the church, but its practical appearance, so specifically modified, however, that we perceive the epistle to be also aimed at the germs of the church's corruption latent in the background.

The self-designation of Christ is the first instrument for the accomplishment of the design we have just stated. The Amen, the faithful and true [genuine] Witness, the Originator ( $\alpha\rho\chi\eta$ , see Col. i. 18) of the creation and redemption.\* He is the Amen as the perfect and complete personal conclusion of the revelations of God, beyond Whom there can be no angelic or philosophic or spiritualistic [spiritualistisch] revelations,†—the focus of the Divine sun of revelation, through Whom alone true vital heat is to be got. He is the faithful and essential, perfectly historical and real Witness of the truth, in face of Whom the inflated illusions, images and systems of spiritualism [Spiritualismus] must vanish away. He is the living, personal Principle of the whole creation; hence there is no principal life of spirits or spirit outside of that cosmical order of the Kingdom which is comprehended in Him.

With this description of Christ, the description of the church corresponds. Its works are specifically merged in its character, and this character is lukewarmness—not lukewarmness as positivism, however, but as a double negation: neither cold nor warm. If the church were cold, if it were a stranger to Christ, like the heathen, or even if it cherished a positive antipathy against Him, He would not approach it in the character of a Judge; it might yet become warm. It has just enough Christianity to come under condemnation, but not sufficient to attain to blessedness, for the reason that it is not warm.

already employed in English in two or three different senses. As far as possible to avoid confusion, whenever it and the allied words spiritual, spiritualist, occur, the originals will be printed in brackets as above.—E. R. C.]

* [See comments and additions on pp. 135 sqq.—E. R. C.]
† [This comment seems to be based on a modern use of the term Amen. As it forms the conclusion of our prayers, it has come to be employed, both in German and English, as a word expressive of conclusion. No such meaning, however, properly belongs to it. Nor is there any reason to suppose that, in the days of the Apostles, it was ever employed in this special conventional sense.—E. R. C.]

* [Of all this there is not one particle of evidence.—E. R. C.]

† [On this and several following pages, Lange presents a general view of the epistle. Special exegetical comments and additions may be found pp. 135 sqq.—E. R. C.]

‡ [The marvellous comprehensiveness of the German language is forcibly illustrated here. Six words present all that our translation has given in the space comprised within the last place, which in the German occurs further on. We cite the pregnant six: Ein solches krankhaftes Fertigersein und Bedürfnisslosigkeitsbewusstsein. Perhaps it is but fair to remark that the final octosyllable is composed of a substantive, an adjective, a participle, and an infinitive.—Tr.]

§ [Lange seems to have employed this word, coined from the Latin as a generic term representative of the doctrine of those who deny the necessity of an external atonement, r-revelation and ordinances—affirming that the spirit of a man is sufficient unto itself. In this sense it includes the wildest mystics and the blindest rationalism. The only English word by which it can be rendered is spiritualism. The use of this term, however, is objectionable, as it is

This condition, in its approximation to eternal hopelessness, wrings from the Judge Himself, in His blessed majesty, a sigh that seems laden with a human grief: O that thou wert cold or warm!—Again, the condition of the church is illustrated by the figure of lukewarm water, which, when drunk, causes nausea: I am about to (not yet: I will) spew thee out of my mouth; i. e. reject with lively indignation and repulsion.

Not cold, not warm, but lukewarm. This attitude toward the Lord, His word and His Church, is based upon the church's conduct toward itself, upon its spiritual [geistlich] pride. This pride is likewise expressed three-foldly: I am rich—I have become rich to excess or satiety—I have need of nothing (or, as it may also be rendered, no person, no Saviour, no fellowship). The first declaration is expressive of the church's self-deception in imagining that it can be rich independently. In the second declaration, the church intimates, that in some way or other (by an arcanum or a would-be new idea) it has become rich, and that its wealth is forever an accomplished fact. In the third declaration, the fearful consequence is announced: it has need of nothing more; it is subjectively free from all heavenly and earthly props; its satiety is the complete caricature of the blessedness of true faith, having an imaginary exaltation in an imaginary omniscience.

Its false self-appraisal is met by the annihilating sentence of the Lord:

Thou knowest not.—Ignorance, and that in relation to the most immediate and necessary knowledge—ignorance of its own condition; ignorance in its most aggravated form—self-blinding, constitutes the basis of its wants. The church (represented by her character, her masculine life-picture) knows not that she is, on the one hand, the wretched one, the specific bearer of the burdens of a salvationless state; and, on the other, the one pitiable above all others, on whom, also, the Lord wills yet to have pity in consideration of her ignorance (see Luke xxiii. 34). The three fundamental traits of this woful picture are: poor and blind and naked; poor in reference to the true riches of life; blind in reference to truth and knowledge; naked in reference to the utter want of a truly spiritual [geistlich] appearance in genuine good works or signs and evidences of the inner life.

The counsel of the Lord is in harmony with the situation. The church is admonished to buy all that she lacks of Him. For of Him alone can the beggar buy—buy for nought (Is. lv. 1), and yet buy, inasmuch as it is only under moral forms and conditions that the free gift is received; its reception implies the surrender of a whole world of counterfeit value, and thus there is a difference between its bestowal and the actual giving of alms to a beggar. The first proffer is that of gold—gold purified by fire; the heavenly riches of righteousness, in the sterling quality of the fidelity of faith; purified by the fire of tribulation, and thus proven to be genuine gold. The spiritualist [Spiritualist] dares not expose his gilded fancies to the fire of tribulation. The church's nakedness is the second thing provided for—in advance of her blindness; and this is, doubtless, because a modicum of sight is pre-supposed in the first and second acts, and because it is high time that the manifestation of the shame of her nakedness, appearing, as it necessarily will, in moral scandals, should be averted by demonstrations of Christian life, in white garments, which are connected with the gold of faith. Then comes the eye-salve of truth, in order to the gaining of true and perfect sight in Christian knowledge, from which the spiritualist [Spiritualist], in his false conceit of knowledge, is most remote.

The severe utterance of the Lord is next exempted from all suspicion of partyism, party-strife or school-wrangling. The truth of Christ, under whatever aspect it is viewed, always turns to rebuke when it encounters falsehood; and the very fact of its rebuking and chastening is designed to teach the person thus exercised, that the love of Christ has not yet given him up, and that, on the contrary, it would fain win him by these means of rebuke and chastening—that it is thereby calling him to repentance.

Ver. 20. Behold, I stand at the door.—With the peculiar species of sinfulness in the condition of the church, the peculiar form of repentance corresponds. An obliteration of the consciousness of man's liberty of election is partly the cause, partly the effect of spiritualism [Spiritualismus]; the nerve of moral freedom is paralyzed, and the sense of moral greatness, as exemplified in the history of the world, is obscured. Therefore Christ—Who has not for a long time been in this high-flying spiritualism [Spiritualismus]<sup>1</sup>—stands at the door of the soul and knocks. He finds the door shut; still He does not burst it in; He knocks and begs for admittance. In face of this conduct of the royally Free, the unfree should rouse him from his palsy. If any man.—This, indeed, is not to be expected of the mass of blinded ones, yet it may be hoped of individuals.

If any man hear My voice.—There is help for any one who still has an ear for this—for the affectionate tone, the loving call of Jesus' voice. Amid his spiritual [geistig] waverings betwixt light and darkness, his heart, constantly declining, as it is, into an indifference to personal love, is not yet quite dead. This is proved by the fact of his opening the door to the Lord, by his reception of the personal Christ as his Friend and Saviour. And what then? With the peculiar modification of repentance, the peculiar modification of grace corresponds. The subsequent word of promise is, assuredly, meant for all who are converted, but especially is it intended for the returning spiritualist [Spiritualist].

I will come in to him and will sup with him.—In the case of the spiritualist [Spiritualist], above all, the new life must take the form of the most intimate communion, of personal fellowship with the Lord. This communion is primarily Christ's supping with him; his heart, his property, his bread henceforth belong to the Christian fellowship. But the higher form of this new life is that he, on his part, sups with Christ, that he becomes a participant in His blessed, heavenly life. And though the general reference here is to the meal of vital communion, the restoration of the spiritualist [Spiritualist] will also be particularly evidenced in a proper appreciation of the Lord's Supper, the social Christ, a Sacrament which he has before despised in his imagined self-sufficiency.

In this epistle, as in all the others, the concluding promise to the victor is in perfect harmony with all that has gone before.

Ver. 21. To him that conquereth will I grant to sit with Me on My throne.—The throne of Christ is the glory of His Kingdom—the sitting on His throne, the personal vital possession of this glory; the sitting with Him on this throne is, therefore, the co-enjoyment of this highest definiteness of perfected personal life. This future forms the extremest contrast to the expectation of the spiritualistic [spiritualistisch] indifferentist who holds that he is to be swallowed up in the waves of the general, impersonal world-essence.

But the promise unfolds still greater glories:

And sat down with My Father.—We can imagine nothing concerning a fellowship in God's personal exaltation above the world, above the transitoriness, unfreeness, and imperfection of the world. The words at the head of this paragraph, however, unmistakably form the culminating point of the contrast to the nihilistic views of the indifferentistically lukewarm mind, the positive counterpart of the negative Buddhistic Nirvana.

The solemn conclusion appeals for the last time to the organization, the capacity, the destination of man; for the last time to man's freedom and to the first stirrings of freedom in hearing and obeying; for the last time to the high calling of the Christian—to hear what the Spirit saith to the churches. The words this time have a seven-fold weight, for they form the conclusion not only of the last letter, but of all the foregoing epistles likewise.

The more general import of Christ's declaration, Behold, I stand at the door, is this, viz., that the last epistle sketches the last form of the church, and touches upon the Parousia.

After this general consideration of the final epistle, we present, briefly, the following exegesis of particular points:

Ver. 14. The Amen, 2 Cor. i. 20.—[“Referring, as is the case in every epistle, to some attribute of the speaker adapted to impress their minds, or to give peculiar force to what He was about to say to that particular church. . . . The word amen means true, certain, faithful; and, as used here, it means that He to whom it is applied is eminently true and faithful. What He affirms is true; what He promises or threatens is certain. Himself characterized by sincerity and truth (2 Cor. i. 20), He can look with approbation only on the same in others; and hence He looks with displeasure on the lukewarmness which, from its very nature, always approximates insincerity.” BARNES. It may also be observed that a state of lukewarmness is a state of indifferentism, of partial unbelievingness. The lukewarm hear as though the promises and threats of their teachers were as vain as the wind. It was most appropriate that the Great Teacher should endeavor to arouse the Laodiceans to heed His words, by an epithet declarative of His sincerity, and the truth and certainty of His declarations.—E. R. C.] The Hebrew expression is, doubtless, thoroughly akin to the subsequent Greek terms (Bengel and others); yet there is a distinction between absolute certainty and absolute faithfulness and actuality, and we have here no mere climax (Düsterdieck).—See Düsterd. on unsupported interpretations.

[The faithful and true Witness—“He is ‘the Witness, the faithful and the true,’ in that He speaks what He knows, and testifies what He has seen. The thought is a favorite and ever-recurring one in the Gospel of St. John (iii. 11, 32, 33); but does not appear in any other. . . . Of the two epithets, the first, πιστός, expresses His entire trustworthiness. The word is employed in the New Testament, as elsewhere—now as trusting or believing (John xx. 27; Acts xiv. 1), now as trustworthy or to be believed (2 Tim. ii. 22; 1 Thess. v. 27; 1 John i. 9). Men may be πιστοί in both senses, the active and the passive, as exercising faith, and as being worthy to have faith exercised upon them. God can be only πιστός in the latter. . . . It will be seen that the truthfulness of Christ as a Witness is asserted in the πιστός, not, as might at first sight be assumed, in the ἀληθινός that follows, or at least in it only as one quality among many. Christ is a μαρτυρ ἀληθινός (not ἀληθής), in that He realized and fulfilled in the highest sense all that belonged to a witness. Three things are necessary thereto. He must have been αὐτόπτης; having seen with his own eyes that which he professes to attest. He must be competent to relate and reproduce this for others. He must be willing faithfully and truthfully to do this. These three things meeting in Christ, and not the presence of the last only, constitute Him a ‘true * Witness,’ or one in whom all the highest conditions of a witness met.” TRENCH.—E. R. C.]

[The beginning (ἀρχή) of the creation of God.—[1] The principle of the creation; see Col. i. 15.—False interpretations: [2] The Prince [Fürst, first] of the creation; [3] The Founder of the new creation, the Church; [4] The first and most glorious Creature of the creation. See John i. 1 sqq. [The first of the preceding views, the one adopted by Lange, is the one advocated by Alford and Trench. Their arguments as against the 4th, or Arian, view, are embodied in the following extract from Barnes. Both these distinguished commentators cite, as supporting their opinions as to the use of the term ἀρχή, many passages from Apocryphal and early Christian authors. TRENCH writes as follows: “For the use of ἀρχή in the sense and with the force which we here demand for it as ‘principium,’ not ‘initium’ (though these Latin words do not adequately reproduce the distinction), comp. the Gosp. of Nicod. c. 25, in which Hades addresses Satan as ἡ τοῦ θανάτου ἀρχή καὶ ῥίζη τῆς ἀμαρτίας; and further, Dionysius, the Areopagite (c. 15): ὁ Θεὸς ἐστὶν πάντων αἰτία καὶ ἀρχή; and again, Clement of Alex. (Strom. iv. 25): ὁ Θεὸς δὲ ἀναρχος, ἀρχὴ τῶν ὅλων παντελὴς. These, and innumerable other passages, abundantly vindicate for ἀρχή that active sense which we must needs claim for it here." BARNES, who adopts the 2d of the above views, presents the entire subject in the following powerful language: "The phrase here used is susceptible, properly, of only one of the following significations, viz.: either (a) that He was the beginning of the creation in the sense that He caused the universe to begin to exist, that is, that He was the author of all things; or (b) that He was the first created being; or (c) that He holds the primacy over all, and is at the head of the universe. It is not necessary to examine any other proposed interpretations, for the only other senses supposed to be conveyed by the words, that He is the beginning of the creation in the sense that He rose from the dead as the first-fruits of them that sleep, or that He is the head of the spiritual creation of God, are so foreign to the natural meaning of the words as to need no special refutation. As to the three significations suggested above, it may be observed, that the first one—that He is the author of the creation, and in that sense the beginning, though expressing a Scriptural doctrine (John i. 8; Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 16), is not in accordance with the proper meaning of the word here used—ἀρχή. The word properly refers to the commencement of a thing, not its authorship, and denotes properly primacy in time, and primacy in rank, but not primacy in the sense of causing anything to exist. The two ideas which run through the word, as it is used in the New Testament, are those just suggested. For the former—primacy in regard to time—that is properly the commencement of a thing, see the following passages where the word occurs: Matt. xix. 4, 8; xxiv. 8, 21; Mark i. 1; x. 6; xiii. 8, 19; Luke i. 2; John i. 1, 2; ii. 11; vi. 64; viii. 25, 44; xv. 17; xvi. 4; Acts xi. 15; 1 John i. 1; ii. 7, 13, 14, 24; iii. 8, 11; 2 John 5, 6. For the latter signification—primacy of rank or authority—see the following places: Luke xii. 11; xx. 20; Rom. viii. 38; 1 Cor. xv. 24; Eph. i. 21; iii. 10; vi. 12; Col. i. 16, 18; ii. 10, 15; Tit. iii. 1. The word is not, therefore, found in the sense of authorship, as denoting that one is the beginning of anything in the sense that he caused it to have an existence. As to the second of the significations suggested, that it means that He was the first created being, it may be observed (a) that this is not a necessary signification of the phrase, since no one can show that this is the only proper meaning which could be given to the words, and therefore the phrase cannot be adduced to prove that He is Himself a created being. If it were demonstrated from other sources that Christ was, in fact, a created being, and the first that God had made, it cannot be denied that this language would appropriately express that fact. But it cannot be made out from the mere use of the language here; and as the language is susceptible of other interpretations, it cannot be employed to prove that Christ is a created being. (b) Such an interpretation would be at variance with all those passages which speak of Him as uncreated and eternal; which ascribe Divine attributes to Him; which speak of Him as Himself the Creator of all things. Compare John i. 1-3; Col. i. 16; Heb. i. 2, 6, 8, 10-12. The third signification, therefore, remains, that He is 'the beginning of the creation of God,' in the sense that He is the Head or Prince of the creation; that is, that He presides over it so far as the purposes of redemption are to be accomplished, and so far as it is necessary for those purposes. This is (a) in accordance with the meaning of the word, Luke xii. 11; xx. 20, et al., ut supra, and (b) in accordance with the uniform statements respecting the Redeemer, that 'all power is given unto Him in Heaven and in earth' (Matt. xxviii. 18); that God has 'given Him power over all flesh' (John xvii. 2); that all things are 'put under His feet' (Heb. ii. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 27); that He is exalted over all things, Eph. i. 20-22. Having this rank, it was proper that He should speak with authority to the church at Laodicea."—E. R. C.]

Ver. 15. Thy works.—Works are of value only as indications of the character of the persons performing them. Lukewarm hearts, lukewarm works, and vice versa. [See comments on ch. ii. 2.—E. R. C.]—[That thou art neither cold nor hot (Lange: warm).]—The application to this passage of the distinction between the perfectly righteous, the perfectly unrighteous, and those occupying a middle position, is misleading; far more applicable is Dante's description of the sinners peopling that portion of Hell which lies immediately beyond the direful portal—wretches too bad for Heaven, and even for Hell; i. e., the present passage of Scripture speaks of qualitative not of quantitative things. Most certainly the warm one is he who hangs upon the Lord, for only a personal relationship of love to Jesus, and conduct actuated by that love, make warm life. Whilst De Wette and others regard ψυχρός as the antithesis to θερός, Dürstiedick, with Hengstenberg and others, justly insist that the antithesis is a vacillating middle conduct. Dürstiedick's positive definition of coldness as enmity and resistance to the Lord, such as were manifested by Saul of Tarsus, is, however, as incorrect as Hengstenberg's theory concerning a cold person who is painfully sensible of his coldness. The antitheses are: the believer—the non-believer—and in the midst, the half-believer, who in his inmost soul is already an unbeliever. [I would, etc.—"Ὅρελόν, properly the second aorist of ὀρεῖλναι, but now grown into an adverbial use (= utinam), has so far forgotten what at the first it was, as to be employed promiscuously in all numbers and persons; cf. 1 Cor. v. 8; 2 Cor. xi. 1. It governs an indicative, not an optative, here (ἵς, not εἴς, is the right reading), inasmuch as the Lord is not desiring that something even now might be, but only that something might have been. In form a wish, it is in reality a regret." TRENCH. But in what respect is a lukewarm worse than a cold condition? The author just quoted answers the question thus: "Best, I think, . . . by regarding the 'cold' as one hitherto untouched by the power of grace. There is always hope of such an one, that, when he does come under those powers, he may become a zealous and earnest Christian. He is not one on whom the grand experiment of the Gospel has been tried, and has failed. But the 'lukewarm' is one who has tasted of the good gift, and of the powers of the world to come, who has been a subject of Divine grace, but in whom that grace has failed to kindle more than the feeblest spark. The publicans and harlots were 'cold,' the Apostles 'hot.' The Scribes and Pharisees, such among them as that Simon in whose house the Lord sat and spake the parable of the fifty and the five hundred pence (Luke vii. 36-47), they were 'lukewarm.' It was from among the 'cold' and not the 'lukewarm,' that He drew recruits."—E. R. C.]

Ver. 16. The figure is unmistakably derived from the nauseating effect of lukewarm water when taken into the mouth. [The figure is indicative of most fearful woe, namely, utter rejection by Christ as loathsome.—E. R. C.] The μᾶλλον must be distinguished from a positive ἔτιον.

Ver. 17. I am rich.*—This is not, as a number of commentators suppose, to be referred to the earthly wealth of the flourishing emporium of Laodicea, though the connection between external riches and the danger of an inward conceit of riches cannot be ignored. Comp. the Old and New Testaments. The fancied wealth of spiritual goods is, therefore, the thing intended, in accordance with most commentators. ["So far as the language here is concerned, this may refer either to riches literally, or to spiritual riches. . . . It is not easy to determine which is the true sense, but may it not have been that there was an allusion to both, and that, in every respect, they boasted that they had enough?" BARNES.—E. R. C.] Note the climax: πλούσιός εἰμι, etc., [see p. 184.]

And knowest not.—This is no mere simple self-delusion; it is marked in its character, being an aggravated ignorance, over against a supposed multiplied knowledge.—That thou, even thou.—ὁ ταλαίπωρος—the wretched one, par excellence.

Ver. 18. I counsel thee.—The "dash of irony" which Ebrard discovers in this expression, may consist in the fact that Christ does not here approach the spiritualistic [spiritualistisch] indifferent in His historical authority, because such an one has loosed the bond of historical obedience. He meets him on the ground of his false liberty. If he will not obey the voice of the Lord, he must still hear the language of truth.† Perfectly analogous to this form is the further declaration: Behold, I stand at the door—a hint to the Church in her dealing with [self-] emancipated spirits [emancipirte Geister].‡

* [Trench would connect this verse with the preceding: "placing a colon at the end of ver. 16, and a full stop at that of ver. 17."—E. R. C.]

† [There is a certain irony, but the irony of Divine love, in these words. He who might have commanded, prefers rather to counsel; He who might have spoken as from Heaven, conforms himself, so far as the outward form of His words reaches, to the language of earth. To the merchants and factors of this wealthy mercantile city, He addresses Himself in their own dialect.—TRENCH. "There is a deep irony in this word. One who has need of nothing, yet needs counsel on the vital points of self-preservation." ALFORD. Is it not better, as more consistent with the character of the compassionate and long-suffering Saviour, to suppose that there is no irony here? The language, couched indeed in the commercial dialect of those addressed, is such as a loving Father, yearning over indifferent and ungrateful children, might use to win them to better things.—E. R. C.]

‡ [By this expression, Lange doubtless would indicate those who, in his own language, might better be styled (self-) emancipated spiritualists. The adjective emancipirte, when employed in certain connections, obtained the meaning of self-emancipation—thus an emancipirte Frau, is a woman who has freed herself from conventionalisms—as we say in English, a strong-minded woman.—E. R. C.]

To buy.—There can be no question of an actual purchase by a meritum de congruo; for Laodicea is poor and naked, and the thing to be procured is gold. Yet the usual Protestant idea—the church must simply surrender her self-conceit; that is the purchase-price (Vitringa, Bengel, and others)—conceals in some measure the true relation of things. Such a surrender invariably presupposes an advance toward the Saviour in penitence and self-denial.* According to Ebrard, the Lord's counsel should be followed invertedly; first, eye-salve, then raiment, then gold. There are substantial grounds, however, for the order given. The gold purified in the fire, the fidelity of faith, tested in temptation and trial (Hengstenberg, fides; à Lapide, caritas; Düsterd., spiritual good things; Ebrard, good fruits). [Is it not the righteousness of Christ, imputed to him who believes, by virtue of which the possessor becomes rich (comp. Rom. v. 15-18; 2 Cor. viii. 9)?—E. R. C.]

White garments.—Throughout the Apocalypse, these represent the victorious adornment of that righteousness of life which is based upon the righteousness of faith. Hence they are not of like meaning with the gold (Düsterd.), nor do they denote the subjective purification of the heart (Ebrard), which cannot be seen as can white garments. [May not the reference be to the entire righteousness of sanctification (holiness of heart and life) produced by the Spirit? The garments of the Saints are white within as well as without.—It may here be remarked, that it is utterly vain to expect that any one material figure should set forth a spiritual truth in all its phases.—E. R. C.]

The eye-salve, κολύριον (the classic form is κολήριον), is likewise differently explained (as the word of God, the gift of the Holy Spirit Who enlightens).

Ver. 19. Εγώ.—After the Lord's apparent self-coördination with the church, His high and sovereign personality emerges once more to view. This is the case here, however, especially in order to the expression of the fact, that His rebuke and chastening are pure love, and that His love can chasten and punish; and all this in contrast to the loose and anti-personal nature of indifferentism, which perverts love into laxity, accounts punishment as harshness, and utterly sunders the two. [Comp. Heb. xii. 5-13; Prov. iii. 12.—E. R. C.]

As many as I love.—Düsterdieck justly insists, in opposition to Vitringa, that this does not apply merely to the better portion of the church.

[I rebuke and chasten.]—The relation of ἐλέγχειν and παιδεύειν is in harmony with Christian liberty. The sinner must first suffer himself to be convicted, intellectually corrected; then grace begins to exercise an affectionate discipline over conscience and life.

* [And so it might be said, that any advance presupposes a previous advance. There must be a beginning of spiritual activity somewhere. This surrender, this giving up the tinsel and rags of one's own righteousness, is essentially involved in that living faith which rests upon Christ alone for salvation, and which is the beginning of spiritual activity.—E. R. C.]

[For a full discussion of the force of ἐλέγχειν, see Lange on John xvi. 8 (Am. Ed., pp. 472 sqq.). Trench writes that it is "more than ἐπιτιμᾶν, with which it is often joined; see my (his) Syn. of the N. T., § 4. It is so to rebuke, that the person rebuked is brought to the acknowledgment of his fault, is convinced, as David was when rebuked by Nathan (2 Sam. xii. 13)." This definition will scarce bear the test of thorough exegesis. It is manifest that in the use of the term Matt. xviii. 5; Luke iii. 19, an acknowledgment of sin is not contemplated, but the contrary. The word is one which expresses the act of an agent, and not the effect of that act upon its object; it is such a presentation of the truth as leaves the object without excuse for not believing (comp. John viii. 46; xvi. 8; 1 Cor. xiv. 24; Eph. v. 11, 13; 1 Tim. v. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 2; Titus i. 9, 13; ii. 15; Heb. xii. 5; Jas. ii. 9). The necessary consequence of rebuke thus defined may, indeed, be a dim, inchoate perception of the right, but not necessarily that completed judgment, that conviction, which involves an acknowledgment even to self; and even this perception is not necessarily contemplated in the use of the term. (In John iii. 20; viii. 9; the only other passages in which the term occurs, its use is peculiar. In the latter the man was his own rebuker—conviction preceded rebuke; in the former, the idea is somewhat similar—here a dim perception of the fact of sin leads the transgressor, instinctively, to avoid the light which will clearly manifest his unworthiness.) The term παίδειν is also too much restricted by Trench, and apparently by our author. The former writes: "Παίδειν, being in classical Greek to instruct, to educate, is in sacred Greek to instruct or educate by means of correction, through the severe discipline of love," etc. This is the meaning of the English word chasten, which was used by our translators to render the word whenever, in their judgment, the παίδεια was castigatory (1 Cor. xii. 32; 2 Cor. vi. 9; Heb. xii. 6, 7, 10; see also παίδεια in Heb. xii. 5, 7, 8, 11; and παίδευσις, Heb. xii. 9); but it is by no means the established sacred usage of the original term. That fatherly correction was not always contemplated, see Luke xxiii. 10, 23 (and perhaps 1 Tim. i. 20); that castigation was not always implied, see Acts vii. 22; xxii. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 25; Titus ii. 12; also παίδεια, Eph. vi. 4; 2 Tim. iii. 16; and παίδευσις Rom. ii. 20. An apparent force is given to the remark of Trench from the frequent recurrence of the word (and its allies) in Heb. xii., where it appears eight times out of the twenty-one instances of its New Testament use. These, however, in an exegetical point of view, constitute but one appearance. It appears in only thirteen independent passages; in three of these only do the contexts require us to limit its specific meaning to the training of castigation (Heb. xii. 5–10; 1 Cor. xi. 32; 2 Cor. vi. 9—possibly four, if we include 1 Tim. i. 20); and in seven this specific meaning is excluded by the context (see above). The classical force of the word is retained in the Scriptures. Its proper meaning is to discipline, to educate; and into this education enter all the elements of spiritual training. Παίδειν includes ἐλέγχειν. A context may, indeed, limit the education spoken of to one specific kind. In such case only have we a right to regard it as limited. In the passage under consideration, in which sin is referred to, doubtless, chastisement was contemplated; but we should not suppose that chastisement alone was in the view of the Divine speaker. This very epistle entered into the παίδεια.—E. R. C.]

[Be zealous, therefore, and repent.—"This word (ζηλεῖν), through ζήλος connected with ζῆω and thus with ζεῶς (ver. 15), is chosen as the special word of exhortation, with special reference to the lukewarmness," etc. TRENCH. "Be earnest, strenuous, ardent, in your purpose to exercise true repentance, and to turn from the error of your ways." BARNES.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 20.—This verse also makes part of the special word to Laodicea; it is not, therefore, an epilogue to the whole (Vitranga). Yet the entire proceeding here described forms a picture which closes the preceding epistles and touches upon the approaching Parousia.

The door.—Generally interpreted, the door of the heart, the knocking being referred to the word of God, the Holy Ghost, special visitations. [Compare Song of Sol. v. 2–6.—He knocks in every incident of providence—in every act of παίδεια—that produces the thought of Himself in the mind.—E. R. C.] The door of the heart however, is the personal liberty. The standing before this door is expressive of three things: 1. Christ is not in the heart of the lukewarm; 2. He recognizes the liberty of shutting Him out which the lukewarm person possesses; 3. He makes a positive assault upon that unfreeness which lies in the abuse of liberty. The Lord's knocking in the last time is a synthesis of the threatening presages of judgment and His word. According to Bengel, the promise, I will sup with him, must be understood of the earthly life; he with Me, of the heavenly. The promise, however, distinguishes in a general manner a lower and higher grade of spiritual life (Martha, Mary). Our passage has nothing to do with the figure of the Marriage; it treats of the establishment of a personal intimate relationship between Christ and the individual church, or, better, the individual soul. [Compare John xiv. 21–23.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 21. The promise, in its special greatness, certainly corresponds to the special greatness of the victory to be gained by the Laodicean (Ebrard); in its peculiar nature, however, it also forms a contrast to the destruction whence he must tear himself. According to Düsterdieck, this promise is merely the greatest and last. But as the final promise it points, with peculiar expression, to the all-embracing, consummate victorious form of the heavenly glory. Düsterdieck justly discards the distinction of different thrones of the Father and the Son (Calov.), referring to the oneness of the throne in ch. xxii. 1. [Is it not a promise of kingship in the Basileia (comp. Dan. vii. 27; Matt. xxv. 21; Luke xxii. 30; and the Excursus on the Basileia, p. 93 sqq.)?—E. R. C.]

SUPPLEMENTARY REMARKS ON THE HISTORICAL REALIZATION OF THE PROPHETIC CHURCH-PICTURES.

We wish, first of all, to establish the following points:

1. The seven epistles are by no means episcopal letters designed as an introduction to the Apocalypse: they are prophetic letters, constituting the first part of the Apocalypse itself, and forming a foundation for the whole.*

2. Hence, the life-pictures of the seven churches are not merely historical portraits of the Apostolic Church (issued through an episcopal medium, but of prophetic depth and form); they are also prophetic types of churchly conditions, which shall hold good until the end of the world.

3. Still, we should bind ourselves to the general chronological Church-historical conception of the Apocalypse if, in the succession of these pictures, we were to pretend to discover distinct periods of Church-history.†

4. Notwithstanding this, the Prophetic Spirit has, out of the synchronistic coördination of the seven Asiatic churches, indubitably made an ideal succession which, in its beginning and end, is at the same time unmistakably historical. For Ephesus is manifestly a picture of the Church toward the end of the apostolic time, whilst Laodicea pictures it as it shall be in the last time, according to the fundamental traits of that time, as predicted Matt. xxiv. 37 sqq. And thus individual attempts at exposition, conceiving of the seven churches as historical periods, may be worthy of notice; in any case, the ideal foundation, the prophetic view of a spiritual world-historical process of development, such as we have sketched above, must be retained. The attempts themselves, however, are by their disagreement characterized as mere attempts.

The construction of the Catholic Theologian Holzhauser is incorporated by Haneberg in his History of Biblical Revelation, p. 690:

1. EPHESUS: End of the apostolic age. 2. SMYRNA: Time of the martyrs. 3. PERGAMUS—Confession of faith: Time of the great Church fathers, from the fourth to the sixth century. 4. THYATIRA—Laudable condition: Time of the Church's domination, from Justinian to Charlemagne; warning (?) against worldliness—Jezebel. 5. SARDIS: Semblance of Christianity; the prevailing condition of the Church at the present time. 6. PHILADELPHIA—Destitute of exterior power, yet witnessing a faithful confession: Perhaps our immediate future. 7. LAODICEA, i. e., people's judgment: The end.

* [Are they not, on Lange's own hypothesis, both episcopal and prophetic? Episcopate, as coming from the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls (1 Pet. ii. 25) to the individual churches in Asia Minor primarily addressed; and also to those portions of the Church throughout the ages respectively prophesied concerning, through the medium of these individual churches as types.—E. R. C.]

† [We should so bind ourselves, if we pretended (or endeavored, to discover only such distinct periods. If it be recognized that all the types may be exemplified at any one time, although only one predominantly there is no such binding. Manifestly when these epistles were written, all the types existed as realities; but, almost certainly, the existing Ephesus represented the predominant character of the then extant Church. See ADDITIONAL NOTE, beginning in the following column, and paragraph 4 above.—E. R. C.]

Sander furnishes a Protestant pendant to this:

1. EPHESUS: Like Holzhauser. 2. SMYRNA: As above. 3. PERGAMUS: Period from Constantine the Great to the middle of the eighth century. 4. THYATIRA: From the middle of the eighth century to the Reformation. 5. SARDIS: Time of dead orthodoxy, from the end of the sixteenth century to about the latter half of the eighteenth. 6. PHILADELPHIA: Church of Brotherly Love, signalized by the phenomena of Pietism, Herrnhutism, Methodism. 7. LAODICEA: Picture of the final period.

We can affirm with certainty that the seven life-pictures are continued side by side through all ages of the Church; now one, and now another, predominating; one prevailing at this place and another at that. There have been illustrations of the figure of Jezebel in all ages. And were there no Philadelphia in the very last time, where would the Lord find His Bride?

[ADDITIONAL NOTE ON THE HISTORICO-PROPHETIC CHARACTER OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES.

—As to the nature of the Seven Churches, there are three (logically) possible hypotheses. I. The Historic—that they were merely seven churches in Asia Minor; II. The Prophetic—that (having no proper historic character, as existing when the Apocalypse was written), they represent merely seven ages of the Church; III. The Historico-prophetic—that they were seven churches then existing, but also typical of seven periods of Church history. The generic Historico-prophetic hypothesis is divisible into two species: 1. The simple Historico-prophetic—that merely seven prophetic periods were indicated; 2. The complex Historico-prophetic—that seven periods were indicated in which all the types should be exemplified, one exemplification however being predominant in each period, in the order indicated. There have been few, if any, supporters of the II. hypothesis; nearly all commentators who have advocated the prophetic character of the churches, have admitted that the types were realized in the churches mentioned. It is probable, also, that there are no advocates of the I., or Historic, hypothesis, who do not also admit that the seven historic churches were, in some sort, representative of churchly conditions that should be exemplified throughout all periods of the present dispensation. Thus Trench (who, in an exceedingly able Excursus at the end of his work on The Epistles to the Seven Churches, opposes the III., or what he styles the "Periodist," hypothesis, admits that 1. "These seven epistles, however, primarily addressed to these seven churches of Asia, were also written for the edification of the Universal Church;" 2. "These seven churches of Asia are not an accidental aggregation, which might just as conveniently have been eight, or six, or any other number; that, on the contrary, there is a fitness in this number, and that these seven do in some sort represent the Universal Church; that we have a right to contemplate the seven as offering to us the great and leading aspects, moral and spiritual, which churches gathered in the name of Christ out of the world will assume. . . . (But) though not exhaustive, . . . they give us on a smaller scale ὡς ἐν τμήτι, the grander and more recurring features of that life (the new life which Christ brought into the world); are not fragmentary, fortuitously strung together; but have a completeness, a many-sidedness, being selected probably for this very cause; here, perhaps, being the reason why Philadelphia is included and Miletus past by; Thyatira, outwardly so insignificant, chosen, when one might have expected Magnesia or Tralles. . . . That these churches are more or less representative churches, and were selected because they are so; that they form a complex within and among themselves, mutually fulfilling and completing one another; that the great Head of the Church contemplates them for the time being as symbolic of the Universal Church, implying as much in that mystic seven, and giving many other indications of the same." It is also probable that there are few, if any, who adopt the first species of the Historico-prophetic view, all the advocates of this generic hypothesis adopting more or less completely the second—the one designated in this note as complex. This latter specific view, is the one that will be advocated in this paper; as there is no danger of confusion it will be styled simply, Historico-prophetic.

In order to the complete establishment of this hypothesis, three points must be proved: 1. That the Seven Churches are representative of the Universal Church. 2. That they are representative of different forms of Church-life, each of which is always existent, to a greater or less degree, in every period of Church-history. 3. That they are, in their order, representative of the predominant characteristics of the Church in seven periods of her history between the writing of the Apocalypse and the second Advent of Christ.

1. The proof of the first of these points is ably set forth in the language of Trench, quoted above. The following, however, is presented as a more complete exposé of the facts upon the view of which the truth of this proposition may be concluded, viz.: The nature of the Apocalypse as a Book for the Universal Church (chs. i. 1-3; xxii. 6-20 [16]); the mention of the seven churches in immediate connection with an Introduction contemplating the Universal Church (comp. i. 1-3 with 4); the choice of the number seven (the sacred, mystic number, symbolic of completeness), when there were other, and in some instances, more prominent, churches in the geographical district; the manifest parallelism of the seven candlesticks and the seven stars, with the seven Spirits of God, ch. i. 4; iii. 1 ("the Holy Ghost sevenfold in His operations" in the Church), and with the sevenfold description of the person of Christ, ch. i. 14-16; their being symbolized by the seven-branched candelabrum of the Tabernacle (itself, doubtless a symbol of the one light-giving Church, manifold in its branches) tended by the Great High Priest, ch. i. 13; ii. 1 (see Notes); the characteristics of the respective churches which set forth every conceivable form of Church-life, each being the complement of all the others, as is each beam of the seven colored rainbow; the constant call throughout the epistles for all to hear (and heed) the things said unto the churches, a call manifestly contemplated, and in essence resumed, in the conclusion of the Book, where the address is unquestionably to the Universal Church (ch. xxii. 6-20); all these things are inconsistent with the idea that ch. i. 4-iii. 22, is an unnoted episode, in which merely seven churches (and these not, all of them, the most prominent even in their own geographical district) should have been addressed; but, on the other hand, require the hypothesis that, whilst the seven churches specified were specifically addressed, they were selected and addressed as types of Church-life then existent, and that should continue to exist until Christ should come again.

2. An a priori probability as to the truth of the second point—viz., that each of these forms typified a form existent in every period of Church history—arises from all that has been said under the preceding head. Manifestly, they were all existent, in the apostolic age, in the churches specified; and the most cursory view of history is sufficient to show that these churches have always had their analogues—in every age, there has been somewhere, a Philadelphia, a Sardis, a Laodicea.

3. The proof of the third point—viz., that the Seven Churches are, in their order, representative of the predominant characteristics of the Church in the seven periods of her history—is based entirely on observation of history. On this point TRENCH, after stating objections to the hypothesis, remarks: "But all such objections, with all those others which it would only be too easy to make, might indeed be set aside or overborne, if any marvellous coincidence between these epistles and the after-course of the Church's development could be made out; if history set its seal to these, and attested that they were prophecy indeed; for when a key fits perfectly well the wards of a complicated lock, and opens it without an effort, it is difficult not to believe that they were made for one another. But there is nothing here of the kind." He admits that "there are two or three fortunate coincidences here between the assumed prophecy and the fact. . . . Smyrna, for instance, represents excellently well the ecclesia pressa in its two last and most terrible struggles with heathen Rome; so too for such Protestant expositors as see the papacy in the scarlet woman of Babylon, the Jezebel of Thyatira appears exactly at the right time," etc. His principal objection—viz., that resemblance fails between the church of Philadelphia and the churches of the Reformation, in that the latter suffered the "open door" set before them "to so great an extent to be closed again"—is based altogether upon his own interpretation of the open door—that it was to the heathen. If by this be understood an open door to the Kingdom of Heaven (see Note on ch. iii. 8), which had been previously closed by those who made void the law of God by their traditions (comp. Matt. xxiii. 13; Luke xi. 52), the coincidence becomes no less striking than in the case of Smyrna. And if by Jezebel is understood, not the scarlet woman of the Papacy, but a world-element brought into a position of power in the Church by the unholy marriage of Church and State—in time assuming the position of a teacher and introducing heathen abominations (see Note on ch. ii. 20), the coincidence between Thyatira and the period following the union becomes more striking than as presented above.

The scheme set forth in the following paragraph, which, as to the great periods indicated, is substantially that of Vitringa, is suggested for consideration. It may here be remarked that, upon the supposition of the truth of the hypothesis, it does not necessarily follow that the different periods should have distinctly defined termini; it is rather to be expected that, like the colors of the rainbow, the characteristics of adjacent periods, manifestly distinct in their central portions, should blend into one another at each beginning and end.

EPHESUS: The Church of first love, but declining—the primitive era extending to a time between the date of the Apocalypse and the Decian persecution, A. D. 250. SMYRNA: the Church faithful in trial—the period of persecution extending from near the beginning of the third century to about A. D. 312. PERGAMUS: The Church beginning in persecution (martyrdom of Antipas), subsequently brought under the protection of the world-power (dwelling [κατοικεῖν = secure habitation] where Satan's throne is), earnest in working and faithful in the confession of essential truth, yet having those who, like Balaam, taught the world-power to seduce to heathen customs—the period beginning at the close of persecution, A. D. 312, and extending through the era of Constantine to about A. D. 700. (This was the period of Athanasius, Basil, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom; of the protests against Arianism and Pelagianism; of the first five Ecumenical Councils; and also of the introduction of pompous ceremonies and image worship, after the manner of the heathen). THYATIRA: The Church of earnest working, yet of unholy union with the world-power, in which the State itself, as an authority and a permitted teacher, established heathen rites—a period intimately connected with the former, yet in its culmination different; having its roots, indeed, in the era of Constantine, but, as a distinct period, really beginning with the transformation of alliance into marriage with the State, culminating in the era of Charlemagne, and running on until lost in the period typified by Sardis, at some time before A. D. 1200. (This was a period of great charities and extensive missionary operations in Britain and throughout northern, central and eastern Europe, and yet of unholy union with, and subjection to, the civil power. In the West, the right of patronage was developed, the right of kings to confirm and invest bishops was established, and that of the emperor to confirm the election of the Pope; in the East the subservience of the Church was still more complete. Heathenish customs, which at the first seemed to have been adopted out of compliance with the world, now became, especially in the East, a matter of state control. On the subject of image worship, Gieseler well remarks that "orthodoxy changed according to court caprice;" it was abolished by Leo Isauricus, A. D. 726-780, but restored by the infamous Irene, who, A. D. 787, summoned a Synod at Nice, which, under her authority and influence, decreed in its favor; again, under imperial authority, it was abolished, and again restored by the Empress Theodora, who, A. D. 842, instituted a yearly festival [ἡ κυριακή τῆς ὁρθοδοξίας] in commemoration of its establishment [see Gieseler's Church History, Period III. Div. 1; and Historians generally on Century VIII]. This was an extended period in which ample space was given for repentance.) SARDIS: The Church of uncompleted works, of mere ritual observances, of spiritual death; in which, however, a few living souls were found—the period blending with the spiritual declensions of the preceding, and extending through the dark ages to the Reformation. This was a period in which true religion was confined almost entirely to small and oppressed bodies, as the Paulicians, Albigenses and Waldenses. PHILADELPHIA: The faithful Church, to be preserved, before whose members was set an open door to the Kingdom—a period beginning with the "morning-star of the Reformation," near A. D. 1400, and extending in appreciable degree to the present time. LAODICEA: The outwardly prosperous, but lukewarm Church. Has not this period already begun? That this is a day of unequaled outward prosperity for the Church is acknowledged by all. Is it not also a period of lukewarmness even in Protestant lands? It is true that this is a time in which, as compared with the absolute works of former days, great schemes of Christian beneficence are in operation. Spiritual warmth, however, is to be estimated, not by the absolute amount of work performed, but by the proportion which that amount bears to ability. The existing schemes of beneficence are sustained and operated by only a portion of the nominal Church; and still further, they bear a scarce appreciable proportion to the ability even of the portion nominally engaged in them. In point of fact, are not these schemes the work of the Philadelphia which, still preserved, is embosomed within the increasing Laodicea?—E. R. C.]

* [SIR ISAAC NEWTON presented a peculiar prophetic scheme. He referred the seven churches to the times of the fifth and sixth seals, which he placed between the periods of the division of the Empire under Dioclesian, A. D. 285, and A. D. 378. All these churches, he held, were destroyed, with the exception of Smyrna and Philadelphia, which were continued as the two Witnesses of ch. xi. 3.—E. R. C.]

And round about the throne were [om. were] four and twenty [twenty-four<sup>8</sup>] seats [thrones] : and upon the seats [thrones] I saw [I saw<sup>9</sup>] four and twenty [twenty-four<sup>8</sup>] elders sitting, clothed in white raiment [garments] ; and they had [om. they had<sup>10</sup>] on their heads crowns of gold [golden crowns].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- <sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. [B* gives εἶδον.—E. R. C.]
<sup>8</sup> Ver. 4. Each time εἰκοσι τέσσαρες without kai. It is a perplexing question whether the second twenty-four is connected with the thrones or with the elders. The thrones, however, have their number from the elders—not vice versa. The rois before the twenty-four elders [with B*] would certainly be premature here. [The correct reading of this entire passage is exceedingly doubtful. The Rec. gives καὶ ἐκλήθησαν τοὺς θρόνους ὁμοιοὶ καὶ τέσσαρες καὶ ἐπὶ τοὺς θρόνους εἶδον τοὺς εἰκοσι καὶ τέσσαρας πρεσβυτέρους καθημένους. All the authorities omit καὶ before τέσσαρες in both instances, and also εἶδον. In the first sentence Lach. and Tisch., with N. and A., give θρόνους, Words, Alf., Treg., with B*, give θρόνοι. Words, Tisch., and Treg., with B*, give the second clause as the Rec., with the omission of εἶδον and kai (Treg. and Tisch., also with P., omit the second rois); Lach. and Alford, with A., read ἐπὶ τοὺς εἰς. τέσ. θρόνους πρεσ. καθ. Cod. N. omits all the words between ἐπὶ and τέσσαρες inclusive. In the judgment of the Am. Ed. the reading of N. is to be preferred: in the face of the great critical authorities on the other side, however, he cannot venture to remove this clause from the text. The reading of Tregelles (which Lango supports) is adopted in the translation.—E. R. C.]
<sup>9</sup> Ver. 4. ["All the recent editors reject εἶδον on the authority of A. B., . . . I recommend that this reading be followed, but, in order to mark the change of construction, would leave I saw in italics, as a supplement, extracted from the idov of ver. 2. See Win. § 61, 3. 1." DR. LILLIE'S Notes, etc.—E. R. C.]
<sup>10</sup> Ver. 4. The ἔρχον before ἐπὶ τ. κ. unfounded. [It is omitted by N. A. B*, P., and critical authors generally.—E. R. C.]

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 6. ["The E. V. 'beasts' is the most unfortunate word that could be imagined. A far better one is that now generally adopted, 'living-creatures;' the only objection to it being that when we come to vers. 9, 11, we give the idea, in conjoining 'living-creatures' and 'created ( $\kappa\tau\iota\sigma\acute{\iota}\varsigma$ ), of a close relation which is not found in the Greek." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 7. [" $\beta\upsilon\acute{\upsilon}\varsigma$  is not necessarily to be pressed to its proper primary meaning, as indicating the young calf in distinction from the grown bullock; the LXX. use it for an ox generally, in Exod. xxii. 1; Lev. xxii. 23; also Exod. xxix. 10, and Gen. xii. 16." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 8. The reading:  $\epsilon\upsilon \kappa\alpha\theta' \epsilon\upsilon \alpha\upsilon\tau\omega\upsilon \epsilon\chi\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota$ . [Lachmann, as Lange, Alford, and Tisch., give  $\epsilon\upsilon \kappa\alpha\theta' \epsilon\upsilon \alpha\upsilon\tau\omega\upsilon$ , with A. P.; (B\* also gives  $\epsilon\upsilon \kappa\alpha\theta' \epsilon\upsilon$ , but omits  $\alpha\upsilon\tau\omega\upsilon$ ); Wordsworth follows the Rec.,  $\epsilon\upsilon \kappa\alpha\theta' \epsilon\upsilon \alpha\upsilon\tau\omega$ ; Tregelles, with N. and Vulg., gives  $\epsilon\upsilon \epsilon\kappa\alpha\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon \alpha\upsilon\tau\omega\upsilon$ . Alf., Treg., and Tisch., with A., give  $\epsilon\chi\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota$ ; Lach. and Words., with B\*,  $\epsilon\chi\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota$ ; N. Rec. Vulg.,  $\epsilon\chi\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota$ . The readings of Treg. are adopted in the translation.—E. R. C.]

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 8. [There is great difference amongst critical editors as to the connection of  $\kappa\upsilon\kappa\lambda\omicron\delta\epsilon\upsilon$ . Treg. agrees with Rec. in connecting it with the preceding  $\pi\tau\epsilon\upsilon\gamma\alpha\varsigma \epsilon\acute{\varsigma}$ ; Lach., Words., Alford, Lillie, Tisch., with Vulg. and Lange, connect with  $\kappa\alpha\iota \delta\omicron\upsilon\sigma\theta\epsilon\upsilon$ . LILLIE thus supports the latter arrangement (Notes, etc.): "(1) Assuming  $\epsilon\chi\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota$  or  $\epsilon\chi\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota$  and  $\gamma\epsilon\mu\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota$  to be the true readings, the structure of the whole verse is simplified; (2) the other arrangement does not harmonize with the cherubic appearances before referred to, ver. 7; (3), and might have precluded the Seer's minute observation of the other features (v. 6, 7), which first caught his eye; while, (4), the construction proposed is apparently required by the  $\epsilon\mu\pi\omicron\sigma\theta\epsilon\upsilon$  and  $\delta\omicron\upsilon\sigma\theta\epsilon\upsilon$  of ver. 6; and, (5), is that adopted by Vulg., Fr., S.; Grot., Hamm., Beng., Sch., Wordsworth." Cod. B\* has, after  $\kappa\upsilon\kappa\lambda\omicron\delta\epsilon\upsilon$ ,  $\kappa\alpha\iota \epsilon\acute{\iota}\delta\epsilon\upsilon$ .—E. R. C.]

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 11. According to A. B\*, etc. [Lach., Words., Alf., Treg., Tisch., with N. A. B\*, read  $\delta\ \kappa\upsilon\iota\omicron\varsigma \kappa\alpha\iota \delta\ \theta\epsilon\acute{o}\varsigma \eta\mu\acute{\iota}\nu$  (N. prefix  $\kappa\upsilon\iota\omicron\varsigma$ , and B\* subjoins  $\delta\ \alpha\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$ ); P. gives  $\kappa\upsilon\iota\omicron\varsigma \delta\ \theta\epsilon\acute{o}\varsigma \eta\mu\acute{\iota}\nu$ . Lange translates: our Lord and our God.—E. R. C.]

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 11. [The Rec.  $\epsilon\iota\sigma\iota$  agrees with P. Lach., Words., Alf., Treg., Tisch., with N. A. B\*, give  $\eta\sigma\alpha\upsilon$ . B\* gives  $\eta\sigma\alpha\upsilon$ ; on this ALFORD remarks: "The remarkable reading  $\eta\sigma\alpha\upsilon$  is worth notice, 'by reason of Thy will they were not, and were created,' i. e., 'they were created out of nothing.' But besides the preponderance of authority the other way, there is the double chance that  $\eta\sigma\alpha\upsilon$  may have arisen from the preceding  $\sigma\upsilon$  ( $\sigma\omicron\upsilon$ ), and that it may have been an escape from the difficulty of  $\eta\sigma\alpha\upsilon$ ."—E. R. C.]

<sup>35</sup> Ver. 5. The ὡς is omitted. [So all the recent critical editors, with *N. A. B*. P.*, etc.—E. R. C.]

<sup>38</sup> Ver. 5. The clause καὶ ἰδοὺ, supported by B. [P.], etc., is also supported by the context. The Beza wishes to prepare his readers for an unexpected, great and new vision. It seems most hazardous to erase the two words. [B*, does not support the clause. It is omitted by Lachmann, Wordsworth, Alford, Tregelles, Tisch., with *N. B*. P.*, etc. A. and Vulg. give it.—E. R. C.]

<sup>42</sup> Ver. 6. The reading ἀποσπείλλόμενα has B., and the sense, in its favor. [So Wordsworth; Alford and Tischendorf read ἀποσπείλμενα, with N.; Lach. and Treg., ἀποσπείλμενοι, with A.—E. R. C.]

<sup>45</sup> Ver. 9. Against the insertion of ἡμᾶς are Cod. B. [P.], etc. Still more opposed to it is the context, for ἡμᾶς would refer to the living-beings as well as to the elders. Hence we should read αὐτοῖς in ver. 10 also, in accordance with Codd. A. B*, etc. [Lachmann, Wordsworth, Alford, and Tisch., with A., omit ἡμᾶς; Tregelles, with *N. B*. Tischendorf, with Cod. N., Amiat., Fuld., Tol., Harl., gives βασιλεύουσιν; the Vulgate (Clem.) requires βασιλεύουσιν. The weight of ancient authority seems to me to be about equally divided between the present and the future forms; the condition of those who utter the song (in heaven), together with the promise to the saints of future authority upon and over the earth, in my judgment, require the future.—E. ## EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[PRELIMINARY NOTE ON THE SYMBOLISM OF THE VISION.]

By the American Editor.

[The question—What did the Apocalypticist behold?—is one of great interest and importance. It is almost universally admitted, that he did not look upon the real Heaven and real angels. The scene he beheld was symbolic. But what is a symbol? What are the classes of symbols? What relation do they bear to the objects symbolized?]

It is not designed in this note to discuss the whole subject of Symbolism. For this, the writer does not feel himself to be, at present, prepared; neither has he time or space for so great a work. He would, however, present certain views which may prove helpful to a more thorough appreciation and understanding of the Apocalypse than at present obtains, and which also may be of use as preparatory to that complete discussion of the entire subject, which, in the not distant future, must be made.

A Symbol may be defined to be a substantial (real or apparently real) sense image of some other object. Ordinarily, in the enumeration or classification of symbols, not only are substantial objects given, but also attributives (such as acts, effects, relations, etc.), and chronological periods and numbers. These latter, for scientific purposes, are better classed as symbolic attributives, periods and numbers, contemplating under the term Symbol only substantial (real or apparent) objects.

Symbols are of two essentially distinct classes, viz.: material and visional. The former are material things, such as the Tabernacle, the Mercy-Seat, the Candlestick, and the Cherubim of the Tabernacle, the Water of Baptism, and the Bread and Wine of the Lord's Supper. Visional Symbols are those images, having the appearance of substantiality (simulacra), beheld in ecstatic vision. The latter were the objects beheld by the Apocalyptists (Daniel, Ezekiel, John), and concerning these alone is it designed, in the present note, particularly to treat. It is here proper to remark, however, that whilst scientific arrangements of these two classes of symbols based on their nature will be somewhat different, those based on a consideration of their relations to the ultimate objects represented will be precisely similar, as will appear.

As has just been hinted, Symbols may be classed on two essentially distinct principles: first, in respect of their nature; and, secondly, in respect of their relations to the ultimate objects symbolized.

The former, which, so far as the writer is aware, is the only classification that has been attempted, is exceedingly important; it is absolutely essential to a complete presentation of the subject of Symbolism. The following, adapted to meet the special views of the present writer, from Winthrop's Essay on Prophetic Symbols, pp. 16 sqq. (and therein credited to Lord's Theological and Literary Journal, Vol. III., pp. 688 sqq.), is presented for consideration.*

I. LIVING CONSCIOUS AGENTS.

1. Intelligent, (1) the Zōa, Rev. iv. 6, 8, 9; (2) Angels; (3) Men, etc.
2. Unintelligent, (1) Brutes; (2) Monster Animals.

II. DEAD BODIES, such as the slain witnesses, Rev. xi. 8–11.

III. NATURAL UNCONSCIOUS AGENTS OR OBJECTS; as the earth, the sun, the moon, stars, mountains, etc.

IV. ARTIFICIAL OBJECTS IN ORDINARY USE: as candlesticks, crowns, swords, harps, etc.

* [This table was prepared with special reference to visional symbolization. It should be noted, however, that in form it presents a classification, not of Visional Symbols themselves, but of the apparent elements thereof; by the Visional Symbol must be understood the simulacrum of

A still more important classification, however, is to be made in respect of the relations existing between the symbol and the ultimate object symbolized. The following, which does not profess to be more than tentative, is presented for consideration.

The symbols (simulacra) beheld by John and the other Apocalyptists are at once divisible into two classes: Immediate and Mediate. The former immediately represent the ultimate object contemplated, as the simulacra of Heaven, the Elders, the Angels; the latter represent the ultimate through the medium of some other object, as Christ is represented by the Simulacrum of a Lamb, and a church by that of a candlestick. This distinction is clearly implied in the narrative of John. Sometimes he wrote as though he directly beheld the ultimate objects; he saw Heaven, the Throne, and Him who sat thereon, and the Angels: and again he wrote, not as beholding the ultimate, but some object that represented it; he saw, not Jesus, not the Holy Spirit, but a Lamb representing the former, and Seven Lamps the latter. In the descriptive language of the Apocalyptist, the simulacra, which formed the common elements of the entire vision, were, so to speak, eliminated, and he wrote as though he directly beheld the things which the simulacra represented,—sometimes the ultimate object, sometimes the intermediate object that denoted the ultimate. In the former case, the eliminated simulacra were immediate; in the latter, mediate. In reference to the latter class, we occasionally find the Seer interpreting the symbol as in Rev. i. 20, “The seven stars are (i. e. represent) the Angels,” etc. This was not always done, because, generally, it was unnecessary, as in the case of the Lamb slain representing Christ. It was done, however, with sufficient frequency to indicate the law.

Immediate symbols are divisible into two orders, viz.: (1) Similar, where the form of the simulacrum corresponds with that of the ultimate, as where the simulacrum of a man symbolizes a man; (2) ideal, where the form is not an image of the form of the ultimate, but is an ideal image (not, however, a likeness of some other known object) expressive of the qualities of the ultimate, as the (probably) ideal simulacra of the angels.

Mediate symbols may be divided into three orders, viz.: (1) individual, where the simulacrum indicates an individual ultimate, as where the Lamb indicates Christ; (2) classical, where it indicates a class of individuals, substantial entities regarded as one whole, as where the simulacrum of a candlestick symbolized a church, and that of a woman, the universal Church; (3) aberrant, where the simulacrum (always apparently substantial) indicates as its ultimate, not a substantial, but an ideal entity, as where the simulacrum of a sword indicates justice; and that of a horseman, war or pestilence.

From the preceding classification we deduce five orders of symbols, which may be designated with sufficient clearness as follows: I. Immediate-similar; II. Immediate-ideal; III. Mediate-individual; IV. Classical; V. Aberrant.*

All the attributives of symbols (qualities, actions, relations to other symbols, etc.) are themselves symbolic, i. e. they represent some attributive of the ultimate object. They are of two kinds: Similar and Ideal. Similar, when some similar attributive is denoted, as where the walking, standing, speaking, of the symbol denotes that the individual symbolized walks, stands or speaks; Ideal, when something dissimilar is indicated. Thus the opening of the Seven Seals by the Lamb is Ideal; it denotes, not an actual opening of seals by Christ, but a disclosure of the previously concealed purposes of God. It may be observed that this division is analogous to the general divisions of the symbols themselves, given in the preceding foot-note. It may also be remarked that in the case of Classical and Aberrant Symbols, all the attributives are necessarily Ideal.

Numbers as applied to symbols, whilst they cannot properly be classed as attributives, have a like division. They are either Similar, denoting a like number as applied to the ultimate, or Ideal. Chronological periods may be in like manner divided.

One important fact in reference to Visional Symbolization should here be distinctly noted, as its non-recognition has resulted in much confusion. A simulacrum may immediately represent a Material symbol. Thus, for instance, in the real world, a throne is a real thing, even though it be at the same time a Material Symbol of established sovereignty. Now in the Visional symbolization of a palace and its furniture, the simulacrum of the throne would be an Immediate Symbol: it would designate a really existent substance. The throne in the palace would be a Material Aberrant symbol indicating sovereignty. The simulacrum of that throne would be a Visional Immediate symbol representing, primarily, a real throne. Such a Visional symbol, it should be remarked, would legitimately suggest that which the Material Symbol represented, and, under certain circumstances, might be designed to suggest it. From these observations it follows that a Visional Symbol may perform the double office (1) of immediately symbolizing a Material Symbol as a substance, and (2) of aberrantly representing that which the Material symbol was designed to set forth.

the thing specified therein. With certain modifications the table may be regarded as presenting a classification of Material Symbols. These are of two distinct, though parallel, orders: the first, embracing those real existences that are themselves employed as Symbols—as the lamb of sacrifice, the bread of the Lord's Supper; the second, consisting of material images (of real or ideal existences) that are thus employed—as the image of the flying fiery serpent, the Cherubim of the Tabernacle. The above table presents a complete classification of the first of these orders, in so far as it is a classification of real existences that have been employed as Symbols; it bears to the second order a relation precisely similar to that which it bears to Visional Symbols.—E. R. C.]

* [These orders may be more scientifically deduced as follows: There are four general respects in which every symbol is related to its ultimate object, viz.: as to (1) manner of representation, (2) correspondence of nature, (3) form, (4) number; and in each of these respects it must be related in one of two alternative modes. Its relation must be in view of (1) manner of representation, either Immediate or Mediate; (2) correspondence of nature, either Correspondent or Aberrant; (3) form, either Similar or Ideal; (4) number, either Individual or Classical. From a combination of these general divisions there would result, theoretically, sixteen distinct orders of symbols. Several of these, however, would

The effort will be made to apply the principles set forth in this Note in additional notes and comments throughout the remainder of the Commentary.—E. R. C.]

SYNOPTICAL VIEW.*

Chs. iv. and v.

THE SEVEN SEALS.

The Vision of the Seven Seals embraces the history of the world,† reposing upon the foundation of the Divine counsel and government. This history is represented in its constant gravitation toward the end. It is, on the one hand, in its fearful form, the riddle of all riddles, a book sealed seven-fold; but, on the other hand, unsealed by the Lamb of God, by Christ and the spirit of His cross, it appears as the foundation of the Church's history, as the history of the Kingdom of God [Church]. Its Sovereign Ruler is the Rider on the white horse,‡ behind Whom the other terrible horsemen must ride as esquires. It is thus dynamically governed by the Christian idea or, rather, the personal Christ; its object being the renewal of mankind by the connection of all human suffering with the redemptive crucial suffering of the Lamb. The Lamb, as It had been slain, is the central Personality, in the infinite life-giving operation of Its central suffering. As is the relation of the Logos to the world, of Christ to the human and spiritual world, so is the relation of Christ's suffering to all the sufferings of humanity, down to the very depths of Sheol [Hades]. Accordingly, the vision, in respect of the celestial foundation which it constitutes, is the archetype of the world's history—not its precursive counterpart, in accordance with Jewish ideas. See Düsterdieck, p. 211. The picture of the world's history, again,—especially its history in New Testament times—ch. vi., is the foundation of external Church history, in respect of its eschatological bearings; whilst the Church, in respect of its inner relations as exhibited in the seven Churches, is the ideal præsumptio of world-history. On the seven seals rest be impossible of realization. Thus a symbol at once Aberrant (i. e. differing in nature from its object) and Natural (i. e. similar in form) is inconceivable. And of those that are possible of realization, several have no exemplification in the Scriptures. The five orders given above (all of which are exemplified in the Apocalypse) are here reproduced, an enumeration of the general divisions to which each belongs being given in the parenthesis.

I. Immediate-similar (Immediate, Similar, Correspondent, Individual).

II. Immediate-ideal (Immediate, Ideal, Correspondent, Individual).

III. Mediate-individual (Mediate, Ideal, Correspondent, Individual).

IV. Classical (Mediate, Ideal, Correspondent, Classical).

V. Aberrant (Mediate, Ideal, Aberrant, Individual).

† [If by world is meant the present æon or dispensation, extending to the Second Advent and the complete establishment of the Basileia, this statement is manifestly true, since the seventh seal includes the trumpets and the via. If, however, by world is contemplated the earth, as the scene of life and activity, the statement cannot be accepted. See Introduction by the American Ed. also Lange on ch. i. 1, p. 156.—E. R. C.]

‡ [For other interpretations of the Rider on the white horse, see Comm. on ch. vi. 2, p. 171.—E. R. C.]

§ [Lange reproduces this term from the Latin. As there was no German word that could express his idea, it is hardly possible that an English term can be found.—E. R. C.]

the seven trumpets; on these, the seven thunders, and against these last, the opposition of the seven-headed dragon rears itself, calling forth, in its turn, with its two seven-headed [?] Antichristian organs, the seven anger-vials of judgment; the vials of anger being, as the end of the old world, the preliminary condition of the new.

The effort to decide whether John beheld the whole series of visions in an unbroken succession, or whether prophetic sight ceased between the individual visions, and he set down by parcels that which he had seen only in part (Bengel and others), is the result of a rather literal conception of the Apocalypse. The latter view overlooks the grand unity of the vision in its totality, a unity which is even distinctly expressed in chap. i., and without which the lively connection of the whole could be comprehended only through the assumption of immediate inspiration. On the other hand, the opposite theory ignores the freedom of the symbolic expression; in accordance with which the conception, given in its fundamental outlines on one Sunday, might be further developed in, with and amid its setting forth in writing, being continually accompanied by prophetic evidence.*

The sublime Heaven-scene of chs. iv. and v., introduced by the words, μετὰ ταῦτα εἶδον, is the type of all subsequent Heaven-scenes. And like the rest, it is, as a Heaven-picture, the preliminary condition of the earth-picture; in the sense, that is, of an absolute Providence of the Personal God—a Providence overruling the progress and development of freedom in the world, in their human and demonic aspects, in the night of light and right (Urim and Thummim), in order to the carrying out of judgment to the victory of salvation.

Single Features of the Heaven-Scenes.

The Open Door in Heaven is the full unfolding of the Apocalyptic revelation even unto its deepest heavenly foundation. In the first stage of vision, Christ came to the Seer on earth, clarifying the condition of the Seven Churches, already historically familiar to John, into a type of all future fundamental forms of the Church. In this new stage of vision, Christ transports John to Heaven itself:—this higher power of vision is signalized by the words: Immediately I was in the spirit.

The Thrones of God needs no explanation: it denotes the absolute firmness of His government.† He sits upon the Throne—an ex-

* [It is somewhat difficult to determine from this passage what view Lange adopts. The most natural hypothesis seems to be that John beheld the visions like the unfoldings of a panorama (see the frequent recurrence of the phrase μετὰ ταῦτα εἶδον, ch. iv. 1; vii. 1, 9; xv. 5; xviii. 1; xix. 1, and similar expressions through the Book); and that he wrote as he beheld, or in the possible intervals of vision (see ch. x. 4, where it is recorded that after hearing the thunders, he was about to write, but was forbidden). The latter part of this hypothesis is not inconsistent with the idea that, after the completion of the entire vision, he wrote at leisure a full account of what he had seen and heard, on the basis of the notes he had previously taken.—E. R. C.]

† [See PRELIMINARY NOTE on p. 145 seq., especially the concluding paragraph on p. 145.]

[Is not this symbol, primarily, significant of a Throne in Heaven—some glorious seat in the Heaven of Heavens where Jehovah specially manifests His glory? Secondly, it is indicative not merely of the "firmness" of the Government of God, but of the fact thereof. The Throne—the visible seat pression of His glorious assurance of victory. He sits upon the Throne as the Unique One, the Mystery of mysteries; and yet recognizable as the exalted Personality. He is also more particularly characterized by His symbolic appearance. The jewels, as such, denote the most noble life, light and imperishability in one. If we suppose the sardius, as the carneian, the flesh-colored stone, to be expressive, not of the divine penal righteousness—indicated by the hue of fire—but of God's eternal relation to humanity through Christ, it is probable, that the jasper is significant of the Divine Essence in the abstract, in its symbolical appearance everywhere manifest as essential light; and according to this, the diamond,* and not the ordinary jasper, is undoubtedly intended.

The Rainbow, whose arch surrounds the Throne, is indicative of the fundamental tone of God's government; judgment issuing in salvation—covenant faithfulness, an attribute previously expressed by the rainbow of Noah. Amongst the colors of this rainbow, emerald [green] is pre-eminent; and it is to this that it is likened [ch. iv. 3]; Divine promise demands human hope.

The Occupant of the Throne is immediately surrounded by the twenty-four Elders, the ideal representatives of the Old and New Testament Theocracy, human spiritual princes; in respect of their symbolical number;† representing the ramifying foundations of the Old and the New Covenant in the adornment of their heavenly perfection—clothed in white raiment; and by their golden crowns—the sign of their imperishable royal freedom [and authority], won by surrender to God—attested in God as His heroes (Israel=combatant of God).

Before the Throne the whole governance of God is manifest. His alternate operations are lightnings, and voices, and thunders; lightnings of heavenly wonders, forming epochs on the earth; voices, in which the fundamental idea of these lightnings becomes manifest; and far-reverberating thunders, as periods of the rejuvenescence, extension and development of the Kingdom of God [Church].

These operations are conditioned, however, by the Seven flaming Lamps [Torches] before the Throne, the Seven Spirits of God, as Fundamental Forms of the personal and permanent Life-Revelation of God in His Logos or the eternal

Christ, or as the Seven Fundamental Forms of the revelation of the Holy Spirit (see Is. xi.)*

In pursuance of this manifestation of God, the ideal world is spread out before His Throne;—a sea, clear like crystal; infinitely swelling and agitated life; yet in its appointedness harmonising with the Divine will—as in crystal life is fixed and transparent, like light; infinite liberty in infinite appointedness.

The foundation of the operations of God in the moral kingdom before the Throne are the four Life-forms (beasts) [Living-beings] about the Throne; the four Fundamental Forms of Divine Governance in the universal world generally—also in the creatural world.† For the number of the world is four; the number of the Kingdom of God is seven (see below, on the four beasts [Living-beings]). These Life-forms are full of eyes before and behind (as also within and without, see ver. 8). That is, the Divine Governance is a thoroughly conscious rule; an absolute looking back upon the foundations and events of life, an absolute looking forward to the aims of life and their preliminary conditions; a perfect insight into the profoundest vital causes, as well as a perfect outlook upon the uttermost vital phenomena. A figure of omniscience in its undying motion over the world, in the consciousness of the Divine Governance. The lion appears in this figure as the mighty governance which overcomes all things, the dynamical principle in its irresistible forth-breakings. The bullock or ox appears as the principle of all sacrifice in the world, the principle of suffering in the creatural life (monstrously perverted into a conflict for existence). The human face represents the principle of humanity, relatively pervading the whole world; this Life-form is expressive of the concentration of the infinite in a likeness of the most conditioned finite life. The flying eagle appears as that ideal tendency toward some central sun which not only pervades the planets and comets, but is expressed in the motion of our sun itself; that tendency which is the mystery of all motion—a mystery manifested in its most peculiar essence in the higher tendency of the spirit-world toward the Sun of all life (I go to the Father). In a more general sense, however, motion is the property of all four Life-forms [Living-beings]. Each has six wings; for six is the number of restless activity in Heaven, of restless labor on earth, of restless self-frustration in the abyss. Hence it is said: the beasts [Living-beings] have no rest day and night. Their non-repose, however, consists in the festal work of glorifying God. They glorify Him as the thrice Holy One, Who preserves the purity of His own personality, and works unto purification in all His providential operations throughout the creatural and spiritual world. As the Holy One, He is the All-Ruler, Who repels every temptation to an impersonal line of conduct. And at the same time He is Jehovah (Who was, etc.), Whose covenant faithfulness aims in all ages at the establishment in love of a pure life-kingdom of personal beings.

Now follows the representation of an antipathy of the Sovereign—is the symbol of established government. On earth Jehovah now governs, and the fact becomes evident to those who wisely consider; but it is not patent: it is in measure hidden beneath the veil of what we style the laws of nature. In Heaven, however, it is immediately manifest that He upholds those laws, and governs in, and through, and above them.—E. R. C.]

* [So also Ebrard conjectures. Wordsworth thus writes: "The Jasper (says Victorinus) is like water; the Sardine is like fire: and thus these stones seem to represent God's Majesty and Justice as seen in His judgments—that of the flood, and that of the fire of Sodom and of the Last Day. Or, rather, the union of these two colors; the one of a brilliant and lively hue; the other of a deeper, fiery and darker hue, may perhaps be designed to symbolize the union of Mercy and Glory, with Justice and Majesty in the Godhead, especially in the Gospel dispensation (Rom. iii. 26). Similarly there is a combination of brightness and fire in Ezekiel's Vision (Ezek. i. 4), which also displays the Rainbow (i. 28)."—E. R. C.]

between the beasts [Living-beings] and the Elders. The beasts [Living-beings] have the initiative; for the adoration of the human spiritual princes, the Elders, rests upon the Fundamental Forms of the Divine rule in the world; that Divine Governance which actually redounds to the praise and glory and thanks of Him that sitteth upon the Throne, Who liveth for ever and ever. The Elders fall down before the Throne in humility and reverence, and worship; they cast their crowns at God's feet as a sign that unto Him alone belongs honor, and utter their doxology. It agrees with the doxology of the beasts [Living-beings], with the exception that in the case of the Elders we have δυναμς instead of ειχαριστία, thanksgiving resolving itself into a glorification of the Divine almighty power. But the Elders further give the reason of their praise, and it is noteworthy that they speak of an ideal existence of things preceding the actual creation of them.

This vision of God's glory in His government of the world constitutes the general basis of the special vision of the world's history. The history of the world is embraced in a book-roll [scroll] in the hand of God; the leaves of which are sealed with seven seals. The book [scroll] must, doubtless, contain seven leaves; otherwise all the seals would of necessity be loosed at once.* At every new leaf of the roll, a fresh seal is encountered; but if the leaf be unrolled, it is found to be written upon both sides. Thus, in God's sight, the history of the world is complete, like a book [scroll]. Its course is septenarian, for its design is holy. But it is a sealed book [scroll]; its whole contents are made up of perplexing and disturbing enigmas. And no being is able to unravel this fearful history, to throw light on the gloom-enwrapped fate of the world. None in the angelic world is able to do this, none in the human world, none in the world of departed souls. Not one can so much as try to look upon the book, to examine whether he can open it. The cry of the strong angel is not simply dramatic; it must be made evident that no spiritual power would have solved the riddle of the world's history, if Christ had not solved it with His cross.

And I wept much, says the Seer. A simple yet sublime expression of the feeling and thought of what the world's history would be, had not Christ's cross and victory unveiled it.† The weeping Seer is comforted by one of the Elders (for the redemption belongs to humanity), who points him to the glorious victory of Christ (ch. v. 5). The cross must, of course, be perfected in the resurrection; the Lamb that was apparently overcome must be manifested as the triumphant Lion, for only thus might He loose the seals of the world's history. As the Lion of Judah, Christ possessed the lion nature in the highest sense, as the Master of self-denial and self-conquest (Gen. xlv. 83, 84); and the depths of His royal essence are expressed in the announcement that He is the Root of David, the truly real fundamental idea and fundamental impulse of Davidic glory in the centre of humanity.* This Root is significant of the deepest human cause of life; this Lion denotes the most spiritually mighty human appearance. Then the new wondrous vision within a vision is prefaced by the words: I beheld, and lo!

In the midst of the Throne, i. e., directly in front of God, surrounded by the circle of beasts [Living-beings], and by the circle of Elders, there appears a Lamb, as it had been slain—the Man, with the lineaments of absolute patience and the traits of mortal suffering—suffering surmounted, it is true, yet in its effects enduring forever. The attributes of the Lamb, symbolically defined, are seven horns, the sum of holy powers (Matt. xxviii. 18), and seven eyes, the seven Spirits or spiritual manifestations of the one Spirit of God, which are continually going forth from the Lamb into the world. This apparition comes and receives the book [scroll] from the right hand of God. Two things are indicated here: first, the self-presentation of the Lamb upon the summons of the angel; secondly, the fact that He is really to loose the seals. And hence the grand chorus of praise is not postponed until after His action. In reference to His work, the Elders need not await the doxology of the Divine powers of the world. A new song bursts forth from beasts [Living-beings] and Elders in one grand unison. This song relates to the new creation, the redemption. The redemption [Erlösung] is the loosing [Lösung] of all seals, and the Redeemer [Erlöser] alone is worthy to perform this work. The beasts [Living-beings] and Elders base their praise upon the Redeemer's death on the cross (slain), and the effects of that death. He thereby out of all peoples bought a people for God, the New Testament people of the peoples, making of them a Kingdom of Priests who, in dynamical operation, even now, in all their yielding, nay, by means of the same, reign on earth. This song of praise in the centre of the heavenly congregation, is echoed in a grand antiphony betwixt the angelic world, on the one hand, and the creature world, on the other. The doxology of countless angel hosts, forming the remoter circle round the beasts [Living-beings] and Elders, comes first. Their homage is sevenfold, in harmony with the holy throng. The worship of the creatures is fourfold, in accordance with the number of the world. We have here an antiphonal song of praise from all beings, reminding us of Ps. cxlv.

* Not necessarily. A roll might receive seven seals on either of the flat ends, each seal holding together the edges of a number of the revolutions of the parchment. In such case all the seals would be visible, and any one might be broken without breaking the others. Of course, in the unrolling, the seal nearest to the circumference would have first to be broken, and so on toward the centre. Nor would there be any difficulty in reading such a roll, written within and without, if the writing were in transverse columns, from edge to edge—the entire scroll being turned (longitudinally) when the bottom edge was reached. In this case the portion read would have to be re-rolled in one hand, as the unread portion was unrolled in the other.—E. R. C.]

† Does not the explanation take for granted that the Seer understood something of the future history before the unrolling? Alford's explanation, in which he agrees with Lyra, seems to be better: "It had been promised to him, ch. iv. 1, that he should be shown future events; and now it seemed as if this promise were about to be frustrated by the lack of one worthy to open the Book, . . . and his tears burst forth in the earnestness of disappointed desire after the fulfillment of the promise."—E. R. C.]

* [See on ch. v. 5, p. 167—E. R. C.]

In a didactical aspect, the song is expressive of the fact that the effect of Christ's triumph pervades the entire world of spirits, on the one hand, as an extension of His glory (Eph. i.; Phil. ii.); and that, on the other, it ushers the whole creatural world into the process of glorification, to be consummated in the Palingenesia (Rom. viii.). The four Life-forms or beasts [Living-beings] can only say Amen to this, for therein is the effort of their governance fulfilled. But for the Elders this blissful contemplation is an incentive to unutterable prostration and worship.

EXPLANATIONS IN DETAIL.

Ch. iv. 1. Compare the introductory remarks by Dürstcrdieck, p. 211. Especially the distinction between the Jewish view of the heavenly preludes (a Divine council with the angels) and the Christian idea. Also the difference of the formulas: μετὰ ταῦτα εἶδον καὶ εἶδον.*

On the disputed question as to whether John always beheld and wrote down the visions separately, see above [p. 147]. The literal conception is pressed on either side.

[After these things.—The reference here is to the order of the visions. It does not necessarily follow that the events symbolized were to be subsequent to those previously set forth.—E. R. C.]

[I saw, "not I looked, as in the E. V; not the directing of the Seer's attention, which discovers the door to him, but the simple reception of the vision which is recorded." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

A door set open in Heaven.—Explanations: Heaven is conceived of as a palace; as a Temple; as the Palace of God (Dürstcrdieck). In accordance with the connection, however, the door here denotes the disclosure of the highest revelation, and, hence, the insight of John (De Wette). The voice is expressive of the heavenly inspiration and legitimation of this view. It distinguishes the real ecstasy of the Seer from an enthusiastic and fanatical exaltation.

[Set open.—"Observe here the perfect participle, the door had been opened and was standing open. The veil of the heavenly Holy of Holies had been removed by Christ (Heb. x. 19, 20), and Heaven was laid open to the view." WORDSWORTH.—E. R. C.]

[The Apocalyptist saw Heaven, i. e., he saw an Immediate symbol thereof. As to the fact that Heaven is a place, there should be no doubt. It is, indeed, unquestionable that the term Οὐρανός is sometimes employed to denote the sky, as in Matt. xvi. 2, 3, and sometimes so used as to be consistent with the idea of a mere state, but it is also again and again employed in the didactic Scripture, as indicating a glorious and blessed place, where God specially manifests His glory, to which the Saviour ascended after His resurrection, and which is to be His abode until His second appearing in glory. (Comp. Acts i. 10, 11; iii. 21; vii. 55, 56; Rom. x. 6; 2 Cor. xii. 2; 1 Thess. iv. 16, etc. See also the Excursus on Hades, p. 364.) It can scarce be supposed, however, that the symbolic display of the vision took place in this central home, this Holy of Holies, of the universe. This supposition is not required, as some may suppose, by the language. It is manifest that, throughout the Book, the Seer employs similar expressions where the object of vision was not the thing described, but a simulacrum thereof, as in ch. xiii. 1, where he declares that he "saw a beast rise up out of the sea." And still further, precisely the same form of expression is employed, Rev. xxi. 1 ("I saw a new Heaven and a new earth"), when the real objects referred to were not, at the time of the vision, existent—all that he could then have beheld were their simulacra.

But was the symbol similar or ideal? On this point it is impossible to speak with certainty; and, perhaps, it is improper in any degree to speculate. It may be remarked, however, that it by no means follows (as some seem to suppose) from the fact that the complex symbol beheld by John resembled the Tabernacle as to form and arrangement, that it must have been purely ideal. On the contrary, it is not improbable that the Tabernacle—the earthly dwelling-place of Jehovah, fashioned by Moses after the pattern shown him in the Mount (Ex. xxv. 40; xxvi. 30)—may have been a material symbol of the Heavenly Temple, not only Immediate, but, so far as the earthly can resemble the heavenly, similar.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 2. Immediately I was in the spirit.—Ἐνθέως, without a conjunction, forcibly expresses the instantaneous translation of the Seer, thus denoting a high enhancement of the first stage of visionary sight. The text, therefore, forms a new step in comparison with the first I was in the spirit, ch. i. 10.* The prototypes of this visionary celestial Throne-picture, 1 Kings xxii. 19; Is. vi.; Ezek. i.; Dan. vii. 9, have been perverted by the Jews into monstrous allegories. See Dürstcrdieck, p. 214, the extract from the Pirke, R. Elieser, as given by Schöttgen. "A dextera ipsius est vita, a sinistra mors." This recalls a kindred idea of Milton's.

The ὁράων ἐκείνο is interpreted in a variety of ways (breadth of the Throne, Bengel; its resting upon the cherubim (!), Hengsten.) The fact of its establishment in the highest sense is doubtless enwrapped in the κείοντα.†

* [The passages in Dürstcrdieck specially referred to are as follows:

"On comparing the description, ch. iv., with Rabbinical conceptions, such as Mere Nevoch, II. 6; 'Non facit Deus quicquam, donec illud intuitus fuerit in familia superiori', and Schir Hashchirim R. fol. 93; 'Non facit Deus quicquam, nisi aulea de eo consulerit cum familia superiori' (in Wetstein), we can not overlook the essential difference consisting in the fact that the Johannine view is a pure development of Old and New Testament fundamental truths, whilst the Rabbinus had but a corruption of those truths (contrary to Wetst., Eichh., Heinr., Ew., et al.). For the familia superior, which is represented by the Rabbinus as taking part in the council of God, has, according to John, but to worship God and to magnify the counsel together with the works of God; and the visions beheld by John, in which the things to come are prefigured to him, being in the spirit, are by no means that heavenly prelude of earthly events which the Rabbinus conceive of (comp. Wetst.: 'Ex mente Judæorum, quæ in terris cœntur sunt, in cœlo eorum consensu angelorum prius manifestantur atque representantur')."

"The formula μετὰ ταῦτα εἶδον marks the beginning of a new vision, and that a greater or more important one (chs. vii. 1, 9; xv. 5; xviii. 1), whilst the formula καὶ εἶδον introduces the manifold individual features which present themselves in the course of a greater main picture (v. 1, 6, 11; vi. 1, 5, 8, 9, 12; viii. 2, 13, et al.)."—E. R. C.]

† [See foot-note,† p. 147.—E. R. C.]

Upon the Throne One sitting.—Not an indefinite designation, but an expression of the loftiest mystery. The Jewish dread of uttering the name of Jehovah (Ewald and others) can hardly have any application here, since the Seer has several times given utterance to that name in a developed form. Herder's explanation is irrelevant: "the soul has no image, language no word whereby He may be called." According to Düsterdieck and some elder commentators, He who sits upon the Throne is not the Triune God, but the Father. This is a misapprehension of the symbolical nature of the distinctions. [May there not be an allusion here to a visible Manifestation of the Glory and Presence of Jehovah similar to the Shekinah, which, in the Tabernacle, beamed from the Mercy-seat (the Throne), from between the Cherubim? For comments on the Throne, see p. 147.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 8. Like a jasper stone.—See the Introduction, pp. 20, 21 [and also p. 148]. The true jasper is sometimes greenish, sometimes of a reddish hue, but not τιμωτάτος and κρυστάλλινον, as this jasper is described, ch. xxi. 11. Hence those exegetes who apprehend the word as expressive either of the ordinary jasper, or of a peculiar and unknown sort, are justly opposed by those who are of opinion that the diamond is intended. See Düsterdieck, pp. 216, 217. Compare likewise the various interpretations of the stones as there given.

And a rainbow.—It is a mooted question whether the iris is to be apprehended as a rainbow, or merely as a bow; whether it encircled the Throne vertically or horizontally. As the light of the sun is refracted in its journey toward the earth, so the refraction of absolute Light can be conceived of only in its direction toward the world, i. e., toward the Seer primarily. Yet the bow, as a bow, can appear only in a vertical form. Green, the color of promise, is a dominant color even in the real rainbow, and it is not without reason that Ebrard (p. 222) and others have apprehended it as forming an antithesis to the hues of the precious stones which denote attributes of the Divine Essence itself. It is not indicated, however, that this circular radiance has its origin in the lustre of the jewels. It is possessed of an independent symbolical meaning; the revelation of God in the world is always, conditionally, at the same time a concealment. A tempering of the Divine radiance (Zülig) lies in the colored appearance of the Divine manifestation, whether a pillar of fire, a pillar of cloud, or a cloud is the instrument of presenting the highest glory to the gaze of imperfect human beings. The bow can, of course, be no true rainbow, since the most sublime refraction of light is intended here; though it cannot be concluded that John had a distinct idea of a heavenly ether in contra-distinction to the grosser atmosphere of earth.

[“The rainbow, composed by the joint influences of shower and sunshine, is an emblem of Divine severity, blended with Divine love; a symbol of the dark shower of Divine judgment illumined by the bright beams of Divine Mercy. Comp. the vision of Ezekiel, i. 28. The Bow is a record of the deluge, in which the world was drowned for sin, and speaks of sunshine after storm; and of the Divine Promise that the world should never more be destroyed by water; and yet it is also a silent memento of another judgment (see Gen. ix. 13–16, and 2 Pet. iii. 7.” WORDSWORTH. The iris is but the manifestation of the different hues which perfect light assumes when in connection with gross matter. Since perfect light is the highest symbol of the Divine Excellence, what so significant of that excellence in its relation to the creature world (disintegrated, so to speak, into what we style different attributes) as the many-colored rainbow? Alford is of opinion that the entire bow was green—the shape, and not the prismatic coloring, being indicated by the term rainbow.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 4. Twenty-four thrones.—According to De Wette, the twenty-four thrones must be conceived of as “a few degrees lower” than the Throne of God. If we bring earthly ideas in play here, “a few degrees” would not be sufficient to indicate the distinction. The definition of the twenty-four Elders is an index to the ecclesiastical and theological stand-points of the different exegetes; they have been interpreted as follows: cardinals (Lyra); priests (Alc.); pastors (Calov.); true heads of the Church, and pastors (Vitringa); the crown of the human race (Herder the humanist); angels (Hofmann)—in accordance with an exaggerated Angelology. Rinck similarly; Old Testament dignities ([Würden=digitaries?] Beng.); New Testament martyrs (Eichhorn); half, representatives of teachers, half, representatives of hearers (Volkmar; not quite democratic enough, since the hearers must necessarily preponderate over the clergy). The number of the Elders being composed of twice twelve, Bleek and others have groundlessly regarded it as indicative of a twofold representation of Jewish and Gentile Christians. Ebrard justly remarks, in opposition to this view, that such a division has no Biblical foundation; whilst Düsterdieck, on the other hand, erroneously cites ch. vii. 4, 9, in support of the same opinion, though the real antithesis in the passage quoted is—not Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians, but—the Church Militant, and the Church Triumphant. Yet Düsterdieck himself gives the preference to the preponderant interpretation of many commentators, according to whom the twenty-four Elders represent the Old and New Testament Church, or the Twelve Patriarchs of Israel, and the Twelve Apostles. De Wette shows a thorough misapprehension of the symbolism employed, in insisting upon the unworthiness of individual Patriarchs. And thus an adverse argument has been founded upon the names of the Twelve Apostles, ch. xxi. 14. In perfect analogy with this symbolism is the fact that the conquerors on the sea of glass sing “the song of Moses and the song of the Lamb.” By this, as well as by the twenty-four Elders, the complete harmony of the Old and the New Covenant is expressed. The fact that Jehovah is immediately surrounded by Elders, entirely corresponds with the symbolical significance of the theocratic Presbytery. The Elders represent the purest, richest, and ripest spirits in their Divine likeness and their acquaintance with the counsel of God. In this idea originated the Talmudistic Judaistic accounts of the Elders before the Throne of God (see Hengst., p. 270; Düsterd., p. 219).

[Düsterdieck thus writes: "The twenty-four Elders whom John sees sitting on the thrones which are placed around the Throne of God are the celestial representatives of the whole people of God, just as in Isaiah xxiv. 23, Elders (Ancients) are conceived of as the earthly heads and representatives of the whole Church."* This view, which is confirmed by a comparison of Deut. xxxi. 28 with 80, does not exclude, but confirms, the further idea that the representative Elders were also (individually) chief Rulers in the Kingdom of God. The idea of superiority in rule was distinctly recognized by Jesus (see the EXCURSUS ON THE BASILEIA ii. 2 (4), p. 99). The fact that these Elders are Rulers is set forth by their sitting on thrones and wearing crowns (see below). The suggestion of Barnes in explanation of the number of the Elders is worthy of consideration, viz.: that it was in reference to the twenty-four courses of the Jewish Priesthood (see 1 Chron. xxiv. 3-18). On this view the twenty-four Elders are not only Superior Kings, but the Chief Priests, the Heads of the priestly courses of the glorified Israel.†—E. R. C.]

* [Düsterdieck also quotes, as bearing upon the passage cited from Isaiah, the following passages quoted by Schöttg. and Hengst. from Tanchuma (fol. 48): "Tempore futuro Deus S. B. gloriam senioribus tribuit. Dixerunt quoque Rabbin nostri: Faciet illis Deus S. B. consensum seniorum suorum." Also the following in reference to Dan. vii. 9: "Tempore futuro Deus S. B. sedebit et Angeli dabunt sellas magnatibus Israelis, et illi sedent. Et Deus S. B. sedet cum senioribus tanquam princeps senatus et iudicabit gentes."—E. R. C.]

† [In the Additional Comments above, the Am. Ed. has written as adopting the generally accepted view that the Elders belong to the glorified Church. He would, in this place, deferentially suggest for consideration another hypothesis. The evidence for the current view rests solely on the formerly accepted text of the doxology in which the Living-beings and the Elders are represented as uniting (ch. v. 10, 11). Criticism has shown that, in this instance, the text of the Receipt is specially corrupt; it has established the fact, that the ἡσας and βασιλευσάντων of ver. 10 are corruptions of αἰσῶν and βασιλευσάντων (or βασιλεύοντων), and has rendered probable (certain in the opinion of Lange, Alford and Tischendorf) the further fact, that the ἡσας of ver. 9 is an interpolation. It is well nigh certain (from textual criticism alone) that the doxology was raised in view of the general fact of redemption, and not of the personal redemption of those who united in it—that it affords no evidence that any who joined in its utterance were themselves the subjects of redemption. Apart from this doxology, there is no evidence that the Elders were in any way connected with the Church; on the contrary, all the indications of the Apocalypse are opposed to the idea. Although they are several times mentioned, it is never as representing the redeemed, as being amongst them, or as joining in their hallelujahs. When they are represented as sitting on thrones, the souls of the martyrs—certainly the noblest portion of the redeemed, even if that throng were not intended to represent the whole body of the saved—were beneath the altar (comp. chs. iv. 4 with vi. 9). And where, if not amongst the martyrs, are the Princes of the glorified Israel to be sought? When the great multitude of the redeemed stood before the Throne and raised their hallelujah, the Elders stood, not with them, but with the Living-beings and the Angels, offering a separate worship and uniting in a separate hymn of praise (ch. vii. 9-12). On this august occasion one of the Elders is represented as addressing the Beer, not as a representative of the glorified Host, but as a spectator of their glory; and as a mere spectator (he spoke of them, not of us), he gave information concerning their past and future history (ch. vii. 13-17). In the doxology that burst forth from the Living-beings and the Elders immediately on the announcement of the complete establishment of the Kingdom of the Messiah on earth, there was no allusion to any personal participation in the rewards that should be bestowed on (human) prophets and saints (ch. xi. 16-18). Again, when the Lamb at the head of the hundred and forty-four thousand

The white robes and golden crowns are not merely symbols of the martyrs or confessors in the narrower sense; they are expressive of perfect righteousness of life in its negative and positive aspects. [The crowns, doubtless, are significant of their kingly authority (see above; also additional comment on ch. ii. 11).—E. R. C.]

Ver. 5. And out of the Throne go forth lightnings.—[See SYNOPTICAL VIEW, p. 148.—E. R. C.] According to Düsterdieck, the lightnings, voices and thunders symbolize the omnipotence of God, especially that almighty power which is exercised in judgments (similarly Hengstenberg [also Alford and Barnes.—E. R. C.]). This interpretation is connected with the one-sided apprehension of the precious stones as symbolizing the essence of God. This too special interpretation contrasts with the too general explanation of De Wette. "In ver. 5 the mighty and vital influence of God over nature is represented; in vers. 6-8 nature itself, or the realm of the living, is symbolized in the four cherubim; in vers. 9-11, finally, the harmony of creation and redeemed humanity is represented; and thus God, in His living activity and reality, is exhibited" (De Wette). Similarly Ebrard, who describes God's Throne as a "laboring, effervescent volcano."*

On theocratic ground the lightnings are still less a purely terrific conception than in the Scandinavian-Germanic mythology (the hammer of Thor). With reference to the lightnings of Sinai, comp. Deut. xxxiii. 2, 8. The Coming of the Son of Man shall be like a mighty flash of lightning. Thus the lightnings of the whole New Testament manifestation are for the defence of the faithful people of God, being terrible only to His foes, Zech. ix. 14. They are, therefore, wonders of revelation [Divine manifestation?—E. R. C.]

The history of Christ's Baptism and Transfiguration demonstrates that voices are a sequence, in definite ideas and truths, of Divine revelations—revelations of salvation, in particular; in general, they are the first of the Divine forms of revelation. Even God's voices, His revelation truths, have a judicial as well as an evangelical side, Gen. iii. 10.

The last remark applies equally to the thunder. This denotes the grand effect of revelation [Divine manifestation] in judgment and deliverance. Thus the typical redemption of Israel was effected by a mighty thunder which, at the same time, brought stood on Mount Zion (where should the Princes of Israel have been but with that company?), the Elders and the Living-beings stood apart by the Throne, and before (not by) them the new song of the redeemed was sung (ch. xiv. 1-5).

The writer would ask. Do not these facts go far to confirm the independent conclusions of criticism as to the true text of the doxology in ch. v. 10, 11? And do they not tend to establish the conclusion, that the Elders were not Princes or representatives of the glorified Church, but Princes of the heavenly hosts—of unfallen spirits? And it may also be asked, if this view does not give a unity to this Heaven scene, and to all the scenes of the Apocalyptic visions, entirely lacking on the hypothesis generally accepted.—E. R. C.]

* [The following view of Wordsworth can hardly be accepted as a complete explanation: "This adjunct (thunders) confirms the opinion that St. John is here speaking of God's word. Thunder is the voice of God. St. John himself, as a preacher of God's word, was named by Christ 'a son of thunder.'"—E. R. C.]

down judgment on the head of Israel's foes, Ps. lxxvii. 18, 19. Job finds his prostrating judgment, but also his reconciliation, in a grand thundering of God, chs. xxxviii.—xl. As thunder accompanied the giving of the Law, so the voice which answered Christ's prayer in the Temple, the prayer with which He consecrated Himself to death for our redemption, was accompanied by a tone as of thunder. And the more tremendous the wrathful judgment announced in the thunder, according to Jer. xxv. 30, the more distinct is its proclamation of a new redemption for the people of God; comp. Joel ii. 11. As Elijah, like Moses, was an Old Testament son of thunder, ascending to Heaven in a fiery storm, so two of the greatest Apostles of the New Testament were sons of thunder. And how glorious is the description of the seven-fold thunder of God in Psalm xix., the festal thunder-Psalm! This, therefore, is the sense in which we apprehend the thunders of God; they are heavenly, uncheckable, redemptive revelations, accompanied by judgments—in other words, reformations.

And seven Lamps [torches]* of fire burning before the Throne.—[See SYNOPSIS VIEW, p. 148.—E. R. C.] We cannot refer the participle καυόμεναι to the preceding ἐκροπεύοντες; for the Lights, as such, do not issue forth like lightnings, and the Spirits of God do not proceed from His Throne, but from Himself. By the Seven Spirits that, according to ch. i., stand between Jehovah and Christ, and, according to ch. v. 6, go forth into all lands, we understand the seven fundamental forms of the revelation of the Holy Ghost through Christ, according to Is. xi. 1, or the seven archangelic forms of Christ.

[“These seem to represent the Holy Spirit in His seven-fold working: in His enlightening and cheering as well as His purifying and consuming agency. So most Commentators.”—ALFORD. The idea of the seven-fold influences of the Holy Ghost is thus set forth in the ordination hymn of the Church of England:

“Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire,
And lighten with celestial fire;
Thou the anointing Spirit art,
Who dost Thy seven-fold gifts impart.”

It may here be remarked, that in the view of the Am. Ed. (see PRELIMINARY NOTE, p. 145 sqq.) the simulacrum of the Seven Lamps constitute one (compound) Mediate-individual Symbol of the Holy Ghost; the division being significant of His manifold energies, and the seven-fold division, of the completeness, the perfection of those energies.—E. R. C.]

According to De Wette, the Seven Spirits are significant of the Spirit of God as the principle of physical and spiritual life, through Whom the inner influence of God over nature and mankind operates. According to Ebrard, also, the Spirit of God, in all His distinct properties, is denoted, in so far as He rules over the creation. According to Hengstenberg, on the other hand, the πύρ—fire being invariably used in the Apocalypse to designate the Divine wrath (? comp. ch. xv. 2)—here denotes the Spirit of God or of Christ with a limitation, i. e., “in so far as His operations are productive of ruin, are punitive, destructive.” To this view Düsterdieck justly opposes the remark, that the Apocalyptist is speaking of torches (λαμπάδες). This word is doubtless expressive of the enlightening effect of God's Spirit.

The contrast between the lightnings, voices, thunders, which issue forth from the Throne, and the lights which are stationary before it, has been explained by De Wette in a manifold way. He suggests the dogmatical distinction of manifestations and inspirations, the distinction between the evangelical history and the outpouring of the Holy Ghost. The thunder slowly dies away in the great echoes of the world's history; but the light [λαμπάς] becomes a morning star in the heart—in the realm of the interior history of the Kingdom, therefore; and when the Spirit can complete His judgment as the Spirit, that judgment becomes a redemptive judgment.

Ver. 6. Before the Throne as it were a glassy sea [sea of glass].—[See SYNOPSIS VIEW, p. 148.—E. R. C.] The meaning of this is easily gathered from the two items, sea and crystal—national life and transparent, spiritualized creaturalty. Hence the interpretation of Aretius comes very near the point: cætus ecclesies triumphantis. Similarly Ebrard, p. 225. The interpretations—some of which are quite singular—of this passage are also, in many respects, characteristic. We cite some of them: Baptism (the baptismal basin); the Holy Scriptures; the perishable world; the smooth and shining heavenly pavement; the atmosphere; or more abstract conceptions (certa dei voluntas, etc.). See Düsterdieck, p. 223. In ch. xv. 2 the crystal brightness of this sea is mingled with fire, or the appearance of fire, either because the victors have, in many ways, passed through the fire, or because the victorious Church contains the principle of the fire of the universal judgment. Düsterdieck, referring to Rinck, maintains that the crystal-like sea is identical with the crystal-like river of ch. xxii.; but this view is untenable. The purity, transparency, spirituality of this sea is doubly asserted when it is declared to be both glassy and like crystal. According to Hengstenberg, the crystal sea is another image of the judgments of God. “Opposed to the flood of human wickedness is the great flood, the broad ocean of Divine judgments.”

[The following from Alford is worthy of highest consideration: “Compare, by way of contrast, ἡ καθήμενη ἐπὶ (τῶν) ὑδάτων (τῶν) πολλῶν, the multitudinous and turbulent waters, ch. xvii. 1. In seeking the explanation of this, we must first track the image from its Old Testament earlier usage. (He compares Exod. xxiv. 10; Ezek. i. 22, and Job xxxvii. 10). If we are to follow these indices, the primary reference will be to the clear ether in which the Throne of God is upborne; and the intent of setting this space in front of the Throne will be to betoken its separation and insulation from the place where the Seer stood, and, indeed, from all else around

* [“Seven torches of fire: λαμπάδες in this Book does not mean a lamp (see viii. 10), but a torch (comp. John xviii. 3); and these seven torches or flambeaux of fire burning before the Throne are contrasted with the Star which fell as a torch from Heaven (viii. 10); comp. Weistheit I, p. 607; and Trach. sign. N. T., p. 133.” WORDSWORTH.—E. R. C.]

it. The material and appearance of this pavement of the Throne seem chosen to indicate majestic repose and ethereal purity. . . . It is the purity, calmness, and majesty of God's rule which are signified by the figure." Wordsworth, who adopts the idea that the sea of glass was symbolical of the glorified Church, thus writes: "Sea, in this Book, represents the element of tumult and confusion in this lower world (see xiii. 1). But here, by way of contrast, there is in the heavenly Church a sea of glass, expressive of smoothness and brightness, and this heavenly sea is of crystal; declaring that the calm of Heaven is not like earthly seas, ruffled by winds, but is crystallized into an eternity of peace."

Here, it may be asked, may not the glassy sea be an Immediate symbol, indicating a real pavement in the real Heaven spreading out before the Throne; but at the same time aberrantly significant of the unapproachable grandeur of Him who sits upon the Throne, and (perhaps) of the peace, stability, and brightness of His rule? Similar questions might be asked in regard to other symbols, which generally are explained as merely Aberrant.—E. R. C.]

In the midst of the Throne and round about the Throne four living-beings [Lange: life-forms].—[See SYNOPTICAL VIEW, p. 138; and also ADDITIONAL NOTE ON THE LIVING-BEINGS, by the Am. Ed., p. 161 sq.] According to Eichhorn, Ewald I., and Hengstenberg, "the hinder part (of the eagle, and the human figure, as well as the others?) of the four ζῷα lay under the Throne, whilst the upper portion of them projected from beneath it and rose above it." "An idea which, for the sake of its unsightliness, if on no other account, should not be imputed to John. According to Ebrard, the Throne is transparent, and the ζῷα move within it and issue forth from it." (DÜSTERD.) IDEM: "One on each side of the Throne, and each in the middle of its respective side." If the Throne be significant of the Divine sovereign rule, the beasts [Living-beings], as individual Fundamental Forms of this government, must issue neither from the foot nor from the summit of the Throne, but from its mid-height, as from the centre of the Divine governance; see above. According to Bengel and Hengstenberg, the four beasts [Living-beings] are emblems of nature or the earth, or of the creation, according to Düsterd.* According to Ebrard, they are the creative powers of God Himself, by means of which He exercises a sovereign sway throughout creation (like the lightnings, etc.). Against Ebrard's interpretation of the beasts [Living-beings] as representatives of the fourfold powers of God, see Düsterdieck, p. 228. The contrast, moreover, is by no means clearly defined.

The germ of the representation of the four Fundamental Forms of Divine Providence is contained in Gen. iii. 24. It is a view which, in constant process of development, runs through the whole of the Sacred Writings; see Ex. xxv. 18; Ps. xviii. 10; (comp. Ps. civ. 4; Is. vi. 2);

Ps. xcix. 1; Ezek. i. and x., etc. Riehm, De natura et notione Cheruborum, 1861. Lämmert, Die Cherubim der Heiligen Schrift, Jahrb. für deutsche Theologie, 12, 4, p. 587. The latter starts from the passage Heb. ix. 5, from the term Cherubim of glory. He beholds in the figure of the Cherubim "symbolical representations of the sovereign glory of God, keeping His holy law, overthrowing all that is hostile to Him, but rescuing all that have His laws before their eyes." The explication of the beasts [Living-beings], p. 615, reminds us of Ebrard's interpretation; it offers no inducement to us to depart from our own view as given above. We, therefore, regard the ox as expressive of the spirit of sacrifice; the lion as expressive of the spirit of irruptive victorious courage; the human figure as expressive of the spirit of human and humane sympathy; and the eagle as expressive of the spirit of ideality, of striving after the realization of the ideal (see Leben Jesu, I., p. 234; Dogmatik, 603).

Different interpretations: The four Evangelists (whose attributes they certainly are, but not their original symbols); the four cardinal virtues; the four patriarchal churches; the four greatest fathers of the Church; the four mysteries of faith, etc. The quaternary is manifestly the number of the world. The six wings likewise demand consideration; the eyes, all about, as well as within (directed inward); the restless motion, by day and by night, in eternal praise of the thrice Holy One. The senary of the wings is six in a good sense; restless activity which in its unity makes up the festal septenary (see John v. 17). The wings are symbolical of the absolute motion of the Divine governance toward higher and highest goals. The eyes represent the omniscient rule of Divine Providence, immanent in the life of the world, conscious on all sides. With an absolute round-look corresponds an absolute in-look, expressive of the contemplative concentration and unity of the Divine omniscience. According to Hengstenberg, the eyes are expressive of the permeation of the whole world by spirit; according to Düsterd., they are significant of wakefulness by day and night (of creaturely beings*); whilst the wings, as he thinks, denote the dependence and subjection of the creature. The praise continually offered by the four Life-forms, the Trisagion, reminds us of the song of praise of the Seraphim (Is. vi.), though it does not follow from this that the Cherubim and the Seraphim should be identified, as Lämmert thinks. These two symbolical angelic groups are undoubtedly connected; yet they also form an antithesis (Ps. civ. 4). See Com. on Genesis, p. 241 sq. [Am. Ed.]. Their hymn is expressive of the fact that the governance of God, in all its forms, redounds to His praise; to the praise of the glory, the glorious personality of God, Who is Jehovah, in an involved† expression (Who was, etc.), and Lord of Hosts (Sabaoth), as the All-Ruler, in an involved expression also.

* DE WETTE: These four creatures, as pre-eminent, the first two for strength, and the two others for knowledge, are representatives of all creatures (creatures—that rest not day or night?).

† [Mathematically involved, E. R. C.]

Vers. 9-11. [See SYNOPTICAL VIEW, p. 148 sqq.]. "With the representatives of the creation, the four beasts [Living-beings], the twenty-four Elders, the representatives of redeemed humanity, unite in the praise of God" (comp. De Wette, Hengstenberg, Ebrard). The contrast here presented, however, is not that of creation and redemption; neither is a union of voices intended. On the contrary, the actual eulogy of God in the Forms of His government, wakes the antiphony of praise on the heights of the human spirit-world. The future, ὅταν δόσωσιν, is declared by some commentators to be a pure future; whilst others apprehend it in a frequentative signification—when they, or as often as they. [This latter view is adopted by Wordsworth, Alford, Barnes, etc. See Winer, § 42, 5.—E. R. C.] The relation of priority, as pertaining to the song of praise of the Life-forms [Living-beings], is, however, also enwrapped in the term. They must strike the first notes. It is doubtless indicated, moreover, that there are particular epochs of praise.

Ver. 9. Give is a genuine theocratic term: to return that which is beheld or experienced, to its Author, as a spiritual sacrifice.

Glory and honor.—Düsterdieck: Recognition of the glory and honor peculiar to the Lord, "whilst καὶ εὐχαριστίαν denotes directly, without metonymy, the thanks (Hengstenberg) offered by the creature." This under the supposition that the δοξα are creatures. If, however, they be Ground-forms of the Divine glory or δόξα in its governance, τιμὴ may denote the objective side of this governance over human souls, and εὐχαριστία its subjective side in human souls. Comp. the Doxologies, ch. v. 12, 13; vii. 10, 12; x. 6.

To Him that sitteth upon the Throne.—In face of all the terrors of the last times, the Spirit of this prophecy is not afraid that the Throne of God will ever totter. As God lives into the sons of the sons, i. e., into the great sons which are composed of lesser sons (analogue of the Heaven of Heavens), and lives absolutely, so He survives all enemies upon whom the first and second deaths shall prey.

Ver. 10. The twenty-four Elders fall down—cast [down] their crowns.—An expression of enthusiastic reverence, prostration, self-abasement, in the recognition of the fact that to Him alone belongeth honor. [It is also expressive of their voluntary and grateful recognition of the fact that as Rulers they are subject to Him—that their authority is derived from, and continually dependent upon, Him.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 11. [Thou art worthy to take.—"The original signification of the word (λαμβάνω) is twofold; one, to take, the other, to receive" (LINDALL and SCOTT). Is not the fact that it was here used in the former of these senses, indicated by the exchange of δίδωμι for the εὐχαριστία of ver. 9? Jehovah receives the thanks which His creatures give; He takes the power that can be given Him by none. So far as δόξα and τιμὴ are concerned, there is an essential glory and honor which He takes and holds, and there is also an ascriptive glory and honor which His creatures may give and which He receives.—E. R. C.]

The glory.—The Elders say: τὴν δόξαν κ. τ. λ., because they are responding in a degree to ver. 8 (Bengel and Düsterd.) They seem antiphotically to translate the εὐχαριστία into δίδωμι; why is this? ΔΥΣΤΕΡΔΙΕΚ: The representatives of the creature must necessarily and justly return thanks, but the Elders looked upon the work of creation with a certain objectivity. See against this view ch. xi. 17. Even thanksgiving is a δίδωμι given of God (da quod jubet).* [See the preceding paragraph.—E. R. C.]

[For Thou hast created all things (τὰ πάντα—the all things, the universe).—The Elders here assign the reason why they esteemed Jehovah "worthy to take the glory, and the honor, and the power." Κρίξεν, like the Hebrew כָּרַם, which in the LXX. it is often used to translate, has not the distinctive meaning, to create ex nihilo; in 1 Cor. xi. 9, for instance, it manifestly has the signification: to form out of previously existing substance. It may, however, be restricted to the former meaning by the context, and this is clearly the case in this present instance—to make the all things, must mean to create them. And that this is the meaning, is confirmed by the following sentence (see below).—E. R. C.]

And on account of Thy will (not: by Thy will).—["Because Thou didst will it, . . . they were, i. e., they existed, as in contrast to their previous state of non-existence, . . . and received it (existence) from Thee by a definite act of Thine, ἐκτίσθαι." ALFORD after DÜSTERD.—E. R. C.] It is the teleologically higher conception that all things have come into being in order to the fulfillment and glorification of the Divine will (Rom. xi. 36). "Ὅταν is generally regarded as synonymous with ἐκτίσθαι." Düsterdieck makes this distinction: they were, and thus it is that they were—they were created. Almost the same idea again! Nic. de Lyra ingeniously distinguishes the eternal counsel of God and the actual creation. Grotius, with equal ingenuity, distinguishes birth and regeneration. Taking creation and redemption together, the doxology says: for the fulfillment of Thy will, they finally were, and were created (received their shape and impress) with a view to this ultimate design (see Rom. ix., comp. also Ebrard, p. 231).

Ch. v. 1. [And I saw.—"Notice that from the general vision, in the last chapter, of the heavenly Presence of God, the scene is so far only changed that, all that remaining as described, a particular incident is now seen for the first time, and is introduced by καὶ εἶδον." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

Ver. 1. On the right hand of Him that sitteth upon the Throne.—[See SYNOPTICAL VIEW, p. 149]. For a discussion of ἐπὶ τὴν δεξιάν, in opposition to Ebrard's view, see Düsterd., p. 234. ["The right hand was open, and the book lay on the open hand." ALFORD.—E. R. C.]

A scroll.—The book [scroll], βιβλίον, was in the Hebrew form of a roll (not in the form of a Roman document, as Husccke maintains).

[In answer to the question, "What is represented by this Book?" Alford presents seven different opinions, which may be condensed as follows: 1. The Old Testament, or the Old and New conjoined (Orig., Euseb., Epiph., Hippol., Victor., August., Tichon., Bede, Hilary, Jerome, Joachim, Greg. the Great, Haymo, Ansbert). 2. Christ Himself (Hilary [*], Heterius, Paschasius). 3. Libellus repudiū a Deo scriptus nationi Judaicæ (Wetstein). 4. Sententiam a Iudice et patribus ejus conscriptus in hortis ecclesiæ conceptam (Schöttgen and Hengstenberg). 5. That part of the Apocalypse which treats of the opening of the seven seals, chs. vi.-xi. (Alcasar). 6. The Apocalypse itself (Corn. a-Lap.). 7. "Divinæ providentiæ concilium et præfinitio, quæ apud Se statuit et decrevit facere vel permittere, etc." (Areth., Vitringa, Mede, Ewald, De Wette, Stern, Düsterd., et al.). The last he declares to be, in the main, his own view. See also SYNOPTICAL VIEW.—E. R. C.]

Within and on the back.—The idea of a great leaf-roll, covered with writing on both sides, is here presented. Similar descriptions in classical literature; see in Düsterd. ["According to ancient usage, a parchment roll was first written on the inside, and if the inside was filled with writing, then the outside was used, or back part of the roll; and if that also was covered with writing, and the whole available space was occupied, the book was called opistho-graphos (written on the back-side; Lucian, Vit. Auction. 9, Plin. Epist. iii. 5), or written 'in aversa cartâ,' Martial, viii. 22." WORDSWORTH.—E. R. C.]

The book [scroll] has no vacant places, for the world's history is great, and in Heaven everything is foreseen even to the very end. The explanation of the whole passage is by no means as easy as Düsterdieck and others seem to think. It is not easy to demonstrate how a single leaf could be unsealed without the simultaneous loosing of all its seals, or how the loosing of a single seal could have freed only a single division of the leaf.* And therefore we, with Vitringa (De Wette?) and others, adopt the idea of seven membranes or leaves, of which each one was separately sealed. Further, we reject the view which conceives of the book [scroll] as directly embracing the whole Apocalypse. It of course embraces it implicitly, but explicitly its contents are exhausted with the sixth chapter, inasmuch as the seventh seal, on being opened, gives place to a new vision and introduces a new group of pictures. We can, indeed, say that as the seven churches preside over the seven seals, so the latter preside over the seven trumpets; nevertheless, not only do trumpets and seals form distinct groups, but the seals, as forms of secrecy or mystery, constitute a perfect antithesis to the trumpets. We must particularly note here the idea of the seal (secrecy and security at once, Is. xxix. 11, etc.); that of the seven-fold seal (a sevenfold and hence sacred involution of both considerations); the idea of the book [scroll] (Ex. xxxii. 32; Ps. cxxxix. 16, etc.); finally, the idea of the writing on both sides.

"The idea that the βιβλίον is the Old Testament (Victorinus), or the whole of Sacred Writ, containing the New Testament within and the Old Testament without (Primas., Bede, Zeger) is founded upon mere guess-work." DÜSTERDIECK. Our comment upon this is that the contents are made known by the unsealing.

Ver. 2. And I saw a strong angel (ισχυρόν).*—To the world of Angels the world of the contrast of guilt and grace is a mysterious region (1 Pet. i. 12). Even to the strong Angels it is mysterious. And an anxiety is felt in the heavenly realms for a solution of this dark enigma of earth. Now, the research of the whole non-Christian spirit-world in regard to the great enigma of the world's history might itself be called a mighty Angel. The longing of all spirits and all men cannot solve this enigma, and it sends out its demand for a solution into the universe. And hence beneath the unmistakable proclamatory office of the strong Angel, whose voice must pierce the whole world (Vitringa and others), we hear the cry of the entire world of spirits for the coming of the looser of the seals. Without this loosing [Lösung] there can be no complete releasing [Erlösung, redemption], as, on the other hand, the loosing is conditioned by the releasing [or redemption]. According to De Wette and Hofmann, the loosing of the seals is at the same time the execution of that which is sealed. But a great part of the book [scroll] is referable to the economy of the Father—not to that of the Son: we have reference especially to the red, the black, and the pale horse. Even the Rabbinic declaration: non facit Deus quidquam, donec illud intuitus fuerit in familia superiori, does not lead to the assumption which we have indicated.†

Who is worthy?—The history of the world in its eschatological tendency is unsealed only by the perfect ethical power resident in the Lamb.

To open the scroll and to loose the seals of it.—Is this a hysteron-proteron (De Wette)? We think not. The undertaking is first spoken of as a whole, and then its details are entered into. And, moreover, it is highly probable that there was something that bound the book [scroll] together as a whole.

Ver. 3. Or under the earth.—All this is in perfect accordance with the real circumstances of the case. The angels know not sin; the spirits in Hades and the demons (under the earth) know not grace; and sinful men know not the depths of the contrast between sin and grace. According to Düsterdieck, the place under the earth denotes, not demons (Vitringa), but only departed souls. Why should demons be excluded, since they, most of all, are positively blind in regard to the issue of things?‡

* [The epithet ισχυρόν is by no means superfluous, but corresponds to the δυναμίς below, which, as appears by what followed, penetrated Heaven and earth and Hades.—ALFORD. This is one of the passages which indicate that there are grades of angelic beings.—E. R. C.]

† [That the loosing involved the symbolic execution of that which was sealed, seems to be clear. John beheld in vision (by symbols) that which was afterwards to be (in reality); (comp. ch. iv. 1 with the frequent recurrence of εἶδον). The fact stated by Lange cannot invalidate this conclusion. The "economy of the Father" was, so to speak, the platform on which the actions of the Son were wrought; in order to the unfolding of the latter there must have been, of necessity, an unfolding, to some degree, of the former, just as in the unfolding of a writing there must be the unfolding of the parchment on which it is inscribed.—E. R. C.]

* [See foot-note on p. 149.—E. R. C.]

And no one was able.—This takes for granted numberless attempts.

Nor even [neither] to look upon it.—Düsterdieck: "Tha seeing resultant upon the opening; hence, the seeing within it." This would be a great deal and would lie beyond the opening, whilst it is intimated that the inspecting precedes the opening. Most creatures dare not so much as look well at the problem, and none thoroughly recognizes it as a Divine book.

Ver. 4. And I wept much.—Hengstenberg, who is apt to see judgment everywhere, has even accused the weeping John of weak faith (p. 802); upon which view Ebrard sarcastically expatiates. It is particularly remarkable that Hengstenberg can conceive of a pusillanimous weeping as compatible with a condition of inspired vision. In this vision, John the Seer sees himself weeping as a bishop, and the weeping bishop has a right to weep. How could he receive a communication concerning the whole history of the world—a communication which exalted the most terrible things, war, famine, death's rule in the world's history, the great martyr history, and the dread trumpet tones of the world's evening, into one triumphal procession of Christ—how could he, we repeat, receive such a disclosure without tears? Perfect faith in the glorified Christ in the centre of the world did not exclude the law that the universal consequences of His glorification must be unfolded in a grand sequence of stages, amid the most painful apostolic and reformatory struggles!*

Ver. 5. One of the Elders.—The spirit of literalism has given birth to unsupported definitions of this Elder as Matthew or Peter (of course it is taken for granted that one or the other of these Apostles is already glorified).

Behold.—This, according to Düsterdieck, has reference to the beholding of the Lamb, in ver. 6.

The Lion of the Tribe of Judah, the Root of David, hath conquered.—John is to see, as he never has done before, the full consequence of Christ's victory in its relation to the grand enigma of the world's history.

Interpretations: 1. Christ has obtained the power of opening the book (ἐπέκρινεν ἀνοίγει, Bengel, Ewald and others). 2. Absoluteness of Christ's victory (Ebrard and others).

The text is, however, no mere declaration of Christ's worthiness to open the book. The opening of all seals is the consequence of absolute victory. For the sealing is a judgment, enaunt upon the darkening of the mystery of the world into an obscure and forbidding enigma by sin.† Consequently, victory over the power of darkness is the condition of the loosing of the seals.

The Lion of the Tribe of Judah.—The promise of the Protevangel to the effect that the Seed of the woman should crush the serpent's head, was further modified by the prophecy which constituted Judah the typical conqueror, the victorious Lion (Gen. xlix. 9). The fact that in the passage cited Judah was designated merely as a type, is brought out in our text by the additional clause: the Root of David. These latter words are expressive of the further explication of the type, in respect of its genealogical kernel, in David, the warlike and victorious prince; in other words, it is intimated, that the Incarnation of Christ was the innermost motive power of the Christological significance of David (Is. xi. 10), and consequently that the type of the Lion of Judah has found its true fulfilment.
